THE TRANSLATOR TO the Reader.

GOOD Reader, heere is now offered you the fift time printed in Engliſh M. Caluins booke of the Inſtitution of Chriſtian Religion; a booke of great labour to the Author, and of great profit to the Church of God. M. Caluin firſt wrote it when he was a yong man, a booke of a ſmall volume, and ſince that ſeaſon he hath at ſundry times publiſhed it with new increaſes, ſtill proteſting, at euery edition, himſelfe to be one of thoſe qui ſcribendo proficiunt, & proficiendo ſcribunt, which with their writing doe grow in profiting, and with their profiting do proceed in writing. At length, hauing in many his other works trauelled about expoſition of ſundry books of the Scriptures, and in the ſame finding occaſion to diſcourſe of ſundry Common places and matters of doctrine, which being handled according to the occaſions of the Text that were offered him and not in any other method, were not ſo ready for the Readers vſe, he therefore entred into this purpoſe to inlarge this booke of Inſtitutions, and therein to treat of all thoſe Titles and Common places largely, with this intent, that whenſoeuer any occaſion fell in his other books to treat of any ſuch cauſe, he would not newly amplifie his books of Commentaries and Expoſitions therewith, but referre his Reader wholly to this Store-houſe and Treaſurie of that ſort of Diuine learning. As age and weakneſſe grew vpon him, ſo he haſtened his labour; and according to his petition to God, he in a manner ended his life with his worke: for he liued not long after. So great a iewell was meet to be made moſt beneficiall, that is to ſay, applied to moſt common vſe. Therefore in the very beginning of the late Queenes moſt bleſſed raigne I tranſlated it out of Latine into Engliſh, for the commoditie of the Church of Chriſt, at the ſpeciall requeſt of my deere friends of worthy memory Reginald Wolfe and Edward Whitchurch; the one her Maieſties Printer for the Hebrew, Greeke, and Latine tongues, the other her Highneſſe Printer of the Booke of Common prayer. I performed my worke in the houſe of my ſaid friend Edward Whitchurch, a man well knowen to be of vpright heart and dealing, an ancient zealous Goſpeller, as plain & true a friend as euer I knew liuing, and as deſirous to do any thing to cõmon good, ſpecially by the aduancement of true Religion. At my ſaid firſt edition of this booke I conſidered how the Author thereof had of long time purposely laboured to write the same most exactly, and to packe great plentie of matter in small roome of words, yea and those so circumspectly and precisely ordered, to auoid the cauillations of such, as for enmitie to the truth therein contained, would gladly seeke and abuse all aduantages which might be found by any ouersight in penning of it, that the sentences were thereby become so full as nothing might well be added without idle superfluitie, and againe so nicely pared, that nothing could be minished without taking away some necessarie substance of matter therein expressed. This manner of writing, beside the peculiar termes of artes and figures, and the difficultie of the matters themselues, being thorowout interlaced with the Schoolemens controuersies, made a great hardnesse in the Authors owne booke, in that tongue wherein otherwise he is both plentifull and easie, insomuch that it sufficeth not to reade him once, vnlesse you can be content to reade in vaine. This consideration encombred me with great doubtfulnesse for the whole order and frame of my translation. If I should follow the words, I saw that of necessitie the hardnesse in the translation must needs be greater than was in the tongue wherein it was originally written. If I should leaue the course of words, and grant my selfe libertie after the naturall manner of mine owne tongue, to say that in English which I conceiued to be his meaning in Latine, I plainly perceiued how hardly I might escape errour, and on the other side, in this matter of faith and religion, how perillous it was to erre. For I durst not presume to warrant my selfe to haue his meaning without his words. And they, that wote what it is to translate well and faithfully, specially in matters of religion, do know that not the only Grammaticall construction of words sufficeth, but the verie building and order to obserue all aduantages of vehemence or grace, by placing or accent of words, maketh much to the true setting foorth of a writers minde. In the end, I rested vpon this determination, to follow the words so neere as the phrase of the English tongue would suffer me. Which purpose I so performed, that if the English booke were printed in such paper and letter as the Latine is, it should not exceed the Latine in quantitie. Whereby, beside all other commodities that a faithfull translation of so good a worke may bring, this one benefit is moreouer prouided for such as are desirous to attaine some knowledge of the Latine tongue (which is at this time to be wished in many of those men for whose profession this booke most fitly serueth), that they shall not finde any more English than shall suffice to construe the Latine withall, except in such few places, where the great difference of the phrases of the languages enforced me: so that comparing the one with the other, they shall both profit in good matter, and furnish themselues with vnderstanding of that speech, wherein the greatest treasures of knowledge are disclosed. In the doing heereof, I did not only trust mine owne wit or abilitie, but examined my whole doing from sentence to sentence thorowout the whole booke with conference and ouerlooking of such learned men, as my translation being allowed by their iudgement, I did both satisfie mine owne conscience that I had done truly, and their approouing of it might be a good warrant to the Reader, that nothing should heerein be deliuered him but sound, vnmingled, and vncorrupted doctrine, euen in such sort as the Authour himselfe had first framed it. All that I wrote, the graue, learned, and vertuous man M. Dauid Whitehead

(whom I name with honourable remembrance) did, among other, compare with the Latine, examining euerie ſentence thorowout the whole booke. Beſide all this, I priuatly required many, and generally all men with whom I euer had any talke of this matter, that if they found any thing either not truly tranſlated, or not plainly Engliſhed, they would enforme me thereof, promiſing either to ſatisfie them or to amend it. Since which time I haue not been aduertiſed by any man of any thing which they would require to be altered. Neither had I my ſelfe, by reaſon of my profeſſion being otherwiſe occupied, any leaſure to peruſe it. And that is the cauſe, why not only at the ſecond and third time, but alſo at this impreſſion, you haue no change at all in the worke, but altogether as it was before. Indeed I perceiued many men well minded and ſtudious of this booke, to require a Table for their eaſe and furtherance. Their honeſt deſire I haue fulfilled in the ſecond edition, and haue added thereto a plentifull Table, which is alſo heere inſerted, which I haue tranſlated out of the Latine, wherein the principall matters diſcourſed in this booke are named by their due titles in order of Alphabet, and vnder euery title is ſet forth a brieſe ſumme of the whole doctrine taught in this booke concerning the matter belonging to that title or common place: and therewith is added the booke, chapter, and ſection or diuiſion of the chapter, where the ſame doctrine is more largely expreſſed and proued. And for the readier finding thereof, I haue cauſed the number of the chapters to be ſet vpon euery leafe in the booke, and quoted the ſections alſo by their due number with the vſuall figures of Algoriſme. And now at this laſt publiſhing, my friends by whoſe charge it is now newly imprinted in a Romane letter and ſmaller volume, with diuers other Tables, which ſince my ſecond edition were gathered by M. Marlorate, to be tranſlated and heere added for your benefit. Moreouer, whereas in the firſt edition the ill maner of my ſcribling hand, the interlining of my coppie, and ſome other cauſes well knowen among workemen of that facultie, made verie many faults to paſſe the Printer, I haue in the ſecond impreſſion cauſed the booke to be compoſed by the printed coppie, and corrected by the written: whereby it muſt needs be that it was much more truly done than the other was, as I my ſelfe doe know aboue three hundred faults amended. And now at this laſt printing, the compoſing after a printed coppie bringeth ſome eaſe, and the diligence vſed about the correction, hauing been right faithfully looked vnto, it can not be but much more truly ſet forth. This alſo is performed, that the volume being ſmaller, with a letter faire and legible, it is of more eaſie price, that it may be of more common vſe, and ſo to more large communicating of ſo great a treaſure to thoſe that deſire Chriſtian knowledge for inſtruction of their faith, and guiding of their duties. Thus on the Printers behalfe and mine, your eaſe and commoditie (good Readers) is prouided for. Now reſteth your owne diligence for your owne profit in ſtudying it. To ſpend many words in commending the worke it ſelfe, were needleſſe: yet thus much I thinke I may both not vntruly and not vainly ſay, that though many great learned men haue written books of Common places of our Religion, as Melanthon, Sarcerius, and other, whoſe works are very good and profitable to the Church of God: yet by the conſenting iudgement of thoſe that vnderſtand the ſame, there is none to be compared to this worke of Caluine, both for his ſubſtantiall ſufficiencie of doctrine, the ſound declaration of trueth in Articles of our Religion, the large and learned confirmation of the ſame, and the moſt deepe and ſtrong confutation of all olde and new hereſies: ſo that (the holy Scriptures excepted) this is one of the moſt profitable books for all ſtudents of Chriſtian Diuinitie. Wherein (good Readers) as I am glad for the glorie of God, and for your benefit, that you may haue this profit of my trauell; ſo I beſeech you let me haue this vſe of your gentleneſſe, that my doings may be conſtrued to ſuch good end as I haue meant them: and that if any thing miſlike you by reaſon of hardneſſe, or any other cauſe that may ſeeme to be my default, you will not forthwith condemne the worke, but reade it oftener: in which doing you will finde (as many haue confeſſed to me that they haue found by experience that thoſe things which at the firſt reading ſhall diſpleaſe you for hardneſſe, ſhall be found ſo eaſie as ſo hard matter would ſuffer, and for the moſt part more eaſie than ſome other phraſe which ſhould with greater looſeneſſe and ſmoother ſliding away deceiue your vnderſtanding. I confeſſe indeed it is not finely and pleaſantly written, nor carrieth with it ſuch delightfull grace of ſpeech as ſome geat wiſe men haue beſtowed vpon ſome fooliſher things, yet it containeth ſound truth ſet forth with faithfull plainneſſe without wrong done to the Authors meaning: and ſo if you accept and vſe it, you ſhall not faile to haue great profit thereby, and I ſhall thinke my labour verie well imployed.

THOMAS NORTON.

TO THE MOST MIGHTY AND NOBLE PRINCE, FRANCISCE THE MOST CHRISTIAN KING THE French King his Soueraigne Lord, IOHN CALVINE wisheth peace and saluation in Christ.

WHen I did first set my hand to this worke, I thought nothing lesse (most noble king) than to write any thing that afterward should be presented to your maiestie. Onely my minde was to teach certaine introductions, whereby they that are touched with some zeale of religion might be instructed to true godlinesse. And this trauell I tooke principally for my countreymen the Frenchmen, of whom I vnderstood very many to hunger and thirst for Christ, but I saw very few that had rightly receiued so much as any little knowledge of him. And that this was my meaning, the booke it selfe declareth, being framed after a simple and plaine maner of teaching. But when I perceiued, that the furious rage of some wicked men hath so farre preuailed in your Realme, that in it there is no roome for sound doctrine: I thought I should doe a thing woorth my trauell, all in one worke both to giue an instruction for them, and to declare a confession to you: whereby yee may learne what maner of doctrine that is, against which those furious men burne in so great rage, who at this day trouble your realme with sword and fire. For I will not feare to confesse, that I haue in this worke comprehended in maner the summe of that selfesame doctrine against which they crie out, that it ought to be punished with prisonment, banishment, condemnation without indgement, and with fire, that it ought to be chased away by land & sea. I know indeed with how hainous informations they haue filled your minde and eares, to make our cause most hateful vnto you: but this of your clemencie ought you to weigh, that there shal be no innocencie, neither in words nor deeds, if it may be enough to accuse. Truely, if any, to bring the same in hatred shall alledge that this doctrine whereof I go now about to yeeld account vnto you, hath been long agoe condemned by consent of all degrees, and attainted by many indgements already giuen in iudiciall courts, all that he saith shall amount to no more but that it hath partly beene violently throwne downe by the banding and power of the aduersaries thereof, and partly beene traiterously and fraudulently oppressed with their lies and subtle practises and slanders. Herein is violence shewed, that without hearing the cause, bloodie sentences are pronounced against it: herein is fraud, that it is without deserning accused of sedition and euill dooing. And that none may thinke that we wrongfully complaine of these things, you your selfe can beare witnes, most noble king, with how lying slanders it is daily accused vnto you: as, that it tendeth to no other end but to withdraw from kings their scepters out of their hands, to throwe downe all iudges seates and indgements, to subuert al orders and ciuil gouernment, to trouble the peace & quiet of the people, to abolish all lawes, to vndoe all proprieties and possessions, finally to turne all things vpside downe. And yet you heare the smallest portion. For horrible things they spread abroad among the people: which if they were true, the whole world might worthily inuege it with the maintainers therof, worthie of a thousand fires and gallowes. Who can now marueil that a common hatred is kindled against it, where such most wrongfull accusations are beleeued? Lo, this is the cause that all degrees agree and conspire to the condemning of vs and our doctrine. They that sit to iudge, being ravished with this affection pronounce for sentences their forecontemned determinations which they brought from home with them: and thinke that they haue well enough discharged their duties, if they command no man to be drawen to execution, but such as are found guiltie either by their owne confession or by sufficient witnesse. But of what fault? of that condemned doctrine, say they. But by what law condemned? Herein should haue stood the succour of defence for them, not to denie the doctrine it selfe, but to maintaine it for true. But heere is all libertie once to mutter, vtterly cut off from vs.

Wherefore I do not vniustly require, most victorious King, that it may please you to take into your owne hand the whole hearing of the cause which hitherto hath been troublesomly handled or rather carelesly tossed without all order of lawe, more by outragious heate than iudiciall grauitie. Neither yet thinke, that I heere go about to make mine owne priuat defence, whereby I may procure to my selfe a safe returne into my native countrie, to which although I beare such affection of naturall loue as becommeth me: yet as the case now is, I not miscontentedly want it. But I take vpon me the common cause of all the godly, yea and the cause of Christ himselfe, which at this day hauing beene by all meanes torne and troden downe in your kingdome, lieth as it were in dispaired case, and that indeede rather by the tyrannie of certaine Pharisees than by your owne knowledge. But how that commeth to passe, it is not heere needfull to tell: truely it lieth in great distresse. For thus farre haue the vngodly preuailed, that the truth of Christ, if it be not destroyed being chased away and scattered abroad, yet it lieth kidden as buried and vnregarded: as for the sillie poore Church, it is either wasted with cruel slaughters, and so driuen away with banishments, or dismaied with threates and terrors, that it dare not once open her mouth. And yet still they continue with such rage and fiercenesse as they are woont, thrusting strongly against the wall already bending and the ruine which themselues haue made. In the meane time no man steppeth foorth, to set himselfe in defence against such furies. And they, if there be any such, that will most of all seeme to fauour the truth, say no more but that it were good to pardon the error and vnskilfulnesse of ignorant men. For thus the good natured men forsooth do speake, calling that error and vnskilfulnesse which they knew to be the most certaine truth of God: calling them ignorant men, whose wit they see that Christ hath not so despised but that he hath vouchsaued to communicate to them the mysteries of his heauenly wisedome. So much are all ashamed of the Gospell. It shall be your office (most noble King) not to turne away your eares nor your mind from so iust a defence: specially when so great a matter is in question: namely how the glorie of God may be maintained safe in earth, how the truth of God may keepe her honor, how Christ may haue his kingdome preserued whole among vs. This is a matter worthie for your eares, worthie for your iudgement, worthie for your royall throne: For, euen this thought maketh a true king to acknowledge himselfe in the gouernance of his kingdome to be the minister of God. Neither doth he now vse a kingdome but a robberie, which reigneth not to this end that he may serue the glory of God. And he is deceiued that looketh for a long prosperitie of that kingdom, which is not ruled by the scepter of God, that is, by his holie word: forasmuch as the heauenly Oracle cannot proue vaine, whereby it is proclaimed, that the people shall be scattered abroad where prophecie faileth. Neither ought the contempt of our baseneſſe to withdraw you from this purpose. We verily know right well, how poore and abiect sillie men we be, namely in the sight of God miserable sinners, in the sight of men most despised persons, yea and (if you will) certaine excrements and outcasts of the world, or whatsoeuer viler thing may be named: so that there remaineth nothing for vs to glorie vpon before God, but his onely mercie whereby we are without any our deseruing receiued into the hope of eternall saluation: and before men, nothing but our weakenesse, which among them it is taken for a most great shame to confesse so much as in countenance. But our doctrine must be aduanced lie aboue all glorie of the world, must stand vnuanquishable aboue all power: because it is not ours, but the doctrine of the liuing God and of his Christ, whome the Father hath appointed king to beare rule euen from sea to sea, and from the riuers euen to the ends of the earth: and so to beare rule, that striking the whole earth with the onely rod of his mouth, he may breake it with all the iron and brasen strength, with all the golden and siluer glistering thereof, as it were potters vessels: as the prophets prophecie of the roialtie of his kingdome. Our aduersaries in deede do crie out to the contrarie, and say that we falsly pretend the word of God, whereof we be most wicked corrupters. But how this is not onely a malicious sclaunder, but also a notable shamelesnesse, you your selfe by reading our confession, may according to your wisedome iudge. Yet heere it is also good to say somewhat, either to moone you to willingnesse and heedfulnesse, or at the least to prepare you a way to the reading of it. Paul, when he willed all prophecie to be framed to the agreeablenesse of faith, hath set a most sure rule whereby the expounding of Scripture ought to be tried. Now if our doctrine be examined by this rule of faith, the victorie is alreadie in our hands. For what doth better or more fitlie agree with faith, than to acknowledge our selues naked of all vertue, that of God we may be clothed? emptie of all good, that of him we may be filled? the bondseruants of sinne, that of him we may be made free? blind, that of him we may be enlightened? lame, that of him we may be made streight? feeble, that of him we may be vpholden? to take from our selues all matter of glorying, that he alone may be glorious onely, and in him we may glorie? Woen we say these and such like things, they interrupt vs and crie out, that by this meane is ouerthrowen I wot not what blind light of nature, fained preparations, free-will, works meritorious of eternall saluation, together with their supererogations: because they cannot abide that the whole praise and glorie of all goodnes, vertue, righteousnes, and wisedome should remaine in God. But we read not that they were blamed that haue drawen too much out of the fountaine of liuing water: on the contrary side they are sharply rebuked which haue digged to themselues pits, broken pits, which are not able to hold water. Againe, what is more agreeable with faith, than to promise to themselues that God will be to them a fauourable Father, where Christ is acknowledged to be a brother and procurer of fauour? than assuredlie to looke for all things ioyfull and prosperous at his hand, whose vnspeakeable loue toward vs hath proceeded so farre, that he hath not spared his onely begotten Sonne, but that he gaue him for vs? than to rest in sure looking for saluation and eternall life, where we thinke vpon Christ giuen of the Father, in whom such treasures are hidden? Heere they step in against vs, and crie out that this certaintie of affiance is not without arrogancie and presumption. But as nothing of our selues, so all things ought we to presume of God: and we are for none other reason spoiled of vaine glorie, but that we should learne to glorie in the Lord. What is there more? Consider (most mightie Prince) all the parts of our cause, and thinke that we are worse than any kind of wicked men, vnlesse you plainely finde that we are in trouble and railed at, because we put our trust in the liuing God: because we beleeue that this is the eternall life, to know one true God, and him whom he hath sent Iesus Christ. For this hope, some of vs are bound in irons, some are whipped, some are carried about in mockage, some are condemned without iudgement, some are most cruelly tormented, some escape away by flight: but all are distressed with trouble, all are most terriblie accursed, torne with slanders, and handled in most hainous wise. Now looke vpon our aduersaries (I speake of the degree of Priests, at whose becke and will the other exercise enimities against vs) and consider with me a little while, with what zeale they be carried. As for the true religion, which is taught in the Scriptures, and which ought to be holden certaine among all men, they easilie giue leaue both to themselues and other to be ignorant of it, to neglect and despise it: and they thinke that it maketh small matter what euery man beleeue or not beleeue concerning God and Christ, so that he doe with an vnexpressed faith (as they call it) submit his mind to the iudgement of the Church: neither are they much mooued, if it happen that the glory of God be defiled with manifest blasphemies, so that no man lift vp his finger against the supremacie of the Apostolike sea, and authoritie of our holie mother the Church. Why therefore doe they with so great crueltie and fiercenesse fight for the Masse, Purgatorie, Pilgrimages, and such trifles, so farre foorth, that they say that without most expressed faith (as I may so call it) of these things, godlinesse cannot stand, whereas yet they proone not that any of these things come out of the word of God. Why so? but because their bellie is their god, their kitchen is their religion: which being taken away, they thinke that they shall not onely be no Christians, but also no men. For though some of them doe plenteously glut themselues, and other some liue with gnawing of poore crusts, yet they liue all of one Pot, which without these warming helps should not onely waxe cold, but also throughly freeze. Therfore how much more euerie of them is carefull for his belly, so much more earnest warriour he is for their faith. Finally nally they all endeuour themselues to this, to keepe still either both kingdome safe, and their belly full: but of pure zeale none of them sheweth any token, be it neuer so little. Neither yet so doe they cease to slander our doctrine, and by all the colours that they can, to accuse and defame it, whereby they may bring it into hatred or suspicion. They call it new, and lately forged: they cauill that it is doubtfull, and vncertaine: they demand by what miracles it is confirmed: they aske whether it be meete that it should preuaile against the consent of so many holie fathers, and the most ancient custome: they presse vpon vs to confesse it to be schismaticall, which mooueth warre against the Church, or that the Church hath lien dead in manie ages in which no such thing hath beene heard off. Last of all they say that there neede no arguments, for (say they) it may by the fruites be iudged of what sort it is, namely which hath bred so huge a heape of sects, so many turmoiles of seditions, so great licentiousnesse of vices. Truely full easie it is for them, to triumph vpon a forsaken cause before the light-beleeuing and ignorant multitude. But if we might also haue our turne likewise allowed vs to speake, verily this sharp heate would soone be cooled wherwith they do so with full mouth and as licetiously as vnpunishedly foame against vs.

First, whereas they call it new, they doe great wrong to God, whose holie word deserued not to be accused of newnesse. To them indeede I nothing doubt that it is new, to whom Christ is new, and his Gospell is new. But they which knew that preaching of Paul to be old, that Iesus Christ died for our sinnes, and rose againe for our iustification, shall finde nothing new ameng vs. Whereas it hath long lien hidden, vnknowen, and buried: that is the fault of the vngodlinesse of men. Now sith it is by the bountifulnesse of God restored to vs, it ought at least by right of full restitution to receiue againe the title of ancientie.

Out of the same fountaine of ignorance springeth this, that they take it for doubtfull and vncertaine. This verily is it which the Lord by his Prophet complaineth, that the oxe knew his owner, and the asse his maisters stall, but his people knew not him. But howsoeuer they mocke at the vncertaintie of it: if they were driuen to seale their owne doctrine with their owne blond, and with losse of their life, men might see how much they set by it. But farre other is our assiance, which dreadeth neither the terrours of death, nor yet the very iudgement seate of God.

Esai.1.13.

Whereas they require miracles of vs, they deale vnreasonablie with vs. For we coine no new Gospell, but hold fast the selfe same Gospell, for confirming of the truth whereof all the myracles do serue that euer Christ and his Apostles haue done. But this thing they haue speciall aboue vs, that they can euen to this day confirme their faith with continuall miracles. Yea but rather they alleage myracles, which may weaken a mind otherwise well stablished: they are so either trifling and worthie to be laughed at, or vaine and lying. And yet, although they were neuer so monstrous, they ought not to haue beene of any value against the word of God: forasmuch as the name of God ought both in euerie place and at euerie time to be hallowed, whether it be by myracles or by naturall order of things. This false colour might peraduenture haue made the better shew, if the Scripture did not informe vs of the lawfull end and vse of miracles. For, Marke teacheth that the signes which followed the preaching of the Apostles were set foorth for the confirming of it: Likewise Luke also saith that the Lord did beare witnesse to the word of his grace, when signes and wonders were shewed by the hands of the Apostles. Wherewith wholly agreeth that saying of the Apostle, that when the Gospel was preached, saluation was confirmed by this, that the Lord did beare witnesse to it with signes, and wonders, and diuers powers. But those things which we heare to be the sealings of the Gospell, shall we turne to the destroying of the credit of the Gospell? those things which are appointed onely to stablish the truth, shall we applie to confirming of lies? Therefore it is meete that the doctrine, which (as the Euangelist saith) goeth before myracles, be first examined and tried. If that be allowed, then it may lawfully take confirmation of miracles. But of a true doctrine (as Christ teacheth) this is the marke, if it tend not to the seeking of the glorie of men, but of God. Sith Christ affirmeth this to be the proofe of doctrine, miracles are wrongfully esteemed which are drawen to any other end than to glorifie the name of God alone. And we ought to remember that sathan hath his myracles, which although they be iugling deceits rather than true powers, yet are such as may deceiue the ignorant and vnskilfull. Magicians and enchanters haue been alwaies famous in miracles: wonderfull miracles haue nouriished idolatrie: which yet doe not proue to vs, that the superstition of Magicians and idolaters is lawfull. And with this battering ram in old time the Donatists did shake the simplicitie of the common people, for that they excelled in miracles. Therefore we doe now make the same answer to our aduersaries,

Act.14.3.
Heb.2.4.

Iohn 7.18. and 8.50

which Augustine then made to the Donatists: that the Lord hath made vs warie against such miracle workers, when he foretold that there should come false prophets, which with lying signes and diuers woonders, should if it were possible, bring the elect into errour. And Paul hath giuen warning that the kingdome of Antichrist should be with all power, and signes, and lying wonders. But these myracles (say they) are done not of idols, not of sorcerers, not of false prophets, but of the saints. As though we knew not that this is the craft of satan, to transfigure himselfe into an angel of light. In old time the Ægyptians worshipped Ieremy which was buried among them, with sacrifices and other diuine honors. Did not they abuse the holy prophet of God to idolatry? And yet by such worshipping of his tombe, they obtained that they thought the healing of the stinging of the serpents to be the iust reward thereof. What shall we say: but that this hath beene and euer shall be the most iust vengeance of God, to send strength of illusion to them that haue not receiued the loue of truth, that they may beleeue lying? Therefore we want not miracles, and those certaine, and not subiect to cauillations. As for miracles which they bring foorth for themselues, they are meere illusions of satan, forasmuch as they lead away the people from the true worshipping of their God to vanitie.

2. Thes. 2. 11.

Moreouer, they do slanderously set the Fathers against vs (I meane the ancient Fathers and the writers of the age as yet more vncorrupted) as though they had them for maintainers of vngodlinesse: by whose authoritie if the debate were to be ended, the better part of the victorie (to speake euen most modestly) would bend to our side. But whereas many things haue beene excellently well and wisely written of those Fathers, and in some things, that hath happened to them which is wont to happen to men: these good naturall children forsooth, according to the rightnesse that they haue, both of wit, iudgement, and minde, do worship onely their faults and errors: and those things which are well spoken, they either marke not, or faigne as if they knew them not, or doe corrupt them: so as a man may say that their care was altogether to gather dung in the gold of the Fathers. Then they oppresse vs with importunate crying out against vs, as despisers and enemies of the Fathers. But we doe so not despise them, that if it were the matter of my present purpose, I could very easily proone by their consenting voices, the greater part of these things that we say at this day. But we so read their writings, that we alway remember, that all things are ours, to serue vs, not to haue dominion ouer vs: and that wee are Christes alone, whom we must obey in all things without exception. Who so keepeth not this choise, shall haue nothing certaine in Religion: forasmuch as those holy men were ignorant of many things, do oftentimes striue one with another, yea and sometimes fight with themselues. Not without cause (say they) we are warned of Salomon, that we passe not the old bounds which our fathers haue set. But there is not all one rule in the bounding of fields, and the obedience of faith, which ought to be so framed that it forget her people & the house of her Father. If they haue so great delight to vse allegories, why doe they not rather expound the Apostles, than any other to be their fathers, whose appointed bounds it is not lawfull to plucke vp? for so did Hierome expound it, whose words they haue registred among their Canons. But if they will haue the bounds of the same fathers, whom they meane, to be stedfastly kept: why doe they so oft as they list, so licentiously passe them? Of the number of the fathers were they, of whom the one said, that our God eateth not, nor drinketh, and that therefore he needeth neither cups nor dishes: the other said, that the holy things require not gold, and that those things please not with gold, which are not bought with gold. Therefore they passe the bound, which are in the holy things so much delighted with gold, siluer, iuorie, marble, precious stones, and silks, and thinke that God is not rightly worshipped, vnlesse altogether they be dissolutelie set out with exquisite gorgeousnesse, or rather with outragious excesse. A Father was he, which said, that he therefore did freely eate flesh on the day in which other abstained, because he was a Christian. Therefore they passe the bounds, when they accurse the soule that taſteth flesh in Lent. Fathers were they, of whom the one said, that a Monke which laboreth not with his hands, is iudged as euill as a violent taker, or (if you will) a robber: the other said, that it is not lawfull for Monks to liue of other mens goods, although they be continually busied in contemplations, in Prayers, in studie. This bound also they haue passed, when they placed the idle and barrell bellies of Monks in stewes and brothel houses to be fatted with other mens substance. A father was he, which said, that it is a horrible abomination to see any image painted, either of Christ or of any Saint in the temples of Christians. Neither was this pronounced by the mouth of one man alone, but also decreed by an Ecclesiasticall Councell, that that which is worshipped should not be painted on walls. They are farre from holding themselues within these bounds, when they leaue not one corner without images. Another Father counselled, that hauing done the dutie of naturall kindnesse toward the dead in burying them, we should let them rest. These bounds they breake, when they cast into men a continuall carefulnesse of the dead. One of the Fathers was he, which testifieth that the substance of bread and wine in the Sacrament of the Supper so remaineth and ceaseth not, as in the Lord Christ remaineth the substance and nature of man ioined with the substance of God. Therefore they passe measure, which faigne that after the words of the Lord rehearsed, the substance of bread and wine ceaseth, that it may be transubstantiate into his bodie and bloud. Fathers were they which as they deliuered to the whole Church but one sacrament of Thankesgiuing, and as they debarred from it wicked and haineus euill doers: so did greeuously condemne all those which being present, did not communicate of it. How farre haue they remooued these bounds, when they fill not onely Churches, but also priuate houses with their masses, and admit all men to looke vpon them, and euery man so much more gladly as he more largely paieth, how vncleane and wicked soeuer they be: but allure no man to faith in Christ and faithfull communicating of the Sacraments: yea rather doe beastingly set out to sale their owne worke for the grace and merit of Christ. Fathers were they, of whom the one decreed, that they should be altogether debarred from the vse of the holy Supper of Christ, which holding themselues contented with partaking of the one kinde, abstained from the other. And the other Father stoutly maintaineth, that to the Christian people the bloud of the Lord ought not to be denied, for the confession whereof they are commanded to shed their owne blond. These bounds also they haue taken away, when they haue by an inuiolable law commanded the selfe same thing which the one of these Fathers punished with excommunication, and the other reproued with a strong reason. A Father was he, which affirmed it to be rashnesse to determine any thing of a doubtfull matter on the one side or the other, without eleere and euident witnessings of the Scripture. This bound they forgot, when they stablished so many constitutions, so many canons, so many masterly determinations, without any word of God. A father was he, which among other heresies reproched Montanus with this, that he was the first that had charged men with lawes of fastings. This bound also they haue farre passed, when they commaunded fasting with most straight lawes. A father was he, which denied that marriage ought to be forbidden to ministers of the Church, and pronounced a mans lying with his owne wife to be chastitie: and Fathers were they, which agreed to his authoritie. Beyond these bounds haue they gone, when they seuerely enioined vnmarried life to their sacrificers. A father was he which iudged, that onely Christ ought to be heard, of whome it is said, Heare him: and that we ought not to haue regard, what other men which were before vs, haue said or done, but what Christ (which is the first of all) hath commaunded. This bound neither do they appoint to themselues, nor do suffer other to haue it appointed them, when they set both ouer themselues and other any masters whatsoeuer they be, rather than Christ. A Father was he, which affirmed that the Church ought not to set it selfe before Christ, because he alway iudged truly: but the iudges of the Church, as men, are commonly deceiued. They breaking through this bound also, stick not to affirme that the whole authoritie of the Scripture hangeth vpon the awardment of the Church. All the Fathers haue with one heart accursed, and with one mouth pronounced it abominable, that the holy Word of God should be entangled with the subtleties of Sophisters, and brawlings of Logicians. Doe they hold themselues within these bounds, when they goe about nothing else in their whole life, but with endlesse strifes, and more than sophisticall brabblings to wrap and encomber the simplicitie of the Scripture? so that if the Fathers were now raised to life againe, and should heare such an arte of brawling, which these men call Speculatiue Diuinitie, they would beleeue that nothing lesse is done than any disputation had of God. But my talke should spread it selfe beyond due bounds, if I would reckon vp how boldly these men shake off the yoke of the Fathers, whose obedient children they would seeme to be, truely both moneths and yeeres would be too little for me. And yet they are of so extreme and desperate shamelesnesse, that they dare blame vs for that we sticke not to passe the ancient bounds.

But now whereas they call vs to custome, they nothing preuaile. For we should be most vniustly dealt with, if we should be driuen to yeeld to custome. Truely if the iudgements of men were right, Custome should be taken of the good. But it oftentimes happeneth that men doe otherwise. For, that which is seene to be done of many, by and by obtaineth the right of a Custome.

stome. But the state of men hath scarcely at any time beene in so good case, that the better things pleased the greater number. Therefore for the most part of the priuate vices of many hath beene made a publike errour, or rather a common consent of vices, which now these good men would haue to stand for a lawe. Who so haue eies, doe see that not onely one sea of euils hath ouerflowed, but many poisonous pestilences haue inuaded the world, that all things runne headlong to ruine: so that either the matters of men must be vtterly despaired, or we must lay hand vnto, or rather vse violence vpon so great euils. And remedie is by no other reason driuen away, but because we haue now long time accustomed vs to euils. But be it that publike errour haue place in matters of common weale: yet in the kingdome of God his onely truth is to be heard and regarded, to which by no succeeding course of yeeres, by no custome, by no conspired agreement, may any prescription be limited. So in old time Esaie taught the elect of God, that they should not say Conspiring, to all things in which the people said Conspiring: that is to say, that they should not conspire together to the wicked agreement of the people, nor should feare and dread the peoples feare: but rather that they should sanctifie the Lord of hostes, and he should be their feare and dread. Now therefore let them as much as they list obiect against vs both passed and present ages, if we sanctifie the Lord of hostes, we will not be much afraid. For whether it be that many ages haue consented to like vngodlinesse, he is strong to take vengeance to the third and fourth generation: or if the whole world together conspire into one selfe same wickednes, he hath by experience taught what is the end of them that offend with the multitude, when he did with a generall ouerflowing destroy the whole kind of men, preserving Noe with a small household, which should by his faith being but one man condemne the whole world. Finally an euill custome, is none other than a common pestilence, in which they doe neuertheless die that die with companie of a multitude. Moreouer they ought to haue considered that which Cyprian saith in certaine places, that they which sinne by ignorance, although they cannot cleare themselues from all fault, yet may seeme after some manner accusable: but who so obstinately refuse the truth offered by the grace of God, they haue nothing to pretend for their excuse.

Decret. dist. 8. ca. fi. Ex de consuet.

Esai. 8. 12.

Gen. 7. 1. Heb. 11. 7.

Epist 3. lib. 1. & in epist. ad Iulian. de hæret. baptiza.

As for their double horned argument, they do not driue vs to so hard a streight with it, to compell vs to confesse, that either the Church hath lien dead a certaine time, or that we haue controuersie against the church. Truely the church of Christ hath liued and shall liue, so long as Christ shal raigne at the right hand of the father: by whose hand she is vpholden, by whose succour she is defended, by whose power she keepeth her safetie. For he will vndoubtedlie performe that which he hath once promised, that he will be present with his euen vntill the ending of the world. Against it now we haue no warre at all: For we do with one consent together with all the people of the faithfull honour and worship the one God and Christ the Lord, in like sort as he hath alway been worshipped of all the godly. But they themselues not a little way erre from the truth, when they acknowledge no church, but which they see with present eie, and goe about to cõpasse it about with those bõuds in which it is not enclosed. Vpon these points hangeth our controuersie: first that they affirme that the forme of the church is alway appearing & to be seene: then, that they set the same forme in the sea of the church of Rome, and in the order of their prelates. We on the cõtrary side affirme, both that the church may consist of no appearing forme, and that the forme it selfe is not contained in that outward shining shew, which they foolishlie haue in admiration, but hath a farre other marke, namely, the pure preaching of the word of God, and the right ministration of sacraments. They are in a rage, vnlesse the church may be alwaies pointed out with a finger. But how oft hapned it in the people of the Iewes to be so deformed, that there appeared no forme at all? What forme thinke we to haue shined, whẽ Helias bewailed that he alone was left? How long since the cõming of Christ hath it lien hidden without forme? How since that time hath it been so oppressed with wars, seditions, and heresies, that it shined out on no side? If they had liued at that time, would they haue beleeued that there was any Church? but it was said to Helias, that there were preserued seuen thousand men, which had not bowed their knee before Baal. Neither ought it to be doubtfull to vs but that Christ hath alway reigned in earth since he ascended into heauen. But if the godly had then sought any discernable forme with their eies should they not by and by haue been discouraged. And verily Hilarie accounted it euen alreadie in his time for a most great fault, that being occupied with the foolish admiration of the dignitie of Bishops, they marked not a deadly pestilence lurking vnder that viser. For thus he saith: One thing I warne you, beware of Antichrist: for you are ill taken with the loue of walls: ye do ill worshipp the Church of God in houses and buildings: vnder them ye do ill thrust in the name of peace. It is doubtfull that in those Antichrist shall sit. Mountaines and woods and lakes, and prisons, and caues are safer for me. For in these the Prophets, when they were either abiding or throwen into them, did prophecie. But what doth the world at this day honor in his horned bishops, but that it thinketh them to be the holy prelates of religion, whom it seeth to be heads ouer great Cities? Away therfore with such foolish estemming. But rather let vs leaue this to the Lord, for as much as he alone knoweth who be his, and

2. Tim. 2. 19. sometime also taketh away from the sight of men the outward knowledge of his Church. That is (I graunt) a horrible vengeance of God vpon the earth. But if the wickednes of men so deserue, why do we seeke to withstand the iust vengeance of God? In such wise the Lord hath in times past taken vengeance of the vnthankefulnesse of men. For because they would not receiue his truth, and had quenched his light, he suffered them being blinded in sense, both to be mocked with lies full of absurditie, and to be drowned in deepe darkenesse, so that there was no face of the true Church to be seene. Yet in the meane time he saued his both being scattered abroad and lying hidden in the middest of errours and darkenesse, from destruction. And no marueil. For he can skill to saue both in the very confusion of Babylon, and in the flame of the burning ouen. But whereas they would haue the forme of the Church to be iudged by I wote not what vaine pompous shew: how perillous that is, I will rather point vnto than declare, least I should draw out my tale into infinite length. The Pope (say they) which holdeth the Apostolike sea, and the Bishops that are annoinred and consecrate by him, so that they be trimmed with fillets and Mitres, doe represent the Church, and ought to be taken for the Church: and therefore they cannot erre. How so? because they are Pastors of the Church, and consecrate to the Lord.
Exod. 32. 4. And were not Aaron and the other rulers of Israell also Pastors? But Aaron and his sonnes
1. King. 22. 11. Iere. 18. 18. after that they were made priests, did yet erre when they made the calfe. After this reason, why should not the foure hundred Prophets which lied to Achab, haue represented the Church? But the Church was on Micheas side, being indeed but one man alone, and vnregarded, but out of whose mouth came truth. Did not the false Prophets in resemblance beare both the name and face of the Church, when they did with one violent assault rise vp against Ieremy, and with threatning boasted that it was not possible that the lawe should perish from the priest, counsell from the wiseman, the word from the Prophet? Ieremy alone was sent against the whole companie of the Prophets, to declare from the Lord, that it should come to passe, that the lawe should perish from the priest, counsell from the wiseman, and the word from the Prophet. Do not such a glistering shew shine in that councell which the Bishops, Scribes, and Pharisees assembled, to take aduises together for the killing of Christ? Now let them goe and sticke fast in the outward visour, that they may make Christ and all the Prophets of God, schismatikes: and on the other side make the ministers of Satan, the instruments of the holy Ghost. If they speake as they thinke, let them faithfully answere me, in what nation and place they thinke that the Church remained since the time that by the decree of the Councell at Basile, Eugenius was thrust downe and depriued from the estate of Pope, and Aymee set in his place. They cannot, though they would burst for it, deny that the Councell, for so much as concerneth outward solemnities, was lawfull, and summoned not onely of one Pope, but of two. Eugenius was there condemned of schisme, rebellion, and obstinacie, with the whole flocke of Cardinals and Bishops, which had with him practised the dissolution of the Councell. Yet afterward being borne vp by the fauour of Princes, he recouered his Papacie safe againe. That election of Aymee, which had beene orderly made by the authoritie of a generall and holy Synode, vanished away in a smoke: sauing that he himselfe was appeased with a Cardinals hat, as it were a barking dog with a peece of bread cast vnto him. Out of the bosome of these heretikes, rebels, and obstinates, are proceeded all the Popes, Cardinals, Byshops, Abbots and Priests, that haue beene since. Heere they are taken and can goe no further. For, to whether side will they giue the name of the Church? Will they denie that the Counsell was generall, which wanted nothing to the outward maiestie: namely, which beeing solemnely summoned by two Bulles, and well framed in the order of all things, continued in the same dignitie to the last end? Will they confesse Eugenius with all his companie a schismatike, by whome they are all sanctified? Therefore either let them otherwise define the forme of the Church, or they all as many as are of them shall bee of vs accounted schismatikes, which wittinglie and willinglie haue beene ordered of Heretikes. If it had neuer before beene knowne that the church is not bound to outward pomps, they themselus may be to vs a large proof, which vnder that glorious title of the Church haue so long so proudly boasted themselues, whereas yet they were the deadly pestilences of the Church. I speake not of their maners, and those tragicall doings wherewith their whole life swarmeth full: because they say that they be the Pharisees which are to be heard, not to be followed. But if ye will spare some of your leasure to reade our writings, you shall plainely know that the verie doctrine, the doctrine it selfe, for the which they say that they be the Church is a deadly butcherie of soules, the firebrand, ruine, and destruction of the Church.

Finally they do not vprightly enough, when they doe spitefully rehearse how great troubles, vprores, and contentions the preaching of our doctrine hath drawen with it, and what finistes it now beareth in many. For the blame of these euils is vnworthily laid vpon it which ought rather to haue been imputed to the malice of Satan. This is as it were a certaine naturall property of the word of God, that whensoeuer it riseth vp, Satan is neuer quiet or sleeping. This is the most sure and most trustie marke, whereby it is discerned from lying doctrines, which doe easily shew foorth themselues when they are receiued with fauourable eares of all men, and are heard of the world reioicing at them. So in certaine ages past, when all things were drowned in deepe darkenesse, the Lord of this world made a sport and a play in manner of all men, and lay idle and tooke his pleasure like a certaine Sardanapalus in sound peace. For, what should he else do but laugh and play being in quiet and peaceable possession of his kingdome? But when the light shining from aboue somewhat scattered abroad his darkenesse, when that strong man troubled and assailed his kingdome, then he began to shake off his wonted drowsinesse, and hastily to arme himselfe. And first he stirred vp the force of men, wherby he might violently oppresse the truth beginning to shine. By which when he nothing preuailed, he turned to subtile entrappings. He stirred vp dissentions and disagreements of doctrine by his Catabaptists, and other monstrous leud men, whereby he might darken it, and at length vtterly quench it. And now he continueth to assaile it with both engines. For he trauelleth both by the force and power of men to plucke vp that seed: and with his darnell (as much as in him lieth) to choake it, that it may not grow and beare fruit. But all this he doth in vaine, if we heare the warning of God, which both hath long before opened his craft vnto vs, that he should not take vs vnware, and hath armed vs with sufficient defences against all his engines. But how great maliciousnes is it to lay vpon the word of God, the hatred either of the seditions, which naughtie and rebellious men do stirre vp, or of the sects which deceiuers doe raise against it? Yet it is no new example, Elias was asked whether it were not he that troubled Israel. Christ was esteemed of the Iewes a seditious man. The apostles were accused of making a cõmotion among the people. What other thing do they which at this day do father vpon vs all the troubles, vprores and contentions that boile vp against vs? But what is to be answered to such, Elias hath taught vs: namely, that it is not we that scatter errors or stir vp vprores: but it is they themselues that wrastle against the power of God. But as that one thing alone is sufficient to beate backe their rashnesse, so againe we ought to meet with the weakenesse of other, who oftentimes happen to be mooued with such offences, and in their dismaying to waner. But let them to the end that they may not faint with this dismaying and be discouraged, know that the Apostles in their time felt by experience the same things that now happen vnto vs. There were vnlearned & vnstedfast men, which wrested to their owne destruction, those things that Paul had written by the inspiration of God, as Peter saith. There were despisers of God, that when they heard that sin abounded, to the end that grace might more abound, by and by obiected, We will then abide in sinne, that grace may abound. When they heard that the faithfull are not vnder the law, they by and by answered, We will then sinne, because we are not vnder the law but vnder grace. There were that accused him as an exhorter to euill. There entred priuily many false apostles to destroy the churches which he had builded. Some by enuie and contention, and not purely, yea and maliciously preached the Gospell, thinking to adde more affliction to his bands. Somewhere the Gospell not much profited. All sought their owne, and not the things of Iesus Christ. Some went backward, dogs to their vomit, and swine to their wallowing in the mire. The most part did draw the libertie of the spirit to the licentiousnesse of the flesh. Many brethren crept in, by whom there came afterward great danger to the godly. Among the brethren themselues were many strifes raised vp. What should the Apostles haue done in this case? Should they not either haue dissembled for a time, or rather altogether haue giuen ouer and forsaken the Gospell, which they saw to be the seed-plot of so many contentions, the matter of so many dangers, the occasion of so many offences? No. But for help in such distresses this came in their mind that Christ is the Luke 2.34. stone of stumbling and rocke of offence, set vnto the ruine and rising againe of many, and for a signe that should be spoken against. With which assiance they being armed, went forward boldly through all dangers of vprores and offences. With the same thought we also ought to be vpholden, forasmuch as 2.Cor.2.16. Paul testifieth that this is the perpetuall propertie of the Gospell to be the sauour of death vnto death to them that perish, although it were ordained to this vse that it should be the sauour of life vnto life, and the power of God vnto the salvation of the faithfull: which verily we should also feele, if we did not with our vnthankefulnesse corrupt this so singular a benefit of God, and turne that to our owne destruction which ought to haue beene to vs the onely defence of our safetie.

But now I returne to you, my soueraigne Lord. Let those false reports nothing moone you, by which our aduersaries trauell to cast you in feare of vs, with saying that by this new Gospell (for so they call it) nothing is hunted for and sought but fit occasion of seditions, and vnpunished libertie of vices. For our God is not the Author of diuision, but of peace: and the Sonne of God is not the minister of sinne, which came to destroy all the works of the Diuell. And we are vnworthyly accused of such desires, whereof we neuer gaue any suspicion were it neuer so small. It is likely that we forsooth doe practise the ouerthrowing of kingdomes, of whom there hath neuer beene heard any one seditious word, whose life hath euer been knowen quiet and simple, when we lined vnder you, and which now being chased from home, yet cease not to pray for all things prosperous to you and your Kingdome. It is likely forsooth that we hunt for licentiousnesse of vices, in whose behauiours although many things may be found faultie, yet there is nothing worthie of so great reproching: neither haue we with so ill successe (by the grace of God) profited in the Gospell, but that our life may be to these backebiters an examplar of chastitie, liberalitie, mercy, temperance, patience, modestie, and whatsoeuer other vertue. Verily it is by the proofe it selfe euident that we doe vnfainedly feare and worship God, forasmuch as we desire that his name be hallowed both by our life and our death, and enuie it selfe is compelled to beare of some of vs a witnesse of innocencie and ciuill vprightnesse, in whome this onely thing was punished with death, which ought to haue beene accounted for a singular praise. But if any vnder pretence of the Gospell doe stirre vp tumults (as hitherto it hath not beene found that there haue beene any such in your Realme) if any pretend the libertie of the grace of God to defend the licentiousnesse of their vices (of which sort I haue knowen many) there be lawes and penalties of lawes, by which they may according to their deserunings be sharply punished: yet so that in the meane time the Gospell of God be not euill spoken of for the wickednes of naughtie men. Thus haue you (O King) the venemous vnmistice of the slaunderers largely enough declared, that you may not with an eare of too easie beleefe bend to their reports. I feare me also least it be too largely set out, forasmuch as this Preface is in a maner come to the quantitie of a whole Booke of defense, whereby I entended not to make a defense in deede, but onely to mollifie your minde aforehand to giue audience to the disclosing of our cause: which your mind, though it be now turned away and estranged from vs, yea and enflamed against vs, yet we trust that we shall be able to recouer the fauor thereof, if you shall once haue without displeasure and troublous affection read ouer this our confession, which we will to be in steede of a defence for vs to your Maiestie. But if the whisperings of the malicious doe so possesse your eares, that there is no place for accused men, to speake for themselues: and if those outragious furies doe still with your winking at them, exercise crueltie with prisoning, tormenting, cutting and burning: we shall in deede, as sheepe appointed to the slaughter, be brought to all extremities, yet so that in our patience we shall possesse our soules, and wait for the strong hand of the Lord: which shall without doubt be present in time, and stretch foorth it selfe armed, both to deliuer the poore out of affliction, and to take vengeance on the despisers, which now triumph with so great assuredne sse.

The Lord the King of Kings stablish your throne with righteousnesse,

IOHN CALVINE TO THE READER.

AT the first setting out of this worke, because I did not looke for that successe, which the Lord of his vnmeasurable goodnesse hath giuen, I had (as men vse to doe in small works) for the more part lightly passed it ouer. But when I vnderstood that it was receiued with that fauour of all the godly, which I neuer durst haue desired, much lesse haue hoped for; as I verily felt in my hart that much more was giuen to me than I had deserued, so I thought it should be a great vnthankfulnesse if I should not at the least after my slender abilitie endeuour to answer so fauourable affections toward me, and which of themselues prouoked my diligence. And this I attempted not onely in the second setting foorth of it: but how oft since that time the worke hath beene imprinted, so oft hath it beene enriched with some encrease. But although I did not then repent me of the labour that I had imployed: yet I neuer held my selfe contented till it was disposed into that order which is now set before you. Now I trust I haue giuen you that which may be allowed by all your iudgements. Truely with how great endeuour I haue applied my selfe to the doing of this seruice to the Church of God, I may bring foorth for an euident witnesse, that this last winter, when I thought that the feuer Quartane had summoned me to death, how much more the sickenesse enforced vpon me, so much lesse I spared my selfe, till I might leaue this booke to ouerliue me, which might make some part of thankfull recompence to so gentle prouoking of the godly. I had rather indeed it had beene done sooner: but it is soone enough if well enough. And I shall then thinke that it is come abroad in good season, when I shall perceiue that it hath brought yet more plentifull fruite than it hath done heeretofore to the Church of God. This is my onely desire. And truely full it were with me, if I did not holding my selfe contented with the allowance of God alone, despise the iudgement of men, whether they be the foolish and froward iudgements of the vnskilfull, or the wrongfull and malicious of the wicked. For although God hath throughly setled my minde to the endeuour both of enlarging his kingdome, and of helping the common profit: and though I am cleere in mine owne conscience, and haue himselfe and the Angels to witnesse with me, that since I tooke vpon me the office of a teacher in the Church, I haue tended to none other purpose but that I might profit the church in the mainteining the doctrine of godlinesse: yet I thinke there is no man, that hath beeen ſnatched at, bitten & torne in ſunder with more ſlanders than I. When my Epiſtle was now printing, I was certainly enformed that at Angsburgh where the aſſemblie of the ſtates of the Empire was holden, there was a rumour ſpread abroad of my reuolting to the Papacie, and the ſame was more greedily receiued in the courts of Princes than was meete. This forſooth is their thankfulneſſe who are not ignorant of many trials had of my ſtedfaſtneſſe, which trials as they ſhake off ſo foule a ſlander, ſo they ſhould with all indifferent and gentle iudges haue defended me from it. But the deuill with his whole route is deceiued if in oppreſſing me with filthy lies, hee thinke that by his vniuſt dealing I ſhall bee either the more diſcouraged or made the leſſe diligent: becauſe I truſt that the Lord of his vnmeaſurable goodneſſe will grant mee that I may with euen ſufferance continue in the courſe of his holy calling. Whereof I giue to the godly Readers a newe proofe in this ſetting foorth of this booke. Now in this trauell this was my purpoſe ſo to prepare and furniſh them that be ſtudious of holy Diuinitie to the reading of the word of God, that they may both haue an eaſie entrie into it, and goe forward in it without ſtumbling: for I thinke that I haue in all points ſo knit vp together the ſumme of Religion, and diſpoſed the ſame in ſuch order, that whoſoeuer ſhall well haue it in minde, it ſhall not be harde for him to determine both what he ought chiefely to ſeeke in ſcripture: and to what marke to applie whatſoeuer is contained in it. Therefore, this as it were away being once made plaine, if I ſhall hereafter ſet forth any expoſitions of Scripture, becauſe I ſhall not need to enter into long diſputations of articles of doctrine, and to wander out into common places: I will alway knit them vp ſhortly. By this meane the godly Reader ſhall be eaſed of great paine and tediouſneſſe, ſo that he come furniſhed aforehand with the knowledge of this preſent worke as with a neceſſarie inſtrument. But becauſe the intent of this purpoſe, doth cleerely as in mirrors appeere in ſo many commentaries of mine, I had rather to declare indeed what it is, than to ſet it out in words. Farewell friendly Reader, and if thou receiue any fruite of my labours, helpe me with thy prayers to God our Father.

WHAT

WHAT CHAPTERS ARE contained in the Bookes of this Institution.

In the first booke which intreateth of the knowledge of God the Creator: are contained xviij. Chapters.

THat the knowledge of God and of our selues, are things conioined: and how they bee linked the one with the other.
2 What it is to know God, and to what end tendeth the knowledge of him.
3 That the knowledge of God is naturally planted in the mindes of men
4 That the same knowledge is either choaked or corrupted, partly by ignorance, and partly by malice.
5 That the knowledge of God doth shiningly appeare in the making of the world, and in the continuall gouernment thereof.
6 That to attain to God the Creator, it is needfull to haue the Scripture to be our guide and mistres.
7 By what testimonie the Scripture ought to bee stablished, that is by the witnesse of the holy ghost, that the authoritie thereof may remaine certaine: And that it is a wicked inuention to say that the credit thereof doth hang vpon the iudgement of the Church.
8 That so farre as mans reason may beare, there are sufficient proofes to stablish the credit of the Scripture.
9 That those fantasticall men, which forsaking Scripture, resort vnto reuelation, doe ouerthrow all the principles of godlinesse.
10 That the Scripture, to correct all superstition, doth in comparison set the true God against all the Gods of the Gentiles, reckoning him for none of them.
11 That it is vnlawfull to attribute vnto God a visible forme, and that generally, they forsake God, so many as do erect to themselues any images.
12 That God is seuerally discerned from idols, that he may be onely and wholly worshipped.
13 That there is taught in the Scriptures one essence of God from the very creation, which essence containeth in it three persons.
14 That the Scripture euen in the creation of the world, and of all things, doth by certaine markes put difference between the true God, and faigned gods.
15 What a one man was created: wherein there is intreated of the powers of the soule, and of the image of God, of freewill, and of the first integrity of nature.
16 That God by his power doth nourish and maintaine the world, which himselfe hath created, and by his prouidence doth gouerne all the parts thereof.
17 Whereto and to what end this doctrine is to be applied, that we may be certaine of the profite thereof.
18 That God doth so vse the seruice of wicked men, and so boweth their mindes to put his iudgement in execution, that yet stil himselfe remaineth pure from all spot.

In the second booke which entreateth of the knowledge of God the Redeemer in Christ, which knowledge was first opened to the fathers in the time of the law, and then to vs in the Gospell: are contained xvij. Chapters.

1 THat by Adams sinne and falling away, mankinde became accursed, and did degenerate from his first estate: wherein is intreated of originall sinne.
2 That man is now spoiled of the freedome of will, and made subiect to miserable bondage.
3 That out of the corrupt nature of man proceedeth nothing but damnable.
4 How God worketh in the hearts of men.
5 A confutation of the obiections that are wont to be brought for the defence of free will.
6 That man being lost must seeke for redemption in Christ.
7 That the law was giuen, not to hold still the people in it, but to nourish the hope of saluation in Christ vntil his comming.
8 An exposition of the morall Law.
9 That Christ although he was knowne to the Iewes vnder the Law, yet was he deliuered onely by the Gospell.
10 Of the likenes of the old & new Testament.
11 Of the difference of the one Testament from the other.
12 That it behooued that Christ to performe the office of the Mediatour, should bee made man 13 That Christ tooke vpon him the true substance of the flesh of man.
14 How the natures of the Mediator doe make one person.
15 That we may know to what end Christ was sent of his father, and what he brought vs: three things are principally to be considered in him, his propheticall office, his kingdome, and his priesthood.
16 How Christ hath fulfilled the office of a redeemer, to purchase saluation for vs, wherein is intreated of his Death and Resurrection, and his Ascending into heauen.
17 That it is truely and properly said, that Christ hath deserued Gods fauour and saluation for vs.

The Table.

In the third Booke which intreateth of the manner how to receiue the grace of Christ, and what fruits come thereof to vs, and what effects follow of it: are contained xxv. Chapters.

1 THat those things which are spoken of Christ doe profit vs, by secret working of the holy Ghost.
2 Of Faith, wherein both is the definition of it, and the properties that it hath are declared.
3 That we are regenerate by faith, wherein is intreated of repentance.
4 That all that the Sophisters babble in their Schooles of penance, is farre from the pureneſſe of the Goſpell: where is intreated of confeſſion and Satisfaction.
5 Of the ſupplyings which they adde to ſatisfaction, as pardons and purgatorie.
6 Of the life of a Christian man. And firſt by what arguments the Scripture exhorteth vs thereunto.
7 The ſumme of a Christian life: where is intreated of the forſaking of our ſelues.
8 Of the bearing of the Croſſe, which is a part of the forſaking of our ſelues
9 Of the meditation of the life to come.
10 How we ought to vſe this preſent life, and the helpes thereof.
11 Of the Iuſtification of Faith, and firſt of the definition of the name and of the thing.
12 That to the end we may be fully perſwaded of the free iuſtification, we muſt liſt vp our mindes to the iudgement ſeat of God.
13 That there are two things to be marked in free iuſtification.
14 What is the beginning of Iuſtification, and the continuall proceeding thereof.
15 That those things that are commonly boaſted concerning the merits of works, doe ouerthrow as well the praiſe of God in giuing of righteouſneſſe, as alſo the aſſuredneſſe of ſaluation.
16 A confutation of the ſlanders, whereby the Papiſts goe about to bring this doctrine in hatred
17 The agreement of the promiſes of the Law and the Goſpell.
18 That of the reward, the righteouſneſſe of of works is ill gathered.
19 Of Christian libertie.
20 Of prayer which is the chiefe exerciſe of Faith, and whereby we daily receiue the benefits of God.
21 Of the eternall election, whereby God hath predeſtinate ſome to ſaluation, ſome other to deſtruction.
22 A confirmation of this doctrine by the teſtimonies of Scripture.
23 A confutation of the ſlanders, wherewith this doctrine hath alway beene vniuſtly charged.
24 That election is ſtabliſhed by the calling of God: and that the reprobate do bring vpon themſelues iuſt deſtruction, to which they are appointed.
25 Of the laſt reſurrection.

In the fourth Booke which intreateth of the outward meanes or helpes whereby God calleth vs into the fellowſhip of Chriſt, and holdeth vs in it: are contained xx. Chapters.

1 OF the true Church with which we ought to keepe vnitie. becauſe it is the Mother of all the godly.
2 A compariſon of the falſe Church with the true Church.
3 Of the teachers and miniſters of the Church, and of their election and office.
4 Of the ſtate of the old Church, and of the manner of gouerning that was in vſe before the Papacie.
5 That the old forme of gouernment is vtterly ouerthrowne by the tyrannie of the Papacie.
6 Of the ſupremacie of the Sea of Rome.
7 Of the beginning and increaſing of the Papacie of Rome, vntill it aduanced it ſelfe to this height, whereby both the libertie of the church hath beene oppreſſed, and all the right gouernment thereof ouerthrowne.
8 Of the power of the Church as touching the articles of Faith: and with how vnbridled licentiouſneſſe it hath in the Papacie beene wreſted to corrupt all pureneſſe of doctrine.
9 Of Counſels and of their authoritie.
10 Of the power in making of lawes wherein the Pope and his haue vſed a moſt cruell tyrannie and butcherie vpon ſoules.
11 Of the iuriſdiction of the Church and the abuſe thereof, ſuch as is ſeene in the Papacie.
12 Of the diſcipline of the Church, whereof the cheefe vſe is in the cenſures & excommunication.
13 Of vowes, by raſh promiſing whereof each man hath miſerablie intangled himſelfe.
14 Of Sacraments.
15 Of Baptiſme.
16 That the Baptiſme of Infants doth very well agree with the inſtitution of Chriſt, and the nature of the ſigne.
17 Of the holy Supper of Chriſt: and what it auaileth vs.
18 Of the Popiſh Maſſe, by which ſacriledge the Supper of Chriſt hath not onely beene prophaned, but alſo brought to nought.
19 Of the fiue falſely named Sacraments: where is declared, that the other fiue which haue beene hitherto commonly taken for Sacraments, are not Sacraments: and then is ſhewed what manner of things they be.
20 Of ciuill gouernment.

FINIS.

THE FIRST BOOKE OF THE INSTITVTION OF Christian Religion, which intreateth of the kowledge of God the Creator.

THE FIRST CHAPTER.

That the knowledge of God, and of our selues, are things conioyned: and how they be linked the one with the other.

THE whole summe in a maner of all our wisdome, which only ought to be accounted true and perfect wisdome, consisteth in two parts, that is to say, The knowledge of God, and of our selues. But whereas these two knowledges be with many bonds linked together; yet whether goeth before or engendreth the other, it is hard to discerne. For first, no man can looke vpon himselfe, but he must needs by and by turne all his senses to the beholding of God, in whom he liueth and is mooued: because it is plaine, that those gifts wherewith we be endued, are not of our selues, yea, euen that we haue being is nothing els but an essence in the one God. Finally, by these good things that are as by dropmeale powred into vs from heauen, we are led as it were by certaine streames to the spring head. And so by our owne needinesse, better appeareth that infinit plentie of good things that abideth in God. Specially that miserable ruine, whereinto the fall of the first man hath throwen vs, compelleth vs to lift vp our eyes, not only being foodlesse and hungrie, to craue from thence that which we lacke, but also being awakened with feare, to learne humilitie. For as there is found in man a certaine world of all miseries, and since we haue been spoiled of the diuine apparell, our shamefull nakednesse discloseth an infinit heape of filthie disgracements: it must needs be that euerie man be pricked with knowledge in conscience of his owne vnhappinesse, to make him come at the least vnto some knowledge of God. So by the vnderstanding of our ignorance, vanitie, beggerie, weakenesse, peruersnesse, and corruption, we learne to reknowledge, that no where els but in the Lord abideth the true light of wisdome, sound vertue, perfect abundance of all good things, and puritie of righteousnesse. And so by our owne euils we are stirred to consider the good things of God: and we can not earnestly aspire toward him, vntill we begin to mislike our selues. For of all men what one is there, that would not willingly rest in himselfe? Yea, who doth not rest, so long as he knoweth not himselfe, that is to say, so long as he is contented with his owne gifts, and ignorant or vnmindfull of his owne miserie? Therefore euery man is by the knowledge of himselfe, not only pricked forward to seeke God, but also led as it were by the hand to finde him.

Whether we consider our being, the gifts wherewith we are endued, or the euils that are found in vs, we are thereby led to the knowledge of God.

2 Againe, it is certaine, that man neuer commeth vnto the true knowledge of himselfe, vnlesse he hath first beholden the face of God, and from beholding thereof do descend to looke into himselfe. For (such is the pride that is naturally planted in vs) we alway thinke our selues righteous, innocent, wise and holy, vntill that with manifest proofs we be conuinced of our vnrighteousnesse, filthinesse, follie, and vncleannesse. But we are not conuinced thereof, if we looke vpon our selues only, and not vpon God also, who is the only rule whereby this iudgement ought to be tried. For because we are naturally inclined to hypocrisie, therefore a certaine vaine resemblance of righteousnesse doth abundantly content vs in stead of righteousnesse in deed. And because there appeareth nothing among vs nor about vs, that is not defiled with much filthinesse, therefore that which is somewhat lesse filthie pleaseth vs as though it were most pure, so long as we holde our selues within the bounds of mans vncleannesse. Like as the eye which is vsed to see nothing but blacke, thinketh that to be pure white, which yet is but darkish white, or browne. Yea, we may yet more plainly discerne by our bodily sense how much we are blinded in considering the powers of the soule. For if at mid-day we either looke downe vpon the ground, or beholde those things that round about lie open before our eies, then we thinke our selues to haue very assured and piercing force of sight: but when we looke vp to the Sunne, and beholde it with fixed eies, then that same sharpnesse that was of great force vpon the ground is with so great brightnesse by and by dazled and confounded, that we are compelled to confesse, that the same sharpe sight which we had in considering earthly things, when it commeth to the Sun, is but meere dulnesse. Euen so commeth it to passe in weighing our spirituall good things. For while we looke no further than the earth, so long being well contented with our owne righteousnesse, wisdome & strength, we do sweetly flatter our selues, and thinke vs in maner halfe gods. But if we once begin to raise vp our thought vnto God, & to weigh what a one he is, & how exact is the perfection of his righteousnesse, wisdome and power, after the rule wherof we ought to be framed: then that which before did please vs in our selues with false pretence of righteousnesse, shall become lothsome to vs as greatest wickednes: then that which did maruellously deceiue vs vnder colour of wisdom shal stinke before vs as extreme folly: then that which did beare the face of strength shalbe proued to be most miserable weakenesse. So slenderly doth that, which in vs seemeth euen most perfect, answer in proportion to the pureneſſe of God.

The beholding of the Maiestie of God maketh men to see their own baseneſſe.

3 Heereof proceedeth that trembling and amazedneſſe, wherewith the Scripture in many places reciteth that the holy men were stricken and astonished so oft as they perceiued the presence of God. For when wee see that they which in his absence did stand assured and vnmoued, so soone as he discloseth his glorie, begin so to quake, and are so dismaied, that they fall downe, yea are swallowed vp, and in maner are destroied with feare of death: it is to be gathered thereby, that man is neuer sufficiently touched and inwardly moued with knowledge of his owne baseneſſe, vntill he haue compared himselfe to the Maiestie of God. But of such dismaying we haue often examples both in the Iudges and in the Prophets: so that this was a common saying among the people of God: We shall die, because the Lord hath appeared vnto vs. And therefore the historie of Iob, to throw men downe with knowledge of their owne follie, weakneſſe, and vncleannesse, bringeth alway his principall proofe from describing Gods wisdom, strength and cleannesse. And that not without cause. For we see how Abraham, the neerer that he came to beholde the glorie of God, the better acknowledged himselfe to be earth and dust. We see how Elias could not abide to tarie his comming to him with vncouered face: so terrible is the beholding of him. And what may man do that is but corruption and a worme, when euen the Cherubins for very feare must hide their faces? Euen this is it that the Prophet Esay speaketh of: The Sun shall blush, and the Moone shall be ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reigne, that is to say, when he displayeth his brightnesse, and bringeth it neerer to sight, then in comparison thereof the brighteſt thing of all shall be darkened. But howsoeuer the knowledge of God and of our selues are with mutuall knot linked together, yet the order of right teaching requireth, that first we intreat of the knowledge of God, and afterward come downe to speake of the knowledge of our selues.

THE SECOND CHAPTER.

What it is to know God, and to what end tendeth the knowledge of him.

I Meane by the knowledge of God, not onely that knowledge, whereby we conceiue that there is some God, but also that, whereby we learne so much as behoueth vs to know of him, and as is profitable for his glorie: finally so much as is expedient. For, to speake properly, we can not saie that God is knowen where there is no religion nor godlinesse. But here I doe not yet touch that speciall kinde of knowledge whereby those men that are in themselues reprobate and accursed doe conceiue God the redeemer in Christ the mediator: but I speake onely of that first and simple manner of knowledge, whereunto the verie order of nature would haue led vs, if Adam had continued in state of innocencie. For although no man, sith mankinde is in this ruine, can perceiue God to be either a father, or author of saluation, or in any wise fauorable, vnlesse Christ come as a meane to pacifie him towardes vs: yet it is one thing to feele, that God our maker doth by his power sustaine vs, by his prouidence gouerne vs, by his goodnesse nourish vs, and endue vs with all kindes of blessings: and another thing to embrace the grace of reconciliation offered vs in Christ. Whereas therefore the Lord first simplie appeareth as well by the making of the world, as by the generall doctrine of the Scripture, to be the Creator, and then in the face of Christ to be the Redeemer: hereupon arise two sorts of knowing him, of which the former is now to be intreated of, and then the other shall orderly follow in the place fit for it. For although our minde cannot conceiue the knowledge of God, but that it must giue to him some kinde of worship, yet shall it not be sufficient simplie to know that it is he onely that ought to be honored and worshipped of all men, vnlesse we be also perswaded that he is the fountaine of all good things, to the end that we should seeke for nothing elsewhere but in him. I meane hereby, not onely for that as hee hath once created this world, so by his infinite power he sustaineth it, by his wisedome he gouerneth it, by his goodnesse he preserueth it, and specially mankinde he ruleth by his righteousnesse and iudgement, suffereth by his mercy, and sauegardeth by his defence: but also becausse there can no where be found any one drop either of wisedom, or of light, or of righteousnesse, or of power, or of vprightnesse, or of sincere trueth, which floweth not from him, or whereof he is not the cause: to this end verily, that we should learne to looke for and craue all these thinges at his hand, and with thankesgiuing account them receiued of him. For this feeling of the powers of God is to vs a meere schoolemaster of godlinesse, out of which springeth religion: Godlinesse I call a reuerence of God, ioyned with loue of him, which is procured by knowledge of his benifites. For men will neuer with willing obedience submit themselues to God, vntill they perceiue that they owe all things to him, that they are nourished by his fatherly care, that he is to them the author of all good things, so that nothing is to be sought elsewhere than in him. Yea, they will neuer yeeld themselues truely and with all their heart wholly to him, vnlesse they assuredly beleeue that in him is perfect felicitie reposed for them.

The knowledge whereby we conceiue that there is a God, that he is the creator and preseruer of all things that are, and the only giuer of good things, breedeth godlinesse and obedience.

2 Therefore they doe but trifle with vaine speculations, which in intreating of this question, doe make it their purpose to discusse what thing God is, where it rather behoueth vs to know what manner one he is, and what agreeth with his nature. For to what end serueth it to confesse as the Epicure doth, that there is a God, which doth onely delight himselfe with idlenesse, hauing no care of the world? Finally, what profiteth it to know such a God with whom we haue nothing to doe? But rather the knowledge of him ought to serue to this end, first to frame vs to feare and reuerence: then that by it guiding and teaching vs, we may learne to craue all good things at his hand, and to account them receiued of him. For how can any thought of God enter into thy minde, but that thou must therwithal by and by thinke, that forasmuch as thou art his creature, therefore thou art of right subiect and bound to his authoritie, that thou owest him thy life, that whatsoeuer thou enterprisest, whatsoeuer thou doest, ought to be directed to him? If this be true, then truely it followeth that thy life is peruersly corrupted if it be not framed to obeying of him, forasmuch as his will ought to be our lawe to liue by. Againe, thou canſt not cleerely ſee him, but that thou muſt needes knowe that he is the fountaine and originall of all good thinges, wherevpon ſhould grow both a deſire to cleaue vnto him, and an aſſured truſt in him, if mans owne corruptnes did not draw his minde from the right ſearching of him. For firſt of all, the godly minde doth not as by a dreame imagine to hirſelfe anie God at aduenture, but ſtedfaſtly beholdeth the onely one and true God: and doth not falſely forge of him whatſoeuer hirſelfe liketh, but is content to beleeue him to be ſuch a one as he diſcloſeth himſelfe, and doth alway with great diligence beware that with preſumptuous raſhneſſe ſhe paſſe not beyond his will, and ſo wander out of the way. And when ſhe ſo knoweth him, becauſe ſhe vnderſtandeth that he gouerneth all thinges, ſhe aſſuredly truſteth that he is her ſafe keeper and defender, and therefore wholly committeth herſelfe to his faith, becauſe ſhe vnderſtandeth that he is the authour of all good things: therefore if any thing trouble her, or if ſhe want any thing, by and by ſhe flieth to him for ſuccour, looking for helpe at his hand. Becauſe ſhe is perſwaded that he is good and mercifull, therfore with aſſured confidence ſhe reſteth on him, and doubteth not in all her euils to find readie remedie in his mercifull kindneſſe. Becauſe ſhe knoweth him to be her Lord and father, therefore ſhee determineth that he is woorthie that ſhe ſhould in all things haue regard to his authoritie, reuerence his maieſtie, procure the aduancement of his glorie, and obey his commandements. Becauſe ſhe ſeeth that he is a righteous Iudge, and armed with his ſeueritie to puniſh ſinners, therefore ſhe alway ſetteth his iudgement ſeat before her eies, & with feare of him withdraweth and reſtraineth herſelfe from prouoking his wrath. Yet is ſhe not ſo affraid with the feeling of his iudgement, that ſhe would conuey herſelfe from it, although there were a way open to eſcape it: but rather ſhe doth no leſſe loue him, while he extendeth vengeance vpon the wicked, then while he is beneficiall to the godly, foraſmuch as ſhe vnderſtandeth that it doth no leſſe belong to his glorie, that he hath in ſtore puniſhment for the wicked and euill dooers, than that hee hath reward of eternall life for the righteous. Moreouer ſhe doth not for onely feare of puniſhment refraine herſelfe from ſinning: but becauſe ſhe loueth and reuerenceth him as her father, attendeth on him and honoreth him as her Lord, therefore although there were no hell at all, yet ſhe dreadeth his onely diſpleaſure. Now behold what is the pure and true religion, euen faith ioyned with an earneſt feare of God, ſo that feare may containe in it a willing reuerence, and draw with it a right forme of worſhipping ſuch as is appointed in the lawe. And this is the more heedfully to be noted, becauſe all men generally do worſhip God, but few doe reuerence him, while each where is great pompous ſhewe in ceremonies, but the pureneſſe of heart is rare to be found.

It is in vaine to know God, of whom the moſt godleſſe haue a kind of feeling, vnleſſe we know him ſo, that we alſo worſhip him.

3 Truely, they that iudge rightly, will alway hold this for certaine, that there is grauen in the mindes of men a certaine feeling of the Godhead, which neuer can be blotted out. Yea that this perſwaſion, that there is a God, is euen from their generation naturally planted in them, and deepely rooted within their bones, the verie obſtinacie of the wicked is a ſubſtantiall witneſſe, which with their furious ſtriuing, yet can neuer winde themſelues out of the feare of God. Although Diagoras and ſuch other doe ieſt and laugh at all that hath in all ages beene beleeued concerning religion: although Dionyſius do ſcoffe at the heauenly iudgement: yet that is but a laughter from the teeth forwarde, becauſe inwardly the woorme of conſcience gnaweth them much more ſharpely then all hot fearing irons. I alleadge not this that Cicero ſaith, that errours by continuance of time grow out of vſe, and religion daily more and more encreaſeth and waxeth better. For the world (as a little hereafter we ſhall haue occaſion to ſhew) trauelleth as much as in it lyeth to ſhake off all knowledge of God, and by all meanes to corrupt the worſhipping of him. But this onely I ſay, that when the dull hardneſſe, which the wicked doe deſirouſly labour to get to deſpiſe God withall, doth lie piningly in their hearts, yet the ſame feeling of God, which they would moſt of all deſire to haue vtterly deſtroied, liueth ſtill, and ſometime doth vtter it ſelfe: whereby we gather that it is no ſuch doctrine as is firſt to be learned in ſchooles, but ſuch a one whereof euerie man is a teacher to himſelfe euen from his mothers wombe, and ſuch a one as nature ſuffereth none to forget, although many bend all their endeuour to ſhake it out of their minde. Now, if all men be borne and do liue to this end, to know God, and the knowledge of God is but fickle and lightly vanisheth away, vnlesse it proceede thus farre: it is euident, that they all swarue out of kinde from the lawe of their creation, that do not direct to this marke all the whole thoughts and doings of their life. Of which the Philosophers themselues were not ignorant. For Plato meant nothing else, when he often times taught, that the soueraigne good of the soule is the likenesse of God, when the soule hauing throughly conceiued the knowledge of him is wholly transformed into him. Therefore verie aptly doth Grillus reason in Plutarch, where he affirmeth, that men, if religion be once taken from their life, are not onely nothing better than bruite beasts, but also manie waies much more miserable, for that being subiect to so many sorts of euils, they continually draw foorth a troublesome vnquiet life: and therefore the worshipping of God is the onely thing that maketh them better than bruite beastes, by which alone they aspire to immortalitie.

THE THIRD CHAPTER.

That the knowledge of God is naturally planted in the minds of men.

Why God hath imprinted some knowledge of himselfe in all mens minds, as that al nations, euen idolaters themselues do proue.

WE hold it out of controuersie, that there is in the minde of man, euen by naturall instinction, a certaine feeling of the Godhead. For to the end that no man should flee to the pretence of ignorance, God himselfe hath planted in all men a certaine vnderstanding of his diuine maiestie, the remenbrance whereof, with powring in now and then as it were new drops, he continually reneweth: that when all, not one excepted, do know that there is a God, and that he is their maker, they may all be condemned by their owne testimonie, for that they haue not both worshipped him, and dedicated their life to his will. But truely if the not knowing of God be any where to be found, it is likely that there can no where else be any example of it more than among the grosseſt sorts of people and fardest from ciuill order of humanitie. But (as the heathen man saith) there is no nation so barbarous, no kinde of people so sauage, in whom resteth not this perswasion that there is a God. And euen they that in other parts of their life seeme verie little to differ from bruite beasts, yet do continually keepe a certaine seede of religion. So throughly hath this common principle possessed all mens minds, and so fast it sticketh within all mens bowels. Sith then from the beginning of the world there hath beene no countrey, no citie, yea no house, that could be without religion, in this is emplied a certaine secret confession, that a feeling of the Godhead is written in the hearts of all men. Yea, and idolatrie it selfe is a substantiall proofe of this perswasion. For we know how vnwillingly man abaseth himselfe to honour other creatures aboue himselfe. Therefore when he had rather worship a blocke and a stone, than he would be thought to haue no God, it appeareth that this imprinted perswasion of God is of most great force, which is impossible to be raced out of the minde of man, that it is much more easie to haue the affection of nature broken, as indeede it is broken when man from his owne naturall swelling pride of his owne will stoupeth downe euen to the baseſt creatures to honour God.

Yea, they which do most denie it, shew most that it can not reasonably be denied.

2 Wherefore it is most vaine which some do say, that religion was deuised by the subtletie and craft of a few, by this policie, to keepe the simple people in awe, whereas they themselues that procured others to worship God, beleeued nothing lesse than that there was any God at all. I graunt indeed that subtle men haue inuented many things in religion, whereby to bring the people to a reuerence, and cast them in a feare, to make their minds the more pliable to obedience: But this they could neuer haue brought to passe, vnlesse the minds of men had beene alreadie before hand perswaded that there was a God, out of which perswasion as out of seede springeth that readie inclination to religion Neither is it likely that euen they which subtlely deceiued the simple sort with colour of religion, were themselues altogether without knowledge of God. For though in times past there haue bene some, and at this day there arise vp many that denie that there is any God: yet whether they will or no, they oftentimes feele that which they are desirous not to know. We reade of none that euer did breake foorth into more presumptuous and vnbridled despising of God, than Caius Caligula: yet none more miserably trembled when any token of Gods wrath appered. And so against his will he quaked for feare of him whom of wilfull purpose he endeuored to despise. And the same may a man comonly see to happen to such as he was. For the bolder despiser of God that any man is, the more is he troubled at the verie noise of the falling of a leafe. And whence commeth that, but from the reuengement of Gods maiestie, which doth so much the more vehemently strike their consciences as they more labour to flie away from it? They doe indeed looke about for all the starting holes that may be, to hide themselues from the presence of the Lord: but whether they will or no, they are still holden fast tied. For howsoeuer sometime it seemeth to vanish away for a moment, yet it often returneth againe, and with new assault doth run vpon them: so that the rest which they haue, if they haue any at all, from torment of conscience, is much like to the sleepe of drunkards or franticke men, which euen while they sleepe doe not quietly rest, because they are at euerie moment vexed with horrible and dreadfull dreames. Therefore the very vngodly themselues serue for an example to proue that there alway liueth in all mens minds some knowledge of God.

THE FOVRTH CHAPTER.

That the same knowledge is either choaked, or corrupted, partly by ignorance, and partly by malice.

The erronious imagination which superstitious persons haue of God, can not be excused for that they are the cause of their owne blindnesse.

BVt as experience teacheth that God hath sowen the seed of religion in all men, so scarsely may be found the hundreth man, that hauing it conceiued in his heart doth cherish it, but no man in whom it ripeneth, so far is it off, that any fruit appeareth in due time. Therefore whether it be that some become vaine in their owne superstitions, or that some doe of set purpose maliciously reuolt from God; yet all do runne out of kinde from the true knowledge of him. So commeth it to passe that there remaineth no true godlinesse in the world. But whereas I said that some by errour fall into superstition, I meane not thereby as though their simplicitie might excuse them from blame, because the blindnesse that they haue, is commonly alway mingled both with proud vanitie and with stubbornesse. Vanitie and the same ioyned with pride appeareth in this, that they miserable men both in the seeking of God, do not climbe aboue themselues as they ought to haue done, but measure him according to the proportion of their owne fleshly dulnesse, and also neglecting the sound manner of searching for him, do curiously flie to vaine speculations. And so they conceiue him not such a one as he offereth himselfe, but do imagine him such a one as of their owne rash presumption they haue forged him. Which gulfe being once opened, what way soeuer they stirre their feet, they must needes alway runn headlong into destruction. For whatsoeuer afterward they goe about toward the worshipping and seruice of God, they cannot account it done to him, because they worship him not, but rather the deuise of their owne heart, and their owne dreame in stead of him. This peruersenesse doth Paul expresly touch, where he saith, That they were made fooles when they coueted to be wise. He had before said, that they were made vaine in their imaginations: but lest any man should thereby excuse them from blame, he addeth further, that they are worthily blinded because not contented with sobrietie, but presumptuously taking vpon themselues more than they ought, they wilfully bring darknesse vpon them, yea with vaine and froward pride doe make themselues fooles. Whereupon followeth, that their foolishnesse is not excusable, whereof the cause is not only vaine curiositie, but also a greedinesse to know more than is meet for them, ioyned with a false confidence.

Rom. 1. 22.

2 As for this that Dauid saith, That the wicked and mad men thinke in their hearts, that there is no God: First that it is meant onely of those that choaking the light of nature, do of purpose make themselues senceleſſe, as we shall see againe a little hereafter. Euen as we see that manie after that they haue been hardened with boldnesse and custom of sinning, do furiously put from them all the remembrance of God, which yet is by verie feeling of nature inwardly ministred vnto their minds. Now Dauid, to make their madnesse the more detestable, bringeth them in as though they precisely denied, that there is any God: although they take not from him his being, but because in taking from

Psal. 13. 1. Malicious sinners are said to thinke there is no God, not as if they did precisely deny him to be, but because they la- from him his iudgement and prouidence, they ſhut him vp idle in heauen. For whereas nothing leſſe agreeth with the nature of God, than to throw away the gouernment of the world, and leaue it to fortune, to winke at the ſinnes of men, ſo as they may liue in licentious outrage vnpuniſhed: whoſoeuer he be that quenching the feare of the heauenly iudgement, doth careleſly follow his owne affections, he denieth that there is a God. And this is the iuſt vengance of God, to draw a fatneſſe ouer their hearts, ſo that the wicked when they haue once cloſed their eies, euen in ſeeing may not ſee. And Dauid in another place is the beſt expounder of his owne meaning, where he ſaith: That the feare of God is not before the eies of the wicked. Againe, that in their euill doings they proudly reioice at themſelues, becauſe they perſwade themſelues that God doth not looke vpon them. Therefore although they be compelled to acknowledge ſome God, yet they do rob him of his glorie in withdrawing from him his power. For as God (as Paul witneſſeth) cannot denie himſelfe, becauſe he continually abideth like himſelfe: ſo is it truely ſaid, that theſe men in faining God to be a dead and vaine image, do denie God. Moreouer it is to be noted that although they wraſtle againſt their owne naturall feeling, and do deſire not onely to ſhake out God from thence, but alſo to deſtroy him in heauen: yet their dull hardneſſe can neuer ſo far preuaile, but that God ſometime draweth them backe to his iudgement ſeat. But foraſmuch as they are not withholden with any feare from running violently againſt God: therefore it is certaine that there raigneth in them a brutiſh forgetfulneſſe of God, ſo long as that blind pang of rage doth ſo forcibly carrie them.

Leur to put off fro themſelues all feeling of his power, which notwithſtanding they cannot doe.

2. Tim. 1. 13

3 So is that vaine defence ouerthrowen, which many are wont to pretend for excuſe of their ſuperſtition. For they thinke, that any deuotion to religion ſufficeth, whatſoeuer it be, though it be neuer ſo much contrarie to order and truth. But they conſider not, that true religion ought to be framed according to the will of God, as by a perpetuall rule: and that God himſelfe abideth alway like himſelfe, and is no imagined Ghoſt or fantaſie, that may be diuerſly faſhioned after euery mans liking. And truely we may plainly ſee with how lying deceits ſuperſtition mocketh God, while ſhe goeth about to doe him pleaſure. For catching holde of thoſe things in a manner only, which God hath teſtified that he careth not for, ſhe either contemptuouſly vſeth, or openly refuſeth thoſe things that he appointeth and ſaieth to be pleaſant vnto him. Therefore whoſoeuer do ſet vp new inuented formes of worſhipping God, they worſhip and honour their owne doting deuiſes: becauſe they durſt not ſo triſle with God, vnleſſe they had firſt faigned a God, agreeing with the follies of their trifling toyes. Wherefore the Apoſtle pronounceth, that that vnſtaied and wandring opinion of the maieſtie of God, is a verie not knowing of God. When (ſaith he) yee knew not God, yee ſerued them that in nature were no Gods. And in another place he ſaith that the Epheſians were without a God at ſuch time as they ſtraied from the right knowledge of the one God. And at leaſt in this caſe, it differeth not much, whether thou beleeue one God or many, becauſe in both caſes thou departeſt from and forſakeſt the true God: whom when thou haſt once forſaken, there is nothing left with thee but a deteſtable Idol. It followeth therefore, that we muſt determine with Lactantius, that there is no lawfully allowable religion, but that which is ioyned with trueth.

God alloweth no deuotion but that which ſpringeth from the true knowledge of his name.

Ephe. 2. 12

4 There is alſo a ſecond fault, that they neither haue at any time any conſideration of God, but againſt their wils, nor do approach toward him, till for all their holding backe they be forcibly drawen to him: and euen then alſo they haue not a willing feare that proceedeth from reuerence of Gods maieſtie, but onely a ſeruile and conſtrained feare, which the iudgement of God wringeth out of them: which iudgement becauſe they cannot eſcape, therefore they dread it, but yet ſo as therewithall they abhorre it. And ſo that ſaying of Statius, that feare firſt made gods in the world, may be fitly ſpoken of vngodlineſſe, and of this kinde of vngodlineſſe onely. They that haue a minde abhorring from the iuſtice of God, do heartily wiſh to haue his throne of iudgement ouerthrowen, which they know to ſtand for puniſhment of offences againſt his iuſtice by which affection they warre againſt God, who cannot be without his iudgement. But when they vnderſtand that his power impoſſible to be auoided, hangeth ouer them; becauſe they can neither by force remoue it, nor by flight eſcape it, therefore they

God accepteth not their ſeruice who ſeeke him onely by feare in caſes of extremitie, which neuertheleſſe doth proue that there was a ſeede of the knowledge of God which lay before ſuppreſſed in them.

they feare it. So leſt they ſhould in all things ſeeme to deſpiſe him, whoſe maieſtie ſtill preſſeth vpon them, they vſe a certaine outward forme of religion, ſuch as it is: but in the meane time they ceaſe not to defile themſelues with all kinde of vices, to ioyne outragious miſchiefes to miſchiefes vntill they haue in all points violated the holie law of the Lord, and deſtroied his whole righteouſnes, or at leaſt they are not ſo holden backe with that fained feare of God, but that they ſweetly reſt in their ſinnes, and flatter themſelues, & had rather to follow the intemperance of their fleſh than reſtraine it with the bridle of the holy Ghoſt. But foraſmuch as the ſame is but a voide and lying ſhadow of religion, yea ſcarcely woorthy to be called a ſhadow: heerby againe is eaſily gathered, how much the true godlineſſe, which is powred into the hearts of the faithfull, I meane that out of which religion ſpringeth, doth differ from this confuſed knowledge of God. And yet the hypocrites would obtaine by crooked compaſſes, to ſeeme nigh vnto God, whom they flie from. For whereas there ought to haue beene one continuall vnbroken courſe of obedience in their whole life, they in a manner in all their dooings careleſly rebelling againſt him, labour with a few ſacrifices to appeaſe him. Whereas they ought to haue ſerued him with holineſſe of life and ſincerenеſſe of heart, they inuent triflings & obſeruances of no value, to procure his fauour withall. Yea they doe the more licentiouſly lie dull in their owne dregs, becauſe they truſt that they may be diſcharged againſt him with their owne mockeries of propiciatorie ſatisfactions. Finally, whereas their affiance ought to haue bene faſtened in him, they neglecting him do reſt in themſelues, or in creatures. At length they entangle themſelues with ſuch a heape of errours, that the darke miſt of malice doth choake, and at laſt vtterly quench thoſe ſparkes, that glimmeringly ſhined to make them ſee the glorie of God. Yet that ſeede ſtill remaineth which can by no meane be plucked vp by the roote, to beleeue that there is a certaine Godhead: but the ſame ſeede is ſo corrupted, that it bringeth foorth of it none other but verie euill fruites. Yea thereby is that which I trauaile to proue more certainely gathered, that there is a feeling of the Godhead naturally grauen in the hearts of men, foraſmuch as the verie reprobates themſelues are of neceſſitie enforced to confeſſe it. In quiet proſperitie they pleaſantly mocke at God, yea they are full of talke and prating to diminiſh the greatnes of his power: but if once any deſperation touch them, it ſtirreth them vp to ſeeke the ſame God, and miniſtreth them ſudden ſhort praiers: by which it may appeare, that they were not vtterly ignorant of God, but that the ſame which ought ſooner to haue bene vttered, was by obſtinacie ſuppreſſed.

THE FIFTH CHAPTER.

That the knowledge of God doth ſhiningly appeare in the making of the world and in the continual gouernment thereof.

God's power and Godhead ſhineth ſo cleerely in the world, that it may be ſeene of all be they neuer ſo dull.

MOreouer becauſe the furtheſt end of bleſſed life ſtandeth in the knowledge of God: that the way to felicitie ſhould be ſtopped to none, therefore God hath not onely planted in the minds of men that ſeede of religion which we haue ſpoken of, but alſo hath ſo diſcloſed himſelfe in the whole workmanſhip of the world, and daily ſo manifeſtly preſenteth himſelfe, that men cannot open their eies but they muſt needes behold him. His ſubſtance indeed is incomprehenſible, ſo that his diuine maieſtie far ſurmounteth all mens ſenſes: but he hath in all his workes grauen certaine markes of his glorie, and thoſe ſo plaine and notably diſcernable, that the excuſe of ignorance is taken away from men, be they neuer ſo groſſe and dull witted. Therefore the Prophet rightfully crieth out, That he is clothed with light as with a garment: as if he ſhould haue ſaid, that then he firſt began to come foorth to be ſeene in viſible apparell, ſince the time that he firſt diſplaied his enſignes in the creation of the world, by which euen now what way ſoeuer we turne our eies, he appeareth glorious vnto vs. In the ſame place alſo the ſame Prophet aptly compareth the heauens as they be diſplaied abroad, to his royall pauillion: he ſaith that he hath framed his parlours in the waters, that the clouds are his chariots, that he rideth vpon the wings of the windes, that the windes and lightnings are his ſwift meſſengers. And becauſe the glorie of his power and wisedome doth more fully shine aboue, therefore commonly the heauen is called his palace. And first of all, what waie soeuer thou turne thy eies, there is no peece of the world, be it neuer so small, wherein are not seene at least some sparkles of his glorie to shine. But as for this most large and beautifull frame, thou canst not with one view peruse the wide compasse of it, but that thou must needes be on euery side ouerwhelmed with the infinite force of the brightnesse therof. Wherefore the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues doth verie well call the ages of the world the spectacle of inuisible things, for that the so orderly framing of the world serueth vs for a mirrour wherein we may behold God, which otherwise is inuisible. For which cause the Prophet assigneth to the heauenly creatures a language that all nations vnderstand, for that in them there is a more euident testification of the Godhead, than that it ought to escape the consideration of any nation, be they neuer so dull. Which thing the Apostle declaring more plainly, saith, That there is disclosed vnto men so much as was behouefull to be knowne concerning God: because all men without exception, do throughly see his inuisible things euen to his verie power and Godhead, which they vnderstand by the creation of the world.

Psal. 19.1.

Rom. 1.19.

2 As for his woonderfull wisedome, there are innumerable prooues both in heauen and in earth that witnesse it: I meane not onely that secreter sort of things, for the neerer marking whereof Astrologie, Phisicke, and all naturall Philosophie serueth, but euen those things that thrust themselues in sight of euery one, euen of the rudest vnlearned man, so that men cannot open their eies but they must needes be witnesses of them. But truely they that haue digested, yea or but tasted the liberall Arts, being holpen by the aide thereof, doe proceed much farther to looke into the secrets of Gods wisdome. Yet is there no man so hindred by lacke of knowledge of those Arts, but that hee throughly seeth abundantly enough of cunning workmanship in Gods workes, to bring him in admiration of the workeman thereof. As for example, to the searching out of the mouings of the starres, appointing of their places, measuring of their distances, and noting of their properties, there needeth Art and an exacter diligence: by which being throughly perceiued, as the prouidence of God is the more manifestly disclosed, so it is conuenient, that the minde rise somewhat the higher thereby to behold his glorie. But forasmuch as the vnlearned people, yea, and the rudest sort of them, such as are furnished with the onely helpe of their eies, cannot be ignorant of the excellencie of Gods cunning workmanship, which in this innumerable and yet so seuerally well ordered and disposed varietie doth of it selfe shew foorth it selfe: it is euident that there is no man to whom God doth not largely open his wisedome. Likewise it requireth a singular sharpnesse of wit, to wey with such cunning as Galen doth, the knitting togither, the proportionall agreement, the beautie, and vse in the frame of mans body: but by all mens confession, the body of man doth vtter in very shew of it selfe so cunning a compacting togither, that for it the maker of it may worthily bee iudged woonderfull.

His wisdome, though the learned more nerely, yet the rudest may plainly enough perceiue.

In lib. de vsu part.

3 And therefore certaine of the Philosophers in old time did not without cause call man a little world, because he is a rare representation of the power, goodnesse and wisdome of God, and containeth in himselfe miracles enough to occupy our mindes, if we will be content to marke them. And for this reason Paul, after that he had said that the verie blinde men may finde out God by groping for him, by and by saith further, that he is not to be sought farre off, because all men do feele vndoubtedly within themselues the heauenly grace wherewith they be quickened. But if we need to go no further than our selues, to finde and take hold of God: what pardon shall his slothfulnesse deserue that will not vouchsafe to descend into himselfe to finde God? And the same is the reason why Dauid, when he had shortly spoken in the aduancement of the wonderful name and honour of God that doth euery where gloriously shine, by and by crieth out: What is man that thou art mindefull of him? Againe, Out of the mouth of infants and sucking babes thou hast stablished strength. For so he pronounceth that not onely in the whole kinde of man is a mirrour of the workes of God, but also that the vety infants while they yet hang on their mothers brests, haue tongues eloquent enough to preach his glorie, so that there needeth no other Orators. And there-

We need not seeke farre for the knowledge of God when in our owne faces we may see him., Act. 17.27.

Psal. 8 5.

therefore be doubteth not to set their mouthes in the vaward, as being strongly armed to subdue their madnesse that would according to their diuellish pride couet to extinguish the name of God. And hereupon riseth that which Paul alledgeth out of Aratus, that we are the offspring of God: because he garnishing vs with such excellency, hath testified that he is our father. Like as euen by common reason, and as it were by information of experience, the prophane Poets called him the father of men. And truly no man will assentingly & willingly yeeld himselfe to serue God, but he that hauing tasted his fatherly loue, is mutually allured to loue and worship him.

Act. 17. 28.

4 And here is disclosed the foule vnthankfulnes of men, which while they haue within themselues a workhouse gloriously furnished with innumerable works of God. and also a shop stuffed with inestimable plenty of riches, & when they ought to burst forth into praising of him, are contrariwise puffed vp and do swell with so much the greater pride. They feele how diuersly in maruellous wise God worketh in them: they are taught by experience it selfe, how great variety of gifts they possesse by his liberallity: whether they wil or no, they are inforced to know that these are the tokens of his Godhead: & yet they suppresse it close within them. Truly they need not to goe out of thē selues, so that they would not in presumptuously taking vpon themselues that which is giuen from heauen, bury within the ground that which brightly giueth light to their mindes to see God. But euen at this day the earth beareth many monsterous spirits, which stick not to abuse the whole seed of godhead that is sowne in mans nature, & to imploy it to oppresse the name of God. How detestable, I pray you, is this madnesse, that man finding God a hundred times in his body & his soule, should by the very same pretence of excellency deny that there is a God? They will not say, that they are by chance made different from bruite beasts. But they pretend a cloke of nature, whom they account the maker of al things, & so do conuey God away. They see that exquisite workemanship in all their members, from their mouth and their eies euen to the nailes of their toes, and yet here also they put nature in place of God. But specially the so swift motions, the so excellent powers, the so rare gifts of the soule, doe represent a diuine nature that doth not easily suffer it selfe to be hid: vnlesse the Epicureans like the Giants Cyclopes would (bearing themselues bold vpon this hie degree) outragiously make warre against God. Do the whole treasures of the heauenly wisdome so meet together, to rule a worme of fiue feet long: and shall the whole vniuersality of the world be without this prerogatiue? First to agree that there is a certaine instrumentall thing that answereth to all the parts of man, doth so serue nothing at all to obscure the honour of God, that it rather doth more gloriously set it out. Let Epicure answere me, what meeting of vndiuisible bodies, boiling the meat and drinke in man, doth dispose part into excrements and part into bloud, and bringeth to passe that there is in all the members of man such an endeuouring to doe their office, euen as if so many seuerall soules did by common aduice rule one body.

* Their vnthankefulnesse is worthy of detestation who ascribe the operations of their bodies and soules in such wise to nature that they hide the power of God which worketh in them.

5 But I haue not now to doe with that stie of swine. I rather speake vnto them, that being giuen to subtleties, would by crooked conueiance with that cold saying of Aristotle, both to destroy the immortalitie of the soule, and also to take from God his right. For because there are instrumentall powers of the soule, by pretence thereof they binde the soule to the body, that it cannot continue without the body, and with praises of nature they doe as much as in them is, suppresse the name of God. But the powers of the soule are farre from being inclosed in those exercises that serue the body. For what pertaineth it to the body, for a man to measure the skie, to gather the number of the stars, to learne the greatnesse of one, to know what space they be distant one from another, with what swiftnesse or slowenesse they goe their courses, how many degrees they decline this way or that way? I grant in deed that there is some vse of Astrologie: but my meaning is onely to shew that in this so deepe searching out of heauenly things, it is not an instrumentall measuring, but that the soule hath her offices by it selfe seuerall from the bodie. I haue shewed one example, by which it shall be easie for the readers to gather the rest. Truely the manifold nimbleneſse of the soule, by which it surueieth both heauen and earth, ioyneth things past with things to come, keepeth in memorie things heard long before, and expresseth each thing to

They obscure the glory of God, who binde the soule in such sort vnto the body that they take from it those operations which depending not at all vpon corporall instruments, doe both shew the diuine nature of the soule, and the powerfull prouidence of him that created it.

it selfe by imagination, also the ingeniousnesse by which it inuenteth things incredible, and which is the mother of so many maruellous artes, are sure tokens of diuine nature in man. Beside that, euen in sleeping it doth not onely roll and turne it selfe, but also conceiueth many things profitable, reasoneth of many things, and also prophecieth of things to come. What shall we in this case say, but that the signes of immortalitie that are imprinted in man, cannot be blotted out? Now what reason may beare that man shall be of diuine nature, and not acknowledge his Creator? Shall we forsooth by iudgement that is put into vs discerne betweene right and wrong, and shall there be no iudge in heauen? Shall we euen in our sleepe haue abiding with vs some remnant of vnderstanding, and shall no God be waking in gouerning the world? Shall we be so counted the inuenters of so many artes and profitable things, that God shall be defrauded of his praise, whereas yet experience sufficiently teacheth, that from another and not from our selues, all that we haue, is in diuers wise distributed among vs? As for that, which some doe babble of the secret inspiration that giueth liuelinesse to the world, it is not onely weake, but also vngodly. They like well that famous saying of Virgil:

First heauen and earth, and flowing fieldes of seas,
The shining globe of Moone, and Titans stars, Aen. 6.
Spirite seedes within, and throughout all the lims,
Infused minde the whole huge masse doth moue,
And with the large big bodie mixe it selfe.
Thence come the kindes of men and eke of beastes
And liues of flying foules, and monsters strange,
That water beares within the marble Sea.
A fierie linelinesse and heauenly race there is Within those seedes, &c.

Forsooth, that the world which was created for a spectacle of the glory of God, should be the Creator of it selfe. So in another place the same author following the common opinion of the Greekes and Latins, saith: Geo. 4.

Some say that bees haue part of minde diuine,
And heauenly draughtes. For eke they say that God Goes through the coastes of land, and creekes of sea,
And through deepe skie. And hence the flockes and herdes,
And men, and all the kinds of sauage beasts
Each at their birth receiue their subtle liues.
And thereto are they rendered all at last,
And all resolued are returnd againe.
Ne place there is for death: but liuely they,
Flie into number of the stars aboue,
And take their place within the loftie skie.

Loe, what that hungrie speculation of the vniuersall minde that giueth soule and liuelinesse to the world, auaileth to engender and nourish godlinesse in the hearts of men. Which doth also better appeare by the blasphemous sayings of the filthy dogge Lucretius, which are deriued from the same principle. Euen this is it, to make a shadowish God, to driue farre away the true God whom we ought to feare and worship. I graunt indeed that this may be godlily said, so that it proceed from a godly minde, that Nature is God: but because it is a hard and an vnproper maner of speech, for as much as Nature is rather an order prescribed by God: therefore in things of so great weight and to which is due a singular religiousnesse, it is hurtfull to wrap vp God confusedly with the inferiour course of his workes. Let vs therefore remember, so oft as any man considereth his owne nature, that there is one God which so gouerneth all natures, that his will is to haue vs looke vnto him, our faith to be directed to him, and him to be worshipped and called vpon of vs: because there is nothing more against conueniencie of reason, than for vs to enioy those excellent gifts that sauour of diuine nature in vs, and to despise the author that freely doth giue them vnto vs. Now as concerning his power with how notable examples doth it forceably draw vs to consider it, vnlesse perhaps we may be ignorant, of how great a strength it is with his onely word to vphold this infinite infinite masse of heauen and earth, with his onely becke, sometime to shake the heauen with noise of thunders, to burne vp each thing with lightenings, to set the aire on fire with lightning flames, sometime to trouble it with diuers sorts of tempests, and by and by the same God when he list in one moment to make faire weather: to hold in the Sea as if it hanged in the aire, which with his heighth seemeth to threaten continuall destruction to the earth, sometime in horrible wise to raise it vp with outragious violence of winds, and sometime to appease the waues and make it calme againe. For proofe heereof doe serue all the praises of God gathered of the testimonies of nature, specially in the booke of Iob and in Esay, which now of purpose I ouerpasse, because they shall else where haue another place fitter for them, where I shall entreat of the creation of the world according to the Scriptures. Onely my meaning was now to touch, that both strangers and they of the houshold of God haue this way of seeking God common to them both, that is, to follow these first draughts which both aboue and beneath doe as in a shadowe set foorth a liuely image of him. And now the same power leadeth vs to consider his eternitie. For it must needes be that he from whom all things haue their beginning, is of eternall continuance, and hath his beginning of himselfe. But now if any man enquire the cause whereby hee both was once lead to create all these things, and is now mooued to preserue them: we shall find that his onely goodnesse was it that caused him. Yea and although this onely be the cause, yet ought the same abundantly to suffice to allure vs to the loue of him, forasmuch as there is no creature (as the Prophet saith) vpon which his mercy is not powred out.

The workes of God in cherishing the good, punishing the wicked, and calling sinners home vnto himselfe, are proofes of his exceeding power and vertue.

6 Also in the second sort of his workes, I meane those that come to passe beside the ordinarie course of nature, there doth appeare no lesse euident proofe of his powers. For in gouerning the fellowship of men he so ordereth his prouidence, that whereas he is by innumerable meanes good and bountifull to all men, yet by manifest and daily tokens he declareth his fauourable kindnesse to the godly, and his seuerity to the wicked and euill doers. For not doubtfull are the punishments that he layeth vpon hainous offences: like as hee doth openly shew himselfe a defender and reuenger of innocencie, while he prospereth the life of good men with his blessing, helpeth their necessitie, asswageth and comforteth their sorrowes, relieueth their calamities, and by all meanes prouideth for their safety. Neither ought it any thing to deface the perpetuall rule of his iustice, that he often times permitteth wicked men and euill doers for a time to reioice vnpunished: and on the other side suffereth good and innocent to be tossed with many aduersities, yea and to be oppressed with the malice and vniust dealing of the vngodly. But rather a much contrary consideration ought to enter into our mindes: that when by manifest shew of his wrath he punisheth one sinne, we should therefore thinke that he hateth all sinnes: and when he suffereth many sinnes to passe vnpunished, we should thereupon thinke that there shall be another iudgement to which they are deferred to be then punished. Likewise how great matter doth it minister vs to consider his mercy, while he often times ceaseth not to shew his vnwearied bountifulnesse vpon miserable sinners in calling them home to him with more than fatherly tenderneſse, vntill he haue subdued their frowardnesse with doing them good?

The goodnes of God is shewed by deliuering men that are in miserie, his strength by ouerthrowing them that are mighty, his wisdome by disposing all things in fittest opportunitie.

7 To this end, where the Prophet particularly rehearseth, how God in cases past hope, doth suddenly and wonderfully and beside all hope succour men that are in miserie and in a maner lost, whether hee defend them wandering in wilderneſse from the wild beasts, and at length leadeth them into the way againe, or ministreth food to the needy and hungry, or deliuereth prisoners out of horrible dungeons and iron bands, or bringeth men in perill of shipwracke safe into the hauen, or healeth the halfe dead of diseases, or scorcheth the earth with heat and drineſse, or maketh it fruitfull with secret watering of his grace, or aduanceth the basest of the rascall people, or throweth downe the noble Peeres from the high degree of dignity: by such examples shewed foorth, hee gathereth that those things which are iudged chances happening by fortune, are so many testimonies of the heauenly prouidence and specially of his fatherly kindnesse, and that thereby is giuen matter of reioycing to the godly, and the wicked and reprobrate haue their mouths stopped. But because the greater part infected with their errours are blind in so cleere a place of beholding, therefore he crieth out, that it is a gift of rare and singular wisedome, wisely to wey these works of God: by sight whereof they nothing profit that otherwise seeme most cleere sighted. And truely how much soeuer the glory of God doth apparantly shine before them, yet scarsely the hundreth man is a true beholder of it. Likewise his power and wisedome are no more hid in darknesse: whereof the one, his power, doth notably appeare, when the fierce outragiousnesse of the wicked being in all mens opinion vnconquerable, is beaten flat in one moment, their arrogancie tamed, their strongest holdes rased, their weapons and armour broken in peeces, their strengthes subdued, their deuises ouerthrowne, and themselues fall with their owne weight, the presumptuous boldnes, that auanced it selfe aboue the heauens is throwen downe euen to the bottome point of the earth againe, the lowly are lifted vp out of the dust, and the needy raised from the dunghill, the oppressed and afflicted are drawen out of extreme distresse, men in despaired state are restored to good hope, and vnarmed beare away the victorie from the armed, few from many; the feeble from the strong. As for his wisedome, it selfe sheweth it selfe manifestly excellent, while it disposeth euery thing in fittest opportunitie, confoundeth the wisedome of the world be it neuer so pearcing, findeth out the subtile in their subtiltie, finally gouerneth all things by most conuenient order.

Psal. 113. 7.

1. Cor. 3. 19.

8 We see that it needeth no long or labourſome demonstration, to fetch out testimonies, to serue for the glorious declaration and proofe of Gods maiestie: for by these fewe that we haue touched, it appeareth, that which way soeuer a man chance to looke, they are so common & ready that they may be easily marked with eie, and pointed out with the finger. And here againe is to be noted, that we are called to the knowledge of God, not such as contented with vaine speculation, doth but flie about in the braine, but such as shall be sound and fruitfull, if it be rightly conceiued and take roote in our harts. For the Lord is declared by his powers, the force whereof because we feele within vs, and doe enioy the benefits of them, it must needes be that we be inwardly mooued much more liuely with such a knowledge, than if we should imagine God to be such an one, of whom we should haue no feeling. Whereby we vnderstand that this is the rightest way and fittest order to seeke God, not to attempt to enter deepely with presumptuous curiositie throughly to discusse his substance, which is rather to be reuerently worshipped than scrupulously searched: but rather to behold him in his workes, by which he maketh himselfe neere and familiar, and doth in a manner communicate himselfe vnto vs. And this the Apostle ment, when he said, that God is not to be sought a farre off, forasmuch as he with his most present power dwelleth within euery one of vs.. Wherefore Dauid hauing before confessed his vnspeakeable greatnesse, when he descendeth to the particular rehearsall of his workes, protesteth that the same will shew foorth it selfe. Therefore we also ought to giue our selues into such a searching out of God, as may so holde our wit suspended with admiration, that it may therewithall throughly mooue vs with effectuall feeling. And, as Augustine teacheth in another place, because we are not able to conceiue him, it behoueth vs as it were fainting vnder the burden of his greatnesse, to looke vnto his workes, that we may be refreshed with his goodnesse.

The true knowledge of God consisteth not in the curious searching of his nature, but in the inward feeling of his power.

Act. 17. 27.

Psal. 145.

In Psal. 144.

9 Then such a knowledge ought not onely to stirre vs vp to the worshipping of God, but also to awake vs, & raise vs to hope of the life to come. For when we consider that such examples as God sheweth both of his mercifulnesse, and of his seueritie, are but begun and not halfe full: without doubt we must thinke, that heerein he doth but make a shew afore hand of those things, whereof the open disclosing and full deliuerance is differred vnto another life. On the other side, when we see that the godly are by the vngodly greeued with afflictions, troubled with iniuries, oppressed with slaunders, and vexed with despitefull dealings and reproches: contrariwise that wicked doers doe flourish, prosper, and obtaine quiet with honour, yea, and that vnpunished: we must by and by gather that there shall be another life, wherein is laid vp in store both due reuenge for wickednesse, and reward for righteousnesse. Moreouer when we note that the faithfull are often chastised with the rods of the Lord, we may most certainly determine that much lesse the vngodly shall escape his scourges. For very well is that spoken of Augustine. If euery sinne should now be punished with open

The knowledge of those things which here God worketh vpon men, doth giue vs a taste of that which shall be more fully accomplished in the life to come, especially if we consider his effectuall working in our selues.

De ciui. dei. cap. 8.

paine, it would be thought that nothing were reserued to the last iudgement. Againe, if God should now openly punish no sinne, it would be beleeued, that there were no prouidence of God. Therefore we must confesse, that in euery particular worke of God, but principally in the vniuersall generalitie of them, the powers of God are set foorth as it were in painted tables, by which all mankinde is prouoked & allured to the knowledge of him, and from knowledge to full and perfect felicitie. But whereas these his powers doe in his works most brightly appeare, yet what they principally tende vnto, of what valour they be, and to what end we ought to wey them: this we then onely attaine to vnderstand when we discend into our selues, and do consider by what meanes God doth shew foorth in vs his life, wisedome, and power, and doth vse towards vs his

Psal. 92. 7. righteousnesse, goodnesse, and mercifull kindnesse. For though Dauid iustly complaineth, that the vnbeleeuing doe dote in folly, because they wey not the deepe counsailes of God in his gouernance of mankinde: yet, that is also most true, which he saith Psal. 40. 13. in another place, that the wonderfull wisedome of God in that behalfe exceedeth the haires of our head. But because this point shall heereafter in place conuenient be more largely entreated, therefore I doe at this time passe it ouer.

God manifesting himselfe, men profit not by it, because they beholde things done without regarding the doer, or they ascribe that to fortune which he doth, or if they haue some feeling of God, they deprane it with doting fancies, which fault is common vnto all, euen the sharpest witted.

10 But with how great brightnesse soeuer God doth in the mirrour of his workes shew by representation both himselfe and his immortall kingdome: yet such is our grosse blockishnesse, that we stand dully amased at so plaine testimonies, so that they passe away from vs without profite. For as touching the frame and most beautifull placing of the world, how many a one is there of vs, [illegible] when he either lifteth vp his eies to heauen, or casteth them about on the diuers countries of the earth, doth direct his minde to remembrance of the creator, and doth not rather rest in beholding the works without hauing regard of the workman? But as touching those things that dayly happen beside the order of naturall course, how many a one is there that doth not more thinke that men are rather whirled about and rowled by blinde vnaduisednesse of fortune, then gouerned by prouidence of God? But if at any time we be by the guiding and direction of these things driuen to the consideration of God, (as all men must needs be) yet so soone as we haue without aduisement conceiued a feeling of some godhead, we by and by slide away to the dotages or erroneous inuentions of our flesh, and with our vanitie we corrupt the pure veritie of God. So herein indeede we differ one from another, that euery man priuately by himselfe procureth to himselfe some peculiar error: but in this point we all are most like together, that we all, not one excepted, doe depart from the one true God to monstrous trifles. To which disease not onely common and grosse wits are subiect, but also the most excellent and those that otherwise are indued with singular sharpnesse of vnderstanding, are entangled with it. How largely hath the whole sect of Philosophers bewrayed their owne dulnesse and beastly ignorance in this behalfe? For, to passe ouer all the rest, which are much more vnreasonably fooliſh, Plato himselfe, the most religious and most sober of all the rest, vainely erreth in his rounde globe. Now what might not chaunce to the other, when the chiefe of them, whose part was to giue light to the rest, doe themselues so erre and stumble? Likewise where Gods gouernance of mens matters doth so plainly prooue his prouidence, that it can not be denied, yet this doth no more preuaile with men, then if they beleeued that all things are tossed vp and downe with the rash will of Fortune: so great is our inclination to vanitie and error. I speake now altogether of the most excellent, and not of the common sort, whose madnesse hath infinitely wandered in prophaning the truth of God.

Men who they trust to their owne wits, become in their opinions concerning God, either vaine, as the Stoikes, and the Aegyptians, or irreligious as the Epicures, or irresolute as Symonides.*

11 *Hereof proceedeth that vnmeasurable sinke of errors, wherewith the whole world hath beene filled and ouerflowen. For each mans wit is to himselfe as a maze, so that it is no maruell that euery seuerall nation was diuersly drawen into seuerall deuises, and not that only, but also that each seuerall man had his seuerall gods by himselfe. For since that rash presumption and wantonnesse was ioyned to ignorance and darknesse, there hath beene scarcely at any time any one man found, that did not forge to himselfe an idoll or fansie in steede of God. Truely, euen as out of a wide and large spring doe issue waters, so the infinite number of gods hath flowed out of the wit of man, while euery man ouer licentiously strayning, erroneously deuiseth this or that concerning God himselfe. And yet I neede not heere to make a register of the superstitions, wherewith the world hath beene entangled: becauſe both in ſo doing I ſhould neuer haue end, and alſo though I ſpeake not one word of them, yet by ſo many corruptions it ſufficiently appeareth how horrible is the blindneſſe of mans minde. I paſſe ouer the rude and vnlearned people. But among the Philoſophers, which enterpriſed with reaſon and learning to pearce into heauen, how ſhamefull is the diſagreement? With the higher wit that any of them was endued, and filled with Art and Science, with ſo much the more glorious colours he ſeemed to paint out his opinion. All which notwithſtanding, if one doe narrowly looke vpon, he ſhall finde them to be but vaniſhing falſe colours. The Stoickes ſeemed in their owne conceit to ſpeake very wiſely, that out of all the parts of nature may be gathered diuers names of God, and yet that God being but one is not thereby torne inſunder. As though we were not already more than enough enclined to vanitie, vnleſſe a manifold plenty of gods ſet before vs, ſhould further and more violently draw vs into error. Alſo the Ægyptians myſticall ſcience of diuinitie ſheweth, that they all diligently endeuoured to this end, not to ſeeme to erre without a reaſon. And it is poſſible, that at the firſt ſight ſome thing ſeeming probable, might deceiue the ſimple and ignorant: but no mortall man euer inuented any thing, whereby religion hath not beene fowly corrupted. And this ſo confuſe diuerſitie emboldened the Epicures and other groſſe deſpiſers of godlines, by little and little to caſt off all feeling of God. For when they ſaw the wiſeſt of all to ſtriue in contrary opinions, they ſticked not out of their diſagreements, and out of the fooliſh or apparantly erroneous doctrine of each of them, to gather, that men doe in vaine and fondly procure torments to themſelues while they ſearch for God, which is none at all. And this they thought that they might freely doe without puniſhment, becauſe it was better briefely to deny vtterly, that there is any God, than to faigne vncertaine gods, and ſo to raiſe vp contentions that neuer ſhould haue end. And too much fondly doe they reaſon, or rather caſt a miſt to hide their vngodlineſſe by ignorance of men, whereby it is no reaſon that any thing ſhould be taken away from God. But foraſmuch as all doe confeſſe, that there is nothing, about which both the learned & vnlearned do ſo much diſagree, thereupon is gathered that the wits of men are more than dull and blinde in heauenly myſteries, that do ſo erre in ſeeking out of God. Some other do praiſe that anſwer of Symonides, which being demaunded of King Hieron, what God was, deſired to haue a daies reſpite granted him to ſtudy vpon it. Aud when the next day following, the King demaunded the ſame queſtion he required two daies reſpite, and ſo oftentimes doubling the number of daies at length anſwered: How much the more I conſider it, ſo much the harder the matter ſeemeth vnto me. But granting that he did wiſely to ſuſpend his ſentence of ſo darke a matter, yet heereby appeareth, that if men be onely taught by nature, they can know nothing certainly, ſoundly, and plainly concerning God, but onely are tyed to confuſed principles to worſhip an vnknowen God.

12 Now we muſt alſo hold, that all they that corrupt the pure religion (as all they muſt needs do that are giuen to their own opinion) do depart from the one God. They will boaſt that their meaning is otherwiſe: but what they meane, or what they perſuade themſelues maketh not much to the matter, ſith the holy Ghoſt pronounceth, that all they are Apoſtataes, that according to the darknes of their own minde do thruſt diuels in the place of God. For this reaſon, Paul pronounceth that the Epheſians were without a God, till they had learned by the Goſpell, what it was to worſhip the true God. And we muſt not thinke this to be ſpoken of one nation onely, foraſmuch as he generally affirmeth in another place, that all men were become vaine in their imaginations, ſince that in the creation of the world, the Maieſtie of the Creator was diſcloſed vnto them. And therefore the Scripture, to make place for the true and one onely God, condemneth of falſehood and lying, whatſoeuer Godhead in old time was celebrate among the Gentiles, and leaueth no God at all, but in the mount Sion, where flouriſhed the peculiar knowledge of God. Truely, among the Gentiles the Samaritanes in Chriſts time ſeemed to approch higheſt to true godlines: and yet we heare it ſpoken by Chriſts own mouth, that they knewe not what they worſhipped. Whereupon followeth, that they were deceiued with vaine error. Finally, although they were not all infected with groſſe faults, or fell into open idolatries, yet was there no true and approoued religion that was grounded onely vpon common reaſon. For albeit, that there were a few

1.Cor. 2.8. that were not ſo mad as the common people were, yet this doctrine of Paul remaineth certainely true, that the Princes of this world conceiue not the wiſedome of God. Now if the moſt excellent haue wandred in darknes, what is to be ſaid of the very dregs? Wherefore it is no maruell, if the holy Ghoſt doe refuſe as baſtard worſhippings all formes of worſhipping, deuiſed by the will of men. Becauſe in heauenly myſteries opinion conceiued by wit of men, although it doe not alway breed a heape of errours, yet is alway the mother of errour. And though there come no worſe of it, yet is this no ſmall fault, at aduenture, to worſhip an vnknowne God: of which fault, all they by Chriſts
Iohn.4.22. owne mouth are pronounced guiltie, that are not taught by the law what God they ought to worſhip. And truely the beſt lawmakers that euer were, proceeded no further, than to ſay that religion was grounded vpon common conſent. Yea, and in Xenophon, Socrates praiſed the anſwer of Apollo, wherein he willed that euery man ſhould worſhip gods after the maner of the countrey, and the cuſtome of his owne Citie. But how came mortall men by this power, of their owne authoritie to determine that which far ſurmounteth the world? or who can ſo reſt in the decrees of the elders, or common ordinances of peoples, as to receiue without doubting a God deliuered by mans deuiſe? Euery man rather will ſtand to his owne iudgement, than yeelde himſelfe to the will of another. Sith therefore it is too weake and feeble a bonde of godlineſſe, in worſhipping of God to follow either a cuſtome of a Citie or the conſent of antiquitie, it remaineth that God himſelfe muſt teſtifie of himſelfe from heauen.

By the creatures of the world we cannot aſpire to the true knowledge of God, except our harts be alſo enlightned by him through faith. Heb.11.3.

13 In vaine therefore ſo many lampes lightned do ſhine in the edifice of the world, to ſhew foorth the glory of the creator, which doe ſo euery way diſplay their beames vpon vs, that yet of themſelues they can not bring vs into the right way. Indeede they raiſe vp certaine ſparkles, but ſuch as be choked vp before that they can ſpread abroad any full brightnes. Therefore the Apoſtle in the ſame place where he calleth the ages of the world images of things inuiſible, ſaith further, that by faith is perceiued, that they were framed by the word of God, meaning thereby that the inuiſible godhead is indeede repreſented by ſuch ſhewes, but that we haue no eies to ſee the ſame throughly, vnleſſe they be enlightned by the reuelation of God through faith. And Paul, where he teacheth that by the creation of the world was diſcloſed that which was to be knowen concerning God, doth not meane ſuch a diſcloſing as may be comprehended by the wit of men: but rather ſheweth that the ſame proceedeth no further but to make Act.17. & 27. them vnexcuſable. The ſame Paul alſo, although in one place he ſaith, that God is not Act.13. & 16. to be ſought a far of as one that dwelleth within vs: yet in another place teacheth to what end that neernes auaileth. In the ages paſt (ſaith he) God ſuffered the nations to walke in their own waies: yet he left not himſelfe without teſtimonie doing good from heauen, giuing ſhowers & fruitful ſeaſons, filling the harts of men with food & gladnes. Howſoeuer therefore the Lord be not without teſtimony, while with his great and manifold bountifulnes he ſweetely allureth men to the knowledge of him: yet for all that, they ceaſe not to follow their owne waies, that is to ſay, their damnable errours.

Our ignorance neuertheles becauſe it commeth by our owne fault is without excuſe.

14 But although we want naturall power, whereby we cannot climbe vp vnto the pure and cleare knowledge of God, yet becauſe the fault of our dulneſſe is in our ſelues, therefore all colour of excuſe is cut away from vs. For we cannot ſo pretend ignorance, but that euen our conſcience doth ſtill condemne vs of ſlouthfullnes & vnthankfulneſſe. It is a defence forſooth right worthy to be receiued, if man will alleage that he wanted eares to heare the truth, for the publiſhing whereof the very dumbe creatures haue loude voices: if man ſhall ſay that he cannot ſee thoſe things with his eies, which the creatures without eies doe ſhew him: if man ſhall lay for his excuſe the feeblenes of his wit, where all creatures without reaſon doe inſtruct him: Wherefore ſith all things do ſhew vs the right way, we are worthily put from all excuſe of our wandring and ſtraying out of the way. But howſoeuer it is to be imputed to the fault of men, that they doe by and by corrupt the ſeede of the knowledge of God, ſowne in their mindes by maruellous workmanſhip of nature, ſo that it groweth not to good and cleane fruit: yet it is moſt true, that we are not ſufficiently inſtructed by that bare and simple testimony, that the creatures doe honorably declare of Gods glory. For so soone as we haue taken by the beholding of the world a small taste of the Godhead, we leauing the true God doe in stead of him raise vp dreames and fansies of our owne braine, and doe conuey hither and thither from the true fountaine the praise of righteousnesse, wisdome, goodnesse and power. Moreouer we doe so either obscure, or by ill esteeming them, depraue his daily doings, that wee take awaie both from them their glory, and from the author his due praise.

THE SIXTH CHAPTER.

That, to attaine to God the Creator, it is needfull to haue the Scripture to be our guide and mistresse.

The true Creator and gouernor of the world cannot perfectly be knowne without the word, which meanes, God hath vsed euer sithens the beginning, to instruct his people by.

THerefore, although that same brightnesse, which both in heauen and earth shineth in the eies of all men, doth sufficiently take away all defence from the wickednesse of men, euen so as God, to wrap all mankind in one guiltinesse, doth shew his diuine maiestie to all without exception as it were portraied out in his creatures: yet is it necessarie that we haue also another and a better helpe that may righly direct vs to the very Creator of the world. Therefore not in vaine he hath added the light of his word, that thereby he might be knowne to saluation. And this prerogatiue he hath vouchsafed to giue vs, whom it pleased him more neerely and more familiarly to draw togither to himselfe. For because he saw the mindes of all men to be caried about with wandering and vnstedfast motion, after hee had chosen the Iewes to his peculiar flocke, hee compassed them in as it were with barres, that they should not wander out in vanitie as other did. And not without cause he holdeth vs with the same meane in the true knowledge of himselfe. For otherwise euen they should quicklie swarue away that seeme to stand stedfast in comparison of other. For as old men, or purblind, or they whose eies are dimme sighted, if you laie a faire booke before them, though they perceiue that there is somewhat written therein, yet can they not read two words together: but being holpen with spectacles set betweene them and it, they beginne to read distinctly: so the Scripture gathering vp together in our mindes the knowledge of God, which otherwise is but confused, doth remoouethe mist, and plainely shew vs the true God. This therefore is a singular gift, that to the instruction of his church God vseth not onely dumbe teachers, but also openeth his owne holy mouth: not onely publisheth that there is some God to be worshipped, but also therewithall pronounceth that he himselfe is the same God, whom we ought to worship: and doth not onely teach the elect to looke vpon God, but also presenteth himselfe vnto them to be looked vpon. This order hath he kept from the beginning toward his church, beside these common instructions to giue them also his word. Which is the righter and certainer marke to know him by. And it is not to be doubted, that Adam, Noe, Abraham, and the rest of the fathers by this helpe attained to that familiar knowledge, which made them as it were seuerally different from the vnbeleeuers. I speake not yet of the proper doctrine of faith, wherewith they were enlightened into the hope of eternall life. For, that they might passe from death to life, it was needfull for them to know God not onely to be the Creator, but also the Redeemer: as doubtlesse they obtained both by the word. For that kind of knowledge whereby was giuen to vnderstand who is the God by whom the world was made and is gouerned, in order came before the other: and then was that other inward knowledge adioined, which only quickneth dead soules, whereby God is knowne not onely to be the maker of the world & the only author & iudge of al things that are done, but also to be the redeemer in the person of the mediator. But because I am not yet come to the fal of the world and corruption of nature, I will omit also to entreat of the remedy thereof. Therefore let the readers remember that I do not yet speake of the couenant wherby God hath adopted to himselfe the children of Abraham, and of that speciall part of doctrine whereby the faithful haue alway beene peculiarly seuered from the prophane nations: because that doctrine was founded vpon Christ: but I speake how we ought to learne by the Scripture, that God which is the Creator of the world, is by certaine markes seuerally discerned from the counterfait multitude of falſe gods. And then the order it ſelfe ſhall conueniently bring vs to the redeemer. But although we ſhall alleage many teſtimonies out of the new Teſtament, and ſome alſo out of the law and the Prophets, wherein is expreſſe mention made of Chriſt: yet they ſhall all tend to this end, to prooue that in the ſcripture is diſcloſed vnto vs God the creator of the world, and in the ſcripture is ſet forth what we ought to thinke of him, to the end that we ſhould not ſeeke about the buſh for an vncertaine godhead.

The fathers which knew God by the word, knew alſo the word to be of God, who hath publiſhed the ſame in writing, that all ages might be taught by it.

2 But whether God were knowne to the fathers by oracles and viſions, or whether by the meane and miniſtration of men he informed them of that which they ſhould from hand to hand deliuer to their poſterity: yet it is vndoubtedly true, that in their hearts was engrauen a ſtedfaſt certainty of doctrine, ſo as they might be perſwaded & vnderſtand, that it which they had learned came from God. For God alwaies made vndoubted aſſurance for credit of his word, which farre exceeded all vncertaine opinion. At length that by continuall proceeding of doctrine, the truth ſuruiuing in all ages might ſtill remaine in the world, the ſame oracles which he had left with the fathers, his pleaſure was to haue as it were enrolled in publicke tables. For this intent was the law publiſhed, whereunto after were added the Prophets for expoſitors. For though there were diuers vſes of the law, as hereafter ſhal better appeare in place conuenient: and eſpecially the principall purpoſe of Moſes, and all the Prophets was to teach the maner of reconciliation betweene God and men, for which cauſe alſo Paul calleth Chriſt the end of the law: yet, as I ſay once againe, beſide the proper doctrine of faith and repentance which ſheweth forth Chriſt the mediator, the Scripture doth by certaine markes and tokens paint out the onely and true God, in that that he hath created and doth gouerne the world, to the end he ſhould be ſeuerally knowne and not reckned in the falſe number of fained gods. Therefore although it behoueth man earneſtly to bend his eies to conſider the workes of God, foraſmuch as he is ſet as it were in this gorgeous ſtage to be a beholder of them: yet principally ought hee to bend his eares to the word, that he may better profit thereby. And therefore it is no maruell that they which are borne in darkeneſſe doe more and more waxe hard in their amazed dulneſſe, becauſe very few of them doe giue themſelues pliable to learne of the word of God, whereby to keepe them within their bounds, but they rather reioyce in their own vanity. Thus then ought we to hold, that to the end true religion may ſhine among vs, we muſt take our beginning at the heauenly doctrine. And that no man can haue any taſte be it neuer ſo little of true and ſound doctrine, vnleſſe he haue beene ſcholar to the Scripture. And from hence groweth the originall of true vnderſtanding, that we reuerently embrace whatſoeuer it pleaſeth God therein to teſtifie of himſelfe. For not only the perfect and in al points abſolute faith, but alſo all right knowledge of God ſpringeth from obedience. And truly in this behalfe God of his ſingular prouidence hath prouided for men in and for all ages.

Rom. 10 4.

For many cauſes it was needfull the word ſhould be written, and that we ſhould tie our ſelues thereunto.

3 For if we conſider how ſlipperie an inclination mans minde hath to ſlide into forgetfulneſſe of God, how great a readineſſe to fall into all kind of errors, how great a luſt to forge oftentimes new and counterfeit religions, we may thereby perceiue how neceſſary it was to haue the heauenly doctrine ſo put in writing, that it ſhould not either periſh by forgetfulneſſe, or grow vaine by errour, or be corrupted by boldneſſe of men. Sith therefore it is manifeſt that God hath alway vſed the helpe of his word, toward all thoſe whom it pleaſed him at any time fruitfully to inſtruct, becauſe hee foreſaw that his image imprinted in the moſt beautifull forme of the world was not ſufficiently effectuall: Therefore it behoueth vs to trauell this ſtraight way, if we earneſtly couet to attaine to the true beholding of God. We muſt, I ſay, come to his word, wherein God is well and liuely ſet out by his workes, when his workes bee weighed not after the peruerſneſſe of our owne iudgement, but according to the rule of the eternall truth. If we ſwarue from that word, as I ſaid euen now, although we run neuer ſo faſt: yet we ſhall neuer attaine to the marke, becauſe the courſe of our running is out of the way. For thus we muſt thinke, that the brightneſſe of the face of God, which the Apoſtle calleth ſuch as cannot be attained vnto, is vnto vs like a maze, out of which wee cannot vnwrap our ſelues, vnleſſe we be by the line of the word guided into it: ſo that it is much better for vs to halt in this way, than to runne neuer so fast in another. And therefore Dauid oftentimes when hee teacheth that superstitions are to be taken away out of the world, that pure religion may flourish, bringeth in God reigning: meaning by this word reigning, not the power that he hath, but the doctrine whereby he challengeth to himselfe a lawfull gouernment: because errours can neuer be rooted out of the hearts of men, till the true knowledge of God be planted. Psal. 9. & 96. 97. 99. &c.

4 Therefore the same Prophet, after that he hath recited that the heauens declare the glory of God, that the firmament sheweth foorth the workes of his hands, that the orderly succeeding course of daies and nights preacheth his maiestie, then descendeth to make mention of his word. The law of the Lord (saith he) is vndefiled conuerting soules: the witnesse of the Lord is faithfull, giuing wisedome to little ones: the righteousnesse of the Lord are vpright, making hearts cheerefull, the commandement of the Lord is bright, giuing light to the eies. For although he comprehendeth also the other vses of the law, yet in generality he meaneth, that forasmuch as God doth in vaine call vnto him all nations by the beholding of the heauen and earth, therefore this is the peculiar schoole of the children of God. The same meaning hath the 29. Psalme, where the Prophet hauing preached of the terrible voice of God, which in thunder, winds, showers, whirlewinds, and stormes, shaketh the earth, maketh the mountaines to tremble, and breaketh the Cedar trees: in the end at last he goeth further and saith, that his praises are sung in the sanctuarie, because the vnbeleeuers are deafe and heare not all the voices of God that resound in the aire. And in like maner in another Psalme, after that he had described the terrible waues of the Sea, he thus concludeth: thy testimonies are verified, the beautie of thy temple is holinesse for euer. And out of this meaning also proceeded that which Christ said to the woman of Samaria, that her nation and the rest did honor that which they knew not, and that only the Iewes did worship the true God. For whereas the wit of man by reason of the feebleneſſe thereof can by no meanes attaine vnto God, but being holpen and lifted vp by his holy word, it followed of necessitie, that all men, except the Iewes, did wander in vanitie and error, because they sought God without his word. Psal. 19. 21. It is in vaine to seeke God by contemplation of his creatures without the studie of his word. Psal. 93. 5. Iohn. 4. 22.

THE SEVENTH CHAPTER.

By what testimonie the Scripture ought to be established, that is, by the witnesse of the holy Ghost, that the authoritie thereof may remaine certaine. And that it is a wicked inuention to say, that the credit thereof doth hang vpon the iudgement of the Church.

BVt before I goe any further, it is needfull to say somewhat of the authority of the Scripture, not onely to prepare mens minds to reuerence it, but also to take away all doubt thereof. Now, when it is a matter confessed that it is the word of God that is there set foorth, there is no man of so desperate boldnesse, vnlesse he be void of all common sense and naturall wit of man, that dare derogate the credit of him that speaketh it. But because there are not daily oracles giuen from heauen, and the onely Scriptures remaine wherein it hath pleased him to preserue his truth to perpetuall memorie, the same Scripture by none other meanes is of full credite among the faithfull, but in that they doe beleeue that it is as verily come from heauen, as if they heard the liuely voice of God to speake therein. This matter indeed is right worthy both to be largely entreated of and diligently weighed. But the readers shall pardon me if heerein I rather regard what the proportion of the worke which I haue begunne may beare, than what the largenesse of the matter requireth. There is growne vp among the most part of men a most hurtfull errour, that the Scripture hath only so much authority as by common consent of the Church is giuen vnto it: as if the eternall and inuiolable trueth of God did rest vpon the pleasure of men. For so, to the great scorne of the holy Ghost, they aske of vs who can assure vs that these Scriptures came from God: or who can ascertaine vs that they haue continued vnto our age safe and vncorrupted: who can perswade vs, that this one booke ought to be reuerently receiued, and that other to be striken out of the number of Scripture, vnlesse the Church did appoint a certaine rule of The credit of the Scripture doth not depend vpon the Churches receiuing and authorising of it.

of all theſe things? It hangeth therefore (ſay they) vpon the determination of the Church, both what reuerence is due to the Scripture, and what bookes are to be reckened in the canon thereof. So theſe robbers of Gods honour, while they ſeeke vnder colour of the Church to bring in an vnbridled tyrannie, care nothing with what abſurdities they ſnare both themſelues and other, ſo that they may enforce this one thing to be beleeued among the ſimple, that the Church can doe all things. But if it be ſo: what ſhall become of the poore conſciences that ſeeke ſtedfaſt aſſurance of eternall life, if all the promiſes that remaine thereof ſtand and be ſtaied onely vpon the iudgement of men? When they receiue ſuch anſwere, ſhall they ceaſe to wauer and tremble? Againe, to what ſcornes of the vngodly is our faith made ſubiect? into how great ſuſpition with all men is it brought, if this be beleeued, that it hath but as it were a borowed credit by the fauour of men?

Ephe. 2. 20. The Church depending vpon the ſcripture, doth not by her teſtimonie giue it credit, but becauſe it hath an euidence of certaintie with it ſelfe, doth therfore of dutie acknowledge it to be the truth of God.

2 But ſuch babblers are wel confuted euen with one word of the Apoſtle. He teſtifieth that the church is builded vpon the foundation of the Prophets and Apoſtles. If the doctrine of the Prophets, and Apoſtles be the foundation of the Church: then muſt it needs be, that the ſame doctrine ſtood in ſtedfaſt certaintie, before that the Church beganne to be. Neither can they well cauill, that although the Church take her firſt beginning thereof, yet it remaineth doubtfull what is to be ſaid of the writings of the Prophets and Apoſtles, vnleſſe the iudgement of the Church did declare it. For if the Chriſtian Church were at the beginning builded vpon the writings of the Prophets and preaching of the Apoſtles: whereſoeuer that doctrine ſhall be found, the allowed credit thereof was ſurely before the Church, without which the Church it ſelfe had neuer beene. Therefore it is a vaine forged deuice, that the Church hath power to iudge the Scripture, ſo as the certainty of the Scripture ſhould be thought to hang vpon the wil of the Church. Wherfore, when the Church doth receiue the Scripture and ſealeth it with her conſenting teſtimonie, ſhe doth not of a thing doubtfull, and that otherwiſe ſhould be in controuerſie, make it autentike and of credit: but becauſe ſhe acknowledgeth it to be the truth of her God, according to her dutie of godlineſſe without delay ſhe doth honor it. Whereas they demand, how ſhall we be perſwaded that it came from God, vnleſſe we reſort to the decree of the Church? This is all one as if a man ſhould aske, how ſhall we learne to know light from darkeneſſe, white from black, or ſweete from ſower? For the Scripture ſheweth in it ſelfe no leſſe apparent ſenſe of her truth, than white and blacke things doe of their colour, or ſweet and ſower things of their taſte.

Contra epiſt fundamentalem ca. 5. The authoritie of the Church, as S. Auguſtin confeſſeth, is of force to winne vnbeleeuers to their firſt liking of the Scripture, whereof when once they doe beleeue they ſee then a ſounder foundation whereupon they reſt their faith.

3 I know that they commonly alleage the ſaying of Auguſtine, where he ſaith that he would not beleeue the Goſpell, ſaue that the authoritie of the Church mooued him thereto. But how vntruly and cauilloufly it is alleaged for ſuch a meaning, by the whole tenor of his writing it is eaſie to perceiue. He had to doe with the Manichees, which required to be beleeued without gainſaying, when they vaunted that they had the truth on their ſide, but prooued it not. And to make their Manichees to be beleeued, they pretended the Goſpell. Now Auguſtine asketh them what they would doe, if they did light vpon a man that would not beleeue the Goſpell it ſelfe, with what maner of perſwaſion they would draw him to their opinion. Afterward hee ſaith: I my ſelfe would not beleeue the Goſpell, &c. ſaue that the authority of the Church mooued me thereto. Meaning that he himſelfe, when he was a ſtranger from the faith, could not otherwiſe be brought to embrace the Goſpell for the aſſured truth of God, but by this, that he was ouercome with the authority of the Church. And what maruell is it, if a man not yet knowing Chriſt, haue regard to men? Auguſtine therefore doth not there teach that the faith of the godly is grounded vpon the authority of the Church, nor meaneth that the certainty of the Goſpell doth hang thereupon: but ſimply and only, that there ſhould be no aſſuredneſſe of the Goſpell to the infidels, whereby they might be wonne to Chriſt, vnleſſe the conſent of the Church did driue them vnto it. And the ſame meaning a little before he doth plainly confirme in this ſaying: When I ſhal praiſe that which I beleeue, and ſcorne that which thou beleeueſt, what thinkeſt thou meet for vs to iudge or doe? but that we forſake ſuch men as firſt call vs to come and know certaine truths, and after command vs to beleeue things vncertaine: and that we follow them that require vs first to beleeue that which we are not yet able to see, that being made strong by beleeuing, we may attaine to vnderstand the thing that we beleeue: not men now, but God himselfe inwardly strengthning and giuing light to our minde. These are the very words of Augustine: whereby euery man may easily gather, that the holy man had not this meaning, to hang the credit that we haue to the Scriptures vpon the will and awardment of the Church, but onely to shew this, (which we our selues also doe confesse to be true) that they which are not yet lightned with the spirite of God, are brought by the reuerence of the Church vnto a willingnes to be taught, so as they can finde in their hearts to learne the faith of Christ by the Gospell: and that thus by this meane the authoritie of the Church is an introduction, whereby we are prepared to beleeue the Gospell. For, as we see, his minde is that the assurance of the godly be stayed vpon a far other foundation. Otherwise I doe not deny but that he often presseth the Manichies with the consent of the whole Church, when he seeketh to prooue the same Scripture which they refused. And from hence it came, that he so reproched Faustus for that he did not yeelde himselfe to the truth of the Gospell so grounded, so stablished, so gloriously renowned and from the very time of the Apostles by certaine successions perpetually commended. But he neuer trauelleth to this end, to teach that the authoritie which we acknowledge to be in the Scripture, hangeth vpon the determination or decree of men. But onely this, which made much for him in the matter that he disputed of, he bringeth foorth the vniuersall iudgement of the Church, wherein he had the aduantage of his aduersaries. If any desire a fuller proofe hereof, let him reade his booke concerning the profite of beleeuing. Where he shall finde that there is no other readinesse of beleefe commended vnto vs by him, but that which onely giueth vs an entrie, and is vnto vs a conuenient beginning to inquire, as he termeth it: and yet not that we ought to rest vpon bare opinion, but to leane to the certaine and sound trueth.

Contra Faustum lib. 32.

Aug. de vtilitate cred.

4 We ought to hold, as I before said, that the credit of this doctrine is not established in vs, vntill such time as we be vndoubtedly perswaded that God is the Author thereof. Therefore the principall proofe of the Scripture is commonly taken of the person of God the speaker of it. The Prophets and Apostles boast not of their owne sharpe wit or any such things as procure credit to men that speake: neither stand they vpon prooues by reason, but they bring foorth the holy name of God, thereby to compell the whole world to obedience. Now we haue to see how not onely by probable opinion, but by apparant truth it is euident, that in this behalfe the name of God is not without cause nor deceitfully pretended. If then we will prouide well for consciences, that they be not continually carried about with vnstedfast doubting, nor may wauer, nor stay at euery small stop, this maner of perswasion must be fetched deeper than from either the reasons, iudgements or the coniectures of men, euen from the secret testimonie of the holy Ghost. True indeed it is, that if we lifted to worke by way of arguments, many things might be alledged that may easily prooue, if there be any God in heauen, that the law, the prophecies and the Gospell came from him. Yea, although men learned and of deepe iudgement would stand vp to the contrarie, and would imploy and shew foorth the whole force of their wits in this disputation: yet if they be not so hardened as to become desperately shamelesse, they would be compelled to confesse, that there are seene in the Scripture manifest tokens that it is God that speaketh therein: whereby it may appeare that the doctrine thereof is from heauen. And shortly hereafter we shall see, that all the bookes of the holy Scripture doe far excell all other writings whatsoeuer they be. Yea, if we bring thither pure eies & vncorrupted senses, we shall foorthwith finde there the maiestie of God, which shall subdue all hardnesse of gainsaying, and enforce vs to obey him. But yet they doe disorderly, that by disputation trauell to establish the perfect credit of the Scripture. And truely although I am not furnished with great dexterity, nor eloquence: yet if I were to contend with the most subtile despisers of God, that haue a desire to shew themselues wittie and pleasant in feebling the authoritie of Scripture, I trust it should not be hard for me to put to silence their bablings. And if it were profitable to spend labour in confuting their cauillations, I would with no great businesse shake insunder the brags that they mutter

Although there be reasons enough to proue the diuine authoritie of the Scripture against the cauillations of prophane men: yet cannot it hereby find that credit in the harts of men which the assurance of godlinesse doth require, except it be inwardly sealed by the testimonie of the holy Ghost, the same being the witnesse which was the author of it.

in corners But though a man doe deliuer the ſound word of God from the reproches of men, yet that ſufficeth not foorthwith to faſten in their harts that aſſuredneſſe that godlineſſe requireth. Prophane men becauſe they thinke religion ſtandeth onely in opinion, to the end they would beleeue nothing fondly or lightly, do couet and require to haue it prooued to them by reaſon, that Moſes and the Prophets ſpake from God. But I anſwer, that the teſtimonie of the holy Ghoſt is better than all reaſon. For as onely God is a conuenient witneſſe of himſelfe in his own word, ſo ſhall the ſame word neuer find credit in the harts of men, vntill it be ſealed vp with the inward witneſſe of the holy Ghoſt. It behooueth therefore of neceſſitie that the ſame holy Ghoſt which ſpake by the mouth of the Prophets, doe enter into our harts to perſwade vs, that they faithfully vttered that which was by God commanded them. And this order is very aptly ſet foorth by Eſay in theſe words: My ſpirit which is in thee, and the words that I haue put in thy mouth, and in the mouth of thy ſeede, ſhall not faile for euer. It greeueth ſome good men, that they haue not ready at hand ſome cleere proofe to alleage, when the wicked doe without puniſhment murmure againſt the word of God: As though the holy Ghoſt were not for this cauſe called both a ſeale and a pledge, becauſe vntill he doe lighten mens mindes, they doe alway wauer among many doubtings.

Eſai 51 16.

The Scripture for it ſelfe ſake is worthy of credite, which notwithſtanding it doth not obtaine in vs, till our harts be ſo enlightned that we therein perceiue as it were the very breathing of the diuine maieſtie.

5 Let this therefore ſtand for a certainly perſwaded truth, that they whom the holy Ghoſt hath inwardly taught, doe wholy reſt vpon the Scripture, and that the ſame Scripture is to be credited for it ſelfe ſake, and ought not to be made ſubiect to demonſtration and reaſon: but yet the certainty which it getteth among vs, it attaineth by the witnes of the holy Ghoſt. For though by the onely Maieſtie of it ſelfe it procureth reuerence to be giuen to it: yet then onely it throughly pearceth our affections, when it is ſealed in our harts by the holy Ghoſt. So being lightned by his vertue, we do then beleeue, not by our own iudgement, or other mens, that the Scripture is from God: but aboue all mans iudgement we hold it moſt certainly determined, euen as if we beheld the Maieſtie of God himſelfe there preſent, that by the miniſterie of men it came to vs from the very mouth of God. We ſeeke not for arguments and likelihoods to reſt our iudgement vpon: but as to a thing without all compaſſe of conſideration, we ſubmit our iudgement and wit vnto it. And that not in ſuch ſort as ſome are wont ſometime haſtily to take hold of a thing vnknowen, which after being throughly perceiued diſpleaſeth them: but becauſe we are in our conſciences well aſſured that we hold an inuincible trueth. Neither in ſuch ſort, as ſilly men are wont to yeelde their minde in thraldome to ſuperſtitions, but becauſe we vndoubtedly perceiue therein the ſtrength and breathing of the diuine maieſtie, wherewith we are drawen and ſtirred to obey, both wittingly and willingly, and yet more liuely and effectually than mans will or wit can attaine. And therefore for good cauſe doth God cry out by Eſay, that the Prophets with the whole people doe beare him witneſſe, becauſe beeing taught by prophecies, they did vndoubtedly beleeue without guile or vncertaintie that God himſelfe had ſpoken. Such therefore is our perſwaſion, as requireth no reaſons: ſuch is our knowledge, as hath a right good reaſon to maintaine it, euen ſuch a one, wherein the minde more aſſuredly and ſtedfaſtly reſteth, than vpon any reaſons: ſuch is our feeling, as cannot proceede but by reuelation from heauen. I ſpeake now of none other thing but that which euery one of the faithfull doth by experience finde in himſelfe, ſauing that my words doe much want of a full declaration of it. I leaue heere many things vnſpoken, becauſe there will be elſewhere againe a conuenient place to entreat of this matter. Onely now let vs know, that onely that is the true faith which the ſpirit of God doth ſeale in our harts. Yea with this only reaſon will the ſober reader, and willing to learne, be contented. Eſay promiſeth, that all the children of the renued Church ſhall be the ſchollers of God. A ſingular priuiledge therein doth God vouchſafe to graunt to his elect onely, whom he ſeuereth from all the reſt of mankinde. For what is the beginning of true doctrine, but a ready cheereſulneſſe to heare the voice of God? But God requireth to be heard by the mouth of Moſes, as it is written: Say not in thy hart, who ſhall aſcend into heauen, or who ſhall deſcend into the deepe? the word is euen in thine owne mouth. If it be the pleaſure of God that this treaſure of vnderſtanding be laide vp in ſtore for his children, it is no maruell nor vnlikely, that in the common multitude of men is seene such ignorance and dulnesse. The common multitude I call euen the most excellent of them, vntill such time as they be graffed in the body of the Church. Moreouer Esay giuing warning that the Prophets doctrine should seeme incredible, not onely to strangers but also to the Iewes that would be accounted of the houshold of God, addeth this reason: because the arme of God shall not be reueiled to all men. So oft therefore as the smalnesse of number of the beleeuers doth trouble vs, on the other side let vs call to minde, that none can comprehend the mysteries of God but they to whom it is giuen.

THE EIGHT CHAPTER.

That so farre as mans reason may beare, there are sufficient proones to establish the credit of Scripture.

VNlesse we haue this assurance, which is both more excellent and of more force than any iudgement of man, in vaine shall the authoritie of Scripture either be strengthened with arguments, or stablished with consent of the Church, or confirmed with any other meanes of defence. For vnlesse this foundation be laid, it still remaineth hanging in doubt. As on the other side when exempting it from the common state of things, we haue embraced it deuoutly, and according to the worthines of it: then these things become very fit helpes, which before were but of small force to graffe and fasten the assurance thereof in our mindes. For it is maruellous, how great establishment groweth heereof, when with earnest studie we consider how orderly and well framed a disposition of the diuine wisedome appeareth therein, how heauenly a doctrine in euery place of it, and nothing sauoring of earthlinesse, how beautifull an agreement of all the parts among themselues, and such other things as auaile to procure a maiestie to writings. But more perfectly are our harts confirmed when we consider, how we are euen violently carried to an admiration of it, rather with dignitie of matter, than with grace of words. For this also was not done without the singular prouidence of God, that the high mysteries of the heauenly kingdome should for the most part be vttered vnder a contemptible baseneſse of words, least if it had beene beautified with more glorious speech, the wicked should cauill that the onely force of eloquence doth raigne therein. But when that rough and in a manner rude simplicitie doth raise vp a greater reuerence of it selfe then any Rhetoricians eloquence, what may we iudge, but that there is a more mightie strength of truth in the holy Scripture, than that it needeth any Art of words? Not without cause therefore the Apostle maketh his argument, to proue that the faith of the Corinthians was grounded vpon the power of God, and not vpon mans wisedome, because his preaching among them was set foorth not with enticing speech of mans wisedome, but in plaine euidence of the spirit and of power. For the truth is then set free from all doubting, when not vpholden by foraine aides it selfe alone sufficeth to sustaine it selfe. But how this power is properly alone belonging to the Scripture, heereby appeareth, that of all the writings of men, be they neuer so cunningly garnished, no one is so farre able to pearce our affections. Reade Demosthenes or Cicero, reade Plato, Aristotle, or any other of all that sort: I grant they shall maruellously allure, delite, mooue, and rauish thee. But if from them thou come to this holy reading of Scriptures, wilt thou or not, it shall so liuely mooue thy affections, it shall so pearce thy hart, it shall so settle within thy bones, that in comparison of the efficacie of this feeling, all that force of Rhetoricians and Philosophers shall in maner vanish away: so that it is easie to perceiue that the Scriptures, which doe farre excell all gifts and graces of mans industrie: doe in deede breath out a certaine diuinitie.

The Scripture being once deuoutly embraced, we are afterward the more established by considering the diuine disposition, maiestie and agreement which is in it, and the force which it hath in our mindes through dignity of matter, not grace of words.

1.Cor.2.4.

2 * I grant indeede, that some of the Prophets haue an elegant, cleere, yea, and a beautifull phrase of speech, so as their eloquence giueth not place to the prophane writers: and by such examples it pleased the holy Ghost to shew that he wanted not eloquence, though in the rest he vsed a rude and grosse style. But, whether a man read Daniel, Esay, and such like, who haue a sweete and pleasant flowing speech, or Amos, the Heardman, Hieremie and Zacharie, whose rougher talke sauoreth of countrey rudenes: in euery one of them shall appeare that maiestie of the holy Ghost that I speake of.

* All diuine writers are not rude, neither be all which are rude diuine: but Scripture, whether it speake roughly or smoothly, still it hath something aboue the excellencie of humane speech.

Yet

Schoole men and Canoniſtes.

Yet am I not ignorant, that as Satan is in many things a counterfaiter of God, that with deceitfull reſemblance he might the better creepe into ſimple mens mindes: ſo hath he craftily ſpred abroad with rude and in manner barbarous ſpeech thoſe wicked errours wherewith he deceiueth ſilly men, and hath oft times vſed diſcontinued phraſes, that vnder ſuch viſor he might hide his deceits. But how vaine and vncleanly is that curious counterfaiting, all men that haue but meane vnderſtanding doe plainly ſee. As for the holy Scripture, although froward men labour to bite at many things, yet is it full of ſuch ſentences as could not be conceiued by man. Let all the Prophets be looked vpon, there ſhall not one be found among them, but he hath farre excelled all mans capacitie, in ſuch ſort that thoſe are to be thought, to haue no iudgement of taſte to whom their doctrine is vnſauorie.

The Scripture ancienter than all other writings.

3 Other men haue largely entreated of this argument, wherefore at this time it ſufficeth to touch but a fewe things, that chiefly make for the principall ſumme of the whole matter. Beſide theſe points that I haue already touched, the very antiquitie of the Scripture is of great weight. For howſoeuer the Greeke writers tell many fables of the Ægyptian diuinitie: yet there remaineth no monument of any religion, but that is farre inferior to the age of Moſes. And Moſes deuiſeth not a new God, but ſetteth forth the ſame thing which the Iſraelites had receiued in long proceſſe of time, conueyed in time to them by their Fathers as it were from hand to hand concerning the euerlaſting God. For what doth he elſe but labour to call them backe to the couenant made with Abraham? If he had brought a thing neuer heard of before, he had had no entrie to begin. But it muſt needs be that the deliuerance from bondage, wherein they were deteined, was a thing well and commonly knowne among them, ſo that the hearing of the mention thereof did forthwith raiſe vp all their minds. It is alſo likely that they were informed of the number of the C C C C yeers. Now it is to be conſidered, if Moſes which himſelfe by ſo long diſtance of time was before all other writers, doe from a beginning ſo long before himſelfe fetch the originall deliuerance of his doctrine: how much the holy Scripture then is beyonde all other writings in antiquitie?

Moſes in that he publiſheth things tending to the diſhonor of his owne ſtocke, ſheweth himſelfe to haue followed no ſuch humor as common writers amongſt men.

4 Vnleſſe perhaps ſome liſt to beleeue the Ægyptians, that ſtretch their auncientie to ſix thouſand yeeres before the creation of the world. But ſith their vaine babling hath beene alway ſcorned euen of all the prophane writers themſelues, there is no cauſe why I ſhould ſpend labour in confuting of it. But Ioſephus againſt Appion, alleadgeth teſtimonies woorthie to be remembred out of auncient writers, whereby may be gathered, that by conſent of all nations the doctrine that is in the lawe hath beene famous euen from the firſt ages, although it were neither read nor truely knowne. Now, that neither there ſhould remaine to the malicious any cauſe of ſuſpicion, nor to the wicked any occaſion to cauil, God hath for both theſe dangers prouided good remedies. When Moſes rehearſeth what Iacob almoſt three hundred yeers before had by heauenly inſpiration pronounced vpon his owne poſteritie, how doth he ſet foorth his owne tribe? yea, in the perſon of Leui he ſpotteth it with æternall infamie. Symeon (ſaith he) and Leui the veſſels of wickedneſſe. My ſoule come not into their counſell, nor my tongue into their ſecret. Truely, he might haue paſſed ouer that blot with ſilence, in ſo dooing not onely to pleaſe his Father, but alſo not to ſtaine himſelfe and his whole familie with part of the ſame. How can that writer be ſuſpected, which vnconſtrainedly publiſhing by the oracle of the holy Ghoſt, that the principall aunceſter of the familie wherof himſelfe deſcended was an abominable doer, neither priuately prouided for his owne honor, nor refuſed to enter into diſpleaſure of all his owne kinſmen, whom vndoubtedly this matter greeued. When alſo he rehearſeth the wicked murmuring of Aaron his owne brother, and Mary his ſiſter: ſhall we ſay that he ſpake after the meaning of the fleſh, or rather that he wrote it obeying the commandement of the holy Ghoſt? Moreouer, ſith himſelfe was higheſt in authoritie, why did he not leaue at leaſt the office of the high prieſthoode to his owne ſonnes, but appointeth them to the baſeſt place? I touch heere onely a fewe things of many. But in the law it ſelfe a man ſhall each where meete with many arguments that are able to bring full proofe to make men beleeue that Moſes without all queſtion commeth from heauen as an Angell of God.

5 Now these so many and so notable myracles that he recounteth, are euen as many establishments of the law that he deliuered, and the doctrine that he published. For, this that he was carried in a cloude vp into the mountaine: that there euen to the fortieth day he continued without company of men: that in the very publishing of the law his face did shine as it were beset with sunne beames: that lightnings flashed round about: that thunders and noises were heard each where in the aire: that a trumpet sounded being not blowen with any mouth of man: that the entrie of the tabernacle by a cloud set betweene, was kept from the sight of the people: that his authoritie was so myraculously reuenged with the horrible destruction of Chore, Dathan, & Abiram, and all that wicked faction: that the rocke stricken with a rod did by and by powre foorth a riuer: that at his praier it rained Manna frō heauen: did not God herein commend him from heauen as an vndoubted Prophet? If any man obiect against me, that I take these things as cōfessed, which are not out of controuersie, it is easie to answer this cauillation. For seeing that Moses in open assembly published al these things, what place was there to fainge before those witnesses that had themselues seen the things done? It is likely forsooth that he would come among them, and rebuking the people of infidelity, stubbornes, vnthankfullnesse, and other sinnes, would haue boasted that his doctrine was established in their owne sight with such myracles, which indeede they neuer sawe.

6 For this is also worthie to be noted, so oft as he telleth of any myracles, he therewithall odiously ioyneth such things as might stir the whole people to cry out against him, if there had beene neuer so little occasion. Whereby appeareth, that they were by no other meane brought to agree vnto him, but because they were euer more than sufficiently conuinced by their owne experience. But because the matter was plainelier knowen, than that the prophane could denie that myracles were done by Moses: the father of lying hath ministred them another cauillation, saying, that they were done by Magicall arts and sorcerie. But what like proofe haue they to accuse him for a sorcerer, which so farre abhorred from such superstition, that he commaundeth to stone him to death, that doth but aske counsell of sorcerers and soothsaiers? Truely no such deceiuer vseth his iuggling casts, but that he studieth to amaze the minds of the people to get himselfe a fame. But what doth Moses? by this that he crieth out, that himselfe and his brother Aaron are nothing, but doth only execute those things that God hath appointed, he doth sufficiently wipe away all blots of thinking euill of him. Now if the things themselues be considered, what enchantment could bring to passe, that Manna dayly raining from heauen, should suffice to feede the people? And if any man keepe in store more than is iust measure, by the very rotting thereof he should be taught, that God did punish his want of beleefe? Beside that, with many great prooues God suffred his seruant so to be tried, that now the wicked can nothing preuaile with prating against him. For how oft did sometime the people proudly and impudently make insurrections, sometime diuers of them conspiring among themselues went about to ouerthrow the holy seruant of God: how could he haue beguiled their furor with illusions? And the end that followed plainly sheweth, that by this meanes his doctrine was stablished to continue to the end of all ages.

His myracles not done by Magicall arts and sorcerie.

7 Moreouer where he assigneth the chiefe gouernement to the tribe of Iuda in the person of the Patriarch Iacob, who can deny that this was done by spirit of prophecie, specially if we wey in consideration the thing it selfe, how in comming to passe it proued true? Imagine Moses to haue beene the first Author of this prophecie: yet from the time that he did first put it in writing, there passed fower hundred yeeres wherein there was no mention of the scepter in the tribe of Iuda. After Saul was consecrate king, it seemed that the kingdome should rest in the tribe of Beniamin. When Dauid was anointed by Samuel, what reason appeared there why the course of inheritance of the kingdome should be changed? who would haue looked that there should haue come a King out of the base house of a heardman? And when there were in the same house seuen brethren, who would haue said that that honour should light vpon the yongest? By what meane came he to hope to be a King? who can say that this annointment was gouerned by any arte, trauell or policie of man, and not rather that it was a fulfilling of the heauenly prophecie? Likewise those things that Moses afore speaketh, albeit darkly, concerning the Gentiles to be adopted into the couenant of God, seeing they came to passe almost two thousand yeares after, doe they not make it plaine, that he spake by the inspiration of God? I ouerskip his other tellings aforehand of things, which doe so euidently sauour of the reuelation of God, that all men that haue their sound wit may plainly perceiue that it is God that speaketh. To be short, that same one song of his, is a cleere looking glasse, wherein God euidently appeareth.

Deut. 32.

The like proues appeare in the writings of Esay, Ieremie, Ezechiel, Daniel, and other Prophets, to shew that they spake by a diuine instinct.

8 But in the other Prophets the same is yet also much more plainely seene. I will choose out onely a few examples, because to gather them all togither were too great a labour. When in the time of Esay the kingdome of Iuda was in peace, yea, when they thought that the Chaldees were to them some stay and defence, then did Esay prophecie of the destruction of the Citie, and exile of the people. But admit that yet this was no token plaine ynough of the instinct of God, to tell long before of such things as at that time seemed false, and afterward prooued true: yet those prophecies that he vttereth concerning their deliuerance, whence shall we say that they proceeded but from God? He nameth Cyrus by whom the Chaldees should be subdued, and the people restored to libertie. There passed more then an hundred yeeres from the time that Esay so prophecied before that Cyrus was borne: for Cyrus was borne in the hundreth yeere or there abouts after the death of Esay. No man could then gesse that there should be any such Cyrus, that should haue warre with the Babylonians, that should bring subiect so mighty a monarchie vnder his dominion, and make an end of the exile of the people of Israel. Doth not this bare telling without any garnishment of words euidently shew, that the things that Esay speaketh, are the vndoubted oracles of God, and not the coniectures of men? Againe, when Ieremie a little before that the people were carried away, did determine the end of the captiuitie within three score and ten yeeres, and promised returne and libertie, must it not needs be that his toong was gouerned by the spirit of God? what shamelesnesse shall it be to denie, that the credite of the Prophets was stablished by such prooues, and that the same thing was fulfilled in deede, which they themselues doe report to make their sayings to be beleeued? Behold, the former things are come to passe, and new things doe I declare before they come foorth, I tell you of them. I leaue to speake how Hieremie and Ezechiel being so farre asunder, yet prophecying both at one time, they so agreed in all their sayings, as if either one of them had endyted the words for the other to write. What did Daniel? Doth he not write continuing prophecies of things to come for the space of six hundred yeeres after, in such sort as if he had compiled an history of things already done & commonly known? These things if godly men haue well considered, they shall be sufficiently well furnished, to appease the barkings of the wicked. For the plaine proofe hereof is too cleare to be subiect to any cauillations at all.

Esay. 42.

They are absurd men which aske how we know that any booke was written by Moses, and make it a question, whether euer there were any such man.

9 I know what some learned men doe prate in corners, to shew the quickenesse of their wit in assaulting the truth of God. For they demaund, who hath assured vs that these things which are read vnder title of their names, were euer written by Moses and the Prophets? Yea, they are so hardy to mooue this question, whether euer there were any such Moses or no. But if a man should cal in doubt whether euer there were any Plato, or Aristotle, or Cicero, who would not say, that such madnes were worthie to be corrected with strokes and stripes? The law of Moses hath beene maruellously preserued, rather by heauenly prouidence then by diligence of men. And though by the negligence of the Priests it lay buried a little while: yet since the time that the godly King Iosias found it, it hath still by continual succession from age to age been vsed in the hands of men. Neither did Iosias bring it foorth as an vnknowen or new thing, but such a thing as had been euer commonly published, and whereof the remembrance was at that time famous. The originall booke it selfe was appointed to be sacredly kept in the Temple, and a copie written out thereof, to remaine with the keepers of the Kings Records. Onely this had happed, that the Priestes had ceassed to publish the lawe according to the olde accustomed manner, and the people themselues had neglected their wonted reading of it. Yea, there in maner passed no age wherein the establishment thereof was not confirmed and renewed. They that had Dauid in their hands, knew they not of Moses? But to speake of them all at once, it is most certaine that their writings came to posteritie none otherwise but from hand to hand (as I may terme it) by continuall orderly course of yeeres deliuered from their fathers, which had partly heard them speake, and partly while the remembrance was fresh of it, did learne of them which heard them that they had so spoken.

10 As for that which they obiect out of the history of the Maccabees, to minish the credit of Scripture, it is such a thing as nothing can be deuised more fit to stablish the same. But first let vs wipe away the colour that they lay vpon it, and then let vs turne vpon themselues the engine that they raise vp against vs. When Antiochus (say they) commaunded all the bookes to be burned, whence are come these copies that we now haue? On the other side I aske them, in what shop they could so soone be made? It is euident, that after the crueltie appeased they were immediatly abroad againe, and were without controuersie knowen to be the same of al godly men, that hauing been brought vp in the doctrine of them, did familiarly know them. Yea, when all the wicked men being as it were conspired together, did insolently triumph with reproches vpon the Iewes, yet neuer was there any that durst lay to their charge false changing of their bookes. For whatsoeuer they thinke the Iewes religion to be, yet still they thinke Moses to be the Author of it. What then doe these praters else, but bewray their owne more then doggish frowardnes, while they falsely say, that these bookes are changed, and new put in their places, whose sacred antiquitie is approoued by consent of all histories? But to spend no more labour vainely in confuting such fooliish cauillations: let vs rather hereby consider how great a care God had for the preseruation of his word, when beyond the hope of all men he saued it from the outrage of the most cruell tyrant, as out of a present fire: that he endued the godly priestes and other with so great constancie, that they sticked not to redeeme this booke euen with losse of their life if neede were, and so to conuey it ouer to posteritie: that he disappointed the narrow search of so many gouernours and souldiours. Who can but acknowledge the notable and miraculous worke of God, that these sacred monuments which the wicked verily thought to haue beene vtterly destroyed, by and by came abroad againe as fully restored, and that with a great deale more honour? For by and by followed the translating of them into Greeke, to publish them throughout the world. And not in this only appeared the miraculous working, that God preserued the tables of his couenant from the bloudie proclamations of Antiochus: but also that amongst so manifold miserable afflictions of the Iewes, wherewith the whole nation was sometime worne to a few and wasted, and last of all, brought in manner to vtter destruction, yet they remained still safe & extant. The Hebrew tongue lay not onely vnesteemed, but almost vnknowen. And surely had it not been Gods pleasure to haue his religion prouided for, it had perished altogether. For how much the Iewes that were since their returne from exil, were swarued from the natural vse of their mother tongue, appeareth by the Prophets that liued in that age; which is therefore woorthy to be noted, because by this comparison the antiquitie of the law and the Prophets is the more plainly perceiued. And by whom hath God preserued for vs the doctrine of saluation conteined in the law and the Prophets, to the end that Christ might in his appointed time be openly shewed? euen by the most cruelly bent enemies of Christ, the Iewes, whom Saint Augustine doth therefore woorthily call the keepers of the Librarie of the Christian Church, because they haue ministred vnto vs that thing to reade, whereof themselues haue no vse.

1. Mac. 1. The miraculous preseruation of the law, a token of the diuine excellentie thereof. 2. Mac. 1. 59.

11 * Now if we come to the new Testament, with how sound pillars is the truth thereof vpholden? The three Euangelists write the historie in base and simple speech. Many proud men do loath that simplicitie, because they take no heede to the chiefe points of doctrine therein, whereby it were easie to gather, that they intreat of heauenly mysteries aboue mans capacitie. Surely whosoeuer hath but one drop of honest shame will be ashamed if he reade the first Chapter of Luke. Now, the Sermons of Christ, the summe whereof is shortly compriſed by these three Euangelists, doe easily deliuer their writing from all contempt. But Iohn thundering from an high, those whom he compelleth not to obedience of faith, he throweth downe their stubbornesse more mightily then any thunderbolt. Now let come foorth all these sharpenosed fault-finders, that haue a great pleasure to shake the reuerence of Scripture out of their owne and other mens harts, let them reade Iohns Gospell: Will they or no, they shall there finde a thousand sentences that may at least awaken their sluggishnesse, yea, that may print a horrible brand in their owne consciences to restraine their laughing. The same is to be thought of Peter and Paul, in whose writings although the more part be blinde, yet the very heauenly maiestie in them holdeth all men bound, and as it were fast tied vnto it. But this one thing doth sufficiently aduance their doctrine aboue the world, that Matthew being before all giuen to the gaine of his money boorde, Peter and Iohn brought vp in their fisher boates, all grosse vnlearned men, had learned nothing in mens schoole that they might deliuer to other. Paul, not onely from a professed, but also from a cruell and bloudie enimie conuerted to a new man, with sudden and vnhoped chaunge doth shew, that being compelled by heauenly authoritie, he now maintaineth that doctrine, which before he had fought against. Now let these dogs deny that the holy Ghost came downe vpon the Apostles, or let them discredite the historie: yet still the truth it selfe openly crieth out, that they were taught by the holy Ghost, which being before time despised men among the rascall people, suddenly began so gloriously to intreate of heauenly mysteries.

* The mysteries which the three Euangelists deliuer in simple speech, the thundering maiestie of Iohn, the rude education of the Apostles before they became teachers, S. Paules crueltie against Christians before he taught Christianitie, deliuereth the doctrine of the new Testament from the contempts of prophane men.

No small estimation groweth to the scripture, if the generall and continuall agreement of men in yeilding consent and credite thereunto be considered.

12 There be yet also furthermore many very good reasons, why the consent of the Church should not be esteemed without weight. For it is to be accounted no small matter, that since the Scripture was first published, the wils of so many ages haue constantly agreed to obey it. And that howsoeuer Sathan with all the world hath trauelled by maruellous meanes, either to oppresse it, or ouerthrowe it, or vtterly to blot and deface it out of mens remembrance, yet euer still like a palme tree, it hath risen vp aboue, and remained inuincible. For there hath not lightly beene in olde time any Sophister, or Rhetorician that had any more excellent wit than other, but he hath bent his force against the Scripture: yet they all haue nothing preuailed. The whole power of the earth hath armed it selfe to destroy it, and yet all their enterprises are vanished away, as in smoke. How could it haue resisted being so mightily on each side assailed, if it had had none other defence but mans? Yea, rather it is hereby prooued, that it came from God himselfe, that all the trauels of men striuing against it, yet it hath of her owne power still risen vp. Beside that, not one Citie alone, nor one onely nation hath agreed to receiue and imbrace it: but so farre as the world extendeth in length and breadth, the Scripture hath attained her credit, by one holy conspiracie of diuers nations, which otherwise were in nothing agreeable one with another. And forasmuch as such agreement of mindes so diuers and disagreeing in manner in all things else, ought much to moue vs, because it appeareth, that the same is brought about none other way, but by working of the heauenly maiestie: no small estimation groweth vnto it, when we behold their godlinesse, that doe so agree, I meane not of them all, but onely of those, with whom as with lights it pleased God to haue his Church to shine.

The dignitie of Scripture not a little ascertained by the constant suffrings of so many that haue sealed it with their bloud.

13 Now with what assuredneſse of minde ought we to submit vs to that doctrine which we see stablished & witnessed with the bloud of so many holy men? They when they had but once receiued it, sticked not boldly without feare, yea and with great cheerefulnesse to die for it: how should it then come to passe, that we hauing it conueied to vs with such an assured pledge, should not with certaine and vnmooueable perswasion take hold of it? It is therefore no small confirmation of the Scripture, that it hath beene sealed with the bloud of so many witnesses, specially when we consider that they suffred death to beare witnes of their faith: & not of a frantike distemperance of braine, as sometime the erroneous spirits are wont to doe, but with a firme & constant, and yet sober zeale of God. There be other reasons and those not fewe nor weake, whereby the Scripture hath her dignitie and maiestie, not onely ascertained vnto godly hearts, but also honourably defended against the subtilties of cauillers, yet be they such as be not of themselues sufficiently auailable to bring stedfast credite vnto it, vntill the heauenly Father disclosing therein his maiestie, doth bring the reuerence thereof out of all controuersie. Wherefore then onely the Scripture shall suffice to that knowledge of God that bringeth saluation, when the certainetie thereof shall be grounded vpon the inward persuasion of the holy Ghost. So those testimonies of men that serue to confirme it shall not be vaine, if as second helpes of our weakneſse they follow that chiefe and highest testimony. But they do fondly that wil haue it perswaded by proofe to the vnfaithful, that the scripture is the word of God, which cannot be knowne but by faith. For good reason therefore doth Augustine giue warning, that godlines & peace of minde ought to go before, to make a man vnderstand somewhat of so great matters. De vtilitate credendi.

THE NINTH CHAPTER.

That those fonatical men, which forsaking Scripture, resort vnto reuelation, doe euer throw all the principles of godlinesse.

NOw they that forsaking the Scripture doe Imagine I wote not what way to attaine vnto God, are to be thought not so much to be holden with errour, as to be carried with rage. For there haue arisen of late certaine giddie brained men, which most presumptuously pretending a schoole of the spirit, both themselues doe forsake all reading, and also doe scorne their simplicitie which still follow the dead and slaying letter, as they call it. But I would faine know of these men, what spirit that is, by whose inspiration they are carried vp so high, that they dare despise the doctrine of the Scriptures as childish and base. For if they answer that it is the spirit of Christ, then such carelesnesse is woorthie to be laughed at. For I thinke they will graunt, that the Apostles of Christ and other faithfull in the primitiue Church were lightned with none other spirit. But none of them did learne of that spirit to despise the word of God: but rather euery one was mooued more to reuerence it, as their writings do most plainly witnesse. And surely so was it foretolde by the mouth of Esay. For where he saith: My spirit that is vpon thee, and my words which I haue put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seede for euer: he doth not binde the olde people to the outward doctrine, as though they were set to learne to spell; but rather he teacheth, that this shall be the true and perfect felicitie of the new Church vnder the reigne of Christ, that it shall no lesse be led by the voice of God, then by the spirit of God. Whereby we gather, that these lewde men with wicked sacriledge doe seuere asunder those things that the Prophet hath ioyned with an inuiolable knot. Moreouer, Paul being rauished vp into the third heauen, yet ceassed not to goe forward in the doctrine of the lawe and the Prophets, euen so as he exhorteth Timothie, a Doctour of singular excellencie to applie reading. And woorthie is that commendation to be remembred, wherewith he setteth foorth the Scripture, saying, that it is profitable to teach, to admonish, and to reprooue, that the seruants of God may be made perfect. How dwellish a madnesse is it to faine, that the vse of Scripture is but transitorie, and lasteth but for a while? which in deede guideth the children of God euen to the last end? Againe, I would haue them answere me this: whether they haue tasted of an other spirite then that which the Lord promised to his disciples. Although they be vexed with extreme madnesse, yet I thinke they are not carried with such giddinesse, that they dare so boast. But what maner of spirit did he speake of in his promise? euen that spirite which should not speake of it selfe, but should minister and inspire into their mindes those things, which he the Lord himselfe had taught by his word. It is not therefore the office of the spirit, which is promised vs, to faine new and vnheard-of reuelations, or to coyne a new kinde of doctrine, whereby we should be led from the receiued doctrine of the Gospell, but to seale in our mindes the selfe same doctrine that is commended vnto vs by the Gospell.

The spirit of Christ is giuen not to guide men without the Scripture, but according to the Scripture.

Esay. 59. 21.

1. Tim. 4. 13.

2. Tim. 3. 16.

Iohn. 16. 13.

2 Whereby we plainly vnderstand, that we ought right studiously to apply the reading and hearing of the scripture, if we list to take any vse and fruit of the spirit of God. As also Peter praiseth their diligence that are heedefull to the doctrine of the Prophets, which yet might seeme to haue giuen place after the rising of the light of the Gospell. On the other side, if any spirite leauing the wisedome of the worde of God doth thrust vnto vs another doctrine, that the same spirit ought rightfully to be suspected of vanity and lying. For what? when Sathan transformeth himselfe into an Angell of light, what credit shall the holy Ghost haue among vs, if it be not seuerally knowne by some assured marke? And truely it hath beene plainely pointed out vnto vs by the word of the Lord, but that these miserable men doe willingly couet to erre to their owne deſtruction, while they ſeeke a ſpirite rather from themſelues than from him. But (ſay they) it is diſhonorable, that the ſpirite of God, whom all things ought to obey, ſhould be ſubiect to the Scripture. As if this were a diſhonour to the holie Ghoſt to be euery where egall and like to it ſelfe, to agree with it ſelfe in all things, and no where to vary. Indeede, if it were to be tried by the rule either of men, or of Angels, or any others rule whatſoeuer, then it might well be thought, that it were brought into obedience, or if ye liſt ſo to terme it, into bondage. But when it is compared with it ſelfe, when it is conſidered in it ſelfe, who can therefore ſay, that there is any wrong done vnto it? But thus it is brought to triall. I graunt, but ſuch a triall wherewith it was his owne pleaſure to haue his Maieſtie eſtabliſhed. It ought to content vs ſo ſoone as he entreth into vs. But leaſt vnder his name the ſpirit of Satan ſhould creepe in, he will haue vs to know him by that image of himſelfe, which he hath printed in the Scriptures. He is the Author of the Scriptures: he cannot be diuerſe and vnlike himſelfe. Therefore it muſt needes be, that he continually remaine ſuch as he hath ſhewed himſelfe therein. This is no diſhonor vnto him, vnleſſe perhaps we count it honorable to ſwarue and goe out of kinde from himſelfe.

2.Cor.3.6. As the ſcripture is a dead letter when we read it, hauing not the life of the ſpirit, ſo the ſpirit is a dangerous guide if we follow it, leauing the conduct of the ſcripture: they muſt goe hand in hand, each aſſuring and warranting other.

3 Whereas they cauill that we reſt vpon the letter that ſlaieth, heerein they ſuffer puniſhment for deſpiſing of the Scripture. For it is plaine enough that Paul there contendeth againſt the falſe Apoſtles, which commending the lawe without Chriſt did call away the people from the benefite of the new Teſtament, wherein the Lord doth couenant that he will graue his law within the bowels of the faithfull, and write it in their harts. The letter therefore is dead, and the law of the Lord killeth the Readers of it, when it is ſeuered from the grace of Chriſt, and not touching the hart, onely ſoundeth in the eares. But if it be effectually printed in our harts by the holy Ghoſt, if it preſent Chriſt vnto vs: then is it the word of life, conuerting ſoules, giuing wiſedome to little ones, &c. Alſo in the ſame place the Apoſtle calleth his preaching the miniſterie of the holy Ghoſt: meaning that the holy Ghoſt doth ſo ſticke faſt in his truth which he hath expreſſed in the Scriptures, that then onely he putteth forth and diſplaieth his force, when the Scripture hath her due reuerence and dignitie. And it diſagreeth not heerewith which I before ſaid, that the word it ſelfe is not much aſſured vnto vs, vnleſſe it be confirmed by the witneſſe of the holy Ghoſt. For with a certaine mutuall knot the Lord hath coupled together the aſſurance of his word and of his ſpirite, ſo that perfect reuerence to the word doth then ſettle in our mindes when the holy Ghoſt ſhineth vpon vs to make vs therein behold the face of God: and on the other ſide without all feare of being deceiued we doe embrace the holy Ghoſt, when we reknowledge him in his owne image, that is, in his word. Thus it is vndoubtedly: God brought not abroad his word among men for a ſodaine ſhew, meaning at the comming of his ſpirite by and by to take it away againe, but he after ſent the ſame ſpirite with whoſe power he had diſtributed his word, to make an ende of his worke with effectuall confirmation of his word. In this ſort Chriſt opened the mindes of the two diſciples, not that they ſhould caſt away the Scriptures and waxe wiſe of themſelues, but that they ſhould vnderſtand the Scriptures. Likewiſe Paul when he exhorteth the Theſſalonians not to extinguiſh the ſpirite, doth not carry them vp on high to vaine ſpeculations without the word, but by and by ſaith further, that prophecies are not to be deſpiſed: whereby without doubt is ment, that the light of the ſpirit is choked vp ſo ſoone as prophecies come to be deſpiſed. What ſay theſe proudly ſwelling men, rauiſhed with the ſpirit, to theſe things, which recken this onely to be an excellent illumination, when careleſly forſaking and ſaying fare well to the word of God, they both boldly and raſhly doe take holde of all that they haue conceiued in their ſleepe? Truely, a farre other ſobrietie becommeth the children of God: which as they ſee that without the ſpirit of God they are voide of all light of truth, ſo doe they know that the word is the inſtrument wherewith the Lord diſtributeth to the faithfull the light of his ſpirit. For they know none other ſpirit but that which dwelt and ſpake in the Apoſtles, by whoſe oracles they are continually called to the hearing of the word.

THE

THE TENTH CHAPTER.

BVt because we haue shewed, that the knowledge of God which in the frame of the world and all the creatures is somewhat plainely set foorth, is yet more familiarly and plainly declared in the word: now is it good to consider, whether the Lord shew himselfe such in the Scripture as it pleased him first to be represented in his works. But I shall at this time be contented onely to point vnto it, whereby the godly minds being admonished, may know what is chiefly to be searched in the Scriptures concerning God, and be directed to one certaine marke in their seeking. I do not yet touch the peculiar couenant, whereby God seuered the stocke of Abraham from other nations. For euen then he appeared the redeemer in receiuing to his children by free adoption those that before were enimies. But we are yet about that knowledge that resteth in the creation of the world, and ascendeth not to Christ the mediatour. And although by and by it shall be good to alleage certaine places out of the newe Testament, forasmuch as euen out of it both the power of God the Creator, and his prouidence in preseruing of the first nature is approoued, yet I warne the Readers before, what is now my purpose to doe, to the end that they passe not the appointed bounds. So for this present, let it suffice vs to learne, how God the maker of heauen and earth doth gouerne the world by him created. Euery where is renouned both his fatherly bountie and enclined will to doe good, and there are also examples rehearsed of his seueritie, which shew him to be a righteous punisher of wicked doings, specially where his sufferance nothing preuaileth with the obstinate.

The same power, prouidence, mercy, and iustice of God which shineth in the creatures of the world, is also taught in holy scripture.

2 In certaine places are set foorth more plaine descriptions, wherein his naturall face is as in an image represented to be seene. For in the place where Moses describeth it, it seemeth that his meaning was shortly to comprehend all that was lawfull for men to vnderstand of God. The Lord (saith he) the Lord, a mercifull God, and gracious, patient, and of much mercy, and true, which keepest mercy vnto thousands, which takest away iniquitie and wicked doings, before whom the innocent shall not be innocent, which rendrest the wickednesse of the fathers to the children and childrens children. Where let vs marke, that his æternitie and being of himselfe is expressed in the twise repeating of that honourable name: and that then his virtues are rehearsed, in which is described vnto vs, not what he is in respect to himselfe, but what a one he is toward vs: that this knowledge of him may rather stand in a liuely feeling, than in an emptie and supernaturall speculation. And here we do heare recited those virtues of his which we noted to shine in the heauen and earth, that is to say, clemencie, bountie, mercie, iustice, iudgement, and truth. For might and power are conteined vnder this name Elohim, God. With the same names of addition doe the Prophets set him foorth when they meane fully to paint out his holy name. But, because I would not heape vp too many examples together, at this present let one Psalme suffice vs, wherein the summe of all his virtues is so exactly reckened vp, that nothing can seeme to be omitted. And yet is nothing there rehearsed, but that which we may behold in his creatures. So plainly do we perceiue God by information of experience, to be such as he declareth himselfe in his word. In Ieremy where he pronounceth, what a one he would haue vs know him to be, he setteth foorth a description not altogether so full, but yet comming all to one effect. Hee that glorieth, saith he, let him glorie in this, that he knoweth me to be the Lord that doth mercie, iustice, and iudgement on the earth. Surely, these three things are very necessarie for vs to know: Mercy, in which alone consisteth all our saluation: Iudgement, which is daily executed vpon euill doers, and more greeuous is prepared for them to eternall destruction: Iustice, whereby the faithfull are preserued and most tenderly cherished. Which things when thou hast conceiued, the prophecy saith, thou hast sufficiently enough whereof thou mayst glorie in God. And yet heere are not omitted either his truth or his power, or his holinesse or goodnesse. For how should the knowledge stand sure which is heere required of his iustice, mercy, and iudgement, vnlesse

Exod. 34. 6. Moses, Dauid, and Ieremy teach the same which heauen and earth doe teach concerning God, namely his power, goodnes, mercy, holinesse, iustice, iudgement, & truth, and they teach to the same end, that we might yeeld him obedience, and put confidence in him.

Psal. 145. 3.

Iere 9. 2.

leſſe it did reſt vpon his vnmooueable truth? And how ſhould we beleeue that he doth gouerne the earth with iuſtice and iudgement, but vnderſtanding his power? And whence commeth his mercy but of his goodneſſe? If then all his waies be mercie, iudgement, and iuſtice, in them muſt holineſſe alſo needs be ſeene. And to none other end is directed that knowledge of God that is ſet foorth vnto vs in the Scriptures, than is that knowledge alſo which appeereth imprinted in his creatures, that is to ſay: it firſt mooueth vs to the feare of God, and then to put confidence in him, to the end we may learne firſt to honour him with perfect innocencie of life and vnfained obedience, and then to hang altogether vpon his goodneſſe.

Howſoeuer the name of one God was knowen amongſt the Gentiles, their knowledge of him hath beene alwaies ſo corrupted, that the ſcripture directing to the true God, giueth ſpeciall warning of theirs as falſe.

3 But heere I meane to gather a ſumme of generall doctrine. And firſt let the readers note, that the Scripture to the end to direct vs to the true God, doth expreſſely exclude, and caſt away all the gods of the Gentiles, becauſe commonly in a manner in all ages religion hath beene corrupted. True it is indeed that the name of one God was euery where knowne and renoumed. For euen they that worſhipped a great number of gods, ſo oft as they did ſpeake according to the proper ſenſe of nature, they ſimplie vſed the ſingular name of God, as if they were contented with one God alone. And this was wiſely marked by Iuſtine the martyr, which for this purpoſe made a booke of the monarchie of God, where by many teſtimonies he ſheweth that this, that there is but one God, was engrauen in the hearts of all men. The ſame thing alſo doth Tertullian prooue by the common phraſe of ſpeech. But foraſmuch as all without exception are by their owne vanitie either drawen or fallen to falſe forged deuiſes, and ſo their ſenſes are become vaine, therefore all that euer they naturally vnderſtood of the being but one God, auailed no further, but to make them inexcuſable. For euen the wiſeſt of them doe plainly ſhew the wandring errour of their minde, when they wiſh ſome god to aſſiſt them, and ſo in their prayers doe call vpon vncertaine gods. Moreouer in this, that they imagined God to haue many natures, although they thought ſomewhat leſſe abſurdly then the rude people did of Iupiter, Mercurie, Venus, Minerua, and other: yet were they not free from the deceits of Satan, and as we haue already ſaid elſewhere, whatſoeuer waies of eſcape the Philoſophers haue ſuttlie inuented, they cannot purge themſelues of rebellion, but that they all haue corrupted the truth of God. For this reaſon Habacuc after he had condemned all idols, biddeth to ſeeke God in his owne temple, that the faithfull ſhould not admit him to be any other then ſuch as he had diſcloſed himſelfe by his word.

Aba. 2.

THE ELEVENTH CHAPTER.

That it is vnlawfull to attribute vnto God a viſible forme, and that generally they forſake God, ſo many as doe erect to themſelues any images.

The Scripture is of no one thing more carefull then leſt men corrupt the glorie of God, firſt by conceauing, and then by expreſſing him vnder any ſhape or ſimilitude.

BVt as the Scripture prouiding for the rude and groſſe wit of man, vſeth to ſpeake after the common manner: ſo when it meaneth to make ſeuerally knowen the true God from the falſe gods, it cheefely compareth him with idols: not that it doth allow theſe inuentions that are more ſuttly and finely taught by the Philoſophers, but the plainlier to diſcloſe the fooliſhneſſe of the world, yea rather their madneſſe in ſeeking God ſo long as they cleaue euery one to their owne imaginations. Therefore that excluſiue definition which we commonly heare, bringeth to nought all that maner of godhead, that men frame to themſelues by their owne opinion, becauſe God himſelfe is the onely conuenient witnes of himſelfe. In the meane time, ſith this brutiſh groſenes hath poſſeſſed the whole world, to couet viſible ſhapes of God, and ſo to forge themſelues gods of timber, ſtone, gold, ſiluer, and other dead and corruptible matter, we ought to hold this principle, that with wicked falſhood the glorie of God is corrupted, ſo oft as any ſhape is fained to repreſent him. Therefore God in the law, after he had once challenged the glorie of his deitie to himſelfe alone, meaning to teach vs what maner of worſhipping him he alloweth or refuſeth, addeth immediately: Thou ſhalt make thee no grauen image, nor any ſimilitude, in which words he reſtraineth our libertie, that wee attempt not to repreſent him with any viſible image. And there he ſhortly reckneth vp all the formes wherewith of long time before, ſuperſtition had begun to turne his truth into lying. For we know that the Persians worshipped the Sun, yea, and so many starres as the foolish nations saw in the skie, so many gods they fained them. And scarce was there any liuing creature which was not among the Ægyptians a figure of God. But the Grecians were thought to be wiser then the rest, because they worshipped God in the shape of a man. But God compareth not images one with another, as though one were more and another lesse meete to be vsed, but without any exception he reiecteth all images, pictures, and other signes, whereby the superstitious thought to haue God neere vnto them.

Maximus Tirius Platonicus sermone. 38.

2 * This is easie to be gathered by the reasons which he ioyneth to the prohibition. First with Moses: Remember that the Lord hath spoken to thee in the vale of Horeb. Thou heardest a voice, but thou sawest no bodie. Therefore take heed to thy selfe, least peraduenture thou be deceiued and make to thy selfe any likenesse, &c. Wee see how openly God setteth his voice against all counterfait shapes, that we may know that they forsake God whosoeuer doe couet to haue visible formes of him. Of the Prophets onely Esay shall be enough, which speaketh oft and much hereof, to teach that the maiestie of God is defiled with vncomely and foolish counterfaiting, when he being without bodie, is likened to bodily matter: being inuisible, to a visible image: being a spirit, to a thing without life: being incomprehensible, to a small lump of timber, stone, or gold. In like manner reasoneth Paul: For as much as we are the generation of God, we ought not to thinke that the godhead is like vnto gold, or siluer, or stone grauen by art and the inuention of man. Whereby it certainly appeareth, whatsoeuer images are erected, or pictures painted to expresse the shape of God, they simply displease him as certaine dishonors of his maiestie. And what maruell is it if the holy Ghost doe thunder out these oracles from heauen, sith he compelleth the very wretched and blind Idolaters themselues to confesse this in earth? It is knowen how Seneca complained, as it is to read in Augustine. They dedicate (saith he) the holy immortall and inuiolable Gods in most vile and base stuffe, and put vpon them the shapes of men and beasts, and some of them with kind of man and woman mingled together, and with sundrie shapen bodies, and such they call Gods, which if they should receiue breath and meet them, would be reckened monsters. Whereby againe plainly appeareth, that it is a fond cauillation wherewith the defenders of images seeke to escape, which say, that the Iewes were forbidden images, because they were inclinable to superstition. As though that thing pertained to one nation only which God bringeth forth of his æternall being and the continuall order of nature. And Paul spake not to the Iewes but to the Athenians, when he confuted their errour in counterfaiting a shape of God.

Deut. 4.10. 12.15.

* Not only Moses, Esay, and Paul, but also blind idolaters themselues haue taught, that the maiestie of God is defiled when he is bodily represented in any likenes.

Act. 17.29.

Lib. 6. De ciui. dei. cap. 10.

3 * God indeed, I graunt, sometime in certaine signes hath giuen a presence of his godhead, so as he was said to be beholden face to face, but all these signes that euer he shewed, did aptly serue for meanes to teach, and withall did plainly admonish men of an incomprehensible essence. For the cloud, and smoke, and flame, although they were tokens of the heauenly glorie, yet did they as it were bridle and restraine the minds of men, that they should not attempt to passe any further. Wherefore, not Moses himselfe, to whom God disclosed himselfe most familiarly in comparison of other, obtained by prayer to see that face, but receiued this answere, that man is not able to sustaine so great brightnesse. The holy Ghost appeared vnder the likenesse of a Doue, but sith he immediately vanished away, who doth not see that by that token of so short a continuance of a moment, the faithfull are put in minde, that they ought to beleeue him to be an inuisible spirit, that holding them contented with his virtue and grace, they should make him no outward shape. This, that God appeared sometimes in forme of a man, was a foreshewing of the reuealing that was to be made of him in Christ. And therefore it was not lawfull for the Iewes to abuse this pretence to erect to themselues a representation of the godhead in the shape of man. Also the mercie seate wherein God shewed foorth the presence of his power in the time of the law, was so made, as it might teach that the best beholding of the godhead is this, when mens mindes are carried beyond themselues with admiration of it. For the Cherubins with their wings stretched abroad did couer it, the veile did hide it, and the place it selfe being set far inward, did of it selfe sufficiently keepe it secret. Therefore it is very plaine that they be very mad, that

* Although God haue vsed to declare the presence of his godhead by corporal signes, yet euen therein he hath still giuen some note to shew that hereupon we should not presume to erect vnto our selues a representation of that deitie which we cannot comprehend. The Iewes hauing such rudiments, is no argument why we should haue the because they had, much lesse worship them, which they did not.

Deut. 4.11. Exod. 33.13. Mat. 3.16. Exod. 25.17.

that goe about to defend the images of God and of Saints with the example of theſe Cherubins. For, I pray you, what meant theſe little images, but to ſhew that images are not meete to repreſent the myſteries of God? for as much as they were made for this purpoſe, that hiding the mercie ſeate with their wings, they ſhould not onely keepe backe the eies of man, but alſo all his ſenſes from the beholding of God, and ſo to correct his raſh hardineſſe. For this purpoſe maketh it, that the Prophets deſcribed the Seraphins ſhewed them in a viſion, with their face couered: whereby they ſignifie, that ſo great is the brightneſſe of the glorie of God, that the Angels themſelues are kept from direct beholding it, and the ſmall ſparks thereof that ſhine in the Angels are withdrawen from our eies. Although yet ſo many as rightly iudge, doe acknowledge that the Cherubins of whom we now ſpeake, pertained onely to the old manner of introduction, as it were of children, vſed in the lawe. So to draw them now for an example to our age, is an abſurditie. For that childiſh age, as I may ſo terme it, is paſſed, for the which ſuch rudiments were appointed. And it is much ſhame, that the panime writers are better expounders of the law of God then the Papiſts are. Iuuenal reprocheth the Iewes, as it were in ſcorne, that they honor the white clouds and the deitie of heauen. I grant he ſpeaketh peruerſly and wickedly: and yet he ſpeaketh more truly in ſaying that they haue among them no image of God, than the Papiſts doe which prate that they had a viſible image of God. And whereas that people with a certaine hote haſtines, brake out oftentimes to ſeeke them idols, euen as waters out of a great freſh ſpring boile out with violent force: hereby rather let vs learne how great is the inclination of our nature to idolatrie, leſt throwing vpon the Iewes the blame of that fault which is common to all, we ſleepe a deadly ſleepe vnder vaine allurements to ſinne.

Eſay 6. 2.

4 * To the ſame purpoſe ſerueth this ſaying: The idols of the Gentiles are gold and ſiluer, euen the works of mens hands. Becauſe the Prophet doth gather of the ſtuffe it ſelfe, that they are no gods that haue a golden or ſiluer image: and he taketh it for confeſſed truth, that it is a fooliſh fained inuention whatſoeuer we conceiue of our owne ſenſe concerning God. He nameth rather gold and ſiluer, than clay or ſtone, that the beautie or the price ſhould not ſerue to bring a reuerence to idols. But he concludeth generally, that nothing is leſſe allowable, then gods to be made of dead ſtuffe. And in the meane while he ſtandeth as much vpon this point, that men are carried away with too mad a raſhnes, which themſelues bearing about with them but a borrowed breath, ready to vaniſh away at euery moment, yet dare giue the honor of God to idols. Man muſt needs confeſſe that himſelfe is but a creature of a daies continuance, and yet he wil haue a piece of mettal to be counted God, to which himſelfe gaue the beginning to be a God. For whence came the beginning of idols but from the will of men? Very iuſtly doth the heathen Poet giue them this taunt:

Pſal. 115. 4. & 135. 15.

 The matter whereof idols are made, their makers, their meaſure, doth make them ſeeme worſe then mad, which allow the graning, or painting, or honoring of ſuch things as the figures of God.*

Horat. ſerm. 1. ſat. 8.

I was ſometime a fig tree log, a blocke that ſerud for nought:
The workman doubted what of me were fitteſt to be wrought:
A fourme to ſit vpon, or els a Priap God to be:
At length he thought the better was a God to make of me.

Forſooth an earthly ſilly man that breatheth out his owne life in manner euery moment, by his workmanſhip ſhall conuey the name and honour of God to a dead ſtocke. But foraſmuch as the Epicure in ſcoffingly ieſting hath cared for no religion, let vs leaue the taunts of him & ſuch as he is, and let the rebuking of the Prophet prick vs, or rather thruſt vs through where he ſaith, that they are too much beaſtly witted that with one ſelfe piece of wood doe make a fire and warme themſelues, doe heat the ouen to bake bread, doe roſt or ſeeth fleſh, and doe make them a God before which they fall downe humbly to pray. Therefore in another place he doth not only accuſe them by the law, but alſo doth reproch them that they haue not learned of the foundations of the earth: for that there is nothing leſſe conuenient than to bring God to the meaſure of fiue foote, which is aboue all meaſure and incomprehenſible. And yet this ſame monſtrous thing which manifeſtly repugneth againſt the order of nature, cuſtome ſheweth to be naturall to men. We muſt moreouer hold in mind, that ſuperſtitions are in Scripture commonly rebuked in this phraſe of ſpeech, that they are the workes of mens hands which want the authoritie of God: that this may be certaine, that all theſe manners of worshipping that men doe deuise of themselues are detestable. The Propher in the Psalme doth amplifie the madnesse of them that therefore are indued with vnderstanding, that they should know that all things are mooued with the onely power of God, and yet they pray for helpe to things dead and senceleſſe. But because the corruption of nature carieth as well all nations, as each man priuately to so great madnes, at last the holy Ghost thundreth with terrible curse against them, saying: Let them that make them become like to them, and so many as trust in them. And it is to be noted that a similitude is no lesse forbidden then a grauen image, whereby the fond subtletie of the Greekes is confuted. For they thinke they are well discharged if they graue not a God, while in painting they doe more licentiously outrage than any other nations. But the Lord forbiddeth an image not only to be made by the grauer, but also to be counterfaited by any other workman, because such counterfaiting is euill, and to the dishonor of his Maiestie.

Psal. 115. 8.

5 I know that it is a saying more then common among the people, that images are lay mens bookes. Gregorie so said, but the spirit of God pronounceth farre otherwise, in whose schoole if Gregorie had beene taught, he would neuer so haue spoken. For whereas Hieremie plainly saith, that the stocke is a doctrine of vanitie: and whereas Habacuc teacheth that the molten image is a teacher of lyes: surely hereof is a generall doctrine to be gathered, that it is vaine and lying whatsoeuer men learne by images concerning God. If any man take exception, and say that the Prophets reproue them onely which abused images to wicked superstition: I graunt that to be true. But I adde further that which is easie for all men to see, that they condemne that thing wholly which the Papists take for an assured principle, that images are in steede of bookes. For they doe in comparison set images against God as things directly contrarie, and such as neuer can agree together. This comparison I say is made in those places which I haue alleaged. Sith there is but one true God whom the Iewes did worship, it is amisse and falsly done to forge visible shapes to represent God, and men are miserably deceiued, that thereby seeke for knowledge of God. Finally, if it were not true that it is a deceitfull and corrupt knowledge of God that is learned by images, the Prophets would not so generally condemne it. At least thus much I win of them when we shew that it is vanitie and lying that men doe attempt to represent God with images, we doe nothing but rehearse word for word that which the Prophets haue taught.

They who seeke the knowledge of God in such bookes learne nothing but errors and lyes by it. Hier 10 8. Ha. 2. 18.

6 Let be read what Lactantius and Eusebius haue written of this matter, which sticke not to take it for certaine that they were all mortall, of whom images are to be seene. Likewise Augustine: which without doubting pronounceth that it is vnlawfull not only to worship images, but also to set vp images to God. And yet saieth he none other thing but the same which many yeeres before was decreed by the Elibertine Councell, whereof this is the xxxvj. Chapter. It is ordeined that no pictures be had in the Church, that the thing which is honored and worshipped be not painted on the walles. But most notablie is that which in another place Augustine alleageth out of Varro, and confirmeth it with his owne assent, that they which first brought in the images of Gods, both tooke away the feare of God, and brought in errour. If Varro alone should say this, peraduenture it should be but of small authoritie. Yet ought it of right to make vs ashamed, that a heathen man groping in darknesse came to this light, to see that bodily images are therefore vnmeete for the maiestie of God, because they diminish the feare of God, and increase errour in men. The proofe it selfe witnesseth that this was no lesse truely then wisely spoken. But Augustine hauing borrowed it of Varro, bringeth it foorth as of his owne minde. And first he admonisheth, that the first errors wherewith men were entangled concerning God, began not of images, but as with new matter added, increased by them. Secondly he expoundeth that the feare of God is therefore minished or rather taken away thereby, because his maiestie may easily in the foolishnes, and in the fond and absurd forging of images grow to contempt. Which second thing I would to God we did not by proofe find to be so true. Whosoeuer therfore will couet to be rightly taught, let him elsewhere learne than of images, what is meete to be knowne concerning God.

By Lactantius, Eusebius, Augustine, the Eliberine Councell, and Varro himself, the counterfaiting of God by imagerie condemned as a thing which diminisheth his feare, and bringeth his glorie into contempt. Concil. Eliber. cap. 6. & cap. 31. Lib. 4. De ciui. dei ca. 9. & 31.

7 Wherefore if the Papists haue any shame, let them no more vse this shift to say that

If the images which Papists propose as bookes of holines, were not paternes of vncleannes as they are, yet are they no fit meanes to instruct the people of God, before whom Christ should rather be painted by teaching, than taught by painting.

that images are lay mens bookes, which by many testimonies of Scripture are so openly confuted. And although I grant them so much, yet should they not much get thereby for defence of their idols. What monsters they thrust in, in the place of God, is well knowen. The pictures and images that they dedicate to Saints, what are they but examples of extreme riot and vncleanneſſe, whereunto if any would facion himselfe, he were worthie to be beaten with staues? Surely, the brothelhouses can shew harlots more chastely and soberly attyred, than their temples shew images of these whom they would haue called virgins. Euen as vncomely array giue they to the Martyrs. Let them therefore facion their idols at least to some honest shew of shamefastnes, that they may somewhat more colourably lie in saying, that they are the books of some holines. But if it were so, yet then would we answer, that this is not the right way to teach the faithfull people in holy places, whom God would haue there instructed with farre other doctrine than with these trifles. God commanded in the Churches a common doctrine to be set forth to all men in preaching of his word and in his holy mysteries: whereunto they shew themselues to haue a minde not very heedfull, that cast their eies about to behold images. But whom doe the Papists call lay and vnlearned men, whose vnskilfulnes may beare to be taught onely by images? Forsooth euen those whom the Lord knowledgeth for his disciples, to whom he vouchsafeth to reueale the heauenly wisedome, whom he willeth to be instructed with the wholsome mysteries of his kingdome. I grant indeed as the matter standeth, that there are at this day many which cannot be without such bookes. But whence I pray you groweth that dulnes, but that they are defrauded of that doctrine which onely was meete to instruct them with? For it is for no other cause, that they which had the cure of Churches gaue ouer their office of teaching to idols, but because themselues were dumb. Paul testifieth that Christ is in the true preaching of the Gospel, painted out in a maner crucified before our eies. To what purpose then were it to haue commonly set vp in Churches so many crosses of wood, stone, siluer and golde, if this were well and faithfully beaten into the peoples heads, that Christ died to beare our curse vpon the crosse, to clense our sinnes with the sacrifice of his body, and to wash them away with his bloud, and finally to reconcile vs to God the Father? Of which one thing they might learne more than of a thousand crosses of wood or stone. For perhaps the couetous doe set their minds and eies faster vpon the golden and siluer crosses, than vpon any words of God.

Gal. 3. 1.

Sap. 14. 15. Imagerie is ancient and springeth from the ancient roote of infidelitie, men not beleeuing or not considering God to be present, vnlesse they haue some visible signe for aduertisement of his presence. Gen. 31. 19.

8 As concerning the beginning of idols, that is by common consent thought to be true which is written in the booke of Wisedome, that they were the first authors of them, which gaue this honor to the dead, superstitiously to worship their memory. And truly I grant that this euil custome was very ancient, and I deny not that it was the firebrand wherewith the rage of men being kindled to idolatrie, did more and more burne therein. Yet doe I not grant that this was the first originall of this mischiefe. For it appeareth by Moses that images were vsed before that this curiositie in dedicating the images of dead men, whereof the prophane writers make often mention, were come in vre. When he telleth that Rachel had stolen her fathers idols, he speaketh it as of a common fault. Whereby we may gather that the wit of man is, as I may so call it, a continuall worship of idols. After the generall floud, there was as it were a new regeneration of the world, and yet there passed not many yeeres but that men according to their own lust faigned them gods. And it is likely that the holie Patriarch yet liuing, his childrens children were giuen to idolatry, so that to his bitter griefe he saw the earth defiled with idols, whose corruptions the Lord had but late purged with so horrible iudgement. For Thare and Nachor euen before the birth of Abraham were worshippers of false gods, as Iosue testifieth. Seeing the generation of Sem so soone swarued, what shall we iudge of the posteritie of Cham, who were alreadie cursed in their father? The mind of men, as it is full of pride and rash boldnes, presumeth to imagin God according to hir own conceit: and as it is possessed with dulnes, yea, ouerwhelmed with grose ignorãce, so it conceiueth vanitie and a fond fantasie in steed of God. And in these euils is added a new mischiefe, that man attempteth to expresse in workmanship such a god as he inwardly conceiueth. Thus the minde begetteth the idoll, and the hand bringeth it forth. The example of the Israelites prooueth that this was the beginning of idolatrie, that men doe not beleeue that God is among them, vnleſſe he ſhew himſelfe carnally preſent. We know not (ſaid they) what is become of this Moſes: make vs gods that may goe before vs. They knew that there was a God whoſe power they had had experiēce of in ſo many miracles: but they did not beleeue that he was nie vnto them, vnleſſe they did ſee with their eies a corporall repreſentation of his face to be a witnes vnto them of the God that gouerned them. Their minde was therefore to know by the image going before them, that God was the guide of their iourney. This thing daily experience teacheth, that the fleſh is alway vnquiet till it hath gotten ſome counterfeit deuiſe like it ſelfe, wherein it may vainly delight as in an image of God. In a manner in all ages ſince the creation of the world, men to obey this blinde deſire haue erected ſignes wherein they imagined God to be preſent before their carnall eies. Exod. 31. 1.

9 After ſuch inuention forged, by and by followeth worſhipping. For when men thought that they beheld God in images, they did alſo worſhip him in them. At length being both with minds and eies altogether faſtned thereon, they began to waxe more and more brutiſh, and to wonder at them and haue them in admiration, as if there were ſome nature of godhead in them. So appeareth that men brake not out into the worſhipping of images, till they were perſwaded in ſome groſſe opinion: not to thinke the images to be gods, but to imagine that there did a certaine force of Godhead abide in them. Therefore whether thou repreſent to thy ſelfe either God or a creature in the image, when thou falleſt downe to worſhip, thou art alreadie bewitched with ſome ſuperſtition. For this reaſon the Lord hath forbidden not onely images to be erected that are made to expreſſe a likeneſſe of him, but alſo any titles or ſtones to be dedicated, that ſhould ſtand to be worſhipped. And for the ſame reaſon alſo in the commandement of the lawe, this other point is added concerning worſhipping. For ſo ſoone as they haue forged a viſible forme for God, they alſo tie the power of God vnto it. So beaſtly fooliſh are men, that there they faſten God where they counterfeit him, and therfore muſt they needs worſhip it. Neither is there any difference whether they ſimply worſhip the idol, or God in the idol. This is alway idolatrie, when honors due to God are giuen to an idol, vnder what colour ſoeuer it be. And becauſe God wil not be worſhipped ſuperſtitiouſlie, therefore whatſoeuer is giuen to idols is taken from him. Let them take heed hereunto that ſeeke for pretenſes to defend the abhominable idolatrie, wherwith theſe many ages paſt, true religion hath been drowned & ouerthrowne. But (ſay they) the images are not taken for Gods. Neither were the Iewes themſelues ſo vnaduiſed to forget that it was God by whoſe hands they had been brought out of Ægypt before they made the calfe. Yea when Aaron ſaid, that thoſe were the gods by whom they were deliuered out of the land of Ægypt, they boldly aſſented, ſhewing a plaine token of their meaning, that they would ſtill keepe that God that was their deliuerer, ſo that they might ſee him go before them in the calfe. Neither is it to be beleeued that the heathen were ſo groſſe as to beleeue, that God was no other thing but ſtocks and ſtones. For they changed their images at their pleaſure, but ſtill they kept the ſame gods in their minde: and there were many images of one God, and yet they did not according to the multitude of images faigne them many gods. Beſides that they did daily cōſecrate new images, yet did they not thinke that they made new gods. Let the excuſes be read which Auguſtine ſaith were pretēded by the Idolaters of his age. Whē they were rebuked, the common ſort anſwered, that they did not worſhip that viſible thing, but the deitie that did in it inuiſiblie dwell. And they that were of ſomewhat better religion, as he calleth it, did ſay that they did neither worſhip the image, nor the ſpirit in it, but by the corporal image they did behold the ſigne of that thing which they ought to worſhip? How then? All idolaters, whether they were of the Iewes, or of the Gentiles, were none otherwiſe minded then as I haue ſaid: being not contented with a ſpirituall vnderſtanding of God, they thought by the images he ſhould be more ſure and neerer imprinted in them. After once that ſuch diſordered counterfaiting of God well liked thē, they neuer ended, til daily more & more deluded with new deceits, they imagined that God did ſhew forth his power in images. And neuertheleſſe, both the Iewes were perſwaded that vnder ſuch images they did worſhip the one true Lord of heauen and earth: & likewiſe the Gētiles, their falſe gods, whom yet they fained to dwel in heauen.

From making images to repreſent God, men were brought firſt to thinke that his preſence was reſtrained vnto thoſe images, then to imagine that there was ſome diuine thing in them, and at length flatly to worſhip them.

The ſame fault in Papiſts which was in idolatrous Iewes and Gentiles.
In Pſal. 113.

10 Whoſoeuer denie that it hath thus been done in time paſt, yea within our owne remembrance, they impudently lie. For, why fall they downe before them? And when they pray, why turne they toward them as to the eares of God? For it is true that Auguſtine ſaith, that no man praieth or worſhippeth when he ſo beholdeth an image, but he is ſo affected in minde, that he thinketh himſelfe to be heard of it, or that it will doe for him what he deſireth. Why is there ſuch difference betweene the images of one God, that paſſing by one image with little reuerence or none done to it, they honour another ſolemnly? Why doe they wearie themſelues with vowed pilgrimages to viſit thoſe images whereof they haue like at home? Why doe they at this day in defence of them as it were for their religion and countrey, fight to ſlaughter and deſtruction, in ſuch ſort as they would better ſuffer to haue the one onely God than their idols to be taken from them? And yet I doe not recken vp the groſſe errours of the common people, which are almoſt infinite, and doe in manner poſſeſſe the hearts of all men. I doe onely ſhew what themſelues doe confeſſe when they meane moſt of all to excuſe themſelues of idolatrie. We doe not call them (ſay they) our gods. No more did the Iewes nor the Gentiles call them theirs in time paſt: and yet the Prophets each where ceaſe not to caſt in their teeth their fornication with ſtocks and ſtones, for doing no more but ſuch things as are daily done by them that would be counted Chriſtians, that is to ſay, that they carnally worſhipped God in ſtocks and ſtones.

The difference that they put betweene themſelues and idolaters, is but a ſhift. They are not acquited from the ſame ſinne becauſe they giue it another name.

11 Although I am not ignorant, nor thinke good to paſſe it ouer, as if I knew it not, how they ſeeke to eſcape with a more ſubtle diſtinction, whereof I ſhall againe make mention more at large hereafter. For they pretend that the worſhip which they giue to images, is Idoloduliа, which is ſeruice of images, and not Idololatria which is worſhip of images. For ſo they terme it when they teach that they may lawfully without any wrong done to God, giue vnto images and pictures that worſhip which they call Doulia, or ſeruice. And ſo they thinke themſelues without blame, if they be but the ſeruants and not alſo the worſhippers of idoles: as though it were not a little lighter matter to worſhip then to ſerue. And yet while they ſeeke a hole to hide them in the greeke word, they childiſhly diſagree with themſelues. For ſeeing Latreuein in Greeke ſignifieth nothing but to worſhip, their ſaying commeth but to this effect, as if they would ſay, that they worſhip in deede their images, but without any worſhipping. And there is no cauſe why they ſhould ſay that I ſeeke to catch them in words: but they themſelues, while they ſeeke to caſt a miſt before the eies of the ſimple, doe bewray their owne ignorance. And yet though they be neuer ſo eloquent, they ſhall not attaine by their eloquence to prooue vnto vs that one ſelfeſame thing is two ſundry things. Let them (ſay I) ſhew me a difference in the thing it ſelfe whereby they may be thought to differ from the old idolaters. For as an adulterer or a murderer cannot eſcape guiltineſſe of his fault, by giuing his ſinne a new deuiſed name: ſo it is a very abſurditie to thinke that theſe men be quit by new deuiſe of a name, if in the matter it ſelfe they nothing differ from thoſe idolaters whom they themſelues are compelled to condemne. But ſo far are they from proouing that their caſe differeth from the caſe of thoſe idolaters, that rather the fountaine of all this whole miſchiefe is an vnorderly counterfaiting, wherein they haue ſtriued with them while both with their owne wit they deuiſe, and with their owne hands they frame them ſignifying formes to expreſſe them a faſhion of God.

Images, whether they be of ſtories, or onely of bodies may be both made and vſed, ſo that they be not made to repreſent God, nor otherwiſe abuſed when they are made.

12 And yet am I not ſo ſuperſtitious that I thinke no images may be ſuffered at all. But foraſmuch as caruing and painting are the gifts of God, I require that they both be purely and lawfully vſed. Leſt theſe things which God hath giuen vs for his glorie and for our owne benefite, be not onely defiled by diſordered abuſe, but alſo turned to our owne deſtruction. We thinke it vnlawfull to haue God faſhioned out in viſible forme, becauſe himſelfe hath forbidden it, and becauſe it cannot be done without ſome defacement of his glorie. And leſt they thinke that it is onely we that are in this opinion, they that haue beene trauelled in their works, ſhall finde that all ſound writers did alway reprooue the ſame thing. If then it be not lawfull to make any bodily image of God, much leſſe ſhall it be lawfull to worſhip it for God, or God in it. It remaineth therefore lawfull that onely thoſe things be painted and grauen whereof our eies are capeable: but that the maieſtie of God which is farre aboue the ſenſe of our eies, be not abuſed with vncomely deuiſed ſhapes. Of this ſort are partly hiſtories and things done, partly images and faſhions of bodies, without expreſſing of any things done by them. The firſt of theſe haue ſome vſe in teaching or admoniſhing a man: but what profit the ſecond can bring ſaue onely delectation, I ſee not. And yet it is euident, that euen ſuch were almoſt all the images that heretofore haue ſtand vp in Churches. Whereby we may iudge that they were there ſet vp not by diſcreet iudgement or choiſe, but by fooliſh and vnaduiſed deſire. I ſpeake nor how much amiſſe and vncomely they were for the moſt part faſhioned, nor how licentiouſly Painters and Caruers haue in this point ſhewed their wantonneſſe, which thing I haue alreadie touched. Onely I ſpeake to this end, that though there were no fault in them, yet doe they nothing auaile to teach.

Images dangerous and vnfit to be in Churches.

13 But leauing alſo that difference, let vs by the way conſider whether it be expedient in Chriſtian temples to haue any images at all, that doe expreſſe either things done, or the bodies of men. Firſt, if the authoritie of the ancient Church doe any thing mooue vs, let vs remember that for about fiue hundred yeeres together, while religion yet better flouriſhed, and ſincere doctrine was in force, the Chriſtian Churches were vniuerſally without images. So they were then firſt brought in for the garniſhment of Churches, when the ſinceritie of miniſtration was not a little altered. I will not now diſpute what reaſon they had with them that were the firſt authors thereof. But if a man compare age with age, he ſhall ſee that they were much ſwarued from that vprightnes of them that were without images. What? do we thinke that thoſe holy fathers would haue ſuffered the Church to be ſo long without the thing which they iudged profitable and good for them? But rather becauſe they ſaw either little or no profit in it, and much danger to lurke vnderneath it, they did rather of purpoſe and aduiſedly reiect it, than by ignorance or negligence omit it. Which thing Auguſtine doth alſo in expreſſe words teſtifie: When they be ſet in ſuch places (ſaith he) honorably on hie, to be ſeene of them that pray and doe ſacrifice, although they want both ſenſe and life, yet with the very likenes that they haue of liuely members & ſenſes, they ſo moue the weake minds, that they ſeeme to liue and breath, &c. And in another place: For that ſhape of members doth worke and in maner enforce thus much, that the mind liuing within a body doth thinke that body to haue ſenſe, which he ſeeth like vnto his own. And a little after: Images do more auaile to bow downe an vnhappy ſoule, by this that they haue mouth, eies, eares, and feet, than to amend it by this that they neither ſpeake, nor ſee, nor heare, nor go. This truly ſeemeth to be the cauſe why Iohn willed vs to beware not onely of worſhipping of images, but alſo of images themſelues. And we haue found it too much in experience, that through the horrible madnes which hath heretofore poſſeſſed the world, to the deſtruction in maner of all godlines, ſo ſoone as images be ſet vp in Churches, there is as it were a ſigne ſet vp of idolatrie, becauſe the folly of mē cannot refraine it ſelfe, but it muſt forthwith run on to ſuperſtitious worſhippings. But if there were not ſo much danger hanging thereby: yet when I cōſider for what vſe temples are ordained, me thinks it is very ill beſeeming the holines thereof, to receiue any other images than theſe liuely and naturall images, which the Lord by his word hath conſecrate. I meane Baptiſme, and the Lords ſupper, and other ceremonies wherewith our eies ought both more earneſtly to be occupied, and more liuely to be mooued, then that they ſhould neede any other images framed by the wit of men. Lo this is the incomparable commoditie of images, which can by no value be recompenced, if we beleeue the Papiſts.

In Pſal. 113.

1. Ioh. 5. 21.

The fondlow arguments of Papiſts, whereby it was diſputed in the Nyten Synod, that images were to be had in Churches.

14 I think I had ſpoken ynough of this thing already, but that the Nicene Synode doth as it were lay hand on me to enforce me to ſpeake more. I meane not that moſt famous Synod which Conſtantine the Great aſſembled, but that which was holden eight hundred yeeres ago, by the commandement and authoritie of Irene the Empreſſe. For that Synod decreed, that images ſhould not only be had in Churches, but alſo worſhipped. For whatſoeuer I ſhould ſay, the authoritie of the Synod would make a great preiudice on the other ſide. Although to ſay truth, that doth not ſo much moue me, as make it appeare to the readers how farre their rage extended, that were more deſirous of images than became Chriſtians. But firſt let vs diſpatch this. They that at this day maintaine the vſe of images, alledge the decree of that Nicene Synod for their defence.

But there is extant a booke of confutation bearing the name of Charles the Great, which by the phraſe we may gather to haue beene written at the ſame time. Therein are recited the ſentences of the Biſhops that were preſent at that Councell, and the arguments wherewith they contended. Iohn the Legate of the Eaſt parts ſaid: God created man after his owne image: and thereupon gathered that we ought to haue images. The ſame man thought that images were commended vnto vs in this ſentence: Shew me thy face becauſe it is beautifull. Another to prooue that images ought to be ſet vpon altars, cited this teſtimonie: No man lighteth a candle and putteth it vnder a buſhell. Another, to ſhew that the beholding of them is profitable for vs, brought forth a verſe out of the Pſalme: The light of thy countenance is ſealed vpon vs. Another tooke this ſimilitude: As the Patriarchs vſed the Sacrifices of the Gentiles, ſo muſt Chriſtian men haue the images of Saints in ſteede of the images of the Gentiles. To the ſame purpoſe haue they writhed this ſaying: Lord, I haue loued the beautie of thy houſe. But ſpecially wittie is the expoſition of this place: As we haue heard ſo haue we ſeene, that God is not knowen by onely hearing of his word, but alſo by looking vpon images. Like is the ſharpe deuiſe of Biſhop Theodore: Maruellous (ſaith he) is God in his Saints. And in another place: In the Saints that are in the earth: therefore this ought to be referred to images. Finally, ſo filthie are their vnſauourie follies that it greeueth me to rehearſe them.

Their arguments brought for proofe that they might be worſhipped.

15 When they talke of the worſhipping: then are brought foorth the worſhipping of Pharao, and of the rod of Ioſeph, and of the piller that Iacob ſet vp. Albeit in this laſt example, they doe not onely depraue the meaning of the Scripture, but alſo bring in that which is no where to be read. Then theſe places ſeeme to them maruellous ſtrong and meete prooues. Worſhip his footeſtoole. Againe, worſhip on his holy hill. Againe, all the rich men of the people ſhall worſhip thy countenance. If a man would in ſcorne put the perſonage of a riding foole vpon the patrones of Images, could he gather together greater and groſſer follies? But to put all out of doubt, Theodoſius Biſhop of Mira, doth ſo earneſtly confirme by the dreames of his Archdeacon, that images ought to be worſhipped, as if he had an oracle from heauen to ſhew for it. Now let the fauourers of images go and preſſe vs with the decree of that Synode. As though thoſe reuerend fathers doe not altogether diſcredit themſelues, in either ſo childiſhly handling, or ſo vngodly and fowly tearing the Scriptures.

Honour, and the ſame honour giuen by that Synod vnto images which is due vnto God himſelfe.

16 Now come I to thoſe monſtrous impieties, which it is maruell that euer they durſt vomit, and twiſe maruellous that they were not cried out againſt with high deteſtation of all men. And it is good that this outragiouſly wicked madnes be bewraied, that at leaſt the falſe colour of antiquitie may be taken away, which the Papiſts pretend for the worſhipping of images. Theodoſius the Biſhop of Amorum pronounceth curſe againſt all them that will not haue images worſhipped. Another imputeth all the calamities of Grecia and the Eaſt part to this, that images were not worſhipped. What puniſhment then were the Prophets, the Apoſtles and Martyrs woorthie to ſuffer, in whoſe time there were no images? They adde further. If the Emperours image be met with perfume and cenſing: much more is this honour due to the images of Saints. Conſtantius Biſhop of Conſtance in Ciprus, profeſſeth that he reuerently imbraceth images, and affirmeth that he will giue to them the ſame honourable manner of worſhip that is due to the Trinitie that giueth life. And whoſoeuer refuſeth ſo to doe, he curſeth him and ſendeth him away with the Manichees and Marcionites. And, that ye ſhould not thinke that this was the priuate ſentence of one man, they did all aſſent vnto it. Yea, Iohn the Legate of the Eaſt parts being further carried with heate, ſaid, it were better to bring all brothell houſes into the citie, then to denie the worſhipping of images. At length by conſent of them all it was decreed, that worſe then all heretikes are the Samaritans, and worſe then the Samaritans are the enemies of images. And becauſe the play ſhould not be without his ſolemne farewell, this clauſe was added, let them be glad and reioice, that hauing the image of Chriſt doe offer ſacrifice vnto it. Where is now the diſtinction of Latria and Dulia, wherewith they are woont to ſeeke to blinde the eies both of God and men? For the councell without any exception doth giue euen as much vnto images, as vnto the liuing God himſelfe.

The

THE TVVELFTH CHAPTER.

That God is seuerally discerned from idols, that he may be onely and wholy worshipped.

WE said in the beginning that the knowledge of God standeth not in bare speculation, but draweth with it the worshipping of him, and by the way we touched how he is rightly worshipped, which point shall be in other places more largely set foorth. Now I doe but shortly repeate, that so oft as the Scripture affirmeth that there is but one God, it striueth not for the bare name of God, but withall commandeth this, that whatsoeuer belongeth to the godhead, be not giuen to any other. Whereby also appeareth what pure religion doth differ from superstition. Eusebeia, in Greeke signifieth as much as true worship, because alway euen the blinde themselues groping in darkenesse haue found that this rule ought to be holden, that God be not vnorderly worshipped. The name of religion although Cicero truely and well deriueth from relegere, to record, or gather vp together: yet is the reason that he assigneth enforced and farre set, that good worshippers did often record & diligently wey what was the truth. I rather thinke that that name is set as a cõtrary to wandering libertie, because the greater part of the world vnaduisedly taketh hold of that which they first meet withall, and flieth about hither & thither: but true godlines, to the end it may stand in stedfast state, Relegit, that is to say, doth gather vp it selfe together within her bonds. Like as I thinke superstition to haue her name hereof, that not being contented with the manner and order prescribed, she heapeth vp together a superfluous number of vaine things. But to leaue the words, it hath alway beene agreed by the consent of all ages, that religion is with false errours corrupted and peruerted. Whereupon we gather that it is a very fond colour which the superstitious doe pretend, whē with vndiscreet zeale they giue themselues leaue to doe all things. And although this confession sound in the mouthes of all men: yet herein a shamefull ignorance bewraieth it selfe, that neither they cleaue to the one God, nor haue any regard of order in the worshipping of him, as we haue alreadie shewed. But God, to claime his own right vnto himself, crieth out that he is iealous, and that he will be a seuere reuenger if he be mingled with any fained god. And then he setteth forth the lawfull maner of worshipping, to hold mankind in obedience. He conteineth both these points in his law, when first he bindeth the faithfull vnto himselfe that he onely may be their lawmaker: and then he prescribeth a rule whereby to be worshipped after his owne minde. Of the law, because the vses and ends thereof are many, I will intreate in place fit for it. Now I onely touch this point, that thereby men are brideled that they run not out of the way to wrong worshippings. Now, as I first said, we must hold in minde, that if all that euer properly belongeth to Godhead do not rest in God alone, he is spoiled of his honour, and his worship broken. And there must we somewhat heedfully marke with what subtleties superstition deceiueth. For it doth not so reuolt vnto strange gods that it seemeth to forsake the highest God, or to bring him downe into the number of other gods: but whilest she granteth vnto him the highest place, she setteth round about him a number of lesser gods: among whom she diuideth his offices. And so (albeit clokedly and craftily) the glorie of the Godhead is cut in parts, that it remaineth not whole in him. So in the old time, as well they of the Iewes as of the Gentiles did set beneath the father and iudge of gods a great rout of gods, which should euery one according to his degree in common haue with the highest God the gouerment of the heauen and earth. So the Saints that in a few ages past departed this life, are aduaunced to the fellowship of God, to be worshipped, called vpon, and honored in stead of him. And yet with such abhomination we thinke that the maiestie of God is not so much as diuided, when in deede it is a great part suppressed and extinguished, sauing that we retaine still a poore opinion of his supreme power: and in the meane time deceiued with entangled subtleties, we are sunderly carried to diuers gods.

True religion cleaueth to one set frame of worshipping one God, and him alone.

Superstition though it make that one God the chiefest, doth neuertheless diuide his honour amongst many.

1. De nat. deorum.

2 For this purpose also was inuented the distinction of Latria and Dulia, as they terme them, that is worship and seruice, whereby they might freely seeme to giue away the honors of God to Angels and dead men. For it is euident, that the worship which the Papiſts giue vnto Saints, differeth nothing in deede from the worſhip of God. For all alike without diuerſitie they worſhip both God and them: ſauing that when they be charged with it, they wind away with this exception, that they keepe ſtill for God the honour that is due vnto him inuiolate, becauſe they leaue vnto him the worſhip that they call Latria. But ſith the queſtion ſtandeth vpon the matter, and not the word, who would permit them ſo carelelly to mock in a matter of all matters moſt weighty? But to let that alſo paſſe, yet win they nothing by this diſtinction, but to prooue, that they giue worſhip to one God, and ſeruice to another. For Latria in Greeke ſignifieth as much as in Latine Cultus, and in Engliſh worſhip, Dulia properly ſignifieth ſeruice. And yet ſometime in Scripture this difference is confounded together without diuerſitie. But graunt it be a perpetuall difference, then muſt we ſearch what both the words may meane. Dulia is ſeruice, Latria is worſhip. Now no man doubteth that to ſerue, is more than to worſhip. For many times a man could hardly beare to ſerue him whom he would not ſticke to worſhip. So is it an vnequall dealing to giue to the Saints that which is the greater, and to leaue to God that which is the leſſer. But many of the ancient authors haue vſed this diſtinction. What maketh that matter, if all men doe perceiue it to be not only vnfit, but altogether very fond?

The diſtinction which Papiſts make betweene the honor they doe vnto God & vnto Saints, is vnfit & fond.

Gal.4.8.

Though ciuill honor may be done vnto men, yet all religious not onely worſhip but ſeruice alſo, yea, and all dutifull behauiours of godlines are ſo due vnto God alone, that they cannot without impietie be made common vnto any other.

Mat.4.10.
Reu.19.10.
Act.10.25.

3 Now leauing nice ſubtleties, let vs wey the matter it ſelfe. When Paul putteth the Galathians in remembrance what they were before that they were lightened in the knowledge of God, he ſayth that they gaue Duliam ſeruice to thoſe that of nature were no gods. Although he name Latriam or worſhip, is therefore their ſuperſtition excuſable? He doth neuertheleſſe condemne their peruerſe ſuperſtition, which he termeth by the name of Dulia, ſeruice, than if he had expreſſed the name of Latria, worſhip. And whē Chriſt repulſeth the aſſault of Sathan with his buckler, that it is written, thou ſhalt worſhip the Lord thy God, the name of Latria was not brought in queſtion: Sathan required but an adoration. Likewiſe when the Angell reprooued Iohn, becauſe he fell down on his knees before him, we ought not to thinke that Iohn was ſo mad that he would giue vnto the Angel the honor that was due only to God. But becauſe it was not poſſible, but that all worſhip that is ioyned with religion ſauoureth ſomewhat as pertaining to God, therefore he could not adore the Angell, but that he muſt take away ſomewhat from the glorie of God. We read indeed often, that men haue been honoured: but that was a ciuil honour, as I may ſo call it. But religion hath another rule, which ſo ſoone as it is ioyned with worſhip, bringeth with it a prophane abuſe of the honour of God. The ſame may we ſee in Cornelius. He had not ſo ſlenderly profited in godlineſſe, but that he had learned to giue the ſoueraigne worſhip to God alone. Therefore, when he fell downe before Peter, he did it not of this meaning, to worſhip him in the ſteede of God. And yet did Peter earneſtly forbid him to doe that which he did. And why ſo? but becauſe men doe neuer ſo narrowly put difference betweene the worſhip of God and of his creatures: but that without diuerſitie they giue away that vnto the creature, which belongeth vnto God. Wherefore if we haue one God, we muſt remember that nothing be it neuer ſo little muſt be taken away from his glorie, but that he keepe ſtill that which is properlie his. Therefore Zachary when he preacheth of the repairing of the Church, in plaine words expreſſeth: That there ſhall not only be one God, but alſo that there ſhall be one name of that God, to the end that he haue nothing in common with idols. What maner of worſhip God requireth, we ſhall ſee in another place when it falleth in order. For it pleaſed him in his law to preſcribe vnto men what is lawfull and right, and ſo to bind them to a certain rule, that euery man ſhould not giue himſelfe leaue to deuiſe what forme of worſhip he liſt. But becauſe it is not expedient to loade the readers with heaping many matters together, I will not touch that point yet. Onely let it ſuffice for this time to keepe in minde, that euery carrying away of the dutifull behauiours of godlineſſe to any other then to God alone, is not without robberie of God. And firſt ſuperſtition deuiſed to giue diuine honours to the Sunne, or other Starres or idoles: then followed ambitious pride, which garniſhing mortall men with ſpoiles taken from God, preſumed to prophane all that euer was holy. And although this principle remained among them, to honour the ſoueraigne deitie, yet grew it in vſe indifferently to offer ſacrifices to ſpirits, leſſer gods, or dead men of honour. So ſlipperie is the way to slide into this fault, to make common to a number that which God seuerely challengeth to himselfe alone.

THE THIRTEENTH CHAPTER.

That there is taught in the Scriptures one essence of God from the very creation, which essence conteineth in it three persons.

THat which is taught in the Scriptures concerning the incomprehensible and spirituall essence of God, ought to suffice not onely to ouerthrowe the foolish errors of the common people, but also to confute the fine subtleties of prophane Philosophie. One of the olde writers seemed to haue said very well, That God is all that we doe see, and all that we doe not see. But by this meane he hath imagined the Godhead to be powred into all the parts of the world. Although God, to the intent to keepe men in sober minde, speaketh but sparely of his owne essence, yet by those two names of addition that I haue rehearsed, he doth both take away all grosse imaginations, and also represse the presumptuous boldnes of mans minde. For surely his immeasurable greatnes ought to make vs afraide, that we attempt not to measure him with our sense: and his spirituall nature forbiddeth vs to imagine any thing earthly or fleshly of him. For the same cause he often assigneth his dwelling place to be in heauen. For though, as he is incomprehensible, he filleth the earth also: yet because he seeth our mindes by reason of their dulnesse to lie still in the earth, for good cause he lifteth vs vp aboue the world, to shake off our sloth and sluggishnesse. And here falleth to ground the errour of the Manichees, which in appointing two originall beginnings, haue made the diuell in a maner equall with God. Surely, this was as much as to breake the vnitie of God and restraine his vnmeasurableneesse. For where they haue presumed to abuse certaine testimonies: that sheweth a foule ignorance, as their errour it selfe sheweth a detestable madnesse. And the Anthropomorphites are also easily confuted, which haue imagined God to consist of a body, because oftentimes the Scripture ascribeth vnto him a mouth, eares, eies, hands and feete. For what man, yea though he be slenderly witted, doth not vnderstand that God doth so with vs speake as it were childishly, as nurses doe with their babes? Therefore such maner of speeches doe not so plainly expresse what God is, as they doe apply the vnderstanding of him to our slender capacitie. Which to doe, it behooued of necessitie that he descended a great way beneath his owne heighe.

The Scripture teacheth God to be an essence vnmeasurable and spirituall, doth not onely stay men from measuring God by sense and from imagining any earthly thing of him, but also by the one doth conuince the Manichees, by the other the Anthropomorphites of madnesse.

2 But he also setteth out himselfe by another speciall marke, whereby he may be more neerely knowne. For he so declareth himselfe to be but one, that he yet giueth himselfe distinctly to be considered in three persons: which except we learne, a bare and emptie name of God without any true God flieth in our braine. And that no man should thinke that he is a threefold God, or that the one essence of God is diuided in three persons, we must here seeke a short & easie definition to deliuer vs from all error. But because many doe make much adoe about this word Person, as a thing inuented by man: how iustly they doe so, it is best first to see. The Apostle naming the sonne the engraued forme of the Hypostasis of his father, he vndoubtedly meaneth, that the Father hath some being, wherein he differeth from the Sonne. For to take it for essence (as some expositors haue done, as if Christ like a peece of waxe printed with a seale did represent the substance of the Father) were not onely hard but also an absurditie. For sith the essence of God is single or one and vndiuisible, he that in himselfe containeth it all, and not by peece-meale, or by deriuation, but in whole perfection, should very vnproperly, yea, fondly be called the engraued forme of him. But because the Father although he be in his owne propertie distinct, hath expressed himselfe wholy in his Sonne, it is for good cause said, that he hath giuen his Hypostasis, to be seene in him. Wherewith aptly agreeth that which by and by followeth, that he is the brightnes of his glory. Surely by the Apostles words we gather, that there is a certaine proper Hypostasis in the Father, that shineth in the Sonne: whereby also againe is easily perceiued the Hypostasis of the Sonne that distinguisheth him from the Father. Like order is in the holy Ghost. For we shall by and by proone him to be God, and yet he must needes be other than the Father. Yet this distinction is not of the essence, which it is vnlawfull vnlawfull to make manifold. Therefore if the Apoſtles teſtimonie be credited, it followeth that there be in God three Hypoſtaſes. This terme ſeeing the Latines haue expreſſed with the name of Perſon, it were too much pride and waiwardneſſe to braule about ſo cleare a matter. But if we liſt word for word to tranſlate, we may call it ſubſiſtence. Many in the ſame ſenſe haue called it ſubſtance. And the name of Perſon hath not beene in vſe among the Latines onely, but alſo the Grecians, perhaps to declare a conſent, haue taught that there are three Proſopa, that is to ſay, Perſons in God. But they, whether they be Greekes or Latines that differ one from another in the word, doe very well agree in the ſumme of the matter.

The Scripture teacheth one diuine essence wherein there are three distinguished, but not diuided persons subsisting.

Heb. 1. 3.

With the names of Trinitie and Perſon no man ſhould be offended.

3 Now howſoeuer the heretikes barke at the name of Perſon, or ſome ouermuch preciſe men doe carpe that they like not the word fained by deuiſe of men: ſith they cannot get of vs to ſay, that there be three, whereof euery one is wholy God, nor yet that there be many Gods: what vnreaſonableneſſe is this, to miſlike words, which expreſſe none other thing but that which is teſtified and approoued by the Scriptures? It were better (ſay they) to reſtraine not onely our meanings but alſo our words within the bounds of Scripture, than to deuiſe ſtrange names that may be the beginning of diſagreement and brawling: ſo doe we tier our ſelues with ſtriſe about words: ſo the truth is loſt in contending: ſo charitie is broken by odiouſly brawling togither. If they call that a ſtrange word, which cannot be ſhewed in Scripture, as it is written in number of ſyllables: then they binde vs to a hard law, whereby is condemned all expoſition that is not peeced together, with bare laying together of textes of Scripture. But if they meane that to be ſtrange, which being curiouſly deuiſed, is ſuperſtitiouſly defended, which maketh more for contention than edification, which is either vnaptly, or to no profite vſed, which withdraweth from the ſimplicitie of the word of God, then with all my hart I embrace their ſober minde. For I iudge that we ought with no leſſe deuout reuerence to talke of God than to thinke of him, for as much as whatſoeuer we doe of our ſelues thinke of him, is fooliſh, and whatſoeuer we ſpeake is vnſauorie. But there is a certaine meaſure to be kept. We ought to learne out of the Scriptures a rule both to thinke and ſpeake, whereby to examine all the thoughts of our minde and wordes of our mouth. But what withſtandeth vs, but that ſuch as in Scripture are to our capacitie doubtfull and entangled, we may in plainer words expreſſe them, being yet ſuch words as doe reuerently and faithfully ſerue the truth of the Scripture, and be vſed ſparely, modeſtly, and not without occaſion? Of which ſort there are examples ynough. And whereas it ſhall by proofe appeare that the Church of great neceſſitie was enforced to vſe the names of Trinitie, and Perſons, if any ſhall then find fault with the newneſſe of words, ſhall he not be iuſtly thought to be greeued at the light of the truth, as he that blameth onely this, that the truth is made ſo plaine and cleare to diſcerne?

The crooked ſubtelties of heretikes hath cauſed ſound beleeuers to deuiſe new words for plainer opening of that, vnder which their poyſon lurked, as, Conſubſtantiall, againſt the Arrians: Perſonall Trinitie, againſt the Sabellians.

4 Such newneſſe of words, if it be ſo to be called, commeth then chiefly in vſe, when the truth is to be defended againſt wranglers that doe mock it out with cauillations. Which thing we haue at this day too much in experience, who haue great buſines in vanquiſhing the enimies of true and ſound doctrine. With ſuch folding and crooked winding theſe ſlipperie ſnakes doe ſlide away, vnleſſe they be ſtrongly griped and holden hard when they be taken. So the olde Fathers being troubled with contending againſt falſe doctrines, were compelled to ſhew their meanings in exquiſite plainneſſe, leaſt they ſhould leaue any crooked by-waies to the wicked, to whom the doubtfull conſtructions of wordes were hiding holes of errours. Arrius confeſſed Chriſt to be God, and the ſonne of God, becauſe he could not gainſay the euident words of God, and as if he had beene ſo ſufficiently diſcharged, did fainge a certaine conſent with the reſt. But in the meane while he ceaſed not to ſcatter abroade that Chriſt was creat, and had a beginning as other creatures. But to the end they might draw foorth his winding ſubtiltie out of his den, the auncient Fathers went further, pronouncing Chriſt to be the eternall ſonne of the Father and conſubſtantiall with the Father. Heereat wickednеſſe began to boyle, when the Arrians began to hate and deteſt the name Omoouſion, conſubſtantiall. But if in the beginning they had ſincerely and with plaine meaning confeſſed Chriſt to be God, they would not now haue denied him to be consubstantiall with the Father. Who dare now blame these good men as braulers and contentious, because for one little words sake, they were so hot in disputation, and troubled the quiet of the Church? But that little word shewed the difference betweene the true beleeuing Christians, and the Arrians that were robbers of God. Afterward rose vp Sabellius which accounted in a maner for nothing the names of the Father, the Sonne, and Holy Ghost, saying in disputation that they were not made to shew any maner of distinction, but onely were seuerall additions of God, of which sort there are many. If he came to disputation, he confessed, that he beleeued the Father God, the Sonne God, the Holy Ghost God. But afterward he would readily slip away with saying, that he had in no otherwise spoken than as if he had named God, a strong God, iust God, and wise God: and so he sung another song, that the Father is the Sonne, and the holy Ghost is the Father, without any order, without any distinction. The good Doctors which then had care of godlines, to subdue his wickednesse, cryed out on the other side that there ought to be acknowledged in one God three properties? and to the ende to fense themselues against the crooked writhen subtleties with plaine and simple truth, they affirmed, that there did truely subsist in one God, or (which came all to one effect) that there did subsist in the vnitie of God a Trinitie of persons.

The wordes which haue been in this case deuised for opening of the truth, so that the thinges themselues be agreed vpon, are neither ouer stiffely to be vrged, nor too warwardly to be refused.

5 If then the names haue not been without cause inuented, we ought to take heede, that in reiecting them we be not iustly blamed of proud presumptuousnesse. I would to God they were buried indeede, so that this faith were agreede of all men that the Father and the Sonne, and the holy Ghost be one God: and yet that the Father is not the Sonne, nor the holy Ghost the Sonne, but distinct by certaine propertie. Yet am I not so precise, that I can finde in my hart to striue for bare words. For I note, that the olde Fathers, which otherwise speake very religiously of such matters, did not euery where agree one with another, nor euery one with himselfe. For what formes of speech vsed by the Councels doth Hilary excuse? To how great libertie doth Augustine sometime breake foorth? How vnlike are the Greekes to the Latines? But of this variance one example shall suffice for this time. When the Latins ment to expresse the word Omoousion, they called it Consubstantiall, declaring the substance of the Father and the Sonne to be one, so vsing the word substance for essence. Whereupon Hierome to Damasus saith, it is sacrilege to say, that there are three substances in God: and yet aboue an hundred times you shall finde in Hilary, that there are three substances in God. In the word Hypostasis, how is Hierome accombred? For he suspecteth that there lurketh poyson in naming three Hypostases in God. And if a man doe vse this word in a godly sense, yet he plainly saith that it is an improper speech, if he spake vnfainedly, and did not rather wittingly and willingly seeke to charge the Bishops of the Eastlands, whom he sought to charge with an vniust sclander. Sure this one thing he speaketh not very truely, that in all prophane schooles, Ousia, essence is nothing else but Hypostasis, which is prooued false by the common and accustomed vse. Augustine is more modest and gentle, which although he say, that the word Hypostasis in that sense is strange to Latine eares, yet so farre is it off, that he taketh from the Greekes their vsuall maner of speaking, that he also gently beareth with the Latines that had followed the Greeke phrase. And that which Socrates writeth in the sixt booke of the Tripartite historie, tendeth to this ende, as though he ment that he had by vnskilfull men beene wrongfully applied vnto this matter. Yea and the same Hillarie himselfe layeth it for a great fault to the heretikes charge, that by their waiwardnesse he is compelled, to put those things in perill of the speech of men, which ought to haue beene kept in religiousnes of minds, plainly confessing that this is to doe things vnlawfull, to speake that ought not to be spoken, to atttempt things not licenced. A little after, he excuseth himselfe with many words, for that he was so bolde to vtter new names. For after he had vsed the naturall names Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost, he addeth that whatsoeuer is sought further, is beyond the compasse of speech, beyonde the reach of sense, and beyonde the capacitie of vnderstanding. And in another place he saith, that happy are the Bishops of Gallia, which neither had, nor receiued, nor knew any other confession, but that olde and simple one, which from the time of the Apostles was receiued in all Churches. And much like is the excuse of Augustine, that this word was wrung out of neceſſitie by reaſon of the imperfection of mens language in ſo great a matter: not to expreſſe that which is, but that it ſhould not be vnſpoken how the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghoſt are three. This modeſtie of the holy men ought to warne vs, that we doe not foorthwith ſo ſeuerely, like Cenſors, note them with infamie that refuſe to ſubſcribe and ſweare to ſuch words as we propound them: ſo that they doe it not of pride, of frowardneſſe, or of malicious craft. But let them againe conſider, by how great neceſſitie we are driuen to ſpeake ſo, that by little and little they may be enured with that profitable manner of ſpeech. Let them alſo learne to beware, leſt ſith we muſt meete on the one ſide with the Arrians, on the other ſide with Sabellians, while they be offended that we cut off occaſion from them both to cauill, they bring themſelues in ſuſpition, that they be the diſciples either of Arrius or of Sabellius. Arrius ſaith that Chriſt is God, but he muttereth that he was created, and had a beginning. He ſaith Chriſt is one with the Father, but ſecretly he whiſpereth in the eares of his diſciples, that he was made one as the other faithfull be, although by ſingular prerogatiue. Say once that Chriſt is Conſubſtantiall with his Father, then plucke you off his viſour from the diſſembler, and yet you adde nothing to the Scripture. Sabellius ſaith, that the ſeuerall names, Father, Sonne, and holy Ghoſt, ſignifie nothing in God ſeuerally diſtinct: ſay that they are three: and he will cry out that you name three Gods. Say that there is in one eſſence a Trinitie of perſons, then ſhall you in one word both ſay what the Scripture ſpeaketh, and ſtop their vaine babling. Now if any be holden with ſo curious ſuperſtition, that they cannot abide theſe names: yet is there no man, though he would neuer ſo faine, that can deny but that when we heare of one, we muſt vnderſtand an vnitie of ſubſtance: when we heare of three in one eſſence, that it is ment of the perſons of the Trinitie. Which thing being without fraud confeſſed, we ſtay no longer vpon words. But I haue long ago found, and that often, that whoſoeuer doe obſtinately quarrell about words, doe keepe within them a ſecret poyſon: ſo that it is better willingly to prouoke them, than for their pleaſure to ſpeake darkly.

The eſſence of God is one ſimple and ſingle thing, wherein there are three ſubſiſtences, eth differing from the other, hauing ſome incommunicable propertie.

6 But leauing diſputation of words, I will now begin to ſpeake of the matter it ſelfe. I call therefore a Perſon, a ſubſiſtence in the eſſence of God, which hauing relation to the other is diſtinguiſhed from them with vncommunicable propertie. By the name of the ſubſiſtence we meane another thing than the eſſence. For if the word had ſimply been God, and in the meane time had nothing ſeuerally proper to it ſelfe, Iohn had ſaid amiſſe that it was with God. Where he foorthwith addeth, that God himſelfe was the ſame word, he calleth vs backe againe to the one ſingle eſſence. But becauſe it could not be with God, but that it muſt reſt in the Father: hereof ariſeth that Subſiſtence, which though it be ioyned to the eſſence with an vnſeparable knot, yet hath it a ſpeciall marke, whereby it doth differ from it. So of the three ſubſiſtenſes, I ſay, that each hauing relation to other, is in propertie diſtinguiſhed. Relation is here expreſly mentioned. For when there is ſimple and indefinite mention made of God, this name belongeth no leſſe to the Sonne and the holy Ghoſt, than to the Father. But when the Father is compared with the Sonne, the ſeuerall propertie of either doth diſcerne him from the other. Thirdly, whatſoeuer is proper vnto euery of them is vncommunicable. For that which is giuen to the Father for a marke of difference, cannot agree with, nor be giuen to the Sonne. And I miſlike not the definition of Tertullian, ſo that it be rightly taken, That there is in God a certaine diſpoſition or diſtribution, which yet changeth nothing of the vnitie of the eſſence.

Lib. contra Praxeam.

7 But before that I goe any further, it is good that I prooue the Godhead of the Sonne and of the holy Ghoſt. Then after we ſhall ſee, how they differ one from another. Surely when the word of God is ſpoken of in the Scripture: it were a very great abſurditie to imagine it onely a fading and vaniſhing voice, which ſent into the aire, commeth out of God himſelfe, of which ſort were the oracles giuen to the fathers, and all the prophecies: when rather the word is ment to be the perpetuall wiſedome abiding with the Father, from whence all the oracles and prophecies proceeded. For as Peter teſtifieth, no leſſe did the olde Prophets ſpeake with the ſpirit of Chriſt, than did the Apoſtles and all they that after them did diſtribute the heauenly doctrine. But becauſe Chriſt was not yet openly ſhewed, we muſt vnderſtand that the Word was before

The word whereof in Scripture it is ſaid that the ſpirit was of it, the world made and ſuſtained by it, that it was begotten of God before the worldes, that it worketh with before all worlds begotten of the Father. And if the Spirit was of the Word, whose instruments were the Prophets, we doe vndoubtedly gather that he was true God. And this doth Moses teach plainly enough in the creation of the world, when he setteth the word as the meane. For why doth he expresly tell, that God in creating of all his works said, Be this done: or that done: but that the vnsearchable glory of God may shiningly appeare in his images? The subtle-nosed and babling men doe easily mocke out this, with saying that the name Word, is there taken for his bidding or commandement. But better expositors are the Apostles, which teach that the worlds were made by the same, and that he susteineth them all with his mightie Word. For here we see that the word is taken for the bidding or commandement of the Sonne, which is himselfe the eternall and essentiall Word to the Father. And to the wise and sober it is not darke that Salomon saith, where he bringeth in wisedome begotten of God before all worlds, and bearing rule in the creation of things, and in all the works of God. For to say that it was a certaine commandement of God, seruing but for a time, were very foolish and vaine: whereas indeede it was Gods pleasure at that time to shew foorth his stedfast and eternall purpose, yea and some thing more secret. To which intent also maketh that saying of Christ: My Father and I doe worke euen to this day. For in saying: That from the beginning of the world he was continually working with his Father, he doth more openly declare that which Moses had more shortly touched. We gather then that the meaning of Gods speaking was this, that the Word had his office in the doing of things, and so they both had a common working togither. But most plainely of all doth Iohn speake, when he sheweth that the same Word, which from the beginning was God with God, was together with God the Father the cause of all things. For he both giueth to the Word a perfect and abiding essence, and also assigneth vnto it some thing peculiar to it selfe, and plainely sheweth how God in speaking was the creator of the world. Therefore as all reuelations proceeding from God doe well beare the name of the word of God, so ought we yet to set in the highest place that substantiall Word, the welspring of all Oracles, which being subiect to no alteration, abideth alwaies one and the selfesame with God, and is God himselfe.

the father, that it is the cause of all things, is no sounding voice, but that essentiall word which is the sonne of God, the true and very God himselfe.

8 Here many dogges doe barke against vs, which when they dare not openly take from him his Godhead, doe secretly steale from him his eternitie. For they say, that the Word then began first to be, when GOD in the creation of the world opened his holy mouth. But very vndiscreetly doe they to imagine a certaine innouation of the substance of God. For as those names of God that haue relation to his outward worke, began to be giuen vnto him after the beginning of his worke, as for example, this that he is called the creator of heauen and earth: so doth Godlinesse know or admit no name that should signifie any new thing in himselfe to haue chaunced vnto God. For if any should come to him from elsewhere than in himselfe, then this saying of Iames should faile, that euery good giuing and euery perfect gift is from aboue, and commeth downe from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableneſse, neither shadowing by turning. Therfore nothing is lesse to be suffered, then to faigne a beginning of that Word, which both alwaies was God, & afterward was Creator of the World. But full subtlely forsooth they reason, that Moses in saying that God then first spake, doth secretly shew, that there was no word in him before. Which is a most trifling argument. For it followeth not, because a thing at some one certaine time beginneth to be shewed openly, that therefore it had neuer any being before. But I conclude farre otherwise and say: seeing that in the same moment that God said, Let light be made, the power of the word appeared and shewed it selfe: the same Word was long before: but if a man aske how long before, he shall finde no beginning. For he appointed no certaine space of time when himselfe said: Father, glorifie me with the glory which I had with thee before the World was. And this thing Iohn also left not vntouched, because he first sheweth that in the beginning the Word was with God, before that he commeth to the creation of the world. We say therefore againe, that the Word which was conceiued of God before any beginning of time, was continually remaining with him. Whereby both his eternitie, true essence, and Godhead is proued.

The word in the beginning of things began to shew it selfe, but was before any thing began, and was it selfe without beginning.

9 Although I doe not yet touch the person of the Mediator, but doe defer it to that

The places of ſcripture which proue Chriſt to be God, and the ſhifts which the Iewes haue vſed about them.

that place where we ſhall ſpecially intreat of the redemption: yet becauſe it ought to be certeinely holden without controuerſie among all men, that Chriſt is the ſame Word clad with fleſh, in this place it wil be very fit to recite all thoſe teſtimonies that proone Chriſt to be God. When it is ſaid in the xlv. Pſalme, thy throne O God is for euer and euer: the Iewes doe cauill and ſay, that the name Elohim is alſo applied to the Angels and ſoueraigne powers. But in all the Scripture there is not a like place, that raiſeth an eternall throne to any creature. For he is heere not ſimply called God, but alſo the eternall Lord. Againe, this title is giuen to none but with an addition, as it is ſaid: that Moſes ſhall be for a God to Pharao. Some reade it in the Genitiue caſe which is very fooliſh. I graunt indeede that oftentimes a thing is called Diuine or of God, that is notable by any ſingular excellence: but heere by the tenour of the text it appeareth, that ſuch a meaning were hard and forced, and will not agree. But if their ſtubbornesſe wil not ſo yeeld: In Eſay is very plainely brought in for all one both Chriſt and God, and he that is adorned with the ſoueraigne power, which is properly belonging to God alone. This (ſaith he) is the name whereby they ſhall call him, the ſtrong God, the Father of the World to come, &c. Heere the Iewes barke againe, and turne the text thus: this is the name whereby the ſtrong God the father of the world to come ſhall call him: ſo that they leaue this onely to the Sonne to be called the Prince of peace. But to what purpoſe ſhould ſo many names of addition in this place be heaped vpon God the Father, ſeeing it is the purpoſe of the Prophet to adorne Chriſt with ſuch ſpeciall notes as may build our faith vpon him? Wherefore it is out of doubt that he is heere in like ſort called the ſtrong God, as he is a litle before called Immanuel. But nothing can be found plainer then that place of Hieremy, where he ſaieth, that this ſhall be the name whereby the ſeed of Dauid ſhal be called Iehouah our righteouſneſſe. For where the Iewes themſelues doe teach, that all other names of God are but adiectiue names of addition, and that this onely name Iehouah which they call vnſpeakable is a ſubſtantiue name to expreſſe his eſſence: we gather that the Sonne is the onely and eternall God, which ſaith in another place that he will not giue his glorie to another. But heere alſo they ſeeke to ſcape away becauſe that Moſes gaue that name to the Altar that he builded: and Ezechiel gaue it to the new citie Hieruſalem. But who doth not ſee that the Altar was builded for a monument that God was the auancement of Moſes, and that Hieruſalem is not adorned with the name of God, but onely to teſtifie the preſence of God? For thus ſaith the Prophet: The name of the citie from that day ſhall be Iehouah there. And Moſes ſaith thus: He builded an Altar and called the name of it, Iehouah my exaltation. But more buſines ariſeth by another place of Hieremie, where the ſame title is applied to Hieruſalem in theſe words: this is the name whereby they ſhall call her Iehouah our righteouſnes. But this teſtimonie is ſo farre from making againſt the truth which wee defend, that it rather confirmeth it. For whereas he had before teſtified that Chriſt is the true Iehouah from whom floweth righteouſnes, now he pronounceth that the Church ſhall ſo verily feele the ſame, that ſhe may glorioufſlie vſe the very name it ſelfe. And ſo in the firſt place is ſet the fountaine and cauſe of righteouſnes, in the other the effect.

Iere.33.16.

The word communicating it ſelf with men, tooke the office and name of an Angell, yet ſtill ſhewed it ſelfe to be the God of vnſpeakable glorie.

10 Now if this doe not ſatisfie the Iewes, that Iehouah is ſo often preſented in the perſon of an Angell, I ſee not with what cauillations they can mock it out. It is ſaid, that the Angell appeared to the holy fathers: and the ſame Angell challengeth to himſelfe the name of the eternall God. If any take exception and ſay, that this is ſpoken in reſpect of the perſon that he repreſenteth: this knot is not thus looſed. For being a ſeruant he would not ſuffer Sacrifice to be offered to him and take from God his due honour. But the Angell refuſing to eate bread, commaundeth Sacrifice to be offered to Iehouah. And then he prooueth that himſelfe indeed was the ſame Iehouah, and therefore Manoah and his wife by this token did gather, that they had ſeene not onely an Angell but God. And thence came it that he ſaid we ſhall die becauſe we haue ſeene God. And when his wife anſwereth, if Iehouah would haue ſlaine vs, he would not haue receiued Sacrifice at our hands: in this ſhe doth confeſſe that he was God which before was called the Angell. Beſide this, the anſwere of the Angell himſelfe taketh away all doubt of it, ſaying: why doeſt thou aske me of my name, which is maruellous? So much much the more detestable was the wickednesse of Servetto, when he affirmed that God neuer appeared to Abraham and the other fathers, but that an Angell was worshipped in place of him. But truely and wisely haue the true teaching doctours of the Church expounded, that the same principal Angel was the Word of God, which then as aforehand began to execute the office of mediatour. For though he was not yet clothed with flesh, yet he came downe as a meane betweene God and men, to come more familiarly to the faithfull. Therefore his nye communicating himselfe made him to be called an Angell: yet still in the meane time he retained that which was his owne, to be the God of vnspeakable glorie. The same thing meaneth Osee, which after he had recited the wrastling of Iacob with the Angell, saith: Iehouah the God of hostes, Iehouah, worthie of memorie is his name. Heere againe Servetto carpeth, that God did beare the person of an Angell. As though the Prophet did not confirme that which Moses had said: Why doest thou aske me of my name? And the confession of the holy Patriarch doth sufficiently declare that he was not a created Angell, but one in whom the full Godhead was resident, when he said: I haue seene God face to face. And for this cause Paul saith, that Christ was guide of the people in the wildernesse. For though the time was not yet come of his abasement: yet that eternall word shewed a figure of that office to which he was appointed. Now if the second Chapter of Zacharie be wayed without contention, the Angell that sent another Angell was by and by pronounced to be the God of hostes, and to him is soueraigne power ascribed. I omit innumerable testimonies on the which our faith safely resteth, although they doe not much moue the Iewes. For when it is said in Esay: Behold, this is our God, this is Iehouah, we shall wait vpon him, and he shall saue vs, they that haue eies may see, that herein is ment God which raiseth vp for the saluation of his people. And these vehement demonstrations twise repeated suffer it to be drawen no otherwhere but to Christ. And yet plainer and fuller is the place of Malachie, where he promiseth that he shal come, the Lord that was then desired, to his owne temple. But to none but to the only soueraigne God was the temple dedicate, which temple yet the Prophet doth claime for Christ, whereupon followeth, that Christ is the same God that was euer honored among the Iewes.

The Godhead of Christ plainly auouched in the New Testament.

11 As for the new Testament, it swarmeth with innumerable testimonies, therefore we must trauell rather shortly, to choose out few, than largely to heape vp all. For though the Apostles speake of him since he was now become the Mediatour in flesh: yet all that I shall bring foorth shall aptly serue to prooue his Godhead. First, this is worthie to be singularly marked, that those things which were before spoken touching the eternall God, the Apostles do shew that they are either alreadie performed, or hereafter to be performed in Christ. For where Esay prophecieth that the Lord of hostes shall be to the Iewes & Israelites a stumbling stone & a rock to fall vpon: Paul affirmeth that the same is fulfilled in Christ. Therefore he declareth him to be the Lord of hostes. Likewise in another place, We must all (saith he) once be brought to appeare before the iudgement throne of Christ. For it is written, to me shall all knees bow, and to me shall all toongs sweare. Seeing God in Esay speaketh this thing of himself, and Christ in deed performeth it in himselfe, it followeth that he is the selfesame God, whose glorie may not be withdrawen to another. And that thing which writing to the Ephesians he alleageth out of the Psalmes, is euident that it can be applied to none but to God alone. Ascending on hie he hath caried captiuitie captiue, meaning that such ascending was in shadow shewed, when God in notable victorie against foreine nations did shew foorth his power, but he declareth that in Christ it was more fully performed. So Iohn testifieth that it was the glorie of the Sonne that was reuealed to Esay by a vision, whereas indeed the Prophet himself writeth that the maiesty of God appeared vnto him. And it is euident that those things which the Apostle writing to the Hebrues applieth to the Sonne, are the plaine titles of God: as, Thou Lord in the beginning didst lay the foundations of heauen & earth, &c. Againe, worship him all ye his Angels. And yet he abuseth not those titles when he draweth them to Christ. For all those things that are spoken of in those Psalmes, he himselfe alone hath fulfilled. For it was he that rose vp and had mercie of Sion. It was he that claimed to himselfe the kingdome of all the nations and Ilands. And why should Iohn sticke to apply the maiestie of God to Christ, which in his preface had ſaid that the word was alway God? Why ſhould Paul feare to ſet Chriſt in the iudgement throne of God, hauing before with ſo open proclamation declared his Godhead, where he ſaied that he was God bleſſed to the end of worlds? And to make appeare, how well he agreeth in this point with himſelfe, in another place he writeth that Chriſt is God openly ſhewed in the fleſh. If he be God to be praiſed to the end of worlds, then he is the ſame to whom in another place he affirmeth all glorie and honour to be due. And thus he hideth not, but plainly cryeth out, that he would haue counted it no robberie, if he had ſhewed himſelfe equall with God, but that he willingly abaſed himſelfe. And that the wicked ſhould not carpe that he is ſome made God, Iohn goeth further and ſaith: He is the true God and the eternall life. Although it ought aboundantly to ſatisfie vs, that he is called God, ſpecially of that witneſſe which expreſly affirmeth vnto vs, that there are no more Gods but one. That ſame witnes is Paul, which ſaith thus: How many ſoeuer be called Gods, either in heauen or in earth, to vs there is but one God from whom are all things. When we heare of the ſame mouth, that God was openly ſhewed in the fleſh, that God with his owne bloud purchaſed the Church vnto himſelfe: why ſhould we imagine a ſecond God which he himſelfe acknowledgeth not? And it is no doubt that all the godly were of the ſame meaning. Likewiſe Thomas in proteſting him to be his Lord and his God, doth profeſſe that he is that onely one God whom he had alwaies worſhipped.

12 *Now if we eſteeme his Godhead by the works that in the Scripture are aſcribed vnto him, it ſhall thereby more euidently appeare. For when he ſaid that from the beginning he was thitherto working with his Father: the Iewes which were moſt dull in vnderſtanding of all his other ſayings, yet then perceiued that he tooke vpon him the power of God. And therefore as Iohn telleth, they ſought the more to kill him, becauſe he did not onely breake the Sabboth, but alſo did call God his Father, making himſelfe equall with God. How dull ſhall we be then, if we doe not perceiue that his Godhead is herein plainely affirmed? And truely to order the world with prouidence and power, and to gouerne all things with the authority of his owne might, which the Apoſtle aſcribeth vnto him, belongeth to none but onely to the creator. And he not onely enterparteneth the gouerment of the world with his Father, but alſo all other offices which cannot be made common to God with his creatures. The Lord cryeth out by the Prophet: I am he, I am he, that doe away thine offences for mine owne ſake. According to the meaning of this ſentence, when the Iewes thought that wrong was done to God for that Chriſt did forgiue ſinnes, Chriſt not onely affirmed in words, but alſo prooued by miracle that this power belonged vnto himſelfe. We ſee therefore that he hath, not the miniſtration, but the power of forgiueneſſe of ſinnes, which the Lord ſaith he will not ſuffer to paſſe away from himſelfe to any. What ſhall we ſay of ſearching, and pearſing the ſecret thoughts of hearts? is it not the propertie of God alone? But the ſame had Chriſt: whereby is gathered that he is God.

Iohn 5.17. Heb.1.3. Eſa.43.25. Mat.9.6. Mat.9.4.

13 *Now in his miracles how plainly and clearely doth he appeare? And though I graunt that as well the Prophets as the Apoſtles did equall and like miracles to theſe that he did: yet this great difference is there, that they by their miniſtration diſpoſed the gifts of God, he ſhewed foorth his owne power. He vſed ſometime prayer, to the end to giue glory vnto his Father. But we ſee for the moſt part his owne power ſhewed vnto vs. And how could it otherwiſe be but that he was the very authour of miracles that by his owne authoritie gaue power to other to deale miracles abroad? For the Euangeliſt declareth that he gaue power to the Apoſtles to raiſe vp the dead, to heale the leprous, to caſt out deuils, &c. And they ſo vſed the miniſtration thereof, that they ſufficiently ſhewed that this power came not from elſewhere but from Chriſt. In the name of Ieſus Chriſt (ſaith Peter) riſe and walke. It is therefore no marueile if Chriſt alledged his miracles to confound the vnbeleeuingneſſe of the Iewes: foraſmuch as they were ſuch as being done by his owne power, did giue a moſt plaine teſtimonie of his Godhead. If elſewhere then in God there is no ſaluation, no righteouſneſſe, no life: and Chriſt conteineth all theſe things in him, ſurely he is thereby declared to be God. And no man can obiect againſt me and ſay, that life and ſaluation is powred into him by God: for it is not ſayd that he receiued ſaluation, but that he is ſaluation himſelfe. And if none be good but onely God: how can he be onely man, being I will not ſay good and iuſt, but ſelfe goodnes and iuſtice? Yea, from the firſt beginning of the creation as the Euangeliſt witneſſeth, in him was life: and he euen then being life was the light of men. Wherefore being ſupported with ſuch prooues we are bold to repoſe our faith and hope in him: when yet we know that it is an vngodlineſſe that robbeth God for any man to faſten his confidence in creatures. Beleeue yee in God? ſaith he. Beleeue then alſo in me. And ſo doth Paul expound thoſe two places of Eſay, Whoſoeuer truſteth in him, ſhall not be put to ſhame. Againe, Out of the roote of Iſay ſhall he come that ſhall riſe to rule peoples, in him the nations ſhall truſt. And why ſhould we ſeeke out more teſtimonies of Scripture for this matter, when we ſo often meete with this ſentence? He that beleeueth in me hath eternall life. Moreouer the inuocation which hangeth vpon faith belongeth alſo to him, which yet is proper to the maieſtie of God, if he haue any thing at all proper to himſelfe. For one Prophet ſayeth: Whoſoeuer calleth vpon the name of Iehouah ſhall be ſaued: and another ſayeth, a moſt ſtrong toure is the name of Iehouah: to it the righteous ſhall flee and hee ſhall be ſaued, but the name of Chriſt is called vpon for ſaluation: it followeth therefore that he is Iehouah. As for inuocation, we haue an example of it in Stephen, when he ſayeth, Lord Ieſu receiue my ſpirit. Againe, in the whole Church, as Ananias teſtifieth in the ſame booke. Lord (ſayeth he) thou knoweſt how great euils this man hath done to thy Saints that call vpon thy name. And that it may be more plainely vnderſtanded, that the whole fulneſſe of the Godhead doth corporally dwell in Chriſt, the Apoſtle doth confeſſe that he brought no other doctrine among the Corinthians but the knowledge of him, and that he preached no other thing but that knowledge. What, I pray you, and how great a thing is this, that the name of the Sonne onely is preached vnto vs, whom he willeth to glorie in the knowledge of himſelfe alone? Who dare ſay, that he is but a creature, of whom the onely knowledge is our whole glorie? Beſide that, the ſalutations ſet before the Epiſtles of Paul, with the ſame benefites from the Sonne which they doe from the Father: whereby wee are taught not onely that thoſe things which the Father giueth vs doe come vnto vs by his interceſſion, but alſo by communitie of power, he is the authour of them. Which knowledge by practiſe is without doubt more certaine and perfect than any idle ſpeculation. For there the godly minde doth behold God moſt preſent, and in manner handle him, where it feeleth it ſelfe to be quickened, lightned, ſaued, iuſtified, and ſanctified.

14 Wherefore out of the ſame fountaines we muſt fetch our meane of prouing to confirme the Godhead of the Holy ghoſt. Very plaine is the teſtimonie of Moſes in the hiſtory of the creation, that the ſpirit of God was vpon the depths, or vpon the vnfaſhioned heape: becauſe he ſheweth that not onely the beautie of the world that is now to be ſeene is preſerued by the power of the Spirit, but ere this beautie was added, the Spirit was then buſied in preſeruing that confuſed lump of things. And that ſaying of Eſay cannot be cauilled againſt, And now Iehouah and his Spirit hath ſent me. For he communicateth with the Holy ghoſt his chiefe power in ſending of Prophets. Whereby appeareth the diuine maieſtie of the Holy ghoſt. But our beſt prooſe, as I haue ſaid, ſhall be by familiar vſe. For that which the Scriptures impute vnto it, is farre from the propertie of creatures, and ſuch a thing as we our ſelues doe learne by aſſured experience of godlineſſe. For he it is that being each where poured abroad, doth ſuſtaine and giueth growing and life to all things in heauen and in earth. And by this point he is prooued to be none of the number of creatures, for that he is not comprehended within any bounds: but by pouring his liuely force into all things to breath into them life and motion, this is the very worke of God. Moreouer, if regeneration into an incorruptible life be better and more excellent than any preſent quickning: what ſhall we iudge of him from whoſe power the ſame proceedeth? And that he is the author of regeneration, not by a borrowed, but by his owne force, the Scripture in many places teacheth: and not of that onely, but alſo of the immortalitie to come. Finally, as vnto the Sonne, ſo vnto him alſo are applied all thoſe offices that are moſt of all properly belonging to the Godhead. For he ſearcheth the deepe ſecrets of God, wherewith none of of all the creatures is of counsell. He giueth wisedome and skill to speake, whereas yet the Lord pronounceth to Moses that it is onely his worke to doe it. So by him we come to a partaking of God, so that we may feele his power as it were working life in vs. Our iustification is his worke. From him is power, sanctification, trueth, grace, and what good thing soeuer may be thought of, because it is the holy Ghost onely from whom proceedeth all kinde of gifts. For that sentence of Paul is right woorthy to be noted. Although there be diuers gifts, and manifolde and sundrie is the distribution of them, yet is there but one holy Spirit: because he maketh him not onely the originall and beginning, but also the author. Which a litle after is more plainely expressed in these words. One and the same spirit distributeth all things as he will. For if he were not something subsisting in God, he would not attribute vnto him choise of mind and will. Therefore most euidently doth Paul giue to the holy Ghost diuine power, and sheweth that he is substantially resident in God.

Exod.4.11.

1.Cor.12.11.

The holy Ghost in Scripture plainlie termed God.

15 And the Scripture it selfe, when it speaketh of him, forbeareth not the name of God. For Paul hereby gathered that we are the temple of God, because his spirit dwelleth in vs: which thing is not lightly to be passed ouer. For whereas God so often promiseth that he will choose vs for a temple to himselfe, that promise is no other way fulfilled, but by his spirit dwelling in vs. Surely, as Augustine very well saith: if we were commanded to make vnto the holy Ghost a temple of timber and stone because such worship is due to God onely, it were a cleere argument that he is God: now therefore how much cleerer is this, that we ought not to make a temple, but our selues to be a temple for him? And the Apostle himselfe, calleth vs sometime the temple of God, sometime the temple of the holy Ghost, both in one meaning. And Peter reprehending Ananias for that he had lied to the holy Ghost, said that he lied not vnto men but vnto God. And where Esay bringeth in the Lord of hostes speaking, Paul teacheth that it is the holy Ghost that speaketh. Yea, where comonly the Prophets say, that the words which they vtter are the words of the Lord of hostes, Christ and the Apostles doe referre them to the holy Ghost. Whereby it followeth that he is the true Iehouah, that is the chiefe authour of prophecies. Againe, where God complaineth that he was prouoked to wrath by the stubburnesse of his people, in steed of that Esay saith that his holy spirit was grieued. Last of all, if blasphemie against the holy Ghost be not forgiuen in this world nor in the world to come, whereas he may obtain pardon that hath blasphemed against the Sonne: his diuine maiestie is hereby plainly prooued, the offence or diminishment whereof is an vnpardonable crime. I doe wittingly and of purpose omit many testimonies that the ancient writers haue vsed. They haue thought it a maruellous meete place to alleage out of Dauid: with the word of the Lord the heauens were established, and all the power of them with the spirit of his mouth, to proue that the world was no lesse the worke of the holy Ghost than of the Sonne. But forasmuch as it is commonly vsed in the Psalmes to repeate one thing twise: and in Esay, the spirit of his mouth is as much to say as his word, that reason is very weake. Therefore I thought good to touch a few such things as godly minds might soundly rest vpon.

Esay 11.4.

In the Trinitie of persons the vnitie of God is proued by this, that there is but one faith, and one baptisme.

16 And as God hath more plainly disclosed himselfe by the comming of Christ, so is he also in the three persons become more familiarly knowne. But of all the testimonies let this one suffice vs for this present. Paul so knitteth these three together, God, Faith, and Baptisme, that he reasoneth from the one to the other in this maner. Because there is but one Faith, he thereby sheweth that there is but one God. And because there is but one God, he thereby prooueth that there is but one Faith. Therefore if we be entred into the faith and religion of one God by Baptisme: we must needs thinke him the true God in whose name we are baptised: And it is not to be doubted, but that in this solemne protestation, Christ ment to testifie that the perfect light of faith was alreadie deliuered, when he said: Baptise them in the name of the Father and of the Sonne and of the holie Ghost. For it is as much in effect as to be baptised in the name of one God, which with perfect brightnesse hath appeared in the Father, the Sonne, and the holie Ghost. Wherby is euident that in the essence of God abide three persons, in which the one God is knowen. And surely, forasmuch as our faith ought not to looke hither and thither, nor diuersly to wander about, but to haue regard to the one God, to be applied to him, and to sticke fast in him: it is hereby easily prooued, that if there be diuers kindes of Faith, there must also be many Gods. Now whereas Baptisme is a Sacrament of Faith: it prooueth vnto vs the vnitie of God, because it is but one. And heereof also followeth, that it is not lawfull to be baptised but into one God, because we embrace the faith of him, into whose name we are baptised. What ment Christ then, when he commanded to be baptised, in the name of the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost, but that we ought with one faith to beleeue in the Father, Sonne, and the Holie Ghost? Therefore sith this remaineth certaine, that there is but one God, and not many, we determine that the Worde and the Spirit are nothing else but the very selfe essence of God. And very foolishly did the Arrians prate, which confessing the Godhead of the Sonne, did take from him the substance of God. And such a like rage vexed the Macedonians, who would haue to be vnderstood by the Spirit, onely the gifts of grace that are powred foorth into men. For as wisedome, vnderstanding, prudence, fortitude, feare of God doe proceede from him: so he onely is the spirit of wisedome, prudence, fortitude, and godlinesse. Yet is not he deuided according to the distribution of his graces: but howsoeuer they be diuersly dealt abroad, yet he remaineth one and the same, as the Apostle saith. 1. Cor. 12. 11.

The sonne distinguished from the father, and the spirit from them both.

17 Againe, there is shewed in the Scriptures a certaine distinction of the Father, from the Worde, and of the Worde from the Spirit. In discussing whereof, how great religiousnesse and sobrietie we ought to vse, the greatnesse of misterie it selfe doth admonish vs. And I verie well like that saying of Gregorie Nazianzene: I cannot thinke vpon the one, but by and by I am compassed about with the brightnesse of the three: And I cannot seuerally discerne the three, but I am suddenly driuen backe to one. Wherefore let it not come in our mindes once to imagine such a Trinitie of Persons as may holde our thought withdrawen into seueralities, and doth not foorthwith bring vs againe to that vnitie. The names of Father, Sonne, and holie Ghost, doe prooue a true distinction, that no man should thinke them to be bare names of addition, whereby God according to his workes is diuersly entituled: but yet it is a distinction, not a diuision. The places that we haue already cited, doe shew that the Sonne hath a propertie distinct from the Father, because the Worde had not bene with God, if he had not beene another thing than the Father: neither had he had his glorie with the Father but being distinct from him. Likewise he doth distinguish himselfe from the Father, when he saith, that there is another which beareth him witnesse. And for this purpose maketh that which in another place is said, that the Father created all things by the Word, which he could not, but being after a certaine manner distinct from him. Moreouer, the Father came not downe into the earth, but he that came out from the Father. The Father died not, nor rose againe, but he that was sent by him. Neither yet did this distinction begin at the taking of the flesh: but it is manifest that he was also before, the onely begotten in the bosome of the Father. For who can abide to say, that then the Sonne entered into the bosome of the Father, when he descended from heauen to take manhood vpon him? He was therefore before in the bosome of the Father, and enjoyed his glorie with the Father. As for the distinction of the Holy Ghost from the Father, Christ speaketh of it when he saith, that it proceedeth from the Father. And how oft doth he shew it to be another beside himselfe? as when he promiseth that he will send another comforter, and often in other places.

Iohn 1. 18.

Ioh. 14. 6. 15. 26.

Iohn 14. 16.

18 But to borrow similitudes from matters of men, to expresse the force of this distinction, I know not whether it be expedient. Indeed the olde fathers are wont soe to doe sometime: but withall they doe confesse, that whatsoeuer they bring forth for like, doth much differ. For which cause I am much afraid to be any way bold, least if I bring forth any thing vnfitly, it should giue occasion either to the malicious to cauill, or to the vnskilfull to be deceiued. Yet such distinction as we haue marked to be set out in Scriptures, it is not good to haue left vnspoken. And that is this, that to the Father is giuen the beginning of working, the fountaine and spring of all things: to the Sonne wisedome, counsell, and the very disposition in the dooing of things: to the holy Ghost is assigned power and effectuall working. And although eternitie belong vnto the Father, and eternitie to the Sonne and to the Holy Ghost also, for as much as God could neuer haue beene without his wiſedome and power, and in eternitie is not to be ſought, which was firſt or laſt: yet this obſeruation of order is not vaine or ſuperfluous, wherein the Father is reckoned firſt, and then of him the Sonne, and after of them both the holie Ghoſt. For euery mans minde of it ſelfe enclineth to this, firſt to conſider God, then the wiſedome riſing out of him, and laſt of all the power wherewith he putteth the decrees of his purpoſe in execution. In what ſort the Sonne is ſaid to be of the Father onely, and the holie Ghoſt both of the Father and the Sonne, is ſhewed in many places, but no where more plainly than in the viij. Chapter to the Romanes, where the ſame ſpirit is without difference ſometime called the ſpirit of Chriſt, and ſometime of him that raiſed vp Chriſt from the dead: and that not without cauſe. For Peter doth alſo teſtifie that it was the ſpirit of Chriſt wherewith the Prophets did prophecie, whereas the Scripture ſo often teacheth, that it was the Spirit of God the Father.

That the father is of none, the sonne is of the father, and the spirit is of both.

That the Trinitie of perſons is an argument to proue the vnitie of God: and in what ſenſe the father is the beginning of the ſonne. Iohn 14. 10. Auguſt. hom. de temp. 38.

19 Now this diſtinction is ſo farre off from ſtanding againſt the ſingle vnitie of God, that thereby we may proue that the Sonne is one God with the Father, becauſe he hath one ſpirit with him, and that the holy Spirit is not a thing diuers from the Father and the Sonne. For in each Hypoſtaſis is vnderſtanded the whole ſubſtance, with this, that euery one hath his owne propertie. The Father is whole in the Sonne, and the Sonne is whole in the Father, as himſelfe affirmeth: I am in the Father, and the Father is in me. And the Eccleſiaſticall writers doe not grant the one to be ſeuered from the other by any difference of eſſence. By theſe names that betoken diſtinction (ſaith Auguſtine) that is ment whereby they haue relation one to another, and not the very ſubſtance whereby they are all one. By which meaning are the ſayings of the old writers to be made agree, which otherwiſe would ſeeme not a little to diſagree. For ſometime they ſay that the Father is the beginning of the Sonne, and ſometime that the Sonne hath both Godhead and eſſence of himſelfe, and is all one beginning with the Father. The cauſe of this diuerſitie Auguſtine doth in another place well and plainly declare, when he ſaith: Chriſt hauing reſpect to himſelfe, is called God, and to his Father is called the Sonne. And againe, the Father as to himſelfe is called God, as to his Sonne is called the Father, where hauing reſpect to the Sonne he is called the Father, he is not the Sonne: and where as to the Father he is called the Sonne, he is not the Father: and where he is called as to himſelfe the Father, and as to himſelfe the Sonne: it is all one God. Therefore when we ſimply ſpeake of the Sonne: without hauing reſpect to the Father, we doe well and properly ſay, that he is of himſelfe: and therefore we call him but one beginning: but when we make mention of the relation betweene him and his Father, then we rightly make the Father the beginning of the Sonne. All the whole fifth booke of Auguſtine concerning the Trinitie doth nothing but ſet forth this matter. And much ſafer it is to reſt in that relation that he ſpeaketh of, than in too ſubtlely pearcing vnto the high myſterie, to wander abroade by many vaine ſpeculations.

De trinitate & coll. ad Paſcentium epiſt. 174. Cyrillus de trin. lib. 6. idē lib. 3. dialog. Auguſt. in Pſal. 109. & tract. in Iohn 39. & Pſal. 68.

The diuerſitie of perſons and the order of them ſtandeth well inough with one ſingle diuine eſſence, whereunto we muſt haue recourſe when the father, the ſonne, or the ſpirit ſeuerally is called God, and not imagin each to be a ſeuerall God from other.

20 Let them therefore that are pleaſed with ſoberneſſe, and contented with meaſure of faith, ſhortly learne ſo much as is profitable to be knowen: that is, when we profeſſe that we beleeue in one God, vnder the name of God, we vnderſtand the one onely and ſingle eſſence in which we comprehend three Perſons or Hypoſtaſes. And therefore ſo oft as we doe indefinitely ſpeake of the name of God, we meane no leſſe the Sonne and the holy Ghoſt than the Father. But when the Sonne is ioyned to the Father, then commeth in a relation, and ſo we make diſtinction betweene the Perſons. And becauſe the properties in the Perſons bring an order with them, ſo as the beginning and originall is in the Father: ſo oft as mention is made of the Father and the Sonne, or the holy Ghoſt together, the name of God is peculiarly giuen to the Father. By this meane is retained the vnitie of the eſſence, and regard is had to the order, which yet doth miniſh nothing of the godhead of the Sonne and of the Holy Ghoſt. And whereas we haue already ſeene that the Apoſtles doe affirme, that the Sonne of God is he, whom Moſes and the Prophets doe teſtifie to be Iehouah the Lord, we muſt of neceſſitie alway come to the vnitie of the eſſence. Wherefore it is a deteſtable ſacriledge for vs to call the Sonne a ſeuerall God from the Father, becauſe the ſimple name of God, doth admit no relation, and God in reſpect of himſelfe cannot be ſaid to be this or that. Now, that the name of Iehouah the Lord indefinitely taken is applied to Chriſt, appeareth by the words words of Paul, where he saith: Therefore I haue thrise praied the Lord, because that after he had receiued the answere of Christ, My grace is sufficient for thee: he saith by and by, that the power of Christ may dwell in me. It is certaine that the name Lord is there set for Iehouah, and therefore to restraine it to the person of the Mediatour were very fond and childish, for so much as it is an absolute sentence that compareth not the Father with the Sonne. And we know that after the accustomed maner of the Greekes, the Apostles doe commonly set the word Kyrios, Lord, in stead of Iehouah. And not to fetch an example farre off, Paul did in no other sense pray to the Lord, than in the same sense that Peter citeth the place of Ioel: Whosoeuer calleth vpon the name of the Lord shall be saued. But where this name is peculiarly giuen to the Sonne, we shall see that there is another reason thereof, when we come to a place fit for it. Now it is ynough to haue in minde, when Paul had absolutely prayed to God, he by and by bringeth in the name of Christ. Euen so is the whole God called by Christ himselfe the Spirit. For there is no cause against it, but that the whole essence of God may be spirituall, wherein the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost be comprehended. Which is very plaine by the Scripture. For euen as there we heare God to be made a Spirit: so we doe heare the Holy Ghost, for so much as it is an Hypostasis of the whole essence, to be called both God, and proceeding from God.

2. Cor. 12. 9.

Act. 2. 16. Ioel 2. 28.

21 But for as much as Sathan, to the end to roote out our faith, hath alway moued great contentions, partly concerning the diuine essence of the Sonne, and of the Holy Ghost, and partly concerning their distinction of persons: And as in a maner in all ages he hath stirred vp wicked spirits to trouble the true teachers in this behalfe: so at this day he trauelleth out of the old embers to kindle a new fire: therefore heere it is good to answere the peruerse foolish errours of some. Hitherto it hath beene our purpose, to leade as it were by the hand those that are willing to learne, and not to striue hand to hand with the obstinate and contentious. But now the truth which we haue alreadie peaceably shewed, must be rescued from the cauillations of the wicked. Albeit my chiefe trauell shall yet be applied to this end, that they which giue gentle and open eares to the word of God, may haue whereupon stedfastly to rest their foote. In this point, if any where at all in the secret mysteries of Scripture, we ought to dispute soberly, and with great moderation, and to take great heed that neither our thought nor our toong proceede any further than the bounds of Gods word doe extend. For how may the mind of man by his capacitie define the immeasurable essence of God, which neuer yet could certainly determine how great is the bodie of the Sunne which yet he daily seeth with his eies? yea, how may she by her owne guiding attaine to discusse the substance of God, that cannot reach to know her owne substance? Wherefore let vs willingly giue ouer vnto God the knowledge of himselfe. For he onely, as Hilarie saith, is a conuenient witnesse to himselfe, which is not knowen but by himselfe. We shall giue it ouer vnto him, if we shall both conceiue him to be such as he hath opened himselfe vnto vs, and shall not elsewhere search to know of him, then by his owne word. There are to this end written fiue homilies of Chrysostome against the Anomei. Yet the boldnesse of Sophisters could not be restrained by them from babbling vnbridledly. For they haue behaued themselues in this behalfe no whit more modestly than they are wonted in all other. By the vnhappie successe of which vndiscretion, we ought to be warned to take care that we bend our selues to trauell in this question rather with tractable willingnesse to learne, than with sharpnesse of wit, and neuer haue in our mind either to search for God any where else than in his holy word, or to thinke any thing of him, but hauing his word going before to guide vs, or to speake any thing but that which is taken out of the same word. The distinction that is in the one Godhead of the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost, as it is very hard to know, so doth it bring more businesse and comberance to some wits than is expedient. Let them remember that the minds of men doe enter into a maze when they follow their owne curiositie, and so let them suffer themselues to be ruled with the heauenly oracles, howsoeuer they cannot attaine the height of the mysterie.

With what sobrietie we ought to dispute against heretikes about the mysterie of the Trinitie.

Hilar. lib. pri. de Trinitate.

22 To make a register of the errours, wherewith the pureness of faith in this point of doctrine hath in times past beene assailed, were too long and full of vnprofitable

table tediousnesse: and the most part of heretikes haue so attempted to ouerwhelme the glory of God with grosse doting errours, that they haue thought it enough for them to shake and trouble the vnskilfull. And from a few men haue sprong vp many sectes, whereof some doe teare in sunder the essence of God, some doe confound the distinction that is betweene the Persons. But if we hold fast that which is already sufficiently shewed by the Scripture, that the essence of the one God which belongeth to the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost, is single and vndiuided: Againe, that the Father by a certaine propertie differeth from the Sonne, and the Sonne from the Holy Ghost: we shall stop vp the gate not onely against Arrius, and Sabellius, but also the other old authors of errours. But because in our time there be risen vp certaine phrentike men, as Seruetto and other like, which haue encumbred all things with new deceits: It is good in few words to discusse their falshoods. The name of the Trinitie was so hatefull, yea, so detestable to Seruetto, that he said, that all the Trinitaris, as he called them, were vtterly godlesse. I omit the foolish words that he had deuised to raile withall. But of his opinions this was the summe. That God is made Tripartite, when it is said, that there abide three persons in his essence, and that this Trinitie is but a thing imagined, because it disagreeth with the vnitie of God. In the meane time the Persons he would haue to be certaine outward conceptions of Forme, which are not truely subsisting in the essence of God, but doe represent God vnto vs in this or that fashion. And at the beginning that there was in God nothing distinct, because once the Word & the Spirit were all one: but since that Christ arose God out of God, the holy Ghost sprong also another God out of him. And though sometime he colour his follies with allegories, as when he saith, that the eternall word of God was the spirit of Christ with God, and the bright shining of his forme: Againe, that the holy Ghost was the shadow of the godhead, yet afterward he bringeth the godhead of them both to nothing, affirming that after the rate of distribution, there is both in the Sonne and in the holy Spirit a part of God, euen as the same spirit in vs, and also in wood and stones is substantially a portion of God. What he babbleth of the Person of the Mediatour, we shall hereafter see in place conuenient. But this monstrous forged deuise, that a Person is nothing else but a visible forme of the glory of God, needeth no long confutation, For whereas Iohn pronounceth, that the word was God before the world was yet create, he maketh it much differing from a conception of forme. But if then also, yea, and from farthest Eternitie of time, that Word which was God was with the Father, and had his own proper glory with the Father, he could not be an outward or figuratiue shining: but it necessarily followeth that he was an Hypostasis that did inwardly abide in God. And although there be no mention made of the Spirit, but in the historie of the creation of the world, yet he is not there brought in as a shadow, but an essentiall power of God, when Moses sheweth that the very vnfashioned lumpe was sustained in him. Therefore it then appeared, that the eternall Spirit was alwaies in God, when he preserued and sustained the confused matter of heauen and earth, vntill beautie and order were added vnto it. Surely he could not yet be an image or representation of God as Seruetto dreameth. But in other points he is compelled more openly to disclose his wickednesse, in saying that God by his eternall purpose, appointing to himselfe a visible Sonne, did by this meane shew himselfe visible. For if that be true, there is no other Godhead left vnto Christ, But so farre as he is by the eternall decree of God ordeined his sonne. Moreouer, he so transformeth those imagined shapes, that he sticketh not to fainge new accidents in God. But this of all other is most abhominable, that he confusely mingleth as well the sonne of God, as the holy Ghost, with all creatures. For he plainly affirmeth, that there be part, and partitions in the essence of God, of which euery portion is God. And namely he saith, that the spirits of the faithfull are coeternall and consubstantiall with God: albeit in another place he assigneth the substantiall Deitie, not onely to the soule of man, but also to other creatures.

Iohn 1. 1.

Gen. 1. 2.

That the essence of God doth not belong to the father only.

23 Out of this sinke came foorth another like monstre. For certaine lewd men meaning to escape the hatred and shame of the wickednesse of Seruetto, haue indeede confessed, that there are three Persons, but adding a manner how: that the Father which is truely and properly the one onely God, informing the Sonne and the holy Ghost, hath powred powred his godhead into them. Yea they forbeare not this horrible maner of ſpeech, that the father is by this marke diſtinguiſhed from the ſonne and the holy Ghoſt, that he is the onely eſſentiator or maker of the eſſence. Firſt they pretend this colour, that Chriſt is each where called the ſonne of God, whereof they gather, that there is none other properly God but the Father. But they marke not, that though the name of God be alſo common to the ſonne, yet by reaſon of preeminence it is ſometime giuen to the Father onely, becauſe he is the fountaine and originall of the Deitie, and that for this purpoſe, to make the ſingle vnitie of the eſſence to be thereby noted. They take exception and ſay: If he be truely the ſonne of God, it is inconuenient to haue him reckoned the ſonne of a Perſon. I anſwere that both are true: that is, that he is the ſonne of God becauſe he is the Word begotten of the Father before all worlds (for we come not yet to ſpeake of the Perſon of the Mediatour) and yet for explications ſake we ought to haue regard of the Perſon, that the name of God be not taken ſimply but for the Father onely. For if we meane none to be God but the Father, we plainly throw downe the Sonne from the degree of God. Therefore ſo oft as mention is made of the Godhead, we muſt not admit a compariſon betweene the Sonne and the Father, as though the name of God did belong onely to the Father. For truely the God that appeared to Eſay was the true and onely God, and yet Iohn affirmeth that the ſame was Chriſt. And he that by the mouth of Eſay teſtified, that he ſhould be a ſtumbling ſtone to the Iewes was the onely God: and yet Paul pronounceth that the ſame was Chriſt. He that cryeth out by Eſay, I liue, and to me all knees ſhall bow, is the onely God: and yet Paul expounded that the ſame was Chriſt. For this purpoſe ſerue the teſtimonies that the Apoſtle reciteth. Thou O God haſt laid the foundations of heauen and earth. Againe, let all the Angels of God worſhip him, which things belong to none, but to the onely God. And yet he ſaith, that they are the proper titles of Chriſt. And this cauillation is nothing worth, that that is giuen to Chriſt, which is proper to God, becauſe Chriſt is the ſhining brightneſſe of his glory. For becauſe in each of theſe places is ſet the name of Iehouah, it followeth, that it is ſo ſaid in reſpect that he is God of himſelfe. For if he be Iehouah, it cannot be denied that he is the ſame God that in another place crieth out by Eſay: I, I am, and beſide me there is no God. It is good alſo to conſider that ſaying of Hieremie: The gods that haue not made the heauen and earth, let them periſh out of the earth that is vnder the heauen. Wheras on the other ſide we muſt needs confeſſe, that the Sonne of God is he, whoſe Godhead is oft prooued in Eſay by the creation of the world. And how can it be that the Creator, which giueth being to all things ſhall not be of himſelfe, but borrow his being of another? For whoſoeuer ſaith that the Sonne was eſſentiate or made to be of his Father, denieth that he is of himſelfe. But the Holy Ghoſt ſaith the contrary, naming him Iehouah. Now if we graunt that the whole eſſence is in the Father onely, either it muſt be made partable, or be taken from the Sonne, and ſo ſhall the Sonne be ſpoiled of his eſſence, and be a God onely in name and title. The eſſence of God, if we beleeue theſe trifles: belongeth onely to the Father, for as much as he is onely God, and is the eſſence maker of the Sonne. And ſo ſhall the Godhead of the Sonne be an abſtract from the eſſence of God, or a deriuation of a part out of the whole. Now muſt they needes graunt by their owne principle, that the holy Ghoſt is the Spirit of the Father onely. For if he be a deriuation frm the firſt eſſence, which is onely proper to the Father, of right he cannot be accounted the Spirit of the Sonne: which is confuted by the teſtimonie of Paul, where he maketh the Spirit common to Chriſt and the Father. Moreouer, if the Perſon of the Father be wiped out of the Trinitie, wherein ſhall he differ from the Sonne and the holy Ghoſt, but in this, that he onely is God? They confeſſe Chriſt to be God, and yet they ſay, he differeth from the Father. Againe, there muſt be ſome marke of difference to make that the Father be not the Sonne. They which ſay that marke of difference to be in the eſſence, doe manifeſtly bring the true Godhead of Chriſt to nothing, which cannot be without eſſence, yea, and that the whole eſſence. The Father differeth not from the Sonne, vnleſſe he haue ſomething proper to himſelfe that is not common to the Sonne. What now will they finde wherein to make him different? If the difference be in the eſſence, let them anſwere if he haue not communicated the ſame to the Sonne. But that could not not be in part, for to ſay that he made halfe a God were wicked. Beſide that by this meane they doe fouly teare in ſunder the eſſence of God. It remaineth therefore that the eſſence is whole, and perfectly common to the Father and the Sonne. And if that be true, then as touching the eſſence there is no difference of the one of them from the other. If they ſay, that the Father in giuing his eſſence, remaineth neuertheleſſe the onely God, with whom the eſſence abideth? then Chriſt ſhall be a figuratiue God, and a God onely in ſhew and in name but not indeede: becauſe nothing is more proper to God than to be, according to this ſaying: He that is hath ſent me vnto you.

Exod. 5. 13.

The arguments anſwered which are brought to proue the father to be the onely true God.

24 It is eaſie by many places to prooue that it is falſe which they hold, that ſo oft as there is in Scripture mention made abſolutely of God, none is meant thereby but the Father. And in thoſe places that they themſelues doe alleadge, they fouly bewray their owne want of conſideration, becauſe there is alſo ſet the name of the Sonne. Whereby appeareth, that the name of God is there relatiuely taken, and therefore reſtrained to the Perſon of the Father. And there obiection where they ſay, If the Father were not onely the true God, he ſhould himſelfe be his owne Father, is anſwered with one word. It is not inconuenient for degree and orders ſake, that he be peculiarly called God which hath not onely of himſelfe begotten his wiſedome, but alſo is the God of the Mediatour, as in place fit for it, I will more largely declare. For ſith Chriſt was openly ſhewed in the fleſh, he is called the Sonne of God, not onely in reſpect that he was the eternall Word before all worlds begotten of the Father: but alſo becauſe he tooke vpon him the Perſon and office of the Mediatour to ioyne vs vnto God. And becauſe they doe ſo boldly exclude the Sonne from the honor of God, I would faine know whether the Sonne when he pronounceth, that none is good but God, doe take goodneſſe from himſelfe? I doe not ſpeake of his humane nature, leaſt perhaps they ſhould take exception, and ſay, that whatſoeuer goodnes was in it, it came of free gift. I aske whether the eternall Word of God be good or no? If they ſay nay, then we hold their vngodlineſſe ſufficiently conuinced: in ſaying yea, they confound themſelues. But whereas at the firſt ſight, Chriſt ſeemeth to put from himſelfe the name of Good, that doth the more confirme our meaning. For ſith it is the ſingular title of God alone, foraſmuch as he was after the common maner ſaluted by the name of Good, in refuſing falſe honour, he did admoniſh them, that the goodneſſe wherein he excelled, was the goodneſſe that God hath. I aske alſo, where Paul affirmeth that onely God is immortall, wiſe, and true, whether by theſe words Chriſt be brought into the number of men mortall, fooliſh, and falſe? Shall not he then be immortall, that from the beginning was life to giue immortalitie to Angels? Shall not he be wiſe, that is the eter-nall wiſedome of God? Shall not the truth it ſelfe be true? I aske furthermore, whether they thinke that Chriſt ought to be worſhipped or no? For he claimeth this vnto himſelfe, to haue all knees bow before him: it followeth that he is the God which did in the law forbid any other to be worſhipped but himſelfe. If they will haue that meant of the Father onely which is ſpoken in Eſay: I am, and none but I: this teſtimonie I turne againſt themſelues, foraſmuch as we ſee, that whatſoeuer pertaineth to God is giuen to Chriſt. And their cauillation hath no place, that Chriſt was exalted in the fleſh, wherein he had beene abaſed, and that in reſpect of the fleſh, all authoritie is giuen him in heauen and in earth: becauſe although the maieſtie of King and Iudge extend to the whole Perſon of the Mediatour, yet if he had not beene God openly ſhewed in the fleſh, he could not haue beene aduanced to ſuch height, but that God ſhould haue diſagreed with himſelfe. But this controuerſie Paul doth well take away, teaching that he was equall with God before he did abaſe himſelfe vnder the ſhape of a ſeruant. Now how could this equalitie haue ſtand togither, vnleſſe he had beene the ſame God whoſe name is Iah and Iehouah: that rideth vpon the Cherubin, that is King of all the earth and Lord of the worlds? Now howſoeuer they babble againſt it, it cannot be taken from Chriſt which Eſay ſaith in another place: He, he, is our God, for him we haue waited, whereas in theſe words he deſcribeth the comming of God the Redeemer, not onely that ſhould bring home the people from the exile of Babylon, but alſo fully in all points reſtore the Church. And with their other cauillation they nothing preuaile, in ſaying, that Chriſt was God in his Father. For though we confeſſe confesse that in respect of order and degree the beginning of the Godhead is in the Father, yet we say that it is a detestable inuention to say, that the essence is onely proper to the Father, as though he were the onely Godmaker of the Sonne. For by this meanes either he should haue moe essences than on, or else they call Christ God onely in title and imagination. If they graunt that Christ is God, but next after the Father, then shall the essence be in him begotten and fashioned, which in the Father is vnbegotten and vnfashioned. I know that many quick-nosed men doe laugh at this that we gather the distinction of Persons out of the words of Moses, where he bringeth in God speaking thus: Let vs make man after our image. But yet the godly readers doe see how vainly and fondly Moses should bring in this as a talke of diuers together, if there were not in God moe Persons than one. Now certaine is it, that they whom the Father spake vnto, were vncreate: but nothing is vncreate but God himselfe, yea the one onely God. Now therefore vnlesse they graunt that the power of creating was common, and the authoritie of commaunding common, to the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost: it shall follow that God did not inwardly thus speak to himselfe, but directed his speech to other forreine workemen. Finally one place shall easily answere two of their obiections. For whereas Christ himselfe pronounceth that God is a Spirit, this were not conuenient to be restrained to the Father onely, as if the Word himselfe were not of Spirituall nature. If then the name of Spirit doth as well agree with the Sonne as with the Father, I gather that the Sonne is also comprehended vnder the indefinite name of God. But he addeth by and by after that, none are allowed for good worshippers of the Father, but they that worship him in spirit and truth: whereupon followeth another thing, because Christ doth vnder a head execute the office of a teacher, he doth giue the name of God to the Father, not to the intent to destroy his owne Godhead, but by degrees to lift vs vp vnto it.

Mat. 19. 17.

1. Tim. 1. 17.

Gen. 1. 26.

Iohn 4. 24.

25 But in this they are deceiued, that they dreame of certaine vndiuided singular things, whereof each haue a part of the essence. But by the Scriptures, we teach, that there is but one essentiall God, and therefore that the essence as well of the Sonne as of the Holy Ghost is vnbegotten. But for so much as the Father is in order first & hath of himselfe begotten his wisedome, therefore rightfully as is aboue said, he is counted the originall and fountaine of all the Godhead. So God indefinitely spoken, is vnbegotten, and the Father also in respect of Person is vnbegotten. And foolishly they thinke that they gather, that by our meaning is made a quaternitie, because falsely and cauillously they ascribe vnto vs a deuise of their owne braine, as though we did faigne that by deriuation there come three Persons out of one essence: whereas it is euident by our writings, that we doe not drawe the Persons out of the essence, but although they be abiding in the essence we make a distinction betweene them. If the Persons were seuered from the essence, then peraduenture their reason were like to be true. But by that meanes it should be a Trinitie of Gods and not of Persons, which one God containeth in him. So is their fond question answered, whether the essence doe meete to make vp the Trinitie, as though we did imagine that there descend three Gods out of it. And this exception groweth of like foolishnes where they say, that then the Trinitie, should be without God. For though it meete not to make vp the distinction as a part or a member, yet neither are the Persons without it, nor out of it. Because the Father if he were not God could not be the Father, and the Sonne is none otherwise the Sonne but because he is God. We say therefore, that the Godhead is absolutely of it selfe. Whereby we grant that the Sonne in so much as he is God, is of himselfe without respect of his person, but in so much as he is the Sonne, we say that he is of the Father. So his essence is without beginning, but the beginning of his Person is God himselfe. And the true teaching writers that in olde time haue spoken of the Trinitie, haue onely applied this name to the Persons, for so much as it were not onely an absurd errour but also a grosse vngodlinesse, to comprehend the essence in the distinction. For they that will haue these three to meete, the essence, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost, it is plaine that they doe destroy the essence of the Sonne and the holy Ghost, for else the parts ioyned together would fall in sunder, which is a fault in euery distinction. Finally if the Father and the Sonne were Synonimes or seuerall names signifying one thing, so the

There is one indiuisible diuine essence, which is vnbegotten, absolutely of it selfe and without beginning.

the Father ſhould be the Godmaker, and nothing ſhould remaine in the Sonne but a ſhadow, and the Trinitie ſhould be nothing elſe, but the ioyning of one God with two creatures.

Chriſt though the ſonne of God, yet properly God not by a certaine derived dietie, but by the ſame Godhead where by his father is God.

26 Whereas they obiect, that if Chriſt be properly God, he is not rightfully called the Son: to that we haue already anſwered, that becauſe in ſuch places there is a compariſon made of the one Perſon to the other, the name of God is not there indefinitely taken, but reſtrained to the Father onely, in ſo much as he is the beginning of the Godhead, not in making of eſſence as the maddmen doe fondly imagine, but in reſpect of order. In this meaning is conſtrued that ſaying of Chriſt to the Father: this is the eternall life, that men beleeue in thee the one true God, and Ieſus Chriſt whom thou haſt ſent. For ſpeaking in the perſon of the Mediatour, hee keepeth the degree that is meane betweene God and men: and yet is not his maieſtie thereby diminiſhed. For though he abaſed himſelfe, yet he left not with the Father his glory that was hidden before the world. So the Apoſtle in the ſecond Chapter to the Hebrues, though he confeſſeth that Chriſt for a ſhort time was abaſed beneath the Angels, yet he ſticketh not to affirme withall, that he is the ſame eternall God that founded the earth. We muſt therefore hold, that ſo oft as Chriſt in the perſon of the Mediator ſpeaketh to the Father, vnder this name of God is comprehended the Godhead which is his alſo. So when he ſaid to the Apoſtles: It is profitable that I goe vp to the Father, becauſe the Father is greater: He giueth not vnto himſelfe onely the ſecond degree of Godhead to be as touching his eternall eſſence inferiour to the Father, but becauſe hauing obtained the heauenly glory, he gathereth together the faithfull to the partaking of it. He ſetteth his Father in the higher degree, inſomuch as the glorious perfection of brightneſſe that appeereth in heauen, differeth from that meaſure of glory that was ſeene in him being clothed with fleſh. After like maner in another place Paul ſaith: that Chriſt ſhall yeelde vp the kingdome to God and his Father, that God may be all in all. There is nothing more abſurd than to take away eternall continuance from the Godhead of Chriſt. If he ſhall neuer ceaſe to be the Sonne of God, but ſhall alway remaine the ſame that he was from the beginning, it followeth that vnder the name of the Father, is comprehended the one eſſence that is comon to them both. And ſurely therefore did Chriſt deſcend vnto vs, that lifting vs vp vnto his Father, he might alſo lift vs vp vnto himſelfe, in as much as he is all one with the Father. It is therefore neither lawfull nor right ſo excluſiuely to reſtraine the name of God to the Father, as to take it from the Sonne. For, Iohn doth for this cauſe affirme that he is true God, that no man ſhould thinke that he reſteth in a ſecond degree of Godhead beneath his Father. And I maruel what theſe framers of new Gods do meane, that while they confeſſe Chriſt to be true God, yet they foorthwith exclude him from the Godhead of his Father. As though there could any be a true God but he that is the one God: or as though the Godhead powred from one to another, be not a certaine newe forged imagination.

Ireneus farre from thinking the father onely and not the ſonne to be properly eternall God.

27 Whereas they heape vp many places out of Ireneus, where he affirmeth that the Father of Chriſt is the onely and eternall God of Iſrael: that is either done of a ſhamefull ignorance, or of an extreme wickedneſſe. For they ought to haue conſidered, that then the holy man had to doe in diſputation with thoſe frantike men, that denied that the Father of Chriſt was the ſame God that in old time ſpake by Moſes and the Prophets, but that he was I wot not what imagined thing brought out of the corruption of the world. Therefore he altogether trauelleth in this point, to make it plaine, that there is no other God preached of in the Scripture but the Father of Chriſt, and that it is amiſſe to deuiſe any other, and therefore it is no maruell if he ſo oft conclude that there was no other God of Iſrael, but he that was ſpoken of by Chriſt and the Apoſtles. And in like manner now, whereas we are to ſtand againſt another ſort of errour, we may truely ſay that the God which in old time appeared to the Fathers, was none other but Chriſt. But if any man obiect that it was the Father, our anſwere is in readineſſe, that when we ſtriue to defend the Godhead of the Sonne, we exclude not the Father. If the readers take heed to this purpoſe of Ireneus, all that contention ſhall ceaſe. And alſo by the ſixt Chapter of the third booke, this whole ſtrife is ended, where the good man ſtandeth all vpon this point, to proue that he which is in Scripture abſolutely & indefinitely called God: is verily the one onely God, and that Chriſt is abſolutely called God. Let vs remember that this was the principall point whereupon ſtoode all his diſputation, as by the whole proceſſe thereof doth appeare: and ſpecially the 46. Chapter of the ſecond booke, that he is not called the Father by darke ſimilitude or parable, which is not very God indeed. Moreouer in another place he ſaith, that as well the Sonne as the Father were ioyntly called God by the Prophets & Apoſtles. Afterward he defineth how Chriſt which is Lord of all, and King, and God, and Iudge, receiued power from him which is the God of all, that is to ſay in reſpect of his ſubiection, becauſe he was humbled euen to the death of the croſſe. And a little after he affirmeth, that the Sonne is the maker of heauen and earth, which gaue the Law by the hand of Moſes, and appeared to the Fathers. Now if any man doe prate that with Irenæus onely the Father is the God of Iſrael, I will turne againe vpon him that which the ſame writer plainly teacheth, that Chriſt is all one and the ſame: as alſo he applyeth vnto him the Prophecie of Habacuc: God ſhall come out of the South. To the ſame purpoſe ſerueth that which is read in the ninth Chapter of the fourth booke. Chriſt himſelfe therefore with the Father is the God of the liuing. And in the twelfth Chapter of the ſame booke he expoundeth that Abraham beleeued God, becauſe Chriſt is the maker of heauen and earth and the onely God.

28 And with no more truth doe they bring in Tertullian for their defender. For though he be rough ſometime and crabbed in his manner of ſpeach, yet doth he plainely teach the ſumme of that doctrine that we defend. That is to ſay, whereas he is the one God, yet by diſpoſition and order he is his Word: that there is but one God in vnitie of ſubſtance, and yet that the ſame vnitie by myſterie of orderly diſtribution is diſpoſed into Trinitie, that there are three, not in ſtate, but in degree, not in ſubſtance, but in forme, not in power, but in order. He ſaith that he defendeth the Sonne to be a ſecond next to the Father, but he meaneth him to be none other than the Father, but by way of diſtinction. In ſome places he ſaith that the Sonne is viſible. But when he hath reaſoned on both parts he defineth that he is inuiſible in ſo much as he is the Word. Finally where he affirmeth, that the Father is determined in his owne perſon, he prooueth himſelfe farre from that errour which we confute. And though he doth acknowledge none other God but the Father, yet in the next peece of his writing expounding himſelfe, he ſaith, that he ſpeaketh not excluſiuely in reſpect of the Sonne, becauſe he denyeth that the Sonne is any other God beſide the Father, and that therefore their ſole gouernement is not broken by diſtinction of Perſon. And by the perpetuall courſe of his purpoſe it is eaſie to gather the meaning of his words. For he diſputeth againſt Praxeas, that though God be diſtinguiſhed into three perſons, yet are there not made many Gods nor the vnitie torne in ſunder. And becauſe by the imagination of Praxeas Chriſt could not be God, but he muſt alſo be the Father, therefore he ſo much laboureth about the diſtinction. Whereas he calleth the Word and the Spirit a portion of the whole, although it be a hard kinde of ſpeech, yet is it excuſable, becauſe it is not referred to the ſubſtance, but onely ſheweth the diſpoſition and order that belongeth onely to the Perſons, as Tertullian himſelfe witneſſeth. And hereof hangeth that: How many Perſons thinkeſt thou there are, O moſt froward Praxeas, but euen ſo many as there be names? And ſo a little after that, they may beleeue the Father and the Sonne each in their names and Perſons. Hereby I thinke may be ſufficiently confuted their impudencie, that ſeeke to beguile the ſimple with colour of Tertullians authoritie.

Tertullian as farre from that opinion.

29 And ſurely whoſoeuer ſhal diligently compare togither the writings of the old Authors, ſhall find no other thing in Irenæus, than that which hath been taught by other that came after. Iuſtine is one of the ancienteſt, and he in all things doth agree with vs. Yet let them obiect that he as the reſt doe, calleth the Father of Chriſt the onely God. The ſame thing doth Hilarie teach, yea, and ſpeaketh more hardly, that the eternitie is in the Father. But doth he that to take away the eſſence of God from the Sonne? And yet is he altogether in defence of the ſame Faith that wee follow. Yet are they not aſhamed to picke out certaine mangled ſentences whereby they would perſwade that Hilarie is a Patrone of their errour. Where they bring in Ignatius: if they will haue that to be of any authoritie, let them prooue that the Apoſtles made a Law for Lent and ſuch like corruptions of religion. Nothing is more vnſauorie than thoſe fond trifles that are publiſhed vnder the name of Ignatius. Wherefore their impudencie is ſo much leſſe tolerable, that diſguiſe themſelues with ſuch viſors to deceiue. Moreouer the conſent of the ancient Fathers is plainly perceiued by this, that at the Councell of Nice, Arrius neuer durſt alledge for himſelfe the authoritie of any one allowed writer. And none of the Greekes or Latines doth excuſe himſelfe and ſay, that he diſſenteth from them that were before. It needeth not to be ſpoken how Auguſtine whom theſe loſelles doe moſt hate, hath diligently ſearched the writings of them all, and how reuerently he did embrace them. Truely euen in matters of leaſt weight he vſeth to ſhew what compelleth him to diſſent from them. And in this matter, if he had read any thing doubtfull or darke in other, he hideth it not. But the doctrine that theſe men ſtriue againſt, he taketh it as confeſſed, that from the fartheſt time of antiquitie it hath beene without controuerſie receiued. And by one word it appeareth that he was not ignorant what other had taught before him, where he ſaith that in the Father is vnitie, in the firſt booke of Chriſtian doctrine, will they ſay that he then forgate himſelfe? But in another place he purgeth himſelfe from ſuch reproch, where he calleth the Father the beginning of the whole Godhead, becauſe he is of none: conſidering indeede wiſely, that the name of God is ſpecially aſcribed to the Father, becauſe if the beginning ſhould not be reckoned at him, the ſingle vnitie of God cannot be conceiued. By this I truſt the godly reader will perceiue that all the cauillations are confuted, wherewith Satan hath hitherto attempted to peruert or darken the pure truth of doctrine. Finally, I truſt that the whole ſumme of doctrine in this point is fully declared, if the readers will temper them of curioſitie, and not more greedily than meete is, ſeeke for comberſome and entangled diſputations. For I take not in hand to pleaſe them, that doe delight in an vntemperate deſire of ſpeculation. Truely I haue omitted nothing of ſubtle purpoſe that I thought to make againſt me. But while I ſtudie to edifie the Church, I thought it beſt to leaue many things vntouched which both ſmally profited, and would greeue the readers with ſuperfluous tediouſneſſe. For to what purpoſe were it to diſpute, whether the Father doe alwaies beget? For as much as it is folly to faigne a continuall act of begetting, ſith it is euident that from eternitie there haue beene three Perſons in God.

THE FOVRETEENTH CHAPTER.

That the Scripture euen in the creation of the world and of all things: doth by certaine markes put difference betweene the true God, and fained gods.

Eſay 40.21. The creation of the world taught by Moſes, that men might know the God which made it, and not enquire why he made it no ſooner.

ALthough Eſay doth worthily reproch the worſhippers of falſe gods with ſlouthfulneſſe, for that they haue not learned by the very foundations of the earth, and round compaſſe of the heauens, which is the true God: yet ſuch is the dulneſſe and groſſenes of our wit, that leaſt the faithfull ſhould fall away to the inuentions of the Gentiles, it was neceſſary to haue God more expreſly painted out vnto them. For whereas the ſaying that God is the minde of the world, which is counted the moſt tollerable deſcription that is found among the Philoſophers, is but vaine, it behoooueth vs more familiarly to know him, leaſt we alwaies wauer in doubtfulneſſe. Therefore it was his pleaſure to haue an hiſtorie of the creation remaining, whereupon the Faith of the Church might reſt, and ſeeke for none other God but him, whom Moſes hath declared to be the maker and builder of the world. There is firſt ſet foorth the time, that by continuall proceeding of yeares the faithfull might come to the firſt originall of mankinde, and of all things. Which knowledge is very neceſſary, not onely to confute thoſe monſtrous fables that ſometime were ſpred in Ægypt and other parts of the world, but alſo, that the beginning of the world once being knowen, the eternitie of God may more clearely ſhine foorth and rauiſh vs in admiration of it. Neither ought we to be any thing mooued with that vngodly mocke, that it is maruell why it came no ſooner in the minde of God to make the heauen and the earth, and why he ſitting idle did ſuffer ſo immeaſurable a ſpace to paſſe away, ſith he might haue made it many thouſand ages before: whereas the whole continuance of the world that now draweth to an end, is not yet come to ſix thouſand yeares. For why God ſo long deferred it, is neither lawfull nor expedient for vs to enquire. Becauſe it mans minde will trauaile to attaine thereunto, it ſhall faile an hundred times by the way, neither were it profitable for vs to know that thing which God himſelfe to proue the modeſtie of our faith, hath of purpoſe willed to be hidden. And well did that godly olde man ſpeake, which when a wanton fellow did in ſcorne demand of him, what God had done before the creation of the world, anſwered, that he buylded Hell for curious fooles. Let this graue and ſeueere warning repreſſe the wantonneſſe that tickleth many, yea, and driueth them to euill and hurtfull ſpeculations. Finally, let vs remember that the ſame inuiſible God whoſe wiſedome, power and iuſtice is incomprehenſible, doth ſet before vs the hiſtorie of Moſes as a looking glaſſe, wherein his liuely image appeareth. For, as the eyes that either are growen dimme with age, or dulled with any diſeaſe, doe not diſcerne any thing plainely, vnleſſe they be holpen with ſpectacles: ſo, ſuch is our weakneſſe, that vnleſſe the Scripture direct vs in ſeeking of God, we doe foorth with runne out into vanitie. And they that follow their owne wantonneſſe, becauſe they be now warned in vaine, ſhall all too late feele with horrible deſtruction, how much it had beene better for them reuerently to receiue the ſecret counſels of God, than to vomite out blaſphemies, to obſcure the heauen withall. And rightly doth Auguſtine complaine, that wrong is done to God when further cauſe of thinges is ſought for, than his onely will. The ſame man in another place doth wiſely warne vs, that it is no leſſe euill to mooue queſtion of immeaſurable ſpaces of times than of places. For how broad ſoeuer the circuite of the heauen is, yet is there ſome meaſure of it. Now, if one ſhould quarrell with God for that the emptineſſe wherein nothing is contained, is an hundred times more, ſhall not all the godly abhorre ſuch wantonneſſe? Into like madneſſe runne they that buſie themſelues about Gods ſitting ſtill, becauſe at their appointment he made not the world innumerable ages ſooner. To ſatisfie their owne greedineſſe of minde, they couet to paſſe without the compaſſe of the world, as though in ſo large a circuit of heauen, and earth, they could not finde things enough that with their ineſtimable brightneſſe may ouerwhelme all our ſenſes: as though in ſixe thouſand yeeres, God hath not ſhewed examples, in continuall conſideration whereof, our mindes may be exerciſed. Let vs therefore willingly abide encloſed within thoſe boundes wherewith it pleaſed God to enuiron vs, and as it were to penne vp our mindes, that they ſhould not ſtray abroad with libertie of wandring.

Lib. de gen. contra Ma. De ciuit. dei lib. 40.

2 For like reaſon is it that Moſes declareth, that the worke of God was not ended in a moment but in ſix daies. For by this circumſtance we are withdrawen from forged inuentions to the one onely God that deuided his worke into ſixe daies, that it ſhould not greeue vs to be occupied all the time of our life in conſidering of it. For though our eies, what way ſoeuer we turne them, are compelled to looke vpon the works of God, yet ſee we how fickle our head is, and if any godly thoughts doe touch vs, how ſoone they paſſe away. Heere againe mans reaſon murmureth, as though ſuch proceedings were diſagreeing from the power of God, vntill ſuch time as being made ſubiect to the obedience of faith, ſhe learne to keepe that reſt whereunto the hallowing of the ſeuenth day calleth vs. But in the very order of things, is diligently to be conſidered the fatherly loue of God toward mankind, in this: that he did not create Adam vntill he had ſtored the world with all plentie of good things, For if he had placed him in the earth while it was yet barren and emptie, if he had giuen him life before that there was any light, he ſhould haue ſeemed not ſo well to prouide for his commoditie. But now where he firſt diſpoſed the motions of the Sonne and the Planets for the vſe of man, and furniſhed the earth, the waters, and the aire with liuing creatures, and brought foorth abundance of fruits to ſuffice for foode, taking vpon him the care of a diligent and prouident houſholder, he ſhewed his maruellous bountie toward vs. If a man doe more heedefully wey with himſelfe thoſe things that I doe but ſhortly touch, it ſhall appeare that Moſes was the ſure witneſſe and publiſher of the one God the creator. I omit heere that which I haue already declared, that he ſpeaketh not there

The deuiding of the creation into ſix daies, the order of creating, and the maner which Moſes vſed in ſpeaking of God doe ſhew what we ought eſpecially to learne by that hiſtorie.

onely of the bare eſſence of God, but alſo ſetteth foorth vnto vs his eternall Wiſedome and Spirit, to the end we ſhould not dreame that God is any other, than ſuch as he will be knowne by the image that he hath there expreſſed.

The creation of Angels is a thing neceſſarie to be knowen, both becauſe they are the moſt noble part of Gods workes, and alſo for that there are ſundrie errors concerning Angels, which cannot without ſuch knowledge be refuted.

3 But before that I begin to ſpeake more at large of the nature of man, I muſt ſay ſomewhat of Angels. Becauſe, though Moſes applying himſelfe to the rudeneſſe of the common people, reciteth in his hiſtory of the creation no other works of God but ſuch as are ſeene with our eies, yet whereas afterward he bringeth in Angels for miniſters of God, we may eaſily gather, that he was the creator of them in whoſe ſeruice they employ their trauell and offices. Though therefore Moſes ſpeaking after the capacitie of the people, doth not at the very beginning rehearſe the Angels among the creatures of God: yet that is no cauſe to the contrary, but that we may plainly and expreſly ſpeake thoſe things of them, which in other places the Scripture commonly teacheth. Becauſe if we deſire to know God by his works, ſo noble and excellent an example is not to be omitted. Beſide that, this point of doctrine is very neceſſary for the confuting of many errours. The excellencie of the nature of Angels hath ſo daſeled the minds of many, that they thought the Angels had wrong offered thē, if they ſhould be made ſubiect to the authoritie of one God, & brought as it were in obedience. And hereupon were they fained to be God. There roſe vp alſo one Manichæus with his ſect, which made themſelues two originall beginnings of things, God and the deuill, and to God he aſſigned the beginning of good things, and of things of euill nature he determined the deuill to be the author. If our mindes ſhould be entangled with this errour, God ſhould not keepe whole his glory in the creation of the world. For, whereas nothing is more proper to God than eternitie and a being of himſelfe as I may ſo terme it, they which giue that vnto the deuill, doe they not in a maner giue him the title of Godhead? Now where is the almightineſſe of God become, if ſuch authoritie be graunted to the deuill, that he may put in execution what he will though God ſay nay and withſtand it? As for the onely foundation that the Manichees haue, that it is vnlawfull to aſcribe vnto God that is good, the creation of any thing that is euill; that nothing hurteth the true faith, which admitteth not that there is any thing naturally euill in the whole vniuerſalitie of the world, becauſe neither the frowardneſſe and malice both of man and the diuell, nor the ſinnes that proceede thereof, are of nature, but of the corruption of nature. Neither was there any thing from the beginning, wherein God hath not ſhewed an example both of his wiſedome and iuſtice. Therefore to anſwere theſe peruerſe deuiſes: it behoooueth vs to lift vp our mindes higher than our eyes can attaine to ſee. For which cauſe it is likely, that where in the Nicene creed God is called the Creator of all things, things inuiſible are expreſſed. Yet will we be carefull to keepe the meaſure that the rule of godlineſſe appointeth, leaſt the readers with ſearching to vnderſtand further than is expedient, ſhould wander abroad, being led away from the ſimplicitie of Faith. And ſurely, foraſmuch as the holy Ghoſt teacheth vs alway for our profit, and ſuch things are as ſmally auaileable to edifie, he doth either leaue wholely vnſpoken, or but lightly, and as it were ouerrunningly touch them: it ſhall be alſo our duety to be content not to know thoſe things that doe not profit vs.

Superfluous ſpeculations, and curious queſtions about Angels, are to be auoided.

Gen. 1.2.

4 That the Angels, for as much as they are the miniſters of God ordeined to execute his commaundements, are alſo his creatures, it ought to be certainly out of all queſtion. To moue doubt of the time and order that they were created in, ſhould it not rather be a buſie waiwardnes than diligence? Moſes declareth that the earth was made, and the heauens were made, with all their armies, to what purpoſe than is it, curiouſly to ſearch, what day the other more ſecret armies of heauen beſide the ſtarres and planets firſt began to be? But, becauſe I will not be long, let vs, as in the whole doctrine of religion, ſo here alſo remember that we ought to keepe one rule of modeſtie and ſobriety, that of obſcure things we neither ſpeake, nor thinke, nor yet deſire to know any other thing than that hath beene taught vs by the Word of God: and an other point, that in reading of Scripture we continually reſt vpon the ſearching and ſtudying of ſuch things as certaine to edification, and not giue our ſelues to curioſitie or ſtudie of things vnprofitable. And becauſe it was Gods pleaſure to inſtruct vs, not in trifling queſtions, but in ſound godlineſſe, feare of his name, true confidence, and dueties of holineſſe:

let vs rest vpon such knowledge. Wherefore, if we will be rightly wise, we must leaue those vanities that idle men haue taught without warrant of the word of God, concerning the nature, degree, and multitude of Angels. I know that such matters as this, are by many more greedily taken hold of, & are more pleasant vnto them than such things as lie in dayly vse. But if it greeue vs not to be the schollers of Christ, let it not greeue vs to follow that order of learning that he hath appointed. So shall it so come to passe, that being contented with his schooling, we shall not onely forbeare, but also abhorre superfluous speculations, from which he calleth vs away. No man can deny, that the same Denyse, whatsoeuer man he was, hath disputed many things both subtlely and wittilie in his Hierarchie of Heauen: but if a man examine it more neerely, he shall finde that for the most part it is but meere babling. But the dutifull purpose of a Diuine is, not to delite eares with prating, but to stablish consciences with teaching things true, certaine, and profitable. If one should read that booke, he would thinke that the man were slipped downe from heauen, and did tell of things not that he had learned by heare say, but that he had seene with his eyes. But Paul which was rauished aboue the third heauen, hath vttered no such thing, but also protesteth, that it is not lawfull for man to speake the secrets that he had seene. Therefore bidding farewell to that trifling wisedome, let vs consider by the simple doctrine of the Scripture, what the Lord would haue vs know concerning his Angels. 1. Cor. 12. 2.

5 It is commonly read in the Scripture, that the Angels are heauenly Spirites, whose ministration and seruice God vseth for putting in execution of those things that he hath decreed. For which reason that name is giuen them, because God vseth them as messengers to shew himselfe vnto men. And vpon like reason are deriued the other names that they are called by. They are named armies, because they doe like a Gard enuiron their Prince, and doe adorne and set foorth the honorable shew of his maiestie, and like souldiers they are alway attending vpon the ensigne of their Captaine, and are euer so prepared and in readines to doe his commandements, that so soone as he doth but becken to them, they prepare themselues to worke, or rather be at their worke alreadie. Such an image of the throne of God to set out his royaltie, the other Prophets doe describe, but principally Daniel where he saith, that when God sate him downe in his throne of iudgement, there stood by a thousand thousand, and ten thousand companies often thousands of Angels. Aud because God doth by them maruellously shew foorth & declare the might & strength of his hand, therefore they are named strengths, because he exerciseth and vseth his authoritie in the world by them, therefore they are sometime called principalities, sometime powers, sometime Dominions. Finally, because in them as it were sitteth the glory of God, for this cause also they are called Thrones: though of this last name I will not certainely say, because another exposition doth either as well or better agree with it. But (speaking nothing of that name) the holy Ghost often vseth those other former names to aduance the dignitie of the ministerie of Angels. For it were not reason that those instruments should be let passe without honor, by whom God doth specially shew the presence of his maiestie. Yea, for that reason they are many times called Gods, because in their ministerie, as in a looking glasse, they partly represent vnto vs the Godhead. Although indeede I mislike not this that the olde writers doe expound, that Christ was the Angell, where the Scripture saith, that the Angell of God appeared vnto Abraham, Iacob, Moses, and other, yet oftentimes where mention is made of all the Angels indeed, this name is giuen vnto them. And that ought to seeme no maruell. For if this honor be giuen to Princes and gouernors, that in their office they stand in the steede of God that is soueraigne King and Iudge, much greater cause there is why it should be giuen to the Angels, in whom the brightnesse of the glory of God much more abundantly shineth.

Angels in scripture, termed armies, strengthes, principalities, powers, dominions, thrones, Gods.

6 But the Scripture standeth most vpon teaching vs that, which might most make to our comfort and confirmation of Faith: that is to wit, that the Angels are the distributers and administratours of Gods bountie toward vs. And therefore the Scripture reciteth, that they watch for our safetie: they take vpon them the defence of vs, they direct our waies, they take care that no hurtfull thing betide vnto vs. The sentences are vniuersall, which principally pertaine to Christ the head of the Church, and then to all the faithfull. He hath giuen his Angels charge of thee, to keepe thee in all thy waies. They shall beare thee vp in their hands, lest thou chaunce to hit thy foote against a stone. Againe, the Angell of the Lord standeth round about them that feare him, and he doth deliuer them. Whereby God sheweth that he appointeth to his Angels the defence of them, whom he hath taken in hand to keepe. After this order the Angell of the Lord doth comfort Agar when she fled away, and commandeth her to be reconciled to her mistres. God promiseth to Abraham his seruant an Angell to be the guide of his iourney. Iacob in blessing of Ephraim and Manasses prayeth, that the Angell of the Lord by whom he himselfe had been deliuered from all euill, may make them prosper. So the Angell was set to defend the tentes of the people of Israel. And so oft as it pleased God to reskew Israel out of the hands of their enemies, he raised vp reuengers by the ministrie of Angels. So finally (to the end I need not to rehearse many moe) the Angels ministred to Christ and were ready assistant to him in all necessities. They brought tydings to the women of his resurrection, and to the disciples of his glorious comming. And so to fulfill their office of defending vs, they fight against the deuill and all enemies, and doe execute the vengeance of God vpon them, that are bent against vs. As we read that the Angell of God to deliuer Hierusalem from the siege, slew in one night an hundred fowerscore and fiue thousand in the campe of the King of Assyria.

Whether euery man haue his peculiar Angell to attend vpon him, is an idle and a needelesse question.

7 But whether to euery of the faithfull be a seuerall Angell assigned for their defence, I dare not certainely affirme. Surely when Daniel bringeth in the Angell of the Persians, & the Angell of the Grecians, he sheweth that he ment, that there are to kingdomes and prouinces certaine Angels appointed as gouernours. And when Christ saith that the angels of children do alway behold the face of the father, he seemeth to meane, that there are certaine Angels to whom the preseruation of them is giuen in charge. But I cannot tell whether we ought therby to gather, that euery one hath his angell set ouer him. But this is to be holden for certaintie, that not one Angell onely hath care of euery one of vs, but that they all by one consent doe watch for our safetie. For it is spoken of all the Angels togither, that they more reioyce of one sinner conuerted to repentance, than of ninetie and nine iust that haue stand still in their righteousnesse. And it is said of moe Angels than one, that they cōueyed the soule of Lazarus into the bosome of Abraham. And not without cause did Elizeus shew to his seruant so many fiery chariots that were peculiarly appointed for him. But one place there is that seemeth more plaine than the rest to proue this point. For when Peter being brought out of prison knocked at the doores of the house where the brethren were assembled, whē they could not imagine that it was he, they said it was his Angell. It should seeme that this came in their minde by the common opinion, that to euery of the faithfull are assigned their Angels for gouernours. Albeit yet here it may be answered that it may well bee, notwithstanding any thing that there appeareth, that we may thinke it was any one Angell, to whom God had giuen charge of Peter for that time, and yet not to be his continuall keeper: as the common people doe imagine that there are appointed to euery one two Angels, as it were diuers Ghosts, a good Angell and a badde. But it is not worth trauaile, curiously to search for that which doth not much import vs to know. For if this doe not content a man, that all degrees of the army of heauen doe watch for his safetie, I doe not see what he can be the better, if he vnderstand that there is one Angell peculiarly appointed to keepe him. And they which restraine vnto one Angell the care that God hath to euery one of vs, doe great wrong to themselues, and to all the members of the Church: as if that power to succour vs had beene vainly promised vs, wherewith being enuironed and defended, we should fight the more boldly.

Luk. 15. 7. Luk. 16. 23. 2. King. 16. 17. Act. 12. 15.

The different degrees of honour amongst Angels, and the certaintie of their number are things vnknowne.

8 They that dare take vpon them to define of the multitude and degrees of Angels, let them looke well what foundation they haue. I grant Michael is called in Daniel, the great Prince, and with Iude, the Archangell. And Paul saith, it shall be an Archangell that shall with sound of trumpet call men to the iudgement. But who can thereby appoint the degrees of honours betweene Angels, or discerne one from another by speciall markes, and appoint euery one his place and standing? For the two names that are in Scripture, Michael and Gabriel, and if you list to adde the third out of the historie of Tobie, may by their signification seeme to be giuen to the Angels, according to the capacitie of our weaknes, although I had rather leaue that exposition at large. As for the number of them, we heare by Christs mouth of many Legions, by Daniel many companies of ten thousands, the seruant of Elizeus sawe many chariots full: and this declareth that they are a great multitude, that it is said, that doe campe round about them that feare God. As for shape, it is certaine, that spirits haue none, and yet the Scripture for the capacitie of our wit doth not in vaine vnder Cherubin and Seraphin paint vs out Angels with wings, to the intent we should not doubt that they will be euer with incredible swiftnesse, readie to succour vs, so soone as neede shall require, as if the lightning sent from heauen should flie vnto vs with such swiftnesse as it is wonted. Whatsoeuer more than this may be sought of both these points, let vs beleeue it to be of that sort of mysteries, wherof the full reuelation is deferred to the last day. Wherefore let vs remember to take heed both of too much curiositie in searching, and too much boldnes in speaking.

Mat.26.55. Dan.7.10. Psal.34.8.

9 But this one thing which many troublesome doe call in doubt, is to be holden for certaintie, that Angels are ministring spirits, whose seruice God vseth for the defence of his, and by whom he both distributeth his benefits among men, and also putteth his other works in execution. It was in the old time the opinion of the Sadduces, that by Angels is ment nothing else, but either the motions that God doth inspire in men, or the tokens that he sheweth of his power. But against this errour crie out so many testimonies of Scripture, that it is maruell that so grosse ignorance could be suffred in that people. For to omit those places that I haue before alleaged, where are recited thousands and Legions of Angels: where ioy is giuen vnto them: where it is said that they vphold the faithfull with their hands, and carie their soules into rest: that they see the face of the Father, and such like: there are other places whereby it is cleerly prooued, that they are indeed spirits of a nature that hath substance. For whereas Stephen and Paul doe say, that the law was giuen by the hand of Angels, and Christ saith, that the elect after the resurrection shal be like vnto Angels: that the day of iudgement is not knowne to the very Angels: that he shall then come with his holie Angels: howsoeuer they be writhed, yet must they so be vnderstanded. Likewise when Paul charged Timothie before Christ and his chosen Angels, to keepe his commandements, he meaneth not qualities or inspirations without substance, but very spirits. And otherwise it standeth not together that is written in the Epistle to the Hebrues, that Christ is become more excellent than Angels, that the world is not made subiect vnto them: that Christ tooke vpon him not their nature, but the nature of man. If we meane not the blessed Spirits, to whom may these comparisons agree? And the author of that Epistle expoundeth himselfe, where he placeth in the kingdome of heauen the soules of the faithfull and the holy Angels together. Also the same that we haue alreadie alleaged, that the Angels of children doe alway behold the face of God, that they doe reioyce at our safetie, that they maruell at the manifold grace of God in the Church, that they are subiect to Christ, the head. To the same purpose serueth this, that they so oft appeared to the holy Fathers in the forme of men, that they talked with them, that they were lodged with them. And Christ himselfe for the principall preeminence that he hath in the person of the Mediatour, is called an Angell. This I thought good to touch by the way, to furnish the simple with defence against those foolish and reasonlesse opinions, that many ages agoe raised by Satan doe now and then spring vp againe.

Against the opinion of the Sadduces, who denied that there are any such spirits as we call Angels.

10 Now it resteth, that we seeke to meete with that superstition which is commonly wont to creepe in, where it is said: that Angels are the ministers and deliuerers of all good things vnto vs. For by and by mans reason falleth to this point, to thinke that therefore all honor ought to be giuen them. So commeth it to passe, that those things which belong onely to God and Christ, are conueied away to Angels. By this meane we see that in certaine ages past, the glory of Christ hath bin many waies obscured, when Angels without warrant of Gods word were loden with immeasurable titles of honour. And of all the vices that we speake against, there is almost none more auncient than this. For it appeareth that Paul himselfe had much to doe with some which so aduanced Angels, that they in maner would haue brought Christ vnder subiection. And therefore he doth so carefully presse this point in his Epistle to the Colossians, that Christ

That which Angels doe for vs, must not cause vs to doe the honour vnto them that we owe to God.

Col.1.16.

Christ is not onely to be preferred before all Angels, but that he is also the authour of all the good things that they haue: to the end we should not forsake him and turne vnto them, which cannot sufficiently helpe themselues, but are faine to draw out of the same fountaine that we doe. Surely forasmuch as there shineth in them a certain brightnes of the maiestie of God, there is nothing whereunto we are more easily enclined, than with a certaine admiration to fall downe in worshipping of them, and to giue vnto them all things that are due onely to God. Which thing Iohn in the Reuelation confesseth to haue chaunced to himselfe, but he addeth withall, that he receiued this answere. See thou doe it not. For I am thy fellow seruant, Worship God.

Our frailtie is the cause why God who might doe all things for vs by himselfe, doth so many things by the ministerie of his Angels.

11 But this danger we shall well beware of, if we doe consider why God vseth rather by them than by himselfe without their seruice to declare his power, to prouide for the safetie of the faithfull, and to communicate the gifts of his liberalitie among them. Surely he doth not this of necessitie, as though he could not be without them: for so oft as pleaseth him, he letteth them alone, and bringeth his worke to passe with an onely becke: so farre is it of, that they be any aid to him, to ease him of the hardnesse thereof. This therefore maketh for the comfort of our weaknes, so that we want nothing that may auaile our minds, either in raising them vp in good hope, or confirming them in assurance. This one thing ought to be enough and enough againe for vs, that the Lord affirmeth that he is our protector. But while we see our selues besieged with so many dangers, so many hurtfull things, so many kindes of enemies: it may be (such is our weakenesse and frailtie) that we be sometime filled with trembling feare, or fall for despaire, vnlesse the Lord after the proportion of our capacitie doe make vs to conceiue his presence. By this meane he not onely promiseth that he will haue care of vs, but also that he hath an innumerable gard to whom he hath giuen in charge to trauell for our safetie, and that so long as we be compassed with the garrison and support of them, whatsoeuer danger betideth, we be without all reach of hurt. I graunt we doe amisse that after this simple promise of the protection of God alone, we still looke about from whence other help may come vnto vs. But for as much as it pleaseth the Lord of his infinite clemencie and gentlenesse to help this our fault, there is no reason why we should neglect his so great benefite. An example thereof we haue in the seruant of Elizeus, which when he saw the hill besieged with the armie of the Syrians, and that there was no way open to escape, was stricken downe with feare, as if his maister and he were then vtterly destroied. Then Elizeus prayed God to open his seruants eies, and by and by he saw the hill furnished with horses and fierie chariots, that is, with a multitude of Angels to keepe him and the Prophet safe. Encouraged with this vision he gathered vp his hart againe, and was able with a dreadlesse minde to looke downe vpon his enemies, with sight of whom he was before in a maner driuen out of his wit.

2. King. 6. 17.

That which God doth vse to relieue our weakenes, must not cause vs to diminish his glorie.

12 Wherefore whatsoeuer is said of the ministerie of Angels, let vs applie it to this end, that ouercomming all distrust, our hope may be the more strongly stablished in God. For these succours are therefore prouided vs of God, that we should not be made afraid with multitude of enemies, as though they could preuaile against his help, but should flie vnto that saying of Elizeus, that there be moe on our side than be against vs. How much then is it against order of reason, that we should be led away from God by Angels, which are ordained for this purpose, to testifie that his help is more present among vs? But they doe leade vs away in deede, if they doe not streight leade vs as it were by the hand to him, that we may haue eie vnto, call vpon, and publish him for our onely helper: if we consider not them to be as his hands that moue themselues to no worke but by his direction: if they doe not hold vs fast in the one Mediatour Christ, so that we may hang wholy of him, leane all vpon him, be caried to him and rest in him. For that which is described in the vision of Iacob, ought to sticke and be fastened in our minds, how Angels descend downe to the earth vnto men, and from men doe goe vp to heauen by a ladder, whereupon standeth the Lord of hostes. Whereby is meant, that by the onely intercession of Christ it commeth to passe, that the ministeries of the Angels doe come vnto vs, as he himselfe affirmeth, saying: Hereafter yee shall see the heauens open and the Angels descending to the sonne of man, Iohn 1. 51. Therefore the seruant of Abraham being committed to the custodie of the Angell, doth not therefore call vpon the Angell to help him, but holpen with that commendation, he prayeth to the Lord, and beſeecheth him to ſhew his mercie to Abraham. For as God doth not therefore make them miniſters of his power and goodneſſe, to the intent to part his glorie with them: ſo doth he not therefore promiſe vs his help in their miniſtration, that we ſhould diuide our confidence betweene him and them. Let vs therefore forſake that Platonicall philoſophie, to ſeeke the way to God by Angels, and to honour them for this purpoſe, that they may make God more gentle vnto vs, which ſuperſtitious and curious men haue from the beginning gone about, and to this day doe continue to bring into our religion.

Plato in Epynonide & Cratilo.

13 As for ſuch things as the Scripture teacheth concerning diuels, they tend in a manner all to this end, that we may be carefull to beware aforehand of their awaits and preparations, and furniſh our ſelues with ſuch weapons as are ſtrong and ſure enough to driue away euen the ſtrongeſt enemies. For whereas Sathan is called the god and prince of the world, whereas he is named the ſtrong armed man, the ſpirit that hath power of the aire, and a roaring Lion: theſe deſcriptions ſerue to no other purpoſe, but to make vs more warie and watchfull, and readier to enter in battell with him. Which is alſo ſometime ſet out in expreſſe words. For Peter after he had ſaid, that the diuell goeth about like a roaring Lion, ſeeking whom he may deuoure, by and by addeth this exhortation, that we ſtrongly reſiſt him by faith. And Paul after he had giuen warning that we wraſtle not with fleſh and bloud, but with the princes of the aire, the powers of darkneſſe, and ſpirituall wickedneſſes, by and by biddeth vs put on ſuch armour as may ſerue for ſo great and dangerous a battell. Wherefore let vs alſo apply all to this end, that being warned how there doth continually approch vpon vs an enemie, yea, an enemie that is in courage moſt hardie, in ſtrength moſt mightie, in policies moſt ſubtle, in diligence and celeritie vnweariable, with all ſorts of engins plenteouſly furniſhed, in skill of warre moſt readie, we ſuffer not our ſelues by ſloth and cowardiſe to be ſurpriſed, but on the other ſide with bold and hardie minds ſet our foote to reſiſt him (and becauſe this warre is onely ended by death) encourage our ſelues to continue. But ſpecially knowing our owne weakeneſſe and vnskilfulneſſe, let vs call vpon the help of God, and enterpriſe nothing but vpon truſt of him, for as much as it is in him onely to giue vs policie, ſtrength, courage and armour.

That which the Scripture hath concerning diuels, is to make vs watchful, not to diſcourage vs.

14 And that we ſhould be the more ſtirred vp and enforced ſo to doe, the Scripture warneth vs, that there are not one or two or a few enemies, but great armies that make warre with vs. For it is ſaid, that Mary Magdalen was deliuered from ſeuen diuels, wherewith ſhe was poſſeſſed. And Chriſt ſaith, that it is the ordinarie cuſtome, that if after a diuell be once caſt out, a man make the place open againe, he bringeth ſeuen ſpirits worſe than himſelfe, and returneth into his poſſeſſion, finding it emptie. Yea it is ſaid that a whole legion beſieged one man. Hereby therefore we are taught, that we muſt fight with an infinite multitude of enemies, leaſt deſpiſing the fewneſſe of them, we ſhould be more ſlacke to enter in battell, or thinking that we haue ſome reſpite in the meane time granted, we ſhould giue our ſelues to idleneſſe. Whereas many times Satan or the diuell is named in the ſingular number, thereby is meant that power of wickedneſſe which ſtandeth againſt the kingdome of Iuſtice. For as the Church and the fellowſhip of Saints haue Chriſt to their head, ſo the faction of the wicked is painted out vnto vs with their prince, that hath the chiefe authoritie among them. After which manner this is ſpoken, Go ye curſed into eternall fire that is prepared for the diuell and his angels.

The reaſon why ſometime many diuels, & ſometimes onely one is mentioned. Mar. 16. 9. Mat. 12. 42. Luk. 8. 30.

Mat. 25. 41.

15 Heere alſo this ought to ſtirre vs vp to a perpetuall warre with the diuell, for that he is euery where called the enemie of God and of vs. For if we haue regard of Gods glory, as it is meete we ſhould, then ought we with all our force to bend our ſelues againſt him, that goeth about to extinguiſh it. If we be affectioned to maintaine the kingdome of Chriſt as we ought, then muſt we needs haue an vnappeaſable warre with him that conſpireth the ruine thereof. Againe, if any care of our owne ſafetie doe touch vs, then ought we to haue neither peace nor truce with him that continually lieth in wait for the deſtruction of it. Such a one is he deſcribed in the third Chapter of Geneſis where he leadeth man away from the obedience that he did owe to God, that he both robbeth robbeth God of his due honour, and throweth man himselfe headlong into destruction. Such a one also is he set foorth in the Euangelists, where he is called an enemie, and is said to scatter tares, to corrupt the seed of eternall life. In summe, that which Christ testifieth of him, that from the beginning he was a murtherer, and a lier, we finde by experience in all his dooings. For he assaileth the truth of God with lies, obscureth the light with darkenesse, entangleth the mindes of men with errors, raiseth vp hatreds, kindleth contentions and strifes, doth all things to this end to ouerthrow the kingdome of God, and drowne men with himselfe in eternall destruction. Whereby appeareth, that he is of nature froward, spitefull, and malicious. For needs must there be great frowardnes in that wit, that is made to assaile the glorie of God and saluation of men. And that doth Iohn speake of in his Epistle, when he writeth, that he sinneth from the beginning. For he meaneth that he is the author, captaine, and principall workeman of all malice and wickednes.

The malice of Satan being ſuch as it is, we muſt haue vnappeaſable war with him.

Iohn 8.44.

16 But forasmuch as the diuell was created by God, let vs remember that this malice which we assigne in his nature, is not by creation, but by deprauation. For whatsoeuer damnable thing he hath, he hath gotten to himselfe by his owne reuolting and fall. Which the scripture therefore giueth vs warning of, least thinking that he came out such a one from God, we should ascribe that to God himselfe which is farthest from him. For this reason doth Christ say that Satan speaketh of his owne when he speaketh lies, and addeth a cause why, for that he stood not still in the truth. Now when he saith that he stood not still in the truth, he sheweth that once he had been in the truth. And when he maketh him the father of lying, he taketh this from him, that he can not lay that fault to God whereof he himselfe is cause to himselfe. Although these things be but shortly and not very plainly spoken, yet this is enough for this purpose, to deliuer the maiestie of God from all slaunder. And what maketh it matter to vs, to know more or to any other purpose concerning diuels? Many perhaps doe grudge, that the Scripture doth not orderly and distinctly in many places set foorth that fall and the cause, manner, time, and fashion thereof. But because these things doe nothing pertaine to vs, it was better, if not to be suppressed wholy, yet to be but lightly touched, and that partly, because it was not beseeming for the holy Ghost to feede curiositie with vaine histories without any fruite: and we see that it was the Lords purpose to put nothing in his holy oracles but that which we should learne to edificatiō. Therfore, least we our selues should tarie long vpon things superfluous, let vs be content shortly to know thus much concerning the nature of diuels, that at the first creation they were the Angels of God: but by swaruing out of kinde, they both destroyed themselues, and are become instruments of destruction to other. Thus much, because it was profitable to be knowne, is plainly taught in Peter and Iude. God spared not (say they) his Angels which had sinned, and not kept their beginning, but had forsaken their dwelling place. And Paul naming the elect Angels, doth without doubt secretly by implication set the reprobate Angels in comparison against them.

2.Pet.2.4. Iude 1.6. 1.Tim.5.20.

That Satan stubbornely resisteth God, it is by Gods owne sufferance: but the will of God dispatcheth the effects which come from Satan, and turneth them to good.

Iob. 1.6. & 2.1. 1.King.22.20. 1.Sam.16.14. & 18.10. Psal.34. 2.Thess.2.9.

17 As for the discord and strife that we say is betweene God and Satan, we must so take it that still we hold this for certaine, that he can doe nothing but by the will and sufferance of God. For we reade in the historie of Iob, that he presented himselfe before God to receiue his commandements, and durst not go forward to doe any enterprise till he had obteined licence. So when Achab was to be deceiued he tooke vpō him that he would be the Spirit of lying in the mouth of all the Prophets, and so being sent of God he performed it. For this reason is he called the euill spirit of the Lord that tormented Saul, because by him as with a scourge the sinnes of the wicked king were punished. And in another place it is written, that the plagues were laid vpon the Ægyptians by the euill angels. According to these particular examples Paul doth generally testifie, that the blinding of the wicked is the worke of God, whereas before he had called it the working of Satan. It is euident therefore that Satan is vnder the power of God, and so gouerned by his authoritie that he is compelled to doe him seruice. Now when we say that Satan resisteth God, that the works of Satan disagree with the works of God, we doe therewithall affirme that this disagreement and strife hangeth vpon the sufferance of God. I speake not now of his will, nor of his endeuor, but of the effect onely. For sith sith the diuell is wicked of nature, he is not inclined to obey the will of God, but is wholly caried to stubbornesse and rebellion. This therefore he hath of himselfe and of his owne wickednesse, that of desire and purpose he withstandeth God. And by this wickednesse he is stirred vp to the enterprising of those things that he knoweth to be most against God. But because God holdeth him fast tied and restrained with the bridle of his power, he executeth onely those things that are granted him from God. And so doth he obey his creator whether he will or no, because he is constrained to applie his seruice whither soeuer God compelleth him.

18 Now because God boweth the vncleane Spirits hither and thither as pleaseth him, he so tempereth this gouernement, that they exercise the faithfull with battell, they set vpon them out of ambushes, they assaile them with inuasions, they presse them with fighting, and oftentimes wearie them, trouble them, make them afraid, and sometime wound them, but neuer ouercome nor oppresse them. But the wicked they subdue and draw away, they raigne vpon their soules and bodies, and abuse them as bondslaues to all mischieuous doings. As for the faithfull, because they are vnquieted of such enemies, therefore they heare these exhortations. Doe not giue place to the diuell. The diuell your enemie goeth about as a roaring lyon, seeking whom he may deuoure, whom resist yee being strong in faith, and such like. Paul confesseth that he himselfe was not free from this kind of strife, when he saith, that for a remedie to tame pride, the Angel of Satan was giuen to him by whom he might be humbled. This exercise therefore is common to all the children of God. But because that same promise of the breaking of Satans head, pertaineth generally to Christ, and to all his members, therefore I say, that the faithfull can neuer be ouercome nor oppressed by him. They are many times striken downe, but they are neuer so astonied withall, but that they recouer themselues. They fall downe many times with violence of strokes, but they are after raised vp againe: they are wounded, but not deadly. Finally, they so labour in all the course of their life that in the end they obtaine the victorie: but I speake not this of euery doing of theirs. For we know that by the iust vengeance of God Dauid was for a time giuen ouer to Satan, by his motion to number the people: and not without cause Paul saith there is hope of pardon, although any haue been entangled with the snares of the diuell. Therefore in another place the same Paul saith, that the promise aboue alleaged is begun in this life, wherein we must wrastle, and is performed after our wrastling ended: when he saith, the God of peace shall shortly beate downe Satan vnder your feete. This victorie hath alway fully beene in our head Christ, because the Prince of the world had nothing in him, but in vs that are his members it doth now partly appeare, and shall be perfited, when being vnclothed of our flesh by which we are yet subiect to weakenesse, we shall be full of the power of the Holy Ghost. In this maner when the kingdome of Christ is raised vp and aduaunced, Satan with his power falleth downe, as the Lord himselfe saith, I saw Satan fall as a lightning downe from heauen. For by this answere he confirmeth that which the Apostles had reported of the power of his preaching: Againe, When the Prince possesseth his owne pallace, all things that he possesseth are in peace, but when there commeth a stronger, he is throwen out, &c. And to this end Christ in dying ouercame Satan which had the power of death, and triumphed vpon all his armies, that they should not hurt the Church, for otherwise they would euery moment an hundred times destroy it. For (considering what is our weakenes, and what is his furious strength) how could we stand, yea neuer so little time against his manifold and continuall assaults, but being supported by the victory of our captaine? Therefore God suffereth not the Diuell to raigne ouer the soules of the faithfull, but onely deliuereth him the wicked and vnbeleeuing to gouerne, whom God doth not vouchsafe to haue reckoned in his flocke. For it is said, that he possesseth this world without controuersie till he be thrust out by Christ. Againe, that he doth blinde all them that beleeue not the Gospell. Againe, that he performeth his worke in the stubborne children, and woorthely, for all the wicked are the vessels of his wrath. Therefore to whom should they be rather subiect than to the minister of Gods vengeance? Finally, they are said to be of their father the Diuell, because as the faithfull are heereby knowne to be the children of God, because they beare his image: so they be the image of Satan into which

Diuels are really subsisting spirits, and not affections onely, or perturbatiõs of the minde.

19 As we haue before confuted that trifling Philosophie concerning the holie Angels, which teacheth that they are nothing else but good inspirations or motions, which God stirreth vp in the minds of men: so in this place must we confute them that fondly say, that diuels are nothing else but euill affections or perturbations of the mind, that are thrust into vs by our flesh. That may we shortly doe, because there be many testimonies of Scripture, and those plaine enough vpon this point. First, where the vncleane Spirits are called Angels, Apostataes, which haue swarued out of kinde from their beginning, the very names doe sufficiently expresse, that they are not motions or affections of minds, but rather indeede as they be called mindes or spirits endued with sense and vnderstanding. Likewise, whereas both Christ and Iohn doe compare the children of God with the children of the Diuell: were it not an vnfit comparison, if the name of the Diuell signified nothing else but euill inspirations? And Iohn addeth somewhat more plainely, that the Diuell sinneth from the beginning. Likewise, when Iude bringeth in Michael the Archangell fighting with the Diuell, doubtlesse he setteth against the good Angell an euill and rebellious Angell. Wherewith agreeth that which is read in the historie of Iob, that Satan appeared with the holy Angels before God. But most plaine of all are those places that make mention of the punishment which they begin to feele by the iudgement of God, and specially shall feele at the resurrection. Sonne of Dauid, why art thou come before the time to torment vs? Againe, Goe ye cursed into eternall fire t hat is prepared for the Diuell and his Angels. Againe, If he spared not his owne Angels that had sinned, but cast them downe into hell, and deliuered them into chaines of darknesse to be kept vnto damnation, &c. How fond should these speeches be, that the Diuels are ordeined to eternall iudgement, that fire is prepared for them, that they are now alreadie tormented and vexed by the glorie of Christ: if there were no diuels at all? But because the matter needeth no disputation among them that beleeue the word of the Lord, and little good is done with testimonies of Scripture among those vaine students of speculation, whom nothing pleaseth but that which is new: I suppose I haue performed that which I purposed, that is, that the godly minds should be furnished against such fond errours, wherewith vnquiet men doe trouble both themselues and other that be more simple. But it was good to touch this, least any entangled with that errour, while they thinke they haue none to stand against them, should waxe more slowe and vnprouided to resist.

The consideration of things which God hath created is fruitefull.

20 In the meane time let it not be wearisome vnto vs, in this so beautifull a stage to take godlie delight of the manifest and ordinarie workes of God. For, as I haue elsewhere alreadie said, though this be not the chiefe, yet is it in order the first doctrine of Faith, to remember, that what way soeuer we turne our eies, all that we see are the works of God, and with godly consideration to wey for what end God did make them. Therfore that we may conceiue by faith so much as behooueth vs to know of God, it is good first of all to learne the historie of the creation of the world, how it is shortly rehearsed by Moses, and afterward more largely set out by holie men, specially by Basile and Ambrose. Out of it we shall learne that God by the power of his word and spirit created heauen and earth of nothing, and thereof brought foorth all liuing creatures, and things without life, with maruellous order disposed the innumerable varietie of things, to euery thing he gaue the proper nature, assigned their offices, appointed their places and abidings, and where all things are subiect to corruption, yet hath he so prouided, that of all sorts some shall be preserued to the last day, and therefore some he cherisheth by secret meanes, and powreth now and then, as it were a new liuelinesse into them, and to some he hath giuen the power to increase by generation, that in their dying that whole kinde should not die together. So hath he maruellously garnished the heauen and the earth, with so absolutely perfect plentie, varietie, and beautie of all things as possibly might be, as it were a large and gorgeous house furnished and stored with abundance of most finely chosen stuffe, last of all how in framing Man, and adorning him with so goodly beautie, and with so many and so great gifts, he hath shewed in him the most excellent example of all his works. But because it is not my purpose at this present to set foorth at large the creation of the world, let it suffice to haue once againe touched touched these few things by the way. For it is better, as I haue already warned the readers, to fetch a fuller vnderstanding of this matter out of Moses, and other, that haue faithfully and diligently conueyed the historie of the world by writing to perpetuall memorie.

21 It is to no purpose, to make much adoe in disputing, to what end the consideration of the works of God ought to tend, or to what marke it ought to be applied: for as much as in other places already a great part of this question is declared, so much as belongeth to our present purpose may in few words be ended. Truely, if we were minded to set out as it is woorthy, how inestimable wisedome, power, iustice, and goodnesse of God appeareth in the framing of the world, no eloquence, no garnishment of speech could suffice the largenesse of so great a matter. And no doubt it is Gods pleasure that we should be continually occupied in so holy a meditation, that while we behold in his creatures as in looking glasses the infinite riches of his wisedome, iustice, bountie and power, we should not run ouer them, as it were with a flying eie, or with a vaine wandring looke, as I may so call it, but that we should with consideration rest long vpon them, cast them vp and downe earnestly and faithfully in our mindes, and oft repeate them with remembrance. But because we are now busied in that kinde that pertaineth to order of teaching, it is meete that we omit those things that require long declamations. Therefore, to be short, let the readers know that then they haue conceiued by faith, what this meaneth, that God is the creator of heauen & earth, if they first follow this vniuersall rule, that they passe not ouer with not considering or forgetfulnesse of those vertues, that God presenteth to be seene in his creatures, then, that they so learne to apply themselues, that they may therewith be throughly moued in their hearts. The first of those we doe when we consider how excellent a workemans worke it was to place and aptly set in so well disposed order the multitude of the stars that is in heauen, that nothing can be deuised more beautifull to behold: to set and fasten some of them in their standings so that they cannot mooue, and to other some, to graunt a free course, but so that in mooving they wander not beyond their appointed space, so to temper the motion of them all, that it may diuide in measure the daies and nights, monethes, yeeres, and seasons of the yeere, and to bring this inequalitie of daies which we daily see to such a tempered order that it hath no confusion. Likewise, when we marke his power in sustaining so great a body, in gouerning the so swift whirling about of the engine of heauen, and such like. For these few examples doe sufficiently declare, what it is to record the power of God in the creation of the world. For else, if I should trauell as I said, to expresse it all in words, I should neuer make an end, forasmuch as there are so many miracles of the power of God, so many tokens of his goodnesse, so many examples of his wisedome, as there be formes of things in the world, yea, as there be things either great or small.

The first thing that we are to weigh attentiuely when we behold heauen and earth is, what vertues of God there are presented to be seene in creatures.

22 Now remaineth the other part which commeth neerer to faith, that while we consider that God hath ordained all things for our guard and safetie, and therewithall doe feele his power and grace in our selues, and in so great good things that he hath bestowed vpon vs: we may thereby stir vp our selues to the trust, inuocation, praise and loue of him. Now, as I haue before said, God himselfe hath shewed in the very order of creation, that for mans sake he created all things. For it is not without cause that he diuided the making of the world into sixe daies, whereas it had bene as easie for him in one moment to haue in all points accomplished his whole worke, as it was by such proceeding from peece to peece to come to the end of it. But then it pleased him to shew his prouidence and fatherly carefulnesse toward vs, that before he made man he prepared all that he foresaw should be profitable for him and fit for his preseruation. How great vnthankfulnesse now should it be to doubt, whether this good Father doe care for vs, whom we see to haue bin carefull for vs ere that we were borne? How wicked were it to tremble for distrust lest his goodnes would at any time leaue vs destitute in necessitie, which we see was displaied for vs being not yet borne, with great abundance of all good things? Beside that we heare by Moses that by his liberalitie all that euer is in the world is made subiect to vs. Sure it is that he did it not to mocke vs with an emptie name of gift. Therefore we shall neuer lacke any thing, so far as it shall be auailable for our preseruation. Finally to make an end, so oft as we name God the creator of heauen and earth let this come in our minds withall, that the disposition of all things which he hath created, is in his hand and power, and that we are his children whom he hath taken into his owne charge and keeping to foster and bring vp: that we may looke for all good things at his hand, and assuredly, that he will neuer suffer vs to lacke things needfull for our safetie, to the end our hope should hang vpon none other: that whatsoeuer we desire, our prayers may be directed to him: of what thing soeuer we receiue profit, we may acknowledge it to be his benefit, and confesse it with thanksgiuing: that being allured with so great sweetnes of his goodnes and liberalitie, we may studie to loue and honour him with all our heart.

The fruit of our considering the creatures of God must be the feeling of his goodnes toward our selues, and our growing thereby in faith hope & godlinesse.

THE FIFTEENTH CHAPTER.

What a one man was created: wherein there is intreated of the powers of the soule, of the image of God, of freewill, and of the first integritie of nature.

Mans first excellencie doth stop their mouthes which blame God with mens euils, and his being made so excellent out of the earth, doth both humble him, and commend his maker.

NOw must we speake of the creation of man, not onely because he is among all the works of God the most noble and most excellent example of his iustice, wisedome and goodnes: but also because as we haue said in the beginning, we cannot plainly and perfectly know God, vnlesse we haue withall a mutuall knowledge of our selues. Although the same knowledge be of two sorts, the one to know what we were created at the first beginning, the other to know what our estate began to be after the fall of Adam (for it were but to small profit for vs to know our creation, vnlesse we did also in this lamentable fall know what is the corruption and deformitie of our nature:) yet at this time we will be content with description of our nature when it was pure. And before we descend to this miserable estate whereunto man is now in thraldome, it is good to learne what a one he was created at the beginning. For we must take heed that in precisely declaring onely the naturall euils of man, we seeme not to impute them to the author of nature. For vngodlines thinketh hirselfe to haue sufficient defense in this colour, if it may lay for hirselfe that whatsoeuer fault she hath, the same did after a certaine maner proceede from God, and sticketh not if she be accused, to quarrell with God, and to lay the fault vpon him whereof she is worthily accused. And they that would seeme to speake somewhat more reuerently of the maiestie of God, yet doe willinglie seeke to excuse their owne wickednesse, by nature, not considering that therein though not openly they blame God also, to whose reproch it should fall if it were prooued that there is any fault in nature. Sith then wee see that our flesh gapeth for all the waies to escape, whereby she thinketh the blame of her owne euils may any way be put off from her, we must diligentlie trauell to meete with this mischiefe. Therefore we must so handle the calamitie of mankinde that we cut off all excuse, and deliuer the iustice of God from all accusation. Afterward in place conuenient we shall see how farre men be now from that pureness that was giuen to Adam. And first we must remember, that in this that man was taken out of earth and clay, a bridle was put vpon his pride, for there is no greater absurditie, then for them to glorie in their excellencie, that doe not onely dwell in a cottage of clay, but also are themselues in part but earth and ashes. But forasmuch as God did not onely vouchsafe to giue life vnto an earthen vessell, but also it was his pleasure that it should be the dwelling house of an immortall Spirit, Adam might iustly glorie in so great liberalitie of his maker.

Eccle. 12. 7. Luke 23. 46. Act. 7. 59.

2 Now it is not to be doubted that man consisteth of soule and body, and by the name of soule I meane an immortall essence, and yet created, which is the nobler part of him. Sometime it is called the Spirit. Albeit when these two names Soule and Spirit are ioyned together, they differ one frō the other in signification, yet when Spirit is set by it selfe it meaneth as much as Soule. As, when Salomon speaking of death, saith, that then the Spirit returneth to him that gaue it. And Christ commending his Spirit to his Father, and Stephen his Spirit to Christ, doe both meane none other thing, but that when the Soule is deliuered from the prison of the flesh, God is the perpetuall keeper of it. As for them that imagine that the Soule is therefore called a Spirit, because cause it is a breath or a power by God inspired or powred into bodies which yet hath no essence, both the thing it selfe, and all the Scripture sheweth, that they doe too grosly erre. True it is, that while men are fastned to the earth more than they ought to be, they waxe dull, yea, because they are estranged from the Father of lights they are blinded with darknesse, so that they doe not thinke vpon this, that they shall remaine aliue after death. And yet is not that light so quenched in darknesse, but that they be touched with some feeling of immortalitie. Surely the conscience which discerning betweene good and euill, answereth the iudgement of God, is an vndoubted signe of an immortall spirit. For how could a motion without essence attaine to come to the iudgement seate of God, and throw it selfe into feare by finding her owne guiltinesse? For the bodie is not mooued with feare of a spirituall panne, but that falleth onely vpon the Soule. Whereby it followeth, that the Soule hath an essence. Moreouer the very knowledge of God doth proue that the soules which ascend vp aboue the world are immortall: for a vanishing liuelinesse were not able to attaine to the fountaine of life. Finally, for as much as so many excellent gifts wherewith mans mind is endued, doe cry out that there is some diuine thing engrauen in it, there are euen so many testimonies of an immortall essence. For that sense which is in brute beasts, goeth not out of the bodie, or at least extendeth no further than to things presently set before it. But the nimblenes of the mind of man which vieweth the heauen and earth and secrets of nature, and comprehending all ages in vnderstanding and memory, digesteth euery thing in order, and gathereth things to come by things past, doth plainely shew that there lieth hidden in man a certaine thing seuerall from the body. We conceiue by vnderstanding the inuisible God and Angels, which the body cannot doe. We know things that be right, iust, & honest, which are hidden from the bodily senses. Therfore it must needs be that the spirit is the seate of this vnderstanding. Yea, and our sleepe it selfe, which astonieth a man, and seemeth to take life away from him, is a plain witnesse of immortalitie, forasmuch as it doth not onely minister vnto vs thoughts of those things that neuer were done, but also foreknowings of things for time to come. I touch these things shortly which euen prophane writers doe excellently set out with more gorgeous garnishment of words: but with the godly readers a simple putting in mind of them shal be sufficient. Now if the Soule were not a certaine thing by it selfe seuerall from the body, the Scripture would not teach that we dwell in houses of clay, that by death we remoue out of the tabernacle of the flesh, that we doe put off that which is corruptible, finally at the last day we may receiue reward euery man as he hath behaued himselfe in his body. For these places and other that we doe each where commonly light vpon, doe not onely manifestly distinguish the soule from the body, but also in giuing to the soule the name of Man, doe shew that it is the principall part. Now whereas Paul doth exhort the faithfull to clense themselues from all defiling of the flesh and the Spirit, he maketh two parts of man wherein abideth the filthinesse of sinne. And Peter where he calleth Christ the shepheard and bishop of soules should haue spoken fondly if there were no soules about whom he might execute that office. Neither would that conueniently stand together which he saith of the eternall saluation of soules, and where he biddeth to clense our soules, and where he saith that euill desires doe fight against the soule, and where the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues saith, that the Pastors do watch that they may yeeld account for our soules, vnlesse it were true that soules had a proper essence. To the same purpose serueth it that Paul calleth God for witnesse to his owne soule, because it could not be called in iudgement before God vnlesse it were subiect to punishmēt. And this is also more plainly expressed in the words of Christ, whē he biddeth vs to feare him, which after that he hath killed the body, can throw the soule into hell fier. Now where the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues doth distinguish the fathers of our flesh from God, which is the onely Father of spirits, he would not otherwise more plainely affirme the essence of Soules. Moreouer, if the soules remained not aliue being deliuered from the prisons of their bodies, Christ should very fondly haue brought in the soule of Lazarus ioying in the bosome of Abraham, and againe, the soule of the rich man subiect to horrible tormēts. The same thing doth Paul confirme, when he teacheth that we wander abroad from God, so long as we dwell in the flesh, and that we enioy his presence being out of the flesh.

Act. 23. 8.

3 Alſo a ſtrong proofe hereof may be gathered of this, where it is ſaid, that man is create like to the Image of God. For although the glorie of God doe appeare in the outward ſhape of man, yet is it noe doubt that the proper ſeat of the Image of God is in the Soule. I doe not deny that as concerning our outward ſhape, in aſmuch as the ſame doth diſtinguiſh and ſeuer vs from brute beaſts, we doe alſo therein more neerely approach to God then they: neither will I much ſtand againſt them which thinke that this is to be accounted of the Image of God, that where all other liuing creatures doe grouelingwiſe behold the ground, to man is giuen an vpright face, and he is commanded to looke vpon the heauen, and to aduance his countenance toward the ſtarres: ſo that this remaine certaine, that the image of God which appeareth or ſhineth in theſe outward ſignes, is ſpirituall. For Oſiander (whom his writings declare to haue beene in fickle imaginations fondly witty) referring the image of God without difference, as well to the bodie as to the ſoule, mingleth heauen and earth together. For he ſaith, that the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy ghoſt did ſettle their image in man, becauſe though Adam had ſtood without falling, yet ſhould Chriſt haue become man. And ſo by there opinion the body that was appointed for Chriſt, was but an example or figure of that bodily ſhape which then was formed. But where ſhall he finde that Chriſt is the image of the Spirit? I graunt indeed that in the perſon of the Mediator ſhineth the glory of the whole Godhead. But how ſhall the eternall word be called the image of the Spirit whom he goeth before in order? Finally, it ouerthroweth the diſtinction betweene the Sonne and the Holy ghoſt, if he doe here call him his image. Moreouer I would faine learne of him how Chriſt doth reſemble the Holy ghoſt in the fleſh that he tooke vpon him, and by what markes and features he doth expreſſe the likeneſſe of him. And whereas this ſaying: Let vs make man after our image, doth alſo belong to the perſon of the Sonne, it followeth, that he muſt be the image of himſelfe, which is againſt all reaſon. Beſide that, if Oſianders inuention be beleeued, man was faſhioned onely after the figure and paterne of Chriſt in that he was man, and ſo that forme out of which Adam was taken, was Chriſt, in that that he was to be clothed with fleſh, whereas the Scripture in a far other meaning teacheth, that he was create in the image of God. But their ſubtle inuention is more colourable which do thus expound it, that Adam was create in the image of God, becauſe he was faſhioned like vnto Chriſt, which is the onely image of God. But that expoſition alſo is not ſound. Alſo ſome interpreters make a great diſputation about Image and Likenes, while they ſeeke a difference betwene thoſe two words, where is no difference at all, ſaying, that this word Likenes is added to expound the other. Firſt we know that among the Hebrues ſuch repetitions are comon, wherein they expreſſe one thing twiſe: and in the thing it ſelfe there is no doubt, but that man is therefore called the image of God, becauſe he is like to God. Whereby appeareth that they are to be laughed at, which doe ſubtlely argue about the words, whether they appoint Zelem, that is to ſay, Image in the ſubſtance of the ſoule, or Demuth, that is to ſay, Likeneſſe in the qualities, or what other thing ſoeuer it be that they teach. For whereas God determined to create man after his owne image, this being ſomewhat darkely ſpoken, he doth as by way of explication repeate it in this ſaying, After his likenes, as if he would haue ſaid, that he would make man, in whom he would repreſent himſelfe as an image, becauſe of the markes of likenes grauen in him. And therefore Moſes a litle after reciting the ſame thing, doth repeate the image of God twiſe, leauing out the name of Likenes. And it is a trifling obiection that Oſiander maketh, that not a part of man, or the ſoule onely with the gifts thereof, is called the image of God, but the whole Adam which had his name giuen him of the earth, from whence he was taken. Trifling, I ſay, will all readers that haue their ſound wit iudge this obiection. For where whole man is called mortall, yet is not the ſoule thereby made ſubiect to mortalitie. Againe, where he is called a liuing creature endued with reaſon, it is not thereby ment, that the body hath reaſon and vnderſtanding. Although therefore the ſoule is not the whole man, yet is

Man was created like to God, not in the faſhion of his body, nor becauſe he was framed at the firſt according to the ſhape which the ſonne of God ſhould afterwards take vpon him: nor becauſe he was like vnto Chriſt, who is properly Gods image, but for that in his firſt integritie he reſembled the excellencie of his Creator.

Gen. 1. 27.

Gen. 1. 16.

it not inconuenient, that man in reſpect of the ſoule be called the image of God, albeit I hold ſtill that principle which I haue before ſtabliſhed, that the image of God extendeth to the whole excellencie, whereby the nature of man hath preeminence among all kind of liuing creatures. Therefore in that word is noted the integritie that man had when he was endued with right vnderſtanding, when he had his affection framed according to reaſon, and all his ſenſes gouerned in right order, and when in excellent gifts he did truly reſemble the excellencie of his Creator. And though the principall ſeate of the image of God were in the mind and hart, or in the ſoule and the powers thereof, yet was there no part of man, not ſo much as the body, wherein did not ſome ſparks thereof appeare. Certaine it is that alſo in all the parts of the world, there doe ſhine ſome reſemblance of the glory of God: whereby we may gather that where it is ſaid, that his image is in man, there is in ſo ſaying a certaine ſecret compariſon, that aduanceth man aboue all other creatures, and doth as it were ſeuer him from the common ſort. Neither is it to be denied, that the Angels were create after the likeneſſe of God, ſith (as Chriſt himſelfe teſtifieth) our chiefe perfection ſhall be to become like vnto them. But not without cauſe doth Moſes by that peculiar title ſet foorth the grace of God toward vs, ſpecially, where he compareth onely viſible creatures with man. Mat.22.30.

4 But yet it ſeemeth that there is not giuen a full definition of the image of God, vnleſſe it plainlier appeare in what qualities man excelleth: and whereby he ought to be counted a glaſſe, reſembling the glory of God. But that can be by no other thing better knowen, than by the repairing of mans corrupted nature. Firſt it is doubtleſſe, that when Adam fell from his eſtate, he was by that departure eſtranged from God. Wherefore although we graunt that the image of God was not altogether defaced and blotted out in him, yet was it ſo corrupted, that all that remaineth is but vglie deformitie. Therfore the beginning of recouery of ſafetie for vs, is in that reſtoring which we obtaine by Chriſt, who is alſo for the ſame cauſe called the ſecond Adam, becauſe he reſtored vs vnto true and perfect integritie. For although where Paul doth in compariſon ſet the quickning ſpirit that Chriſt giueth to the faithful, againſt the liuing ſoule wherin Adam was created, he ſetteth foorth the more abundant meaſure of grace in the regeneration: yet doth he not take away this other principall point, that this is the end of our regeneration, that Chriſt ſhould new faſhion vs to the image of God. Therefore in another place he teacheth, that the new man is renued according to the image of him that created him. Wherewith agreeth this ſaying: Put on the new man which is created according to God. Now it is to be ſeene what Paul doth principally comprehend vnder this renuing. Firſt he ſpeaketh of knowledge, and after of pure righteouſnes and holines. Whereby we gather that the image of God was firſt of all to be ſeene in the light of the minde, in the vprightnes of the heart, and ſoundnes of all the parts. For although I graunt that this is a figuratiue phraſe of ſpeech to ſet the part for the whole: yet cannot this principle be ouerthrowen, that that thing which is the chiefe in the renuing of the image of God, was alſo the principall in the creation of him. And for the ſame purpoſe maketh it that in an other place he teacheth, that we beholding the glorie of God with open face, are transformed into the ſame image. Now doe wee ſee how Chriſt is the moſt perfect image of God, according to the which we being faſhioned are ſo reſtored, that in true godlineſſe, righteouſneſſe, pureneſſe, and vnderſtanding, we beare the image of God. Which principle being eſtabliſhed, Oſianders imagination of the ſhape of our body doth eaſily vaniſh away of it ſelfe. Whereas the man alone is in Paul called the image and glory of God, and the woman is excluded from that degree of honor, it appeareth by the reſt of the text, that the ſame is to be applyed onely to ciuill order of policie. But that vnder the name of image, whereof we ſpeake, is comprehended all that belongeth to the ſpirituall and eternall life, I thinke it be alreadie ſufficiently prooued. And the ſame thing doth Iohn confirme in other words: ſaying, that the light which was from the beginning in the eternall word of God was the light of men. For where his purpoſe was to praiſe the ſingular grace of God, whereby man excelleth all liuing creatures, to ſeuer him from the common ſort, becauſe he hath atteined no common life, but ioyned with the light of vnderſtanding, he therewithall ſheweth how he was made after the image of God. Therefore ſith the image of God is the vncorrupted excellencie of the nature of man, which shined in Adam before his fall, and afterward was so corrupted and almost defaced, that nothing remaineth since that ruine, but disordered, mangled, and filthily spotted: yet the same doth in some part appeare in the elect, in so much as they are regenerate, and shall obtaine her full brightnes in heauen. But that we may know on what parts it consisteth, it shall be good to intreate of the powers of the soule. For that speculatiue deuise of Augustine is not sound, where he saith, that the soule is a glasse of the Trinitie, because that there are in it vnderstanding, will, and memorie. Neither is their opinion to be approoued, which set the image of God in the power of dominion giuen vnto him, as if he resembled God onely in this marke, that he is appointed Lord and possessor of all things, whereas indeed the image of God is properly to be sought within him, and not without him, and is an inward good gift of the soule.

The excellencie wherein man reſembled God, conſiſteth in knowledge, and holines, not in the number of the faculties of his minde, nor in the power which God gaue him ouer other creatures.

Lib. de Tri. 10. De ciui. dei. 11.

Man was not made in the likenes of God, because his soule was a portion of the godhead, or because the essentiall iustice of God was poured into him.

5 But before I go any further, it is needfull that I meet with the doting errour of the Manichees, which Seruetto hath attempted to bring in againe in this age. Where it is said, that God breathed the breath of life into the face of man, they thought that the soule did conuay into man the substance of God, as if some portion of the immeasurable God were come into man. But it is easie euen shortly to shew how many grosse and foule absurdities this diuelish errour draweth with it. For if the soule be by deriuation part of the essence of God, it shall follow that the nature of God is subiect not onely to change and passions, but also to ignorance, euill lusts, weakenesse, and all kinds of vices. Nothing is more inconstant then man, because contrarie motions doe tosse and diuersly drowne his soule, oftentimes he is blind by ignorance, oft he yeeldeth as vanquished euen to small tentations, and we know that the soule it selfe is the sinke and receiuer of all filthinesse, all which things we must ascribe to the nature of God, if we grant that the soule is of the essence of God, or a secret inflowing of Godhead. Who would not abhorre this monstrous deuise? Truely indeed doth Paul alleage out of Aratus, that we are the ofspring of God, but in qualitie and not in substance, inasmuch as he hath garnished vs with godly gifts. But in the meane time, to teare in sunder the essence of the Creator, as to say, that euery man doth possesse a part of it, is too much madnesse. Therefore we must certainly hold, that the soules, although the image of God be grauen in them, were no lesse created than the Angels were. And creation is not a powring out of one substance into another, but a beginning of essence made of nothing. And although the spirit of man came from God, and in departing out of the flesh returneth to God, yet is not forthwith to be said, that it was taken out of his substance. And in this point also Osiander, while he glorieth in his illusions, hath entangled himselfe with an vngodly errour, not acknowledging the image of God to be in man without his essentiall iustice, as though God by the inestimable power of his holy spirit could not make vs like vnto himselfe, vnlesse Christ should substantially powre himselfe into vs. With whatsoeuer colour many doe go about to disguise these deceits, yet shal they neuer so beguile the eies of the readers, that are in their right wits, but that they wil easily see that these things sauour of the Manichees error. And where S. Paul intreateth of the restoring of this image, it may be readily gathered out of his words, that man was made of like forme to God, not by inflowing of his substance, but by grace and power of his spirit. For he saith, that in beholding the glory of Christ, we are trãsformed into the same image, as by the Spirit of God, which surely so worketh in vs, that it maketh vs not of one substãce with God.

Act. 17. 28.

2. Cor. 3. 18.

The doctrine of Philosophers concerning the nature and powers of the soule.

6 It were but folly to borrow of the Philosophers a definition of the soule, of whom almost none, except Plato, hath perfectly affirmed it to be an immortall substance. Indeed some other also, that is the Socratiãs, doe touch it, but so as none doth plainly teach that to other, which himselfe was not perswaded. But therefore is Plato of the better iudgement, because he doth in the soule consider the image of God. Some other doe so binde the powers and vertues of the soule to this present life, that being out of the body they leaue to it nothing. Now we haue alreadie taught by the Scripture, that it is a bodilesse substance: now must we adde that although properly it is not comprehended in place, yet it is set in the body, and doth there dwell as in a house, not onely to minister life to all the parts of the body, and to make the instruments therof meet & fitly seruing for the actions that they are appointed for, but also to beare the chiefe office in gouer-

ning the life of man, & that not only about the duties in this earthly life, but also to stir vs vp to the seruice of God. Although this later point in this corruption is not plainly perceiued, yet euen in the vices themselues there remaine imprinted some leauings thereof. For whence commeth it but of shame, that men haue so great care what be reported of them? And whence commeth shame, but of regard of honestie? Whereof the beginning and cause is, that they vnderstand that they are naturally borne to obserue Iustice, in which perswasion is enclosed the seede of religion. For as without all controuersie man was made to meditation of the heauenly life: so is it certaine that the knowledge thereof was engrauen in his soule. And surely man should want the principall vse of his vnderstanding, if he should be ignorant of his owne felicitie, whereof the perfection is, that he be ioyned with God, and therefore it is the chiefe action of the Soule to aspire thereunto. And so the more that euery man studieth to approach vnto God, the more he thereby prooueth himselfe to be endued with reason. As for them that would haue diuers soules in man, that is, a feeling soule, and a reasonable soule, although they seeme to say somewhat by reason prooueable, yet because there is no stedfast certaintie in their reasons, we must reiect them, vnlesse we listed to accomber our selues in things trifling and vnprofitable. A great disagreement say they, there is betweene the instrumentall motions and the part of the Soule endued with reason. As though reason it selfe did not also dissent from it selfe, and some deuises of it doe striue with other some, as they were armies of enemies. But forasmuch as that troublesomenes proceedeth of the corruption of nature, it were amisse to gather thereby, that there are two Soules; because the powers of the Soule doe not agree together, in such well framed order as they ought. But as for more subtle disputation of the powers themselues, I leaue that to the Philosophers. A simple definition shall suffice vs for edification of godlinesse. I graunt that the things that they teach are true, and not onely pleasant but also profitable to be knowen, and well gathered of them, and I forbid not such as are desirous to learne to studie them. First therefore I admit that there are fiue senses, which Plato better liked to call instruments, whereby all obiectes are powred into Common sense, as into a place of receit: then followeth Phantasie, which iudgeth those things one from other that Common sense hath conceiued, next is Reason, to which belongeth the vniuersall iudgement of things: last, is the Vnderstanding mind, which with earnestly bent and quiet viewing beholdeth all those things, that Reason is wont to discourse vpon, and consider. And to the Vnderstanding minde, Reason and Phansie, which are the three powers of the Soule, that rest in knowledge, there doe answere three other that doe rest in Appetite, that is to say, Will, the parts whereof are to couet those things that the Vnderstanding minde and Reason doe lay before it: the power of Anger, which catcheth those things that Reason and Phansie doe minister vnto it. The power of Desiring, which taketh hold of these things that Phansie and Sense presenteth it. Although these things be true, or at the least likely to be true, yet because I feare that they shal more entangle vs with obscurenes, than further vs, I thinke it best to ouerpasse them. If any man list otherwise to diuide the powers of the soule, and to call the one the power of Appetite, which although it be without reason it selfe, yet doth obey Reason, if it be by other meane directed, and to call the other the power of Vnderstanding, which is by it selfe partaker of Reason, I am not much against it, neither will I confute this opinion, that there are three beginnings of doing: that is to say, Sense, Vnderstanding, and Appetite. But let vs rather choose a diuision, that is within the capacitie of all men, which cannot be had of the Philosophers. For they when they meane to speake most plainly, doe diuide the soule into Appetite and Vnderstanding, but either of these they make of two sorts. Vnderstanding, they say, is sometime contemplatiue, which being contented with only knowledge, hath no moouing of action, which thing Cicero thinketh to be expressed by this word ingenium, wit. Sometime they say it is practicall, which by conceiuing of good or euill doth diuersly mooue the will. And Appetite they do diuide into Will and Lust. Will they call that, whē Appetite which they call horme obaieth to reason, & Lust they call that, when the Appetite shaking off the yoke of reason, runneth out to intemperance. So alway they imagine reason to be that in man, whereby man may rightly gouerne himselfe.

Two principall parts of the soule, vnderstanding, and will.

7 But we are constrained somewhat to swarue from this maner of teaching, because the Philosophers which knew not the corruption of mans nature, which came for punishment of his fall, doe wrongfully confound the two very diuers states of man. Let vs therefore thus thinke of it, that there are in the soule of man two parts, which shall serue at this time for our present purpose, that is to say, Vnderstanding and Will. And let it be the office of Vnderstanding, to discerne betweene obiects, or things set before it, as each of them shall seeme worthie to be liked or misliked: and the office of Will, to choose and follow that which vnderstanding saith to be good, and to refuse and flie that which vnderstanding shall disallow. Let vs not here be stayed at all with the nice subtleties of Aristotle, that the minde hath of it selfe no mouing, but that it is choise which mooueth it, which choise he calleth the desiring vnderstanding. But to the end we be not intangled with superfluous questions, let this suffice vs, that the Vnderstanding is as it were the guide and gouernor of the Soule, and that Will hath alwaies regard to the appointment of Vnderstanding, and abideth the iudgement thereof in her desires. According whereunto, Aristotle himselfe hath truely said, that fleeing or following is in Appetite such a like thing, as in the Vnderstanding minde is affirming and denying. Now how certaine the gouernement of Vnderstanding is to direct the Will: that we will consider in another place. Here we meane onely to shew that there can be found no power in the Soule but that may well be said to belong to the one of these two members. And in this sort vnder Vnderstanding we comprehend Sense, which other doe so distinguish, that they say Sense is inclined to pleasure, for which Vnderstanding followeth that which is good: and that so it commeth to passe, that the Appetite of Sense is Concupiscence and Lust, the affection of Vnderstanding is Will. Againe, in steede of the name of Appetite, which they better like, I set the name of Will, which is more commonly vsed.

The perfection of mans vnderstanding and will, in his first creation.

8 God therefore hath furnished the Soule of man with an Vnderstanding minde, whereby he might discerne good from euill, & right from wrong, and hauing the light of reason going before him, might see what is to be followed or forsaken. For which cause the Philosophers haue called this directing part the Guider. To this he hath adioyned Will, to which belongeth choise. With these noble gifts the first state of man excelled, so that he not onely had enough of reason, vnderstanding, wisedome, and iudgement, for the gouernement of this earthly life, but also to clime vp euen to God and to eternall felicitie. Then to haue choise added vnto it, which might direct the Appetites, and order all the instrumentall motions, and that so the Will might be altogether agreeable to the gouernment of reason. In this integritie, man had freewill, whereby if he would he might haue attained eternall life. For here it is out of place to moue question of the secret predestination of God: because we are not now about to discusse what might haue chaunced or not, but what at that time was the nature of man. Adam therefore might haue stand if he would, because he fell not but by his owne will. But because his will was pliable to either side, and there was not giuen him constancie to continue, therefore he so easily fell. Yet his choise of good and euill was free. And not that onely, but also in his vnderstanding minde, and in his will was most great vprightnes, and all his instrumentall parts orderly framed to obedience, vntill by destroying himselfe he corrupted the good things that were in him. From hence commeth it that all the Philosophers were so blinded, for that in a ruine they sought for an vpright building, and for strong ioints in an vniointed ouerthrow. This principle they held, that man could not be a liuing creature, endued with reason, vnlesse there were in him a free choise of good & euill: and they considered, that otherwise all the difference should be taken away betweene vertues and vices, vnlesse man did order his owne life by his own aduise. Thus farre had they said well if there had beene no change in man, which change because they knew not of, it is no maruell though they confound heauen and earth togither, But as for them which professing themselues to be the disciples of Christ, do yet seeke for free will in man, that hath been lost and drowned in spirituall destruction, they in going meane betweene the Philosophers opinions and heauenly doctrine are plainely deceiued, so that they touch neither heauen nor earth. But of these things we shall better speake in place fit for them: now onely this we haue to hold in minde, minde, that man at his first creation was farre other than his posteritie euer since, which taking there beginning from him being corrupted, hath from him receiued an infection deriued to them as it were by inheritance. For then all the parts of his soule were framed to right order, then stood safe the soundnes of his vnderstanding minde, & his will free to choose the good. If any do obiect that it stood but in slipperie state, because his power was but weake. I answere that that state was yet such as sufficed to take from him all excuse, neither was it reasonable to restraine God to this point, to make man such a one as either could not or would not sinne at all. I graunt such a nature had bene better, but therefore precisely to quarrell with God, as though it had bene his dutie to haue giuen that vnto man, is too much iniustice, forasmuch as it was in his owne choise to giue how much pleased him. But why he did not vphold him with the strength of stedfast continuance, that resteth hidden in his owne secret counsell: it is our part onely to be so farre wise as with sobrietie we may. Man receiued in deed to be able if he would, but he had not to will that he might be able. For of this will should haue followed stedfast continuance. Yet is he not excusable, which receiued so much that of his owne will he hath wrought his owne destruction. And there was no necessitie to compell God to giue him any other than a meane will and a fraile will, that of mans fall he might gather matter for his owne glorie.

De correp. & grat. ad Valentin. ca. 12.

THE SIXETEENTH CHAPTER.

That God by his power doth nourish and maintaine the world, which himselfe hath created, and by his prouidence doth gouerne all the parts thereof.

BVt it were very fond and bare to make God a creator for a moment, which doth nothing since he hath once made an end of his worke. And in this point principally ought we to differ from the prophane men, that the presence of the power of God may shine vnto vs no lesse in the continuall state of the world, than in the first beginning of it. For though the mindes of the very wicked in onely beholding of the heauen and earth, are compelled to rise vp vnto the Creator, yet hath faith a certaine peculiar manner by it selfe, whereby it giueth to God the whole praise of creation. And therefore serueth that saying of the Apostle, which we before alleaged, that we doe not vnderstand but by faith, that the world was made by the worde of God. For vnlesse we passe forward euen vnto his prouidence, we doe not yet rightly conceiue what this meaneth, that GOD is the Creator, howsoeuer we doe seeme to comprehend it in minde, and confesse it with tongue. When the sense of the flesh hath once set before it the power of God in the very creation, it resteth there, and when it proceedeth furthest of all, it doth nothing but wey and consider the wisedome, power, and goodnesse of the workman in making such a peece of worke (which things doe of themselues offer and thrust themselues in sight of men whether they will or no) and a certaine generall dooing in preseruing and gouerning the same, vpon which dependeth the power of mooving. Finally it thinketh that the liuely force at the beginning put into all things by God, doth suffice to susteine them. But Faith ought to pierce deeper, that is to say, whom he hath learned to be the creator of all things, by and by to gather that the same is the perpetuall gouernour and preseruer of them: and that not by stirring with an vniuersall motion as well the whole frame of the world, as all the parts thereof, but by susteyning, cherishing and caring for, with singular prouidence euery one of those things that he hath created euen to the least sparrow. So Dauid after he had first said that the world was created by God, by and by descendeth to the continuall course of his prouidence. By the word of the Lord (saith he) the heauens were stablished, and all the power thereof by the Spirit of his mouth. By and by he addeth. The Lord looked downe vpon the sonnes of men, and so the rest that he saith farther to the same effect. For although they doe not all reason so orderly, yet because it were not likely to bee beleeued, that God had care of mens matters, vnlesse he were the maker of the world, nor any man doth earnestly beleeue that God made the world, vnlesse he be perswaded that God hath also care of his workes: therefore not without cause Dauid doth by good order conuey vs from the

the one to the other. Generally in deede both the Philosophers doe teach, and mens mindes doe conceiue that all parts of the world are quickned with the secret inspiration of God. But yet they attaine not so farre as Dauid both himselfe proceedeth and carrieth all the godly with him, saying all thinges waite vpon thee, that thou maist giue them foode in due season. Thou giuest it to them and they gather it. Thou openest thy hand and they are filled with good things. But if thou hide thy face they are troubled. If thou take away their breath, they die and returne to their dust. Againe, if thou send foorth thy Spirit, they are created and thou renewest the face of the earth. Yea, although they agree to the saying of Paul, that we haue our being and are mooued, and doe liue in God, yet are they farre from that earnest feeling of grace which he commendeth vnto vs: because they taste not of Gods speciall care whereby alone his fatherly fauour is knowen.

Psal. 104. 27.

We doe iniurie vnto God when we ascribe the workes of his prouidence vnto fortune, as also when we speake of nature working without the hand of God guiding her in euery worke.

2 That this difference may the better appeare, it is to be knowen, that the prouidence of God, such as it is taught in the Scripture, is in comparison set as contrarie to fortune and chaunces that happen by aduenture. Now forasmuch as it hath beene commonly beleeued in all ages, and the same opinion is at this day also in a manner in all men, that all things happen by fortune, it is certaine, that that which ought to haue beene beleeued concerning Prouidence, is by that wrong opinion not onely darkened but also in manner buried. If a man light among theeues or wilde beasts, if by winde sodainly rising he suffer shipwracke on the Sea, if he be killed with the fall of a house or of a tree, if another wandring in desert places finde remedie for his pouerty, if hauing beene tossed with the waues, he attaine to the hauen if miraculously he escape but a finger breadth from death, all these chaunces as well of prosperitie as of aduersitie the reason of the flesh doth ascribe to fortune. But whosoeuer is taught by the mouth of Christ, that all the haires of his head are numbred, will seeke for a cause further off, and will firmely beleeue that all chaunces are gouerned by the secret counsell of God. And as concerning things without life, this is to be thought, that although euery one of them haue his owne propertie naturallie put into it, yet doe they not put foorth their power but onely so farre as they be directed by the present hand of God. They are therefore nothing else but instruments, whereby God continually powreth in so much effect as pleaseth him, and at his will boweth and turneth them to this or that doing. Of no creature is the power more maruellous or more glorious than of the sunne. For besides that it giueth light to the whole world with his brightnes, how great a thing is this that he cherisheth & quickneth all liuing creatures with his heat? that he breatheth fruitfulnesse into the earth with his beames? that out of seedes warmed in the bosome of the ground, he draweth a budding greennesse, and susteining the same with new nourishments doth encrease and strengthen it, till it rise vp in stalkes? That he feedeth it with continuall vapour till it grow to a flower, and from a flower to fruite? That then also with baking it, he bringeth it to ripenesse? That trees likewise and vines being warmed by him, doe first bud and shoote foorth branches, and after send out a flower, and of a flower doe engender fruite? But the Lord, because he would claime the whole glory of all these things to himselfe, made the light first to be, and the earth to be furnished with all kinds of hearbs and fruits before that he created the Sunne. A godly man therefore will not make the Sunne to be either a principall or a necessarie cause of those things which were before the creation of the Sunne, but onely an instrument which God vseth because it so pleaseth him, whereas he might leaue it and doe all things as easily himselfe. Then when we read that the Sunne stoode still two daies in one degree at the praier of Iosua, and that the shadow thereof went backe ten degrees for Ezechias his sake, by those few miracles God hath declared that the Sunne doth not daily so rise and goe downe by blinde instinct of nature, but that he to renue the remembrance of his fatherly fauour toward vs, doth gouerne the course thereof. Nothing is more naturall than spring tide to come immediately after winter, Sommer after spring, and haruest in course after Sommer. But in this orderly course is plainly seene so great and so vnequall diuersitie, that it may easily appeare that euery yeare, moneth and day, is gouerned by a new and speciall prouidence of God.

3 And

3 And truely God doth claime and will haue vs giue vnto him an almightineſſe, not ſuch as the Sophiſters doe imagine, vaine, idle, and as it were ſleeping, but waking, effectuall, working and buſied in continuall doing. Nor ſuch a one as is onely a generall beginning of a confuſed motion, as if he would command a riuer to flowe by his appointed chanels, but ſuch a one as is bent and readie at all his particular mouings. For he is therefore called almightie, not becauſe he can doe and yet ſitteth ſtill and doth nothing, or by generall inſtinct onely continueth the order of nature that he hath before appointed: but becauſe he gouerning both heauen and earth by his prouidence ſo ordereth all things that nothing chanceth but by his aduiſed purpoſe. For whereas it is ſaid in the Pſalme, that he doth whatſoeuer he will, therein is meant his certaine and determined will. For it were very fond to expound the Prophets words after the Philoſophers manner, that God is the firſt Agent or doer, becauſe he is the beginning and cauſe of all mouing: whereas the faithfull ought rather in aduerſitie to eaſe themſelues with this comfort, that they ſuffer nothing but by the ordinance and commandement of God, becauſe they are vnder his hand. If then the gouernement of God doe ſo extend to all his workes, it is a very childiſh cauillation to encloſe it within the influence of nature. And yet they doe no more defraud God of his glory than themſelues of a moſt profitable doctrine, whoſoeuer doe reſtraine the prouidence of God within ſo narrowe bounds, as if he ſuffered all things to be carried with an vngouerned courſe, according to a perpetuall law of nature. For nothing were more miſerable than man if he ſhould be left ſubiect to euery motion of the heauen, the aire, the earth, and the waters. Beſide that by that meane the ſingular goodneſſe of God towards euery man is too much vnhonorably diminiſhed. Dauid crieth out that babes yet hanging on their mothers breſts are eloquent enough to magnifie the glory of God, becauſe euen ſo ſoone as they be come out of the wombe, they finde foode prepared for them by his heauenly care. This is in deede generally true, ſo that yet our eies and ſenſes ouerpaſſe not that vnmarked which experience plainly ſheweth, that ſome mothers haue full and plentifull breaſtes, ſome other almoſt drie, as it pleaſeth God to feede one more liberally, and another more ſcarcely. But they which giue the due praiſe to the almightineſſe of God, doe receiue double profite thereby, the one that he hath ſufficiently large abilitie to doe them good, in whoſe poſſeſſion are both heauen and earth, and to whoſe becke all creatures doe attend vpon, to yeelde themſelues to his obedience: the other that they may ſafely reſt in his protection, to whoſe will are ſubiect all theſe hurtfull things that may any way be feared, by whoſe authority as with a bridle Satan is reſtrained with all his furies and all his preparation, vpon whoſe backe doth hang all that euer is againſt our ſafetie. And no other way but this can the immeaſurable and ſuperſtitious feares be corrected or appeaſed, which we oftentimes conceiue by dangers happening vnto vs. Superſtitiouſly fearefull I ſay we be, if where creatures doe threaten vs or giue vs any cauſe of feare, we be ſo afraide thereof, as if they had of themſelues any force or power to doe vs harme, or did vnforeſee or by chaunce hurt vs, or as if againſt the hurts that they doe, there were not ſufficient helpe in God. As for example. The Prophet forbiddeth the children of God that they ſhould not feare the ſtarres and ſignes of the heauen, as the vnbeleeuers are wont to doe. He condemneth not euery kinde of feare. But when the vnbeleeuers to giue away the gouernement of the world from God vnto Planets, doe faigne that their felicitie or miſery doth hang on the decrees and foreſhewings of the ſtarres, and not of the will of God, ſo commeth it to paſſe, that their feare is withdrawen away from that onely one, whom they ought to haue regarded, vnto the ſtarres and comets. Whoſo therefore will beware of this vnfaithfulneſſe, let him keepe alwaies in remembrance that there is not in creatures a wandering power, working or motion, but that they are gouerned by the ſecret counſell of God, ſo that nothing can chaunce but that which is decreed by him both witting and willing it ſo to be.

They which doe not acknowledge that God directeth the working of euery particular thing doe not onely rob him of his honour, but themſelues of a double benefite, hope of good things, and deliuerance from feare of euill. Pſal. 115. 3.

4 * Firſt therefore let the readers learne, that prouidence is called that, not wherewith God idly beholdeth from heauen what is done in the world, but wherewith as guiding the ſterne he ſetteth and ordereth all things that come to paſſe. So doth it no leſſe belong to his hands than to his eies. For when Abraham ſaid vnto his ſonne, God ſhall

* That God doth not onely behold what is done, but order and diſpoſe the doing of things both aboue and beneath. Gen. 20. 8.

ſhall prouide, he ment not only, that God did foreknow the ſucceſſe then to come, but that he did caſt the care of a thing to him vnknowen vpon the will of God, which is woont to bring things donbtfull and confuſed to a certaine end. Whereby followeth, that prouidence conſiſteth in doing: for too much fondly doe many trifle in talking of bare foreknowledge. Their errour is not altogether ſo groſſe which giue vnto God a gouernment but diſordered, and without aduiſed choiſe, (as I haue before ſaid,) that is to ſay, ſuch as whirleth and drieth about with a generall motion the frame of the world with all the parts thereof, but doth not peculiarly direct the doing of euery creature. Yet is this error not tolerable. For as they teach, it may be (notwithſtanding this Prouidence which they call vniuerſall) that all creatures may be mooued by chaunce, or man may turne himſelfe hither or thither by free choiſe of his will. And ſo doe they part the gouernment betwene God and man, that God by his power inſpireth into man a motion whereby he may worke according to the nature planted in him, and man ordereth his owne doings by his owne voluntarie aduiſe: Briefely they meane that the world, mens matters, and men themſelues are gouerned by the power, but not by the appointment of God. I ſpeake not of the Epicureans (which peſtilence the world hath alwaies bene filled with) which dreame of an idle and ſlothfull God: and other as mad as they, which in olde time imagined that God did ſo rule about the middle region of the aire, that he left things beneath to Fortune: For againſt ſo euident madneſſe, the dumme creatures themſelues doe ſufficiently cry out. For, now my purpoſe is to confute that opinion that is in a manner comonly beleeued, which giuing to God a certaine blind, and I wot not what vncertaine motion, taketh from him the principall thing, that is, by his incomprehenſible wiſedome to direct and diſpoſe all things to their end: and ſo in name onely and not in deed it maketh God ruler of the world, becauſe it taketh from him the gouernment of it. For what (I beſeech you) is it elſe to gouerne, but ſo to be ouer them that are vnder thee, that thou maieſt rule them by appointed order? Yet doe I not altogether reiect that which is ſpoken of the vniuerſall prouidence: ſo that they will againe graunt me this, that the world is ruled by God, not onely becauſe he maintaineth the order of nature which himſelfe hath ſet, but alſo becauſe he hath a peculiar care of euery one of his works. True it is, that all ſorts of things are mooued by a ſecret inſtinct of nature, as if they did obey the eternall commandement of God, and that which God hath once determined doth of it ſelfe proceede forward. And hereunto may that be applied which Chriſt ſaith, that he and his Father were euen from the beginning alwaies working. And that which Paul teacheth that in him we liue, are mooued, and haue our being, and that which the Authour of the Epiſtle to the Hebrues, meaning to proue the Godhead of Chriſt, ſaith, that by his mightie commandement all things are ſuſteined. But they doe wrong which by this colour doe hide and darken the ſpeciall prouidence, which is confirmed by ſo certaine and plaine teſtimonies of Scripture, that it is maruell that any man could doubt of it. And ſurely they themſelues that draw the ſame veile which I ſpeake of to hide it, are compelled by way of correction to adde, that many things are done by the peculiar care of God, but then they doe wrongfully reſtraine the ſame onely to peculiar dooings. Wherefore we muſt prooue that God doth ſoe giue heed to the gouernment of the ſucceſſes of all things, and that they all doe ſoe proceede from his determinate counſell, that nothing happeneth by chaunce.

Act. 17. 28. Heb. 1. 3.

5 *If we graunt that the beginning of motion belongeth to God, but that all things are either of themſelues or by chaunce carried whether the inclination of nature drieth them, the mutuall ſucceeding by turnes of daies and nights, of Winter and Summer, ſhall be the worke of God, inſomuch as he appointing to euery one their duties, hath ſet them a certaine law, that is, if they ſhould alway keepe one meaſure in equall proportion, as well the daies that come after the nights, the moneths after moneths, and yeeres after yeeres. But when ſometimes immoderate heates with drineſſe doe burne vp all the graine, ſometime vnſeaſonable raines doe marre the corne, when ſudden harme commeth by haile & tempeſts, that ſhal not be the worke of God, vnleſſe perhaps it be becauſe the clouds or faire weather, or cold or heat haue their beginning ning of the meeting of the planets or other naturall causes. But by this meane is there no roome left, neither for the fatherly fauour, nor for the iudgements of God. If they say that God is beneficiall enough to mankinde because he powreth into the heauen and earth an ordinarie power, whereby they doe finde him nourishment: that is too vaine and prophane an muention, as though the fruitfulnesse of one yeere were not the singular blessing of God, and dearth and famine were not his curse and vengeance? But because it were too long to gather together all the reasons that serue for this purpose, let the authoritie of God himselfe suffice vs. In the law and in the Prophets he doth oftentimes pronounce, that so oft as he watereth the earth with deaw and raine, he declareth his fauour? and that when by his commandement the heauen is hardened like yron, when corne is consumed with blasting and other harmes, when the fieldes are striken with haile and tempests, it is a token of his certaine and speciall vengeance. If we graunt these things, then is it assured that there falleth not a drop of raine but by the certaine commaundement of God. Dauid praiseth the generall prouidence of God, that hee giueth meate to the Rauens, birdes that call vpon him: but when God himselfe threatneth famine to liuing creatures, doth he not sufficiently declare that he feedeth all liuing things sometime with scarce, and sometime with more plentifull portion as he thinketh good? It is a childish thing, as I said before, to restraine this to particular doings, whereas Christ speaketh without exception, that not a sparrow of neuer so small a price doth fall to the ground without the will of his Father. Surely, if the flying of birds be ruled by the purpose of God, then must we needs confesse with the Prophet, that hee so dwelleth on hie, that yet he humbleth himselfe to looke vpon all things that chaunce in heauen and earth. Pſal.146.9 Mat.10.29. Pſal.12.5.

The prouidence of God in disposing the estates of men.

6 But because we know that the world was made principally for mankindes sake, we must therefore consider this end in the gouernance of man. The Prophet Hieremie crieth out: I know, Lord, that the way of man is not his owne, neither belongeth it to man to direct his owne steps. And Salomon saith, the steps of man are ruled by the Lord, and how shall a man dispose his owne way? Now let them say that man is mooued by God according to the inclination of his owne nature, but that man himselfe doth turne that mooning whether it pleaseth him. But if that were truely said, then should man haue the free choise of his owne waies. Peraduenture they will denie that, because he can doe nothing without the power of God. But seeing it is certaine that the Prophet and Salomon doe giue vnto God, not onely power but also choise and appointment, they cannot so escape away. But Salomon in another place doth finely rebuke this rashnesse of men, that appoint vnto themselues another end without respect of God, as though they were not led by his hand. The preparations (saith he) of the heart are in man, but the answere of the tongue is of the Lord. It is a fond madnesse that men will take vpon them to doe things without God, which cannot so much as speake but what he will. And the Scripture to expresse more plainly that nothing at all is done in the world but by his appointment, sheweth that those things which seem most happening by chaunce, are subiect to him. For what can you more ascribe to chaunce, then where a broken bough falling from a tree killeth a wayfaring man passing by it? But the Lord saith far otherwise, which confesseth that he hath deliuered him into the hand of the slayer. Likewise, who doth not leaue the happening of lots to the blindnesse of fortune? But the Lord suffereth it not, which claimeth the iudgement of them to himselfe: for he saith that it commeth not to passe by a mans owne power that stones are cast into the lap and drawen out againe, but that thing which onely might be said to come of chaunce he testifieth to come from himselfe. For the same purpose maketh that saying of Salomon. The poore man and the vsurer meet together, God lighteneth both their eies. For although poore men and rich be mingled together in the world, while euery one hath his state assigned him from God, he admonisheth that God which giueth light to all men is not blind, & so he exhorteth the poore to patience, because whosoeuer are not contented with their owne state, they seeke to shake off the burthen that God hath laid vpon them. So another Prophet rebuketh the vngodly men, which ascribe to the diligence of men or to fortune, that some lie in misery & some arise vp to honor. To come to prefermēt is neither frō the East, nor from the Pro.16.1. Exod.21.13. Pro.16.33. Prou.22.2. Pſal.75.7.

West, nor from the South, for God is the Iudge, he maketh low and he maketh high. Because God cannot put off the office of a Iudge, thereupon the Prophet prooueth that by his secret purpose, some are in honor, and other some remaine in contempt.

Exod.19.13. Ionas 1.4. The common euents which are seene in the world come from the speciall prouidence of God.

7 And also I say that the very particular successes are generally witnesses of Gods singular prouidence. God raised in the desert a South winde to bring the people plentie of fowles: when his pleasure was to haue Ionas throwen into the Sea, he sent out a wind to raise vp a tempest. But they that thinke that God gouerneth not the world, will say that this chaunced beside common vse: But thereby I doe gather that neuer any winde doth rise or increase but by the speciall commandement of God. For otherwise it should not be true, that he maketh the windes his messengers, and fiery flames his ministers, that he maketh the cloudes his chariots, and rideth vpon the wings of the winde, vnlesse he did by his will driue about the cloudes and winds, and shew in them the singular presence of his power. So in another place we are taught that so oft as the Sea swelleth with blast of windes, those violences doe testifie a singular presence of God. He commandeth and raiseth vp the stormie windes and it lifteth vp the waues thereof, and then he turneth the storme to calme, so that the waues thereof are still. As in another place he saith, that he scourged the people with burning windes. So whereas the power of engendring is naturally giuen to men, yet God willeth it to be imputed to his speciall grace, that he leaueth some in barrennesse, and vouchsafeth to grant issue to othersome, the fruit of the wombe is his gift. Therefore said Iacob to his wife, am I as God that I can giue thee children? But to make an ende: there is nothing more ordinarie in nature than that we be fed with bread. But the holy Ghost pronounceth, that not onely the growing of the fruites of the earth is the speciall gift of God, but also that men liue not by onely bread, because it is not the very full feeding that nourisheth, but the secret blessing of God: as on the other side he threateneth, that he will breake the stay of bread. Neither could we earnestly pray for our daily bread, vnlesse God did giue vs foode with his fatherly hand. Therefore the Prophet to perswade the faithfull, that God in feeding them doth fulfill the office of a good father of household, doth put them in minde, that he giueth meate to all flesh. Finally when we haue on the one side: The eies of the Lord are vpon the righteous, and his eares bent to their praiers: on the other side: The eie of the Lord is vpon the vngodly to destroy the memorie of them out of the earth: Let vs know that all creatures both aboue and beneath are readie to obedience, that he may apply them to what vse soeuer he will, whereupon is gathered, that not onely his generall prouidence remaineth in his creatures to continue the order of nature, but also by his maruellous counsell is applied to a certaine and proper end.

The doctrine concerning Gods prouidence, doth not establish Stoicall destinie, but excludeth heathenish fortune and chaunce. Lib.2.ad Bon. cap.6.

8 They which would bring this doctrine in hatred, doe cauill that this is the learning that the Stoikes teach of Fatum or Destinie, which also was once laid for reproch to Augustine. As for vs, although we be loth to striue about words, yet we allow not this word Fatum, both because it is one of those whose prophane nouelties S. Paul teacheth vs to flie, and because some men doe go about with the odiousnesse thereof to bring Gods truth in hatred. As for the very opinion of the Stoikes, it is wrongfully laid to our charge. For we doe not as the Stoikes doe, imagine a necessitie by a certaine perpetuall knot and entangled order of causes which is contained in nature: but we make God the Iudge and gouernour of all things, which according to his wisedome hath euen from the furthest ende of eternitie decreed what he would doe, and now by his power putteth in execution that which he hath decreed. Whereupon we affirme that not onely the heauen and earth and other creatures without life, but also the purposes and wils of men are so gouerned by his Prouidence, that they be directly carried to the ende that it appointeth. What then? will one say, doth nothing happen by Fortune or by Chaunce? I answere that Basilius Magnus hath truely said that Fortune and Chaunce are heathen mens words, with the signification whereof the minds of the godly ought not to be occupied. For if euery good successe be the blessing of God, and euery calamitie and aduersitie be his curse, now is there in mens matters no place left for Fortune or Chaunce. We ought also to be mooued with this saying of Augustine in his booke against the Academies he saith: It doth displease me that I haue haue ſo oft named fortune, albeit my meaning was not to haue any goddeſſe meant thereby, but onely a chanceable happening in outward things either good or euill. Of which word Fortune are deriued thoſe words which no religion forbiddeth vs to vſe, forte, forſan, forſitan, fortaſſe, fortuito, that is, perhap, peraduenture, by fortune and by chaunce, which yet muſt all be applied to the prouidence of God. And that did I not leaue vnſpoken when I ſaid, for perchaunce euen the ſame that is commonly called Fortune is alſo ruled by ſecret order. And we call chance in things nothing elſe, but that whereof the reaſon and cauſe is vnknowen. I ſaid this in deede, but it repenteth me that I did there ſo name Fortune. Foraſmuch as I ſee that men haue a very euill cuſtome, that where they ought to ſay, thus it pleaſed God, they ſay, thus it pleaſed Fortune. Finally, he doth commonly in his bookes teach, that the world ſhould be vnorderly whirled about if any thing were left vnto Fortune. And although in another place he determineth that all things are done partly by the free will of man, and partly by the prouidence of God, yet doth he a little after ſufficiently ſhew that men are ſubiect vnto and ruled by prouidence, taking this for a principle, that nothing is more againſt conuenience of reaſon, than to ſay that any thing chanceth but by the ordinance of God, for elſe it ſhould happen without cauſe or order, by which reaſon he alſo excludeth that happening that hangeth vpon the will of men: and by and by after he plainlier ſaith that we ought not to ſeeke a cauſe of the will of God. And ſo oft as he maketh mention of ſufferance, how that is to be vnderſtanded, ſhall very well appeare by one place where he prooueth that the will of God is the ſoueraigne and firſt cauſe of all things, becauſe nothing happeneth but by his commandement or ſufferance. Surely he faigneth not God to ſit ſtill idle in a watch tower, when it is his pleaſure to ſuffer any thing, whereas he vſeth an actuall will (as I may ſo call it) which otherwiſe could not be called a cauſe.

Quæſt. lib. 83. de Tri. lib. 3. cap. 4.

9 But for as much as the dulneſſe of our vnderſtanding cannot by a great way attaine to the height of Gods prouidence, we muſt vſe a diſtinction to helpe to lift it vp. I ſay therefore, howſoeuer all thing are ordeined by the purpoſe and certaine diſpoſition of God, yet to vs they are chanceable, not that we thinke that Fortune ruleth the world and men, and vnaduiſedly toſſeth all things vp and downe (for ſuch beaſtlineſſe ought to be farre from a Chriſtian hart) but becauſe the order, meane, end, and neceſſitie of thoſe things that happen, doth for the moſt part lie ſecret in the purpoſe of God, and is not comprehended with opinion of man, therefore thoſe things are as it were chanceable, which yet it is certaine to come to paſſe by the will of God. For they ſeeme no otherwiſe, whether we conſider them in their owne nature, or whether we eſteeme them according to our knowledge and iudgement. As for an example, let vs put the caſe, that a Marchant being entred into a wood in company of true men, doth vnwiſely ſtray away from his fellowes, and in his wandering chanceth vpon a den of robbers, lighteth among theeues, and is killed, his death was not onely foreſeene with Gods eie, but alſo determined by his decree. For it is not ſaid that he did foreſee how farre each mans life ſhould extend, but that he hath ſet and appointed markes which cannot be paſſed. And yet ſo farre as the capacitie of our minde conceiueth, all things herein ſeeme happening by chaunce. What ſhall a Chriſtian here thinke? euen this, whatſoeuer happened in ſuch a death, he will thinke it in nature chauncing by fortune as it is indeed, but yet he will not doubt that the prouidence of God did gouerne to direct Fortune to her end. In like maner are the happenings of things to come. For as all things that be to come are vncertaine vnto vs, ſo we hang them in ſuſpence, as if they might fall on either part, yet this remaineth ſetled in our harts, that nothing ſhall happen but that which God hath already foreſeene. In this meaning is the name of chaunce oft repeated in Eccleſiaſtes, becauſe at the firſt ſight men doe not attaine to ſee the firſt cauſe which is farre hidden from them. And yet that which is declared in the Scriptures concerning the ſecret prouidence of God, was neuer ſo blotted out of the harts of men, but that euen in the darkneſſe there alway ſhined ſome ſparkes thereof. So the Soothſaiers of the Philiſtimes, although they wauer in doubtfulneſſe, yet they aſcribe aduerſitie partly to God, partly to Fortune. If (ſay they) the arke goe that way, we ſhall know that it is God that hath ſtricken vs: but if it goe the other

A thing may be termed chanceable, and be ſaid to happen by fortune in reſpect of vs who ſee not the cauſe, when in reſpect of God who both appointed it, it is neceſſary, and though not in it owne nature, yet by reaſon of his appointment inuitable.

Io. 14. 5.

way, then a chaunce hath light vpon vs. In deede they did fooliſhly, when their cunning of ſoothſaying deceiued them, to flee to fortune, but in the meane while we ſee them conſtrained, ſo that they dare not thinke that the euill hap which chaunced vnto them did come of fortune. But how God with the bridle of his prouidence turneth all ſucceſſes whither pleaſeth him, may appeare by one notable example. Behold euen at one moment of time, when Dauid was found out and neere taken in the deſert of Mahon, euen then the Philiſtimes inuaded the land, and Saul was compelled to depart. If God meaning to prouide for the ſafetie of his ſeruant did caſt this let in Saules way, ſurely although the Philiſtimes going to armes were ſudden, and beſide the expectation of men, yet may we not ſay that it came by chaunce. But thoſe things that ſeeme to vs to happen by chaunce, faith will acknowledge to haue beene a ſecret mooving of God. I graunt there doth not alway appeare the like reaſon, but vndoubtedly we ought to beleeue, that whatſoeuer changes of thinges are ſeene in the world, they come by the ſecret ſtirring of the hand of God. But that which God purpoſeth is ſo of neceſſitie to come to paſſe, that yet it is not of neceſſitie preciſely nor by the nature of it ſelfe. As there of is a familiar example in the bones of Chriſt. Foraſmuch as he had put on a body like vnto ours, no wiſe man will deny that his bones were naturally able to be broken, yet was it impoſſible that they ſhould be broken: whereby we ſee againe that not without cauſe were in ſchooles inuented the diſtinctions of neceſſitie in reſpect, and neceſſitie abſolute, of conſequent and conſequence, whereas God had ſubiect to brickleneſſe the bones of his Sonne, which he had exempted from being able to be broken, and ſo brought to neceſſitie by reaſon of his owne purpoſe, that that thing could not be, which naturally might haue beene.

THE SEVENTEENTH CHAPTER.

Whereto and to what end this doctrine is to be applyed, that we may be certaine of the profit thereof.

Foure things in conſidering the prouidence of God doe make the conſideration thereof ſweet and comfortable, that it ſerueth for things to come, as well as paſt: that it worketh by, with, and without meanes: that it reſpecteth principally the Church of God: and that it worketh euen when the courſe of things doth ſeeme to perſwade the contrarie.

NOw foraſmuch as mens wits are bent to vaine curious ſubtleties, it is ſcarſely poſſible but that they ſhall encomber themſelues with entangled doubts, whoſoeuer doe not know the true and right vſe of this doctrine. Therefore it ſhall be expedient here to touch ſhortly, to what ende the Scripture teacheth, that all things are ordered by God. And firſt of all is to be noted, that the prouidence of God ought to be conſidered as well for the time to come as for the time paſt: ſecondarily, that the ſame is in ſuch ſort the gouernor of all things, that ſometime it worketh by meanes, ſometime without meanes, and ſometime againſt all meanes. Laſt of all, that it tendeth to this ende that God may ſhew that he hath care of all mankind, but ſpecially that he doth watch, in ruling of his Church, which he vouchſafeth more neerely to looke vnto. And this is alſo to be added, that although either the fatherly fauour and bountifulneſſe of God, or oftentimes the ſeueritie of his iudgement doe brightly appeare in the whole courſe of his prouidence: yet ſometime the cauſes of thoſe things that happen are ſecret, ſo that this thought creepeth into our minds, that mens matters are turned and whirled about with the blind ſway of fortune, or ſo that the fleſh ſtirreth vs to murmur, as if God did to make himſelfe paſtime, toſſe them like tenniſe bals. True it is, that if we were with quiet and ſtill mindes ready to learne, the very ſucceſſe it ſelfe would at length plainely ſhew, that God hath an aſſured good reaſon of his purpoſe, either to traine them that be his to patience, or to correct their euil affections and tame their wantonneſſe: or to bring them downe to the renouncing of themſelues, or to awake their drowſineſſe: on the other ſide to ouerthrow the proud, to diſappoint the ſubtletie of the wicked, to confound their deuiſes. But howſoeuer the cauſes be ſecret and vnknowen to vs: we muſt aſſuredly hold that they are laid vp in hidden ſtore with him, and therefore we ought to cry out with Dauid, God, thou haſt made thy wonderfull workes ſo many, that none can count in order to thee thy thoughts toward vs. I would declare and ſpeake of them, but they are more than I am able to expreſſe. For although alwaies in our miſeries we ought to thinke vpon our ſinnes, that the very puniſhment may moue vs to repentance, yet doe we ſee how Chriſt giueth more power to the ſecret purpoſe

of his Father, than to punish euery one according to his deseruing. For of him that was borne blinde he saith: neither hath this man sinned nor his parents, but that the glory of God may be shewed in him. For here naturall sense murmureth when calamitie commeth euen before birth, as if God did vnmercifully so to punish the silly innocent, that had not deserued it. But Christ doth testifie that in this looking glasse the glory of his Father doth shine to our sight, if we haue cleere eies to behold it. But we must keepe modestie, that we draw not God to yeelde cause of his doings, but let vs so reuerence his secret iudgements, that his will be vnto vs, a most iust cause of all things. When thicke cloudes doe couer the heauen, and a violent tempest ariseth, then because both a heauisome mystinesse is cast before our eies, and the thunder troubleth our eares, and all our senses are amased with terrour, we thinke that all things are confounded and troubled together: and yet all the while there remaineth in the heauen the same quietnesse and calmenesse that was before. So must we thinke that while the troublesome state of things in the world taketh from vs abilitie to iudge, God by the pure light of his righteousnesse and wisedome, doth in well framed order gouerne and dispose euen those very troublesome motions themselues to a right ende. And surely very monstrous is the rage of many in this behalfe, which dare more boldly call the works of God to account and examine his secret meanings, and to giue vnaduised sentence of things vnknowen, than they will doe of the deedes of mortall men. For what is more vnorderly than to vse such modestie towards our egals, that we had rather suspend our iudgement than to incur the blame of rashnesse, and on the other side proudly to triumph vpon the darke iudgements of God, which it became vs to regard with reuerence? Iohn 9.

2 Therefore no man shall well & profitably weigh the prouidence of God, but he that considering that he hath to doe with his creator and the maker of the world, doth with such humilitie as he ought submit himselfe to feare and reuerence. Hereby it commeth to passe, that so many dogs at this day doe with venimed bitings, or at least barking, assaile this doctrine, because they will haue no more to be lawfull for God, than their own reason informeth them. And also they raile at vs with all the spitefulnesse that they are able, for that not contented with the commandements of the law, wherein the will of God is comprehended, we doe further say, that the world is ruled by his secret counsels. As though the things that we teach were an inuention of our owne braine, and as though it were not true that the holy Ghost doth euery where expresly say the same, and repeateth it with innumerable formes of speech. But because some shame restraineth them, that they dare not vomit out their blasphemies against the heauen: they faigne that they contend with vs, to the ende they may the more freely play the madmen. But if they doe not grant that what soeuer happeneth in the world, is gouerned by the incomprehensible purpose of God, let them answere, to what end the Scripture saith, that his iudgements are a deepe bottomlesse depth. For whereas Moses cryeth out that the will of God is not to be sought a farre of in the clouds, or in the depthes, because it is familiarly set foorth in the law: it followeth, that his other hidden will is compared to a bottomlesse depth. Of the which Paul also saith: O the depth of the richnesse and of the wisedome, and of the knowledge of God: how vnsearchable are his iudgements, and his waies past finding out? for who hath knowen the mind of the Lord, or who hath beene his counsellour? And it is in deede true, that in the Gospell and in the Law are contained mysteries which are farre aboue the capacitie of our sense: but for asmuch as God for the comprehending of these mysteries which he hath vouchsafed to open by his word, doth lighten the mindes of them that be his, with the spirit of vnderstanding: now is therein no bottomlesse depth, but a way wherein we must safe walke, and a candle to guide our feete, and the light of life, and the schoole of certaine and plainely discernable truth. But his marueilous order of gouerning the world, is worthily called a bottomlesse depth: because while it is hidden from vs, we ought reuerently to worship it. Right well hath Moses expressed them both in few words. The secret things (saith he) belong to the Lord our God: but the things reuciled belong to vs and to our children for euer. We see how he biddeth vs not onely to study in meditation of the law, but also reuerently to looke vp vnto the secret secret prouidence of God. And in the booke of Iob is rehearsed one title of this deapth, that it humbleth our mindes. For after that the author of that booke in surueiyng vp and downe the frame of the world, had honorably entreated of the workes of God, at length he addeth: Loe, these be part of his waies, but how little a portion heare we of him? According to which reason in another place he maketh difference betweene the wisedome that remaineth with God, and the measure of wisedome that he hath appointed for men. For after he hath preached of the secrets of nature, he saith that wisedome is knowen to God onely, and is hidden from the eies of all liuing creatures. But by and by after, he saith further, that it is published to the end it should be searched out, because it is said vnto man: behold, the feare of God is wisedome. For this purpose maketh the saying of Augustine: Because we know not all things which God doth concerning vs in most good order, that therefore in onely good will we doe according to the law, because his prouidence is an vnchangeable law. Therefore, sith God doth claime vnto himselfe the power to rule the world, which is to vs vnknowen, let this be to vs a law of soberneſſe and modestie, quietly to obey his soueraigne authoritie, that his will may be to vs the onely rule of iustice, and the most iust cause of all things. I meane not that absolute will, of which the Sophisters doe babble, separating by wicked and prophane disagreement his iustice from his power, but I meane that prouidence, which is the gouerneſſe of all things, from which proceedeth nothing but right: although the causes thereof be hidden from vs.

Lib.83.quæst. cap.23.

The lewd collections which wicked men inferre vpon the doctrine of Gods prouidence because they doe not rightly and soberly discerne of it.

3 Whosoeuer shall be framed to this modestie, they neither for the time past will murmure against God for their aduersities, nor lay vpon him the blame of wicked doings, as Agamemnon in Homer did, saying. I am not the cause, but Iupiter and destinie: nor yet againe, as carried away with destinies, they will by desperation throwe themselues into destruction, as that yoong man in Plautus which said: Vnstable is the chaunce of things: the Destinies driue men at their pleasure, I will get me to some rocke there to make an ende of my goods and life together. Neither yet (as an other did) they will pretend the name of God to couer their owne mischieuous doings: for so saith Lycomides in another comedie: God was the mouer. I beleeue it was the will of the gods: for if it had not beene their will, I know it should not so come to passe. But rather they will search and learne out of the Scripture what pleaseth God, that by the guiding of the Holy Ghost, they may trauaile to attaine thereunto. And also being readie to follow God, whither soeuer he calleth, they shew indeede that nothing is more profitable than the knowledge of his doctrine. Very fooliſhly doe prophane men turmoile with their fondnesses, so that they in manner confound heauen and earth together as the saying is: If God haue marked the point of our death, we cannot escape it: then it is labor vainely lost in taking heede to our selues. Therefore, whereas one man dareth not venture to goe the way that he heareth to be dangerous, lest he be murthered of theeues: another sendeth for Phisitians, and wearieth himselfe with medicines to succour his life: another forbeareth grosse meates for feare of appairing his feeble health: another dreadeth to dwell in a ruinous house. Finally, whereas men deuise alwaies and endeuour with all diligence of minde whereby they may attaine that which they desire: either all these remedies are vaine, which are sought, as to reforme the will of God, or else life and death, health and sickneſſe, peace and warre, and other things, which men as they couet or hate them, doe by their trauaile endeuour to obtaiue or escape, are not determined by his certaine decree. And further they gather, that the prayers of the faithfull are disordered, or at the least superfluous, wherein petition is made that it will please the Lord to prouide for those things which he hath alreadie decreed from eternitie. To be short, they destroy all counsels that men doe take for time to come as things against the prouidence of God, which hath determined what hee would haue done, without calling them to counsaile. And then whatsoeuer is alreadie happened, they so impute it to the prouidence of God, that they winke at the man whom they know to haue done it. As, hath a Ruffian slaine an honest Citizen? he hath executed (say they) the purpose of God. Hath one stolen, or committed fornication? because hee hath done the thing that was foreseene and ordeined by the Lord, he is a minister of his prouidence.

Hath

Hath the Sonne careleſſie, neglecting all remedies, waited for the death of his father? he could not reſiſt God that had ſo before appointed from eternitie. So all miſchieuous doings they call vertues, becauſe they obey the ordinance of God.

4 But as touching things to come, Salomon doth well bring in agreement together, the purpoſes of men with the prouidence of God. For as he laugheth to ſcorne their folly, which boldly doe enterpriſe any thing without the Lord, as though they were not ruled by his hand: ſo in another place he ſpeaketh in this manner: The heart of man purpoſeth his way, but the Lord doth direct his ſteps, meaning, that we are not hindered by the eternall decrees of God, but that vnder his will we may both prouide for our ſelues, and diſpoſe all things belonging to vs. And that is not without a manifeſt reaſon. For he that hath limited our life within appointed bounds, hath therewithall left with vs the care thereof, hath furniſhed vs with meanes and helps to preſerue it, hath made vs to haue knowledge before hand of dangers, and that they ſhould not oppreſſe vs vnware, he hath giuen vs prouiſions and remedies. Now it is plaine to ſee what is our duetie, that is to ſay: If God hath committed to vs our owne life to defend, our dutie is to defend it. If he offer vs helps, our dutie is to vſe them. If he ſhew vs dangers before, our dutie is not to runne raſhlie into them. If he miniſter vs remedies, our dutie is not to neglect them. But no danger ſhall hurt, vnleſſe it be fatall, which by all remedies cannot be ouercome. But what if dangers be therefore not fatall, becauſe God hath aſſigned the remedies to repulſe and ouercome them. See how thy maner of reaſoning agreeth with the order of Gods diſpoſition. Thou gathereſt that danger is not to be taken heed of, becauſe foraſmuch as it is not fatall, we ſhall eſcape it without taking heed at all: but the Lord doth therefore enioyne thee to take heed of it, becauſe he will not haue it fatall vnto thee. Theſe mad men doe not conſider that which is plaine before their eyes, that the skill of taking counſell and heed is inſpired into men by God, whereby they may ſerue his prouidence in preſeruing of their owne life: as on the other ſide by negligence and ſloth they procure to themſelues theſe euils that he hath appointed for them. For how commeth it to paſſe, that a circumſpect man while he prouideth for himſelfe, doth wind himſelfe out of euils that hang ouer him, and the foole periſheth by vnaduiſed raſhnes, but for that both folly and wiſedome are the inſtruments of Gods diſpoſition on both parts? Therefore it pleaſed God to hide from vs all things to come, to this end, that we ſhould meete with them as things doubtfull, and not ceaſe to ſet prepared remedies againſt them, till either they be ouercome, or be paſt all help of care. And for this cauſe I haue before admoniſhed, that the prouidence of God doth not alway ſhew it ſelfe naked, but as God by vſing of meanes doth in a certaine manner cloth it.

The prouidence of God doth not aboliſh but eſtabliſh the meanes by leauing the end certaine onely to it ſelfe, to vs vncertain, that we might take the waies which are likely to bring vnto that end which we ſhould purpoſe to our ſelues.

5 The ſame men doe vnorderly and vnaduiſedly draw the chaunces of time paſt to the naked prouidence of God. For becauſe vpon it doe hang all things whatſoeuer happen, therefore (ſay they) neither robberies, nor adulteries, nor manſlaughters, are committed without the will of God. Why then (ſay they) ſhall a theefe be puniſhed, for that he ſpoiled him whom the Lords will was to puniſh with pouertie? Why ſhall the murtherer be puniſhed which hath ſlaine him whoſe life the Lord had ended? If all ſuch men doe ſerue the will of God, why ſhall they be puniſhed? But I deny that they ſerue the will of God. For we may not ſay, that he which is carried with an euill minde doth ſeruice vnto God as commander of it, where indeed he doth but obey his owne wicked luſt. He obeyeth God, which being enformed of his will doth labor to that end, whereunto Gods will calleth him. But whereby are we enformed of his will, but by his word? Therefore in doing of things we muſt ſee that ſame will of God, which he declareth in this word. God requireth of vs onely that which he commandeth. If we doe any thing againſt his commandement, it is not obedience but obſtinacie and tranſgreſſion. But vnleſſe he would, we ſhould not doe it. I graunt. But doe we euill things to this end to obey him? But he doth not commaund vs to doe them, but rather we runne on headlong, not minding what he willeth, but ſo raging with the intemperance of our owne luſt, that of ſet purpoſe we bend our trauaile againſt him. And by theſe meanes in euill doing we ſerue his iuſt ordinance, becauſe according to the infinite greatnes of his wiſedome he hath good skill to vſe euill inſtruments to doe good. And ſee how fooliſh liſh is their maner of arguing. They would haue the dooers vnpuniſhed for miſchieuous acts, becauſe they are not committed but by the diſpoſition of God. I graunt more: that theeues and murtherers and other euill dooers are the inſtruments of Gods prouidence, whom the Lord doth vſe to execute thoſe iudgements which he hath with himſelfe determined. But I deny that their euill doings ought to haue any excuſe thereby. For why? ſhall they either entangle God in the ſame wickednes with them, or ſhall they couer their naughtines with his righteouſnes? They can doe neither of both. Becauſe they ſhould not be able to excuſe themſelues, they are accuſed by their owne conſcience. And becauſe they ſhould not be able to blame God, they finde all the euill in themſelues, and in him nothing but a lawfull vſe of their euilneſſe. But he worketh by them. And whence I pray you, commeth the ſtinke in a dead carion, which hath beene both rotted and diſcloſed by heate of the Sunne? All men doe ſee that it is raiſed by the beames of the Sunne. Yet no man doth therefore ſay, that the Sun-beames doe ſtinke. So when there reſteth in an euill man the matter and guiltineſſe of euill, what cauſe is there why it ſhould be thought that God is any thing defiled with it if he vſe their ſeruice at his pleaſure? Away therefore with this doggiſh frowardneſſe, which may indeede a farre off barke at the iuſtice of God, but cannot touch it.

The ſweete and ſober meditation which a Chriſtian man ought to haue of Gods prouidence.

6 But theſe cauillations or rather doting errors of phrentike men ſhall eaſily be ſhaken away by godly and holie meditation of the prouidence, which the rule of godlineſſe teacheth vs, ſo that thereof may grow vnto vs a good and moſt pleaſant fruite. Therefore a Chriſtian heart when it is moſt aſſuredly perſwaded that all things come to paſſe by the diſpoſition of God, and that nothing happeneth by chance, will alway bend his eyes to him as to the principall cauſe of things, and yet will conſider the inferior cauſes in their place. Then he will not doubt that the ſingular prouidence of God doth watch for his preſeruation, which prouidence will ſuffer nothing to happen, but that which ſhall turne to his good and ſaluation. And becauſe he hath to doe firſt of all with men, and then with the other creatures, he will aſſure himſelfe that Gods prouidence doth reigne in both. As touching men, whether they be good or euill, he will acknowledge that all their counſels, wills, enterpriſes and powers are vnder the hand of God, ſo that it is in Gods will to bow them whither he liſt, and to reſtraine them ſo oft as pleaſeth him. That the ſingular prouidence of God doth keepe watch for the ſafetie of the faithfull, there are many and moſt euident promiſes to witnes. Caſt thy burden vpon the Lord, and he ſhall nouriſh thee, and ſhall not ſuffer the righteous to fall for euer, becauſe he careth for vs. He that dwelleth in the help of the higheſt, ſhall abide in the protection of the God of heauen. He that toucheth you, toucheth the apple of mine eie. I will be thy ſhield, a braſen wall: I will be enemie to thy enemies. Although the mother forget her children, yet will I not forget thee. And alſo this is the principall entent in the hiſtories of the Bible, to teach that the Lord doth with ſuch diligence keepe the waies of the Saints, that they doe not ſo much as ſtumble againſt a ſtone. Therefore as a little before we haue rightfully reiected their opinion which doe imagine an vniuerſall prouidence of God, that ſtoupeth not ſpecially to the care of euery creature: yet principally it ſhall be good to reknowledge the ſame ſpeciall care toward our ſelues. Whereupon Chriſt after he had affirmed that not the ſparow of leaſt value doth fall to the ground without the will of the father, doth by and by apply it to this end, that we ſhould conſider that how much we be more worth than ſparrowes, with ſo much neere care doth God prouide for vs, and he extendeth that care ſo farre, that we may be bold to truſt that the haires of our head are numbred. What can we wiſh our ſelues more, if not ſo much as a haire can fall from our head but by his will? I ſpeake not onely of all mankinde, but becauſe God hath choſen his church for a dwelling houſe for himſelfe, it is no doubt but that he doth by ſingular examples ſhew his care in gouerning of it.

so that they can conceiue no sound or sober aduise, like as he sent foorth Satan to fill the mouthes of all the Prophets with lying to deceiue Achab. He made Rehoboam mad by the young mens counsell, that he might be spoiled of his kingdome by his owne follie. Many times when he graunteth them wit, yet he maketh them so afraid and astonished, that they cannot will or go about that which they haue conceiued. Sometime also when he hath suffered them to go about that which lust and rage did counsell them, he doth in conuenient time breake off their violences, and suffereth them not to proceede to the end that they purposed. So did he before the time bring to nought the counsell of Achitophel that should haue beene to Dauids destruction. So also he taketh care to gouerne all his creatures for the benefit and safetie of them that be his, yea, and to gouerne the diuell himselfe, which as we see durst enterprise nothing against Iob without his sufferance and commandement. Of this knowledge necessarily ensueth both a thankfulnesse of minde in prosperous successe of things, and also patience in aduersitie, and an incredible assurednes against the time to come. Whatsoeuer therefore shall betide vnto him prosperously and according to his hearts desire, all that he will ascribe vnto God, whether he feele the bountie of God by the ministerie of men, or be holpen by liueleſſe creatures. For thus he will thinke in his minde: Surely it is the Lord which hath inclined their minds to me, which hath ioyned them vnto me to be instruments of his goodnes towards me. In plentie of the fruits of the earth, thus he will thinke, that it is the Lord which heareth the heauen, that the heauen may heare the earth, that the earth also may heare her fruits. In other things he will not doubt that it is the onely blessing of the Lord whereby all things prosper, and being put in minde by so many causes he will not abide to be vnthankefull.

8 If any aduersitie happen, he will by and by therein also lift vp his mind to God, whose hand auaileth much to imprint in vs a patience and quiet moderation of heart. If Ioseph had still continued in recording the falsehoode of his brethren, he could neuer haue taken a brotherly mind toward them. But because he bowed his mind to the Lord, he forgate the iniurie, and inclined to meekenesse and clemencie, so farre foorth that of his owne accord he comforted his brethren and said: It is not you that sould me into Ægypt, but by the will of God I was sent before you to saue your liues. You indeede thought euill of me, but the Lord turned it to good. If Iob had had respect to the Chaldees, by whom he was troubled, he would forthwith haue been kindled to reuenge. But because he did therewithall acknowledge it to be the worke of God, he comforted himselfe with this most excellent saying: The Lord hath giuen, the Lord hath taken away, the Lords name be blessed. So Dauid: when Semei had railed and cast stones at him, if he had looked vpon man, he would haue incouraged his souldiers to reacquite the iniurie. But because he vnderstoode that Semei did it not without the mouing of the Lord, he rather appeased them. Let him alone (said he) for the Lord hath commanded him to curse. With the same bridle in another place doth he restraine the intemperance of sorow. I held my peace (saith he) and became as dumbe, because thou O Lord, didst it. If there be more effectuall remedie against wrath and impatience, surely he hath not a little profited which hath learned in this behalfe to thinke vpon the prouidence of God, that he may alway call backe his minde to this point. It is the Lords will, therefore it must be suffered, not onely because it is not lawfull to striue against it, but also because he willeth nothing but that which is both iust and expedient. In summe, this is the end, that being wrongfully hurt by men, we leauing their malice (which would doe nothing but enforce our sorrow, and whet our minds to reuenge) should remember to climbe vp vnto God, and learne to beleeue assuredly, that whatsoeuer our enemie hath mischieuously done against vs, was both suffered and sent by Gods disposition. Paul, to refraine vs from recompensing of iniuries doth wisely put vs in minde, that we are not to wrastle with flesh and blood, but with the spirituall enimie the Diuell, that we may prepare our selues to striue with him. But this is the most profitable lesson for the appeasing of all rages of wrath, that God doth arme as well the Diuell as all wicked men to striue with vs, and that he sitteth as Iudge to exercise our patience. But if the misfortunes and miseries that oppresse vs doe chance without the worke of men, let vs remember the doctrine of the Law: whatsoeuer is prosperous floweth from the fountaine of Gods

In which is rebuked our sluggishnesse, when according to the common sense of the flesh accounting all to be but chaunce that happeneth of both sorts, we are neither encouraged by the benefits of God to worship him, nor pricked forward with his scourges to repentance. This same is the reason why Hieremie and Amos did so sharply rebuke the Iewes, because they thought that things as well good as euill came to passe without the commandement of God. To the same purpose serueth that sermon of Esay, I the God that create light, and fashion darkenesse, that make peace, and create euill: I God doe make all these things.

Lam.3.38. Amos 3.6. Esa.45.6.

The way to consider wisely of inferior and second causes, whether they be of things past or things to come.

9 And yet in the meane time a godly man will not winke at the inferior causes. Neither will he, because he thinketh them the ministers of Gods goodnesse by whom he hath receiued benefite, therfore let them passe vnconsidered, as though they had deserued no thanke by their gentlenesse: but he will hartily thinke himselfe bound vnto them, and will willingly confesse his bond, and trauell as he shall be able, and as occasion shall serue, to recompence it. Finally in benefites receiued he will reuerence and praise God as the principall Author, but he will honour men as the ministers, and as the truth is indeede he will vnderstand that he is by the will of God bound to them, by whose hand it was Gods will to be beneficiall vnto him. If he suffer any losse by negligence or waste of foresight, he will determine in his minde, that the same was done indeede with the will of God, but he will impute it also to himselfe. If any man be dead by sickenesse whom he hath negligently handled, whereas of duetie he should haue taken good heed vnto him, although he be not ignorant that the man was come to his appointed time beyond which he could not passe, yet will he not thereby lessen his offence, but because he had not faithfully discharged his duetie toward him, he will so take it as if he had perished by fault of his negligence. Much lesse when there is vsed any fraud, and conceiued malice of minde in committing either murther or theft, will he excuse it vnder pretence of Gods prouidence, but he will in one selfe euill act seuerally behold both the righteousnes of God, and the wickednes of man, as both doth manifestly shew themselues. But principally in things to come he will haue consideration of such inferiour causes. For he will recken it among the blessings of God if he be not disappointed of the helps of men which he may vse for his safetie. And so he neither will be negligent in taking of counsell, nor slothfull in crauing their helpe whom he seeth to haue sufficient whereof he may be succoured: but thinking that whatsoeuer creatures can any thing profit him, the same are offered into his hand by God, he will apply them to his vse as the lawfull instruments of Gods prouidence. And because he doth not certainely know what successe the busines will haue that he goeth about, (sauing that in all things he knoweth that the Lord will prouide for his benefit) he will with studie trauell to that which he shall thinke expedient for himselfe, so farre as he can conceiue in minde and vnderstanding. And yet in taking of counsels he will not be carried on by his owne wit, but will commit and yeeld himselfe to the wisedome of God, that by the guiding thereof he may be directed to the right end. But his confidence shall not so stay vpon outward helps, that if he haue them he will carelesly rest vpon them, or if he want them he will be afraid as left destitute, for he will haue his minde alway fastened vpon the Prouidence of God, neither will he suffer himselfe to be drawen away from the stedfast beholding thereof, by consideration of present things. So though Ioab acknowledged that the successe of battell is in the will and hand of God, yet he gaue not himselfe to slothfulnesse, but did diligently execute that which belonged to his calling, but he leaueth it vnto the Lord to gouerne the end. We will stand valiant (saith he) for our nation, and for the cities of our God: But the Lord doth what is good in his eies. This knowledge shall despoile vs of rashnes and wrongfull confidence, and shall driue vs to continuall calling vpon God: and also shall vphold our minds with good hope, so as we may not doubt assuredly and boldly to despise those dangers that compasse vs about.

2.Sam.10.12.

The feares which euery moment of our

10 In this point doeth the inestimable felicitie of a godly minde shew foorth it selfe. Innumerable are the euils that doe beseege mans life, and doe threaten him so many deaths. As, not to go further than our selues: forasmuch as our bodies is a receptacle of a thousand thousand diseases, yea, hath enclosed and doth nourish within it the causes of diseases, man can not carrie himselfe but he must needs also carie about with him many formes of his owne destruction, and draw forth a life as it were entangled with death. For what may it else be called, where he neither is cold, nor sweateth without perill? Now whether soeuer thou turne thee, all things that are about thee are not onely vntrustie friends to thee, but doe in manner openly threaten and seeme to shew thee present death. Goe into a Ship, there is but a foote thicknes betweene thee and death. Sit on horsebacke, in the slipping of one foote thy life is in danger. Goe through the streets of the citie: euen how many tiles are vpon the houses, to so many perils art thou subiect. If there be an iron toole in thy hand or thy friends, thy harme is readie prepared. How many wilde beasts thou seest, they are all armed to thy destruction. If thou meane to shut vp thy selfe, euen in a garden well fenced, where may appeare nothing but pleasantnesse of aire and ground, there sometime lurketh a Serpent. The house which is continually subiect to fire, doeth in the day time threaten thee with pouertie, and in the night time with falling vpon thy head. Thy field, forasmuch as it lieth open to haile, frost, drowth and other tempests, it warneth thee of barrennesse, and thereby famine. I speake not of prisonings, treasons, robberies, open violence, of which, part doe beseech vs at home, and part doe follow vs abroade. In these streights must not man needs be most miserable, which euen in life halfe dead doth plainly draw forth a carefull and fainting breath, as if he had a sword continually hanging ouer his necke? But thou wilt say, that these things chaunce seldome, or at the least not alwaies, nor to all men, and neuer all at once. I graunt, but seeing we are put in minde by the examples of other, that the same things may happen to our selues, and that our life ought of dutie no more to be free than theirs, it cannot be but that we must dread and feare them as things that may light vpon vs. Now what can a man imagine more miserable than such a fearefulnes? Besides that, it is not without dishonourable reproch of God to say, that he hath set open Man the noblest of all his creatures to their blind and vnaduised strokes of fortune. But heere my purpose is to speake onely of the miserie of man, which he should feele if he should be brought subiect vnder fortunes dominion.

11 But when that light of Gods prouidence hath once shined vpon a godly man, he is now releeued and deliuered not onely from the extreme anguish and feare wherewith he was before oppressed, but also from all care. For as iustly he feareth fortune, so he dare boldly commit himselfe to God. This is (I say) his comfort to vnderstand that the heauenly Father doeth so hold in all things with his power, so ruleth them with his authoritie and countenance, so ordereth them with his wisedome, that nothing befalleth but by his appointment: and that he is receiued into Gods tuition, and committed to the charge of Angels, and cannot be touched with any hurt of water, nor fire, nor weapon, but so farre as it shall please God the gouernor to giue them place. For so is it sung in the Psalme. For he shall deliuer thee from the hunters snare, and from the noysome pestilence. He will couer thee vnder his wings, and thou shalt be sure vnder his feathers. His trueth shall be thy shield and buckler. Thou shalt not be afraid of the feare of the night, nor of the arrow that flyeth by day, nor of the pestilence that walketh in the darkenesse, nor of the plague that destroyeth at noone day. And from thence proceedeth that boldnesse of the Saints to glorie. The Lord is my helper, I will not feare what flesh may doe to mee. The Lord is my protector, why shall I be afraide? If whole camps stand vp against me, if I walke in the middest of the shadow of death, I will not cease to hope well. Whence, I pray you, haue they this, that their assurednesse is neuer shaken away from them? but hereby, that where the world seemeth in shew to be without order whirled about, they know that God worketh euery where, whose worke they trust shall be for their preseruation. Now if their safetie be assailed either by the diuell or by wicked men, in that case if they were not strengthened with remembrance and meditation of Prouidence, they must needes by and by be discouraged. But when they call to minde, that the diuell and all the rout of the wicked, are so euery way holden in by the hand of God as with a bridle, that they can neither conceiue any mischiefe against vs, nor goe about it when they haue conceiued it, nor if they goe neuer so much about it, can stirre one finger to bring it to passe but so farre as he shall suffer, yea, yea, so farre as he shall commaund, and that they are not onely holden fast bound with fetters, but also compelled with bridle to doe seruice: heere haue they abundantly wherewith to comfort themselues. For as it is the Lords worke to arme their furie and to turne and direct it whether it pleaseth him, so is it his worke also to appoint a measure and end, that they doe not after their owne will licentiously triumph. With which perswasion Paul being established, did by the sufferance of God appoint his iourney in another place which he said was in one place hindered by Satan. If he had onely said that he had beene stopped by Satan, he should haue seemed to giue him too much power, as if it had beene in Satans hand to ouerthrow the very purposes of God: but when he maketh God the iudge, vpon whose sufferance all iourneies doe hang: he doth therewithall shew, that Satan whatsoeuer he go about, can attaine nothing but by Gods will. For the same reason doth Dauid, because for the sundrie chaunges wherewith mans life is tossed, and as it were whirled about, he doth flie to this sanctuarie, say, that his times are in the hand of God. He might haue said either the course of his life, or time in the singular number. But by the word Times, he meant to expresse that howsoeuer the state of man be vnstedfast, whatsoeuer alterations doe now and then happen, they are gouerned by God. For which cause Rasin, and the king of Israel, when ioyning their powers to the destruction of Iuda, they seemed as firebrands kindled to waste and consume the land, are called by the Prophet smoking brands, which can doe nothing but breathe out a little smoke. So when Pharao was terrible to all men by reason of his riches, strength, and number of men, he himselfe is compared to a beast of the Sea, and his armie to fishes. Therefore God saith, that he will take the Captaine and the armie with his hooke and draw them whether he list. Finallie, because I will not tarrie long vpon this point: if a man marke it he shall easilie see that the extremitie of all miseries is the ignorance of Gods Prouidence, and the chiefe blessednesse standeth in the knowledge thereof.

It disproueth not the setled purpose of God, in appointing all things that he is said to repent him, and that plagues first denounced be afterwards recalled.

12 Concerning the Prouidence of God, this that is said were enough for so much as is profitable both for the perfect learning and comfort of the faithfull, (for to fill the vaine curiositie of men, nothing can be sufficient, neither is it to be wished that they be satisfied) were it not for certaine places, which seeme to meane otherwise than is aboue declared, that God hath not stedfast and stable purpose but changeable, according to the disposition of inferior things. First, in some places is spoken of the repentance of God, as that he repented him of the creating of man, of the aduancing of Saul to the kingdome. And that he will repent him of the euill that he had determined to lay vpon his people, so soone as he perceiueth any conuersion of them. Againe, there are rehearsed diuers repeales of his decrees. He had declared by Ionas to the Ninuites, that after fortie daies once past Ninuie should be destroyed, but by and by he was turned with their repentance to a more gentle sentence. He had by the mouth of Esay pronounced death to Ezechias, which he was mooued by his teares and prayers to deferre. Heereupon many doe make argument, that God hath not appointed mens matters by eternall decree, but yeerely, daily, and hourely appointeth this or that, as euery mans deseruings are, or as he thinketh it equitie and iustice. Concerning his repentance, this we ought to hold, that the same can no more be in God, than ignorance, errour, and weakenesse. For if no man doe wittingly and willingly throw himselfe into the case that he neede to repent, we can not say that God doth repent, but that we must also say, that God is ignorant what will come to passe, or that he cannot auoide it, or that he headlong and vnaduisedly runneth into a purpose whereof he by and by forethinketh him. But that it is so farre from the meaning of the holy Ghost, that in the very mention making of repentance he denieth that God had any repenting at all, because he is not a man that may repent. And it is to be noted, that in the same Chapter they are both so ioyned together, that the comparison doth very well bring the shew of repugnancie to agreement. His changing is figuratiuely spoken, that God repented that he had made Saul king, by and by after it is added, The strength of Israel shall not lie, nor shall be mooued with repenting. Because he is not a man that he may repent. In which words his vnchangeablenesse is affirmed plainely without any figure. Therefore it is certaine that the ordinance of God in disposing the matters of men is perpetuall, and aboue all repentance.

pentance. And that his constancie should not be doubtfull, his very aduersaries haue beene compelled to beare him witnes. For Balaam whether he would or no, could not choose but burst out into this saying, that he is not like a man to lie: nor as a sonne of man to be changed, and that it is not possible that he should not doe that he hath said, and not fulfill whatsoeuer he hath spoken. Num. 23. 19.

13 What meaneth then this name of repentance? euen in the same sort that all the other phrases of speech which doe describe God vnto vs after the maner of men. For, because our weakenesse doth not reach to his highnesse, that description of him which is taught vs, was meete to be framed lowe to our capacitie, that we might vnderstand it. And this is the manner how to frame it lowe for vs, to paint out himselfe not such a one as he is in himselfe, but such a one as he is perceiued of vs. Where as he himselfe is without all mouing of a troubled minde, he yet testifieth that he is angrie with sinners. Like as therefore when we heare that God is angrie, we ought not to imagine that there is any mouing at all in him, but rather to consider that this speech is borrowed of our common sense, because God beareth a resemblance of one chafed and angrie so oft as he exerciseth iudgement: so ought we to vnderstand nothing else by this word of Repentance but a changing of deedes, because men by changing of their deedes, are woont to declare that they mislike them. Because then euerie change among men is an amendment of that which misliketh them, and amendment commeth of repentance; therefore by the name of repentance is meant that, that God changeth in his works. In the meane time yet neither is his purpose nor his will turned, nor his affection changed, but he followeth on with one continuall course that which he had from eternitie foreseene, allowed, and decreed, howsoeuer the alteration seeme sudden in the eies of men. God is said to repent himselfe, not because he changeth his purpose, but the euents which his vnchangeable purpose was to change.

14 Neither doth the holie historie shew that Gods decrees were repelled when it sheweth that the destruction was pardoned to the Niniuites which had beene before pronounced, and that the life of Ezechias was prolonged after warning giuen him of death. They that so construe it are deceiued in vnderstanding of threatenings: which although they doe simply affirme, yet by the successe it shall be perceiued that they contained a secret condition in them. For why did God send Ionas to the Niniuites to tell them aforehand of the ruine of their citie? Why did he by Esay giue Ezechias warning of death? For he might haue brought to naught both him and them without sending them any word of their destruction. He meant therefore another thing, than to make them by foreknowing of their death to see it comming a farre off. Euen this he meant: not to haue them destroyed, but to haue them amended that they should not be destroyed. Therefore this that Ionas prophecied that Niniuie should fall after fortie dayes, was done to this end that it should not fall. That hope of longer life was cut off from Ezechias, was done for this purpose that he might obtaine longer life. Now who doth not see that God meant by such threatnings to awake them to repentance, whom he made afraide to the end that they might escape the iudgement which they had deserued by their sinnes? If that be so agreed, the nature of the things themselues doth leade vs to this, to vnderstand in the simple threatening a secret implyed condition, which is also confirmed by like examples. The Lord rebuking the king Abimelech for that he had taken away Abrahams wife from him, vseth these words: Behold, thou shalt die for the woman that thou hast taken, for she hath a husband. But after hee had excused himselfe, God said thus: Restore the wife to her husband, for he is a Prophet, and shall pray for thee that thou mayst liue. If not: know that thou shalt die the death and all that thou hast. You see how in this first sentence he vehemently striketh his minde to bring him to be more heedfully bent to make amends, and in the other doth plainely declare to him his will. Seeing the meaning of other places is like: doe not gather of these that there was any thing withdrawen from the first purpose of God, by this that he made void the thing which he had before pronounced. For God doth prepare the way for his eternall ordinance, when in giuing warning of the punishment he moueth those to repentance, whom his will is to spare, rather then varieth any thing in his will, no not in his word, sauing that he doth not expresse the same thing in syllabls which is yet easy to vnderstād. For that saying of Esay must needs remaine true, Ionas 3. 10. Esai. 38. 5. Whatsoeuer a thing denounced from God is recald, it was denounced with condition, if not expresst, yet secret. Gen. 16. 3.

Esai.14.27. The Lord of Hostes hath determined, and who shall be able to vndoe it? His hand is stretched out, and who shall turne it away?

THE EIGHTENTH CHAPTER.

That God doth so vse the seruice of wicked men, and so boweth their mindes to put his iudgements in execution, that yet still himselfe remaineth pure from all spot.

How God doth not onely permit but appoint the things to be done which wicked men doe.

THere ariseth a hard question out of other places, where it is said that God boweth and draweth at his will, Satan himselfe and all the reprobate. For the sense of the flesh scarcely conceiueth how he working by them, should not gather some spot of their fault, yea, in his common working be free from all fault, and iustly condemne his ministers. Vpon this was deuised the distinction betweene Dooing and Suffering: because many haue thought this doubt vnpossible to be dissolued: that both Satan and all the wicked are so vnder the hand and power of God, that he directeth their malice, vnto what end it pleaseth him, and vseth their wicked dooings to the executing of his iudgements. And their modestie were peraduenture excusable, whom the shew of absurditie putteth in feare, if it were not so that they doe wrongfully with a lying defence goe about to deliuer the iustice of God from all vnrightfull blame. It seemeth to them vnreasonable, that man should by the will and commandement of God be made blinde, and so by and by be punished for his blindnesse. Therefore they seeke to scape by this shift, that this is done by the sufferance, but not by the will of God. But he himselfe plainly pronouncing that he doth it, doth reiect that shift. As for this that men doe nothing but by the secret commandement of God, and doe trouble themselues in vaine with diliberating, vnlesse he do by his secret direction stablish that which he hath before determined, it is prooued by innumerable and plaine testimonies. It is certaine that this which we before alleaged out of the Psalme, that God doth all things that he will, belongeth to all the dooings of men. If God be the certaine appointer of warre and peace, as it is there said, and that without exception: who dare say that men are carried causelesslie with blinde motion while God knoweth not of it, and sitteth still? But in speciall examples wilbe more lightsome plainnesse. By the first Chapter of Iob we know, that Satan doth no lesse appeare before God to receiue his commandements than doe the Angels which doe willingly obey. Indeed it is after a diuerse maner and for a diuerse end: but yet so that he cannot go about any thing but with the wil of God. Although there seeme afterward to be added a bare sufferance of him to afflict the holy man: yet becausse that saying is true: The Lord hath giuen, the Lord hath taken away, as it pleased God so is it come to passe: We gather that God was the authour of that triall of Iob, whereof Satan and the wicked theeues were ministers. Satan goeth about to driue the holy man by desperation to madnesse. The Sabees cruelly and wickedly doe inuade and rob his goods that were none of theirs. Iob knowledgeth that he was by God stripped of all his goods and made poore, becausse it so pleased God. Therefore whatsoeuer men or Satan himselfe attempt, yet God holdeth the sterne to turne all their trauels to the executing of his iudgements. It was Gods will to haue the false king Achab deceiued: the diuell offered his seruice thereunto: he was sent with a certaine commaundement, to be a lying spirit in the mouth of all the Prophets. If the blinding and madnesse of Achab be the iudgement of God, then the deuice of bare Sufferance is vaine. For it were a fond thing to say, that the iudge doth onely suffer and not also decree what he will haue done, and commaund the ministers to put it in execution. It was the Iewes purpose to destroy Christ, Pilate and the souldiers to follow their raging lust, and yet in a solemne praier the disciples doe confesse, that all the wicked men did nothing else but that which the hand and counsell of God had determined: euen as Peter had before preached, that Christ was by the decreed purpose and foreknowledge of God deliuered to be slaine. As if he should say: that God from whom nothing is hidden, from the beginning did wittingly and willingly appoint that which the Iewes did execute, as in another place he rehearseth, that God which shewed before by all his Prophets that Christ should suffer, hath so fulfilled it.

Abso-

Abſolon defiling his fathers bed with inceſtuous adulterie, committed deteſtable wickedneſſe. Yet God pronounceth that this was his owne worke. For the words are theſe, Thou haſt done it ſecretly, but I will doe it openly, and before the ſunne. Hieremie pronounceth that all the crueltie that the Chaldees vſed in Iurie, was the worke of God. For which cauſe Nabucadnezar is called the ſeruant of God, God euery where crieth out that with his hiſſing, with the ſound of his trumpet, with his power and commandement the wicked are ſtirred vp to warre. He calleth the Aſſyrian the rod of his wrath, and the axe that he mooueth with his hand. The deſtruction of the holy citie and ruine of the temple he calleth his worke. Dauid not murmuring againſt God, but acknowledging him for a righteous iudge, yet confeſſeth that the curſings of Semei proceeded of the commandement of God. The Lord (ſaith he) commanded him to curſe. We often finde in the holy hiſtorie, that whatſoeuer happeneth it commeth of the Lord, as the departing of the ten tribes, the death of the ſonnes of Hely, and very many things of like ſort. They that be meanely exerciſed in the Scriptures doe ſee, that for ſhortneſſe ſake, I bring forth of many teſtimonies but a few, by which yet it appeareth plainely enough, that they doe trifle and talke fondly, that thruſt in a bare Sufferance in place of the Prouidence of God, as though God ſate in a watch Tower waiting for the chaunces of Fortune, and ſo his iudgements ſhould hang vpon the will of men.

2 Now as concerning ſecret motions, that which Salomon ſpeaketh of the heart of a king, that it is bowed hither or thether as pleaſeth God, extendeth ſurelie to all mankinde, and is as much in effect as if he had ſaid: whatſoeuer we conceiue in minde, is by the ſecret inſpiration of God directed to his end. And truely if he did not worke in the mindes of men, it were not rightly ſaid, that he taketh away the lip from the true ſpeakers, and wiſedome from aged men, that he taketh the heart from the Princes of the earth, that they may wander where is no beaten way. And hereto belongeth that which we oft read, that men are fearefull ſo farre foorth as their hearts be taken with his feare. So Dauid went out of the camp of Saul and none was ware of it, becauſe the ſleepe of God was come vpon them all. But nothing can be deſired to be more plainely ſpoken, than where he ſo oft pronounceth, that he blindeth the eies of men, and ſtriketh them with giddineſſe, that he maketh them drunke with the ſpirit of drowſineſſe, caſteth them into madnes, and hardneth their hearts. Theſe things alſo many doe referre to ſufferance, as if in forſaking the reprobate he ſuffered them to be blinded by Satan. But that ſolution is too fond, foraſmuch as the holie Ghoſt in plaine words expreſſeth, that they are ſtriken with blindnes & madnes by the iuſt iudgemēt of God. It is ſaid, that he hardned the heart of Pharao, alſo that he did make dull and ſtrengthen it. Some do with an vnſauorie cauillation mocke out theſe phraſes of ſpeech, becauſe in another place it is ſaid Pharao did harden his owne heart, there is his owne will ſet for the cauſe of his hardning. As though theſe things did not very well agree together, although in diuers maners, that man while he is mooued in working by God, doth alſo worke himſelfe. And I doe turne backe their obiection againſt themſelues. For, if to harden doe ſignifie but a bare ſufferance, then the very motion of obſtinacie ſhall not be properlie in Pharao. Now how weake and fooliſh were it ſo to expound, as if Pharao did onely ſuffer himſelfe to be hardned? Moreouer the Scripture cutteth off all occaſions from ſuch cauillations. For God ſaith, I will hold his heart. So of the inhabitants of the land of Canaan, Moſes ſaith, that they went foorth to battell, becauſe the Lord had hardned their hearts. Which ſame thing is repeated by another Prophet, ſaying: He turned their hearts that they ſhould hate his people. Againe in Eſay he ſaith, that he will ſend the Aſſyrians againſt the deceitfull nation, and will commaund them to carrie away the ſpoiles, and violently take the praie, not meaning that he will teach wicked and obſtinate men to obey willingly, but that he will bowe them to execute his iudgements, as if they did beare his commandements grauen in their mindes. Whereby appeareth that they were mooued by the certain appointment of God. I graunt that God doth oftentimes worke in the reprobate by Satans ſeruice as a meane, but yet ſo that Satan doth his office by Gods mooving, and proceedeth ſo farre as is giuen him. The euill ſpirit troubled Saul, but it is ſaid that it was of God, that we may know that the madnes of Saul came of the iuſt vengeance of God. It is alſo ſaid, that the ſame Satan doth blind

The prouidence of God is a gouerneſſe which directeth all the inclinations of the mind of man whether they bend vnto good or euill.

After the first maner of speaking it is said, If any Prophet shall speake lyingly, I God haue deceiued him. According to the other maner of speach it is said, that he giueth men ouer to a reprobate minde: and to cast them into filthy desires, because he is the chiefe authour of his owne iust vengeance, and Satan is but onely a minister thereof. But because we must entreat of this matter againe in the second booke, where we shall discourse of the free or bond will of man, I thinke I haue already shortly spoken so much as this place required. Let this be the summe of all, that forasmuch as the will of God is said to be the cause of all things, his Prouidence is thought the gouernesse in all purposes and works of men, so as it sheweth foorth her force not onely in the elect, which are gouerned by the holy Spirit, but also compelleth the reprobate to obedience

Ezc.14.9. Rom.1.28.

There are not contrarie wils in God, although he forbid the doing of euill, and yet be willing to haue it done: but our blindnesse whereby we discerne not how these two doagree, maketh vs to imagine that they disagree when in trueth they doe not.

3 Forasmuch as hitherto I haue recited onely such things as are written in the Scriptures, plainly and not doubtfully, let them that feare not wrongfully to slaunder the heauenly oracles, take heed what maner of iudgement they take vpon them. For if by fained pretending of ignorance they seeke a praise of modestie, what can be imagined more proudly done, then to set one small worde against the authoritie of God? as I thinke otherwise, I like not to haue this touched. But if they openly speake euill, what preuaile they with spitting against the heauen? But this is no new example of waywardnesse, because there haue bene in all ages wicked and vngodly men, that with raging mouth barked against this point of doctrine. But they shall feele that thing indeed to be true, which long ago the holy ghost spake by the mouth of Dauid, that God may ouercome when he is iudged. Dauid doth by the way rebuke the madnesse of men in this so vnbrideled licentiousnesse, that of their owne filthinesse they doe not onely argue against God, but also take vpon them power to condemne him. In the meane time he shortly admonisheth, that the blasphemies which they vomit vp against the heauen doe not reach vnto God, but that he driuing away the clouds of cauilations, doth brightly shew foorth his righteousnesse, and also our faith (because being grounded vpon the worde of God, it is aboue all the worlde) doth from her high place contemptuously looke downe vpon these mystes. For first, where they obiect, that if nothing happen but by the will of God, then are there in him two contrarie wils, because he decreeth those things by secret purpose, which he hath openly forbidden by his law, that is easily wiped away. But before I answere it, I will once againe giue the readers warning that this cauillation is throwen out not against me, but against the holy Ghost, which taught the holy man Iob this confession: as it pleased God so it came to passe. When he was spoiled by theeues, he acknowledged in the iniurie and hurt that they did him the iust scourge of God. What saith the Scripture in other places? The sonnes of Heley obeyed not their Father, because it was Gods will to kill them. Also another Prophet crieth out, that God which sitteth in heauen doth whatsoeuer he will. And now I haue shewed plainely enough that God is the author of all those things which these iudges would haue to happē onely by his idle sufferance. He testifieth that he createth light & darknesse, that he formeth good and euill, that no euill happeneth which he himselfe hath not made. Let them tell me, I beseech them, whether he do willingly or against his will execute his owne iudgemēts? But as Moses teacheth, that he which is slaine by the falling of an axe by chance, is deliuered by God into the hand of the striker: so the whole Church saith in Luke, that Herod and Pilate conspired to doe those things, which the hand & purpose of God had decreed. And truely if Christ were not crucified with the will of God, whēce came redemption to vs? And yet the will of God neither doth striue with it selfe, nor is changed, nor faineth that he willeth not the thing that he will: but where it is but one & simple in him, it seemeth to vs manifold, because according to the weaknes of our wit we cōceiue not how God in diuers maner willeth & willeth not one selfe thing. Paul, after that he hath said, that the calling of the Gētiles is a hidden misterie, within a while after saith further, that in it was manifestly shewed the manifold wisedome of God: because for the dulnes of our wit the wisedome of God seemeth to vs manifold, or (as the old interpretor hath trāslated it) of many fashiōs: shall we therefore dreame that there is any varietie in God himselfe, as though he either changeth changeth his purpose, or dissenteth from himselfe? Rather when we conceiue not how God will haue the thing to be done, which he forbiddeth to doe, let vs call to minde our owne weakenesse, and therewithall consider that the light wherein he dwelleth, is not without cause called inaccessible, becausse it is couered with darkenesse. Therefore all godly and sober men will easily agree to this sentence of Augustine, that sometime man with good will willeth that which God willeth not. As if a good sonne willeth to haue his father to liue, whom God will haue to die. Againe it may come to passe, that man may will the same thing with an euill will, which God willeth with a good will. As if an euill sonne willeth to haue his father to die, and God also willeth the same. Now the first of these two sonnes willeth that which God willeth not, and the other sonne willeth that which God also willeth, and yet the naturalnesse of the first sonne doth better agree with the will of God, although he willeth a contrarie thing, than the vnnaturalnesse of the other sonne that willeth the same thing. So great a difference is there what to will doth belong to man, and what to God, and to what end the will of euery one is to be applied, to haue it either allowed or disallowed. For those things which God willeth well he bringeth to passe by the euill wills of euill men. But a little before he had said, that the Angels apostataes in their falling away, and all the reprobate, in as much as concerneth themselues, did that which God would not, but in respect of the omnipotencie of God, they could by no meanes so doe, becausse while they did against the will of God, the will of God was done vpon them. Whereupon he crieth out. Great are the works of God, & ought to be sought out of all thē that loue them: that in maruellous maner the same thing is not done without his will which is also done against his will, becausse it could not be done if he did not suffer it: and yet he doth it not against his will, but willingly: and he being good, would not suffer a thing to be done euill, vnlesse for that he is omnipotent, he could of euill make good.

4 In the same manner is alloiled or rather vanisheth away the other obiection: that if God doe not onely vse the seruice of wicked men, but also gouerneth their counsels and affections, he is the authour of all wicked dooings, and therefore men are vnworthily condemned, if they execute that which God hath decreed, becausse they obey his will: for it is done amisse to confound his will and commandement together, which it appeareth by innumerable examples to differ farre asunder. For though when Absalon abused his fathers wiues, it was Gods will to punish Dauids adulterie with that dishonour: yet he did not therefore command the wicked sonne to commit incest, vnlesse perhaps you meane it in respect of Dauid, as he speaketh of the railings of Semei. For when he confesseth that Semei raileth at him by the commandement of God, he doth not therein commend his obedience, as if that froward dogge did obey the commandement of God, but acknowledging his toong to be the scourge of God, he patiently suffreth to be corrected. And this is to be holden in minde, that when God performeth by the wicked that thing which he decreed by his secret iudgement, they are not to be excused, as though they did obey his commandement, which in deede of their owne euill lust they doe purposely breake. Now how that thing is of God. and is ruled by his secret prouidence, which men doe wickedlie, the election of king Ieroboam is a plaine example, in which the rashnesse and madnesse of the people is scuerely condemned, for that they peruerted the order appointed by God, and falsely fell from the house of Dauid, and yet we know it was his will that he should be annointed. Whereupon in the very words of Osee there appeareth a certaine shewe of repugnancie, that where God complained that that kingdome was erected without his knowledge, and against his will, in another place he saith, that he gaue the kingdome to Ieroboam in his rage. How shall these sayings agree? that Ieroboam reigned not by God, and that he was made king by the same God? Euen thus, becausse neither could the people fall from the house of Dauid, but that they must shake off the yoke which God hath laid vpon them: neither yet had God his libertie taken away, but that he might so punish the vnthankefulnes of Salomon. We see therefore how god in not willing false breach of alleageance, yet to another end iustlie willeth a falling away from their Prince, whereupon Ieroboam beside all hope was by holie annointing driuen to be king. After this manner doth the holie historie say, that there was an enemie raised vp to spoile

Salomons ſonne of part of his kingdome. Let the Readers diligently wey both theſe things, becauſe it hath pleaſed God to haue the people gouerned vnder the hand of one king. Therefore when it was diuided in two parts, it was done againſt his will. And yet the diuiſion tooke beginning of his will. For ſurely whereas the Prophet both by words and ceremonie of annointing did mooue Ieroboam when he thought of no ſuch thing, to hope of the kingdome, this was not done without the knowledge or againſt the will of God, which commanded it ſo to be done: and yet is the rebellion of the people iuſtly condemned, for that as it were againſt the will of God, they fell from the poſteritie of Dauid. In this maner it is alſo afterward further ſaid, that where Reboboam proudly deſpiſed the requeſt of the people, this was done by God, to confirme the word which he had ſpoken by the hand of Abiha his ſeruant. Lo how againſt Gods will the ſacred vnitie is torne in ſunder, and yet with the will of the ſame God ten tribes doe forſake Salomons ſonne. Let vs adde another like example. Where the people conſenting, yea laying their hands vnto it, the ſonnes of Ahab were ſlaine, and all his ofſpring rooted out. Iehu ſaid in deede truely, that nothing of the words of God were fallen to the ground, but that he had done all that he had ſpoken by the hand of his ſeruant Elias. And yet not vniuſtly he rebuketh the citizens of Samaria, for that they had put their hands vnto it. Are ye righteous, ſaith he? If I haue conſpired againſt my Lord, who hath killed all theſe? I haue before (as I thinke) alreadie declared plainely, how in one ſelfe worke both the fault of man doth bewray it ſelfe, and alſo the righteouſnes of God glorioufly appeareth. And for modeſt wits this anſwere of Auguſtine ſhall alway ſuffice: whereas the Father deliuered the Sonne, and Chriſt deliuered his bodie, and Iudas deliuered the Lord: why in this deliuering is God righteous, and man faultie? becauſe in the ſame one thing which they did, the cauſe was not one, for which they did it. If any be more combered with this that we now ſay, that there is no conſent of God with man, where man by the righteous mouing of God doth that which is not lawfull, let them remember that which Auguſtine ſaith in another place: Who ſhall not tremble at theſe iudgements, where God worketh euen in the hearts of euill men whatſoeuer he will, and yet rendreth to them according to their deſeruings? And truely in the falſehood of Iudas, it ſhall be no more lawfull to lay the blame of the wicked deede to God, becauſe he himſelfe willed him to be deliuered, and did deliuer him to death, than it ſhall be to giue away the praiſe of our redemption to Iudas. Therefore the ſame writer doeth in another place truely tell vs, that in this examination God doeth not inquire what men might haue done, or what they haue done, but what their will was to doe, that purpoſe and will may come into the accompt. They that thinke this hard, let them a little while conſider, how tolerable their owne waywardneſſe is, while they refuſe a thing witneſſed by plaine teſtimonies of Scripture, becauſe it exceedeth their capacitie, and doe finde fault that thoſe things are vttered, which God, vnleſſe he had knowen them profitable to be knowen, would neuer haue commanded to be taught by his Prophets and Apoſtles. For our being wiſe ought to be no more but to embrace with meeke willingnes to learne, and that without exception whatſoeuer is taught in the holy Scriptures. As for them that doe more frowardly outrage in prating againſt it, ſith it is euident that they babble againſt God, they are not worthie of a longer confutation.

THE SECOND BOOKE OF THE INSTITVTION OF Christian Religion, which intreateth of the knowledge of God the Redeemer in Christ which knowledge was first opened to the Fathers in the time of the Law, and then to vs in the Gospell.

THE FIRST CHAPTER.

That by Adams sinne and falling away, mankind became accursed, and did degenerate from his first estate: wherein is intreated of Originall sinne.

NOT without cause hath the knowledge of himselfe been in the olde Prouerbe so much commended to man. For if it be thought a shame to be ignorant of all things that pertaine to the course of mans life, then much more shamefull is the not knowing of our selues: whereby it commeth to passe, that in taking counsell of any thing necessary, we be miserably daseled, yea, altogether blinded. But how much more profitable this lesson is, so much more diligently must we take heed, that we do not disorderly vse it, as we see some of the Philosophers haue done. For they in exhorting man to know himselfe, doe withall appoint this to be the ende, why he should know himselfe, that he should not be ignorant of his owne dignitie and excellencie: and nothing else doe they will him to behold in himselfe, but that whereby he may swell with vaine confidence, and be puffed vp with pride. But the knowledge of our selues, first standeth in this point, that considering what was giuen vs in creation, and how bountifully God continueth his gracious fauour toward vs, we may know how great had been the excellency of our nature, if it continued vncorrupted: and we may withall thinke vpon this, that there is nothing in vs of our owne, but that we haue as it were gotten by borrowing all that God hath bestowed vpon vs, that we may alwaies hang vpon him. Then, that we call to minde our miserable estate after the fall of Adam, the feeling whereof may throw downe all glorying and trust of our selues, ouerwhelme vs with shame, and truely humble vs. For as God at the beginning fashioned vs like his owne image, to the end to raise vp our mindes both to the studie of vertue and to the meditation of eternall life, so least the so great nobleness of our kinde, which maketh vs different from brute beasts, should be drowned with our slothfulnesse, it is good for vs to know, that we are therefore endued with reason and vnderstanding, that in keeping a holy and honest life, life, we ſhould proceede on forward to the appointed ende of bleſſed immortalitie. But the firſt dignitie cannot come in our minde, but by and by on the other ſide the heauie ſight of our filthineſſe, and ſhame doth thruſt it ſelfe in preſence, ſince we in the perſon of the firſt man are fallen from our firſt eſtate, whereupon groweth the hatred and loathing of our ſelues, and true humilitie, and there is kindled a new deſire to ſeeke for God, in whom euery of vs may recouer thoſe good things, whereof we are found altogither voide and emptie.

We must learne throughly to know our selues that the consideration of the graces of God may make vs thankefull and the beholding of our miseries, humble vs.

2 This thing ſurely the truth of God appointeth to be ſought in examining of our ſelues, I meane, it requireth ſuch a knowledge as may both call vs away from all confidence of our own power, and making vs deſtitute of all matter to glory vpon, may bring vs to ſubmiſſion. Which rule it behooueth vs to keepe, if we will attaine to the true marke both of right knowledge and well doing. Neither yet am I ignorant how much more pleaſant is that other opinion that allureth vs rather to conſider our good things, than to looke vpon our miſerable needineſſe and diſhonor, which ought to ouerwhelme vs with ſhame. For there is nothing that mans nature more coueteth, than to be ſtroked with flatterie: and therefore when he heareth the gifts that are in him to be magnified, he leaneth to that ſide with ouer much lightneſſe of beleefe: whereby it is ſo much the leſſe to be marueiled, that herein the greateſt part of men haue pernitiouſly erred. For ſith there is naturally planted in all mortall men a more than blind loue of themſelues, they doe moſt willingly perſwade themſelues that there is nothing in them that they ought worthily to hate. So without any maintenance of other this moſt vaine opinion doth each where get credit, that man is abundantly ſufficient of himſelfe to make himſelfe liue well and bleſſedly. But if there be any that are content to thinke more modeſtly, how ſoeuer they graunt ſomewhat to God, leaſt they ſhould ſeeme arrogantly to take all to themſelues, yet they ſo part it, that the principall matter of glory & confidence alway remayneth with themſelues. Now if their come talke, that with her allurements tickleth the pride that already of it ſelfe itcheth within the bones, there is nothing that may more delite them. Therefore as any hath with his extolling moſt fauourably aduanced the excellencie of mans nature, ſo hath he beene excepted with the well liking reioycement in manner of all ages. But whatſoeuer ſuch commendation there be of mans excellencie that teacheth man to reſt in himſelfe, it doth nothing but delite with that her ſweeteneſſe, and indeede ſo deceiueth, that it bringeth to moſt wretched deſtruction all them that aſſent vnto it. For to what purpoſe auaileth it for vs, ſtanding vpon all vaine confidence to deuiſe, appoint, attempt and goe about thoſe things that we thinke to be for our behooſe, and in our firſt beginning of enterpriſe to be forſaken and deſtitute of ſound vnderſtanding and true ſtrength, and yet to goe on boldly till we fall downe into deſtruction? But it cannot otherwiſe happen to them that haue affiance that they can doe any thing by their owne power. Therefore if any man giue heede to ſuch teachers that hold vs in conſidering onely our owne good things, he ſhall not profite in learning to know himſelfe, but ſhall be carried violently away into the worſe kinde of ignorance.

The true knowledge of our ſelues emboldneth not, but caſteth downe: it teacheth vs what our duetie is, and how vnable we are to performe it.

3 Therefore, whereas in this point the truth of God doth agree with the common naturall meaning of all men, that the ſecond part of wiſedome conſiſteth in the knowledge of our ſelues, yet in the very manner of knowing there is much diſagreement. For by the iudgement of the fleſh, a man thinketh that he hath then well ſearched himſelfe, when truſting vpon his owne vnderſtanding and integritie, he taketh boldneſſe, and encourageth himſelfe to doing the dueties of vertue, and bidding battle to vices, trauaileth with all his ſtudie to bend himſelfe to that which is comely and honeſt. But he that looketh vpon and trieth himſelfe by the rule of Gods iudgement, findeth nothing that may raiſe vp his minde to good affiance: and the more inwardly that he hath examined himſelfe, the more he is diſcouraged, till being altogether ſpoyled of all confidence, he leaueth to himſelfe nothing toward the well ordering of his life. And yet would not God haue vs to forget the firſt nobleneſſe that he gaue to our Father Adam, which ought of good right to awake vs to the ſtudie of righteouſneſſe and goodneſſe. For we cannot conſider either our owne firſt eſtate, or to what end we are created, but we ſhall be pricked forward to ſtudie vpon immortalitie, and to deſire the kingdome of God. But that conſideration is ſo farre from putting vs in courage, that rather diſcouraging vs, it throweth vs downe to humbleneſſe. For what is that firſt eſtate of ours? euen that from whence we are fallen. What is that end of our creation? euen the ſame from which we are altogether turned away: ſo that lothing our own miſerable eſtate, we may grone for ſorrow, and in groaning may alſo ſigh for the loſſe of that dignitie. But now when we ſay that man ought to behold nothing in himſelfe that may make him of bold courage: we meane that there is nothing in him vpon affiance whereof he ought to be proud. Wherefore, if any liſt to heare what knowledge man ought to haue of himſelfe, let vs thus deuide it, that firſt he conſider to what end he is created, and endued with gifts that are not to be deſpiſed, by which thought he may be ſtirred vp to the meditation of the hearing of God and of the life to come. Then let him wey his owne ſtrength, or rather needie want of ſtrength, by perceiuing whereof he may lye in extreme confuſion, as one vtterly brought to naught. The firſt of theſe conſiderations, tendeth to this ende, that he may know what is his duetie: and the other, how much he is able to doe towards the performing of it. We will entreat of them both, as the order of teaching ſhall require.

Adams tranſgreſſion proceeding from infidelitie ioyned with pride and vnthankfulneſſe, ended with reprochfull Apoſtaſie from God.

4 But becauſe it muſt needes be that it was not a light negligence, but a deteſtable wicked act which God ſo ſeuerely puniſhed, we muſt conſider the very forme of the ſame in the fall of Adam, that kindled the horrible vengeance of God vpon all mankind. It is a childiſh opinion that hath commonly beene receiued, concerning the intemperance of gluttonie, as though the ſum and head of all vertues conſiſted in the forbearing of one onely fruit, when there flowed one euery ſide ſtore of all ſortes of deinties that were to be deſired, and when in that bleſſed fruitfulneſſe of the earth, there was not onely plentie, but alſo varietie to make fare for pleaſure. Therefore we muſt looke further, becauſe the forbidding him from the tree of the knowledge of good and euill, was the triall of obedience, that Adam in obeying might proue that he was willingly ſubiect to the gouernement of God. And the name of the tree it ſelfe ſheweth, that that commandement was giuen for none other end, than for this, that he contented with his owne eſtate ſhould not with wicked luſt aduaunce himſelfe higher. But the promiſe whereby he was bidden to hope for eternall life, ſo long as he did not eate of the tree of life, and againe, the horrible threatning of Death ſo ſoone as he ſhould taſt of the tree of knowledge of good and euill, ſerued to proue and exerciſe his Faith. Hereof it is not hard to gather, by what meanes Adam prouoked the wrath of God againſt himſelfe. Auguſtine in deede ſaith not amiſſe, when he ſaith, that pride was the beginning of all euils. For if ambition had not lifted vp man higher than was lawfull & than was permitted him, he might haue continued in his eſtate: but we muſt fetch a more full definition from the manner of the tentation that Moſes deſcribeth. For ſith the woman was with the deceit of the Serpent led away by infidelitie, now it appeareth that diſobedience was the beginning of the fall. Which thing Paul confirmeth, teaching that all men were loſt by one mans diſobedience. But it is withall to be noted, that the firſt man fell from the ſubiection of God, for that he not onely was taken with the entiſements of Satan, but alſo deſpiſing the truth, did turne out of the way to lying. And ſurely Gods word being once deſpiſed, all reuerence of God is ſhaken off. Becauſe his maieſtie doth no other waies abide in honour among vs, nor the worſhip of him remaine inuiolate, but while we hang vpon his mouth. Therefore infidelitie was the roote of that falling away. But thereupon aroſe ambition and pride, to which was adioyned vnthankfulneſſe, for that Adam in coueting more than was graunted, did vnreuerently deſpiſe the ſo great liberalitie of God wherewith he was enriched. And this was a monſtrous wickedneſſe, that the ſonne of the earth thought it a ſmall thing that he was made after the likeneſſe of God, vnleſſe he might alſo be made equall with God. If Apoſtaſie be a filthy and deteſtable offence, whereby man draweth himſelfe from the allegeance of his Creator, yea, outragiouſly ſhaketh off his yoke: then it is but vaine to extenuate the ſinne of Adam. Albeit it was no ſimple Apoſtaſie, but ioyned with ſhamefull reproches againſt God, while they aſſented to the ſclaunders of Satan, wherein he accuſed God of lying, enuie, and niggardly grudging. Finally, infidelity, opened the gate to ambition, ambition was the mother of obſtinate rebellion, to make men caſt away the feare of God, and throwe themſelues whither their luſt carried them. Therefore Bernard doth rightly teach that the gate of ſaluation is opened vnto vs, when at this day we receiue the Goſpell by our eares: euen as by the ſame windowes, when they ſtoode open to Satan, death was let in. For Adam would neuer haue beene ſo bold, as to doe againſt the commandement of God, but for this, that he did not beleeue his word. Truely this was the beſt bridle for the right keeping of all affections in good order, to thinke that there is nothing better than to keepe righteouſneſſe in obeying the commandements of God, and then that the chiefe ende of happy life is to be beloued of him. He therefore being carried away with the blaſphemies of the diuell, did (aſmuch as in him lay) extinguiſh the whole glory of God.

Rom.8. All Adams ofſpring through his ſinne are made ſinfull, not by imitation onely as Pelagius taught, but by propagation, receiuing the contagion of ſin and vncleanneſſe before they behold the light of this life.

5 As the ſpirituall life of Adam was, to abide ioyned and bound to his Creator, ſo his alienation from him was the death of his ſoule. Neither is it marueile if he by his falling away, deſtroyed all his owne poſteritie, which peruerted the whole order of nature in heauen and in earth. All the creatures doe grone, ſaith Paul, being made ſubiect to corruption againſt their will. If one ſhould aske the cauſe: no doubt it is for that they beare part of that puniſhment that man deſerued, for whoſe vſe they were created. Sith then the curſe that goeth throughout all the coaſtes of the world, proceded from his fault both vpward and downeward, it is nothing againſt reaſon, if it ſpread abroad into all his iſſue. Therefore after that the heauenly image in him was defaced, he did not alone ſuffer this puniſhment, that in place of wiſedome, ſtrength, holineſſe, truth, and iuſtice (with which ornaments he had beene clothed) there came in the moſt horrible peſtilences, blindneſſe, weakeneſſe, filthineſſe, falſhood, and iniuſtice, but alſo he entangled and drowned his whole of-ſpring in the ſame miſeries. This is the corruption that commeth by inheritance, which the olde writers called originall ſinne, meaning by this word ſinne, the corruption of nature, which before was good and pure. About which matter they haue had much contention, becauſe there is nothing further off from common reaſon, than all men to be made guiltie of one mans fault, and ſo the ſinne to become common. Which ſeemeth to haue beene the cauſe why the oldeſt Doctors of the Church did but darkely touch this point, or at the leaſt did not ſet it out ſo plainely as was conuenient. And yet that fearefulneſſe could not bring to paſſe, but that Pelagius aroſe, whoſe prophane inuention was that Adam ſinned onely to his owne loſſe, and hurted not his poſteritie. So through this ſubtletie, Satan went about by hiding the diſeaſe, to make it incurable. But when it was prooued by manifeſt teſtimonie of Scripture, that ſinne paſſed from the firſt man into all his poſteritie, he brought this cauillation that it paſſed by imitation, but not by propagation. Therefore good men trauailed in this point, & aboue all other Auguſtine, to ſhew that we are corrupted not by forreine wickedneſſe, but that we bring with vs from the wombe of our mother a viciouſneſſe planted in our begetting, which to deny was too great ſhameleſneſſe. But the raſhneſſe of the Pelagians and Celeſtians will not ſeeme marueilous to him, which by the writings of the holy man ſhall perceiue, how ſhameleſſe beaſtes they were in all other things. Surely it is not doubtfully ſpoken that Dauid confeſſeth that he was begotten in iniquities, and by his mother conceiued in ſinne. He doth not there accuſe the ſinnes of his father or mother, but the better to ſet foorth the goodneſſe of God toward him, he beginneth the confeſſion of his owne wickedneſſe at his very begetting. Foraſmuch as it is euident that that was not peculiar to Dauid alone, it followeth that the common eſtate of all mankinde is noted vnder his example. All we therefore that deſcend of vncleane ſeede, are borne infected with the contagion of ſinne, yea, before that we ſee the light of this life, we be in the ſight of God filthy and ſpotted. For who could giue cleane of the vncleanneſſe? not one: as it is in the booke of Iob.

Pſal. 51.7.

Iob.14.4. In Adam our nature being corrupted commeth vnto vs ſuch as he by ſin had made it: whereupon it

6 We heare that the vncleanneſſe of the parents ſo paſſeth i to the children, that all without any exception at their beginning are defiled. But of this defiling we ſhall not finde the beginning vnleſſe we goe vp to the firſt parent of all vs, to the well head. Thus it is therefore, that Adam was not onely the progenitor, but alſo the roote of mans nature, and therefore in his corruption was all mankinde worthily corrupted: which the Apoſtle maketh plaine by comparing of him and Chriſt. As (ſaith he)

by one man ſinne entred into the whole world, and death by ſinne, and ſo death went ouer all men, foraſmuch as all haue ſinned: ſo by the grace of Chriſt, righteouſneſſe and life is reſtored vnto vs. What will the Pelagians heere prate? that Adams ſinne was ſpread abroad by imitation? Then haue we no other profite by the righteouſneſſe of Chriſt, but that he is an example ſet before vs to follow? Who can abide ſuch robberie of Gods honour? If it be out of queſtion that Chriſts righteouſneſſe is ours by communication, and thereby life: it followeth alſo that they both were ſo loſt in Adam, as they be recouered in Chriſt: and that ſinne and death ſo crept in by Adam, as they are aboliſhed by Chriſt. The words are plaine, that many are made righteous by the obedience of Chriſt, as by the diſobedience of Adam they were made ſinners: and that therefore betweene them two is this relation, that Adam wrapping vs in his deſtruction, deſtroyed vs with him, and Chriſt with his grace reſtored vs to ſaluation. In ſo cleere light of truth, I thinke we neede not a longer or more laborious proofe. So alſo in the firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians, when he goeth about to ſtabliſh the godly in the truſt of the reſurrection, he ſheweth that the life is recouered in Chriſt, that was loſt in Adam, he that pronounceth that we all are dead in Adam, doth alſo therewithall plainely teſtifie, that we were infected with the filth of ſinne. For damnation could not reach vnto them that were touched with no guiltineſſe of iniquitie. But it can be no way plainlier vnderſtanded what he meaneth then by relation of the other member of the ſentence, where he teacheth that hope of life is reſtored in Chriſt. But it is well enough knowen that the ſame is done no other way, than when by maruellous manner of communicating, Chriſt powreth into vs the force of his righteouſneſſe. As it is written in another place, that the Spirit is life vnto vs, for righteouſneſſe ſake. Therefore we may not otherwiſe expound that which is ſaid that we are dead in Adam, but thus, that he in ſinning did not onely purchaſe miſchiefe and ruine to himſelfe, but alſo threw downe our nature headlong into like deſtruction. And that not onely to the corruption of himſelfe, which pertaineth nothing to vs, but becauſe he infected all his ſeede with the ſame corruption whereinto he was fallen. For otherwiſe the ſaying of Paul could not ſtand true, that all are by nature the ſonnes of wrath, if they were not alreadie accurſed in the wombe. And it is eaſily gathered that nature is there meant not ſuch as it was created by God, but ſuch as it was corrupted in Adam. For it were not conuenient, that God ſhould be made the Author of death. Adam therefore ſo corrupted himſelfe, that the infection paſſed from him into all his of-ſpring. And the heauenly Iudge himſelfe Chriſt, doth alſo plainly enough pronounce, that all are borne euill and corrupted, where he teacheth, that whatſoeuer is borne of fleſh, is fleſh, and that therefore the gate of life is cloſed againſt all men, vntill they be begotten againe.

followeth, that we are dead becauſe he was dead of whom we are: ſonnes of wrath becauſe they were ſo that begate vs: fleſh becauſe we are borne of fleſh.

7 Neither for the vnderſtanding thereof is any curious diſputation needfull, which not a little combred the old writers, whether the Soule of the Sonne doe proceede by deriuation from the Soule of the Father, becauſe in it the infection principally reſteth. We muſt be content with this, that ſuch gifts as it pleaſed the Lord to haue beſtowed vpon the nature of man, he left them with Adam, and therefore when Adam loſt them after he had receiued them, he loſt them not onely from himſelfe, but alſo from vs all. Who ſhall be carefull of a conueyance from ſoule to ſoule, when he ſhall heare that Adam receiued theſe ornaments which he loſt, no leſſe for vs than for himſelfe? that they were not giuen to one man alone, but aſſigned to the whole nature of man? Therefore it is not againſt reaſon, if he being ſpoyled, nature be left naked and poore: if he being infected with ſinne, the infection creepeth into nature. Therefore from a rotten roote aroſe vp rotten branches, which ſent their rottenneſſe into the other twigges that ſprong out of them. For ſo were the children corrupted in the Father, that they alſo were infectiue to their children: that is to ſay, ſo was the beginning of corruption in Adam, that by continuall flowing from one to another, it is conueyed from the anceſters into the poſteritie. For the infection hath not her cauſe in the ſubſtance of the fleſh or of the Soule, but becauſe it was ſo ordeined of God, that ſuch giftes as he had giuen to the firſt man, man ſhould both haue them, and loſe them as well for himſelfe as for his. As for this that the Pelagians doe cauill, that it is not likely that the children

Whether we haue our ſoules or no, by deriuation from our parents, as we haue our bodies, is a needeleſſe queſtion in this caſe. It ſufficeth vs to know that what God beſtowed vpon Adam, it was to hold, or to loſe, for, or from, both himſelfe and his. That the children of faithfull men are ſanctified, is no diſproofe of their originall corruption.

children doe take corruption from godly parents, ſith they ought rather to be ſanctified by their cleanneſſe, that is eaſily confuted. For they deſcend not of their ſpirituall regeneration, but of their carnall generation. Therefore as Auguſtine ſaith, whether the vnbeleeuer be condemned as guiltie, and the beleeuer quit as innocent, they both doe beget not innocents, but guiltie, becauſe they beget of the corrupted nature. Now whereas they doe in maner partake of the parents holineſſe, that is the ſpeciall bleſſing of the people of God, which prooueth not but that the firſt and vniuerſall curſe of mankinde went before. For of nature is guiltineſſe, and ſanctification is of ſupernaturall grace.

8 And to the end that theſe things be not ſpoken of a thing vncertaine and vnknowen, let vs define Originall ſinne. But yet I meane not to examine all the definitions that are made by writers, but I will bring foorth one onely, which I thinke to be moſt agreable with trueth. Originall ſinne therefore ſeemeth to be the inheritably deſcending peruerſneſſe and corruption of our nature, powred abroad into all the parts of the ſoule, which firſt maketh vs guiltie of the wrath of God, and then alſo bringeth foorth theſe workes in vs, which the Scripture calleth the workes of the fleſh: and that is it properly that Paul oftentimes calleth ſinne. And theſe workes that ariſe out of it, as are adulteries, fornications, thefts, hatreds, murthers, banketings, after the ſame maner he calleth the fruits of ſinne, albeit they are likewiſe called ſinnes both commonly in the Scriptures, and alſo by the ſame Paul himſelfe. Therefore theſe two things are diſtinctly to be noted: that is, that being ſo in all parts of our nature corrupted and peruerted, we are now euen for ſuch corruption onely holden worthily damned and conuicted before God, to whom is nothing acceptable but righteouſneſſe, innocencie and pureneſſe. And yet is it not that bonde in reſpect of anothers fault. For where it is ſaid, that by the ſinne of Adam we are made ſubiect to the iudgement of God, it is not ſo to be taken, as if we innocent and vndeſeruing did beare the blame of his fault. But becauſe of his offending we are all clothed with the curſe, therefore is it ſaid that he hath bound vs. Neuertheleſſe, from him not the puniſhment onely came vpon vs, but alſo the infection diſtilled from him, abideth in vs, to the which the puniſhment is iuſtly due. Wherefore howſoeuer Auguſtine doth oftentimes call it an others ſinne, (to ſhew the more plainly, that it is conueyed into vs by propogation) yet doth he alſo affirme withall that it is proper to euery one. And the Apoſtle himſelfe expreſſely witneſſeth, that therefore death came vpon all men, becauſe all men haue ſinned, and are wrapped in Originall ſinne, and defiled with the ſpots thereof. And therefore the very infants themſelues, while they bring with them their owne damnation from their mothers wombe, are bound, not by anothers, but by their owne fault. For although they haue not as yet brought foorth the fruits of their owne iniquitie, yet they haue the ſeede thereof encloſed within them: yea, their whole nature is a certaine ſeede of ſinne: therefore it cannot be but hatefull and abhominable to God. Whereupon followeth, that it is properly accounted ſinne before God: for there could be no guiltineſſe without ſinne. The other point is, that this peruerſneſſe neuer ceaſeth in vs, but continually bringeth foorth new fruits, euen the ſame workes of the fleſh that we haue before deſcribed: like as a burning furnace bloweth out flame and ſparkles, or as a ſpring doth without ceaſing caſt out water. Therefore they which haue defined Originall ſinne, to be a lacking of Originall righteouſneſſe which ought to haue beene in vs, although indeed they comprehend all that is in the thing it ſelfe: yet they haue not fully enough expreſſed the force and efficacie thereof. For our nature is not onely bare and emptie of goodneſſe, but alſo is ſo plenteous and fruitfull of all euils, that it cannot be idle. They that haue ſaid, that it is a concupiſcence, haue vſed a worde not very farre from the matter, if this were added, which is not graunted by the moſt part, that whatſoeuer is in man, euen from the vnderſtanding to the will, from the ſoule to the fleſh, is corrupted and ſtuffed full with this concupiſcence: or, to end it ſhortlier, that whole man is of himſelfe nothing elſe but concupiſcence.

What originall ſin is, and that we are not onely ſubiect to the puniſhment which our firſt fathers fault deſerued, but the infection of his faultineſſe is alſo in vs.

Gal. 5. 19.

Rom. 5. 12.

9 * Wherefore, I haue ſaid that all the parts of the ſoule are poſſeſſed of ſinne ſith Adam fell away from the fountaine of righteouſneſſe. For not onely the inferior appetite allured him, but wicked impietie poſſeſſed the very caſtle of his minde, and pride pride pearced to the innermost part of his heart. So that it is a fonde and foolish thing, to restraine the corruption that proceeded from thence, onely to the sensuall motions as they call them, or to call it a certaine nouriture that alloureth, stirreth and draweth to none onely that part, which among them is called Sensualitie. Wherein Peter Lombard hath disclosed his grosse ignorance, which seeking and searching for the place of it, saith that it is in the flesh, as Paul witnesseth, not properly indeed, but because it more appeareth in the flesh, as though Paul did meane onely a part of the soule, and not the whole nature which is in comparison set against supernaturall grace. And Paul there taketh away all doubt, teaching that corruption resteth not in one part alone: but that nothing is pure and cleane from the deadly infection thereof. For entreating of corrupted nature, he doth not onely condemne the inordinate motions of appetites that appeare, but specially trauelleth to proove that the vnderstanding minde is subiect to blindnesse, and the heart to peruersnesse. And the same third Chapter to the Romanes is nothing else but a description of Originall sinne. That appeareth more plainly by the renewing. For the spirit which is compared with the old man and the flesh, doth not onely signifie the grace whereby the inferiour or sensuall part of the soule is amended, but also contayneth a full reformation of all the parts. And therefore Paul doth commaund, not onely that our grosse appetites be brought to naught, but also that we our selues be renewed in the spirit of our minde, as likewise in another place he biddeth vs to be transformed in newnesse of minde. Whereupon followeth, that the same part, wherein most of all shineth the excellencie and noblenesse of the soule, is not onely wounded, but also so corrupted, that it needeth not onely to be healed, but in maner to put on a new nature. How farre sinne possesseth both the vnderstanding minde and the heart, we will see hereafter. Here I onely purposed shortly to touch that the whole man from the head to the foote is so ouerwhelmed as with an ouerflowing of water, that no part of him is free from sinne, and that therefore whatsoeuer proceedeth from him is accompted for sinne, as Paul saith, that all the affections of the flesh or thoughts are enmities against God, and therefore death.

10 Now let them goe, that presume to make God authour of their sinnes, because we say that men are naturally sinnefull. They doe wrongfully seeke the worke of God in their owne filthinesse, which they ought rather to haue sought in the nature of Adam, while it was yet sound and vncorrupted. Therefore our destruction commeth of the fault of our owne flesh and not of God, forasmuch as we perished by no other meane but by this, that we degendred from our first estate. But yet let not any man heere murmure and say, that God might haue better foreseene for our saluation, if he had prouided that Adam should not haue fallen. For this obiection both is to be abhorred of all godly mindes, for the too much presumptuous curiositie of it, and also pertaineth to the secret of predestination, which shall after be entreated of in place conuenient. Wherefore let vs remember that our fall is to be imputed to the corruption of nature, that we accuse not God himselfe the authour of nature. True indeed it is, that the same deadly wound sticketh fast in nature: but it is much materiall to know, whether it came into nature from elsewhere, or from the beginning hath rested in it. But it is euident that the wound was giuen by sinne. Therefore there is no cause why we should complaine but of our selues: which thing the Scripture hath diligently noted. For Ecclesiastes saith: This haue I found, that God hath made man righteous, but they haue sought many inuentions. It appeareth that the destruction of man is to be imputed onely to himselfe, forasmuch as hauing gotten vprightnesse by the goodnesse of God, he by his owne madnesse is fallen into vanitie.

Though we be naturally sinfull yet is not God the author of our sin.

Eccl. 7. 31.

11 We say therefore that man is corrupted with faultinesse naturall, but such as proceeded not from nature. We denie that it proceeded from nature, to make it appeare that it is rather a qualitie come from some other thing, which is happened to a man, than a substantiall propertie that hath beene put into him from the beginning. Yet we call it Naturall, that no man should thinke that euery man getteth it by euill custome, whereas it holdeth all men bound by inheritably descending right. And this we do not of our owne heads without authoritie. For, for the same cause the Apostle teacheth, because togither with our nature it is deriued into vs and not gotten by custome. Eph. 2. 3.

We are termed corrupt by nature not because God hath put corruption as a naturall qualitie in vs

that we are all by nature the children of wrath. How could God, whom all his meanest workes doe please, be wrathfull against the noblest of all his creatures? But he is rather wrathfull against the corruption of his worke, than against his worke it selfe. Therefore if, for that mans nature is corrupted, man is not vnfitly said to be by nature abhominable to God, it shall be also not vnaptly called naturally peruerse and corrupted. As Augustine feareth not in respect of nature corrupted, to call the sinnes naturall, which doe necessarily raigne in our flesh where the grace of God is absent. So vanisheth away the foolish trifling deuise of the Manichees, which when they imagined an euilnesse hauing substance in man, presumed to forge for him a new Creator, least they should seeme to assigne to the righteous God the cause and beginning of euill.

The Second Chapter.

That man is now spoiled of the Freedome of will, and made subiect to miserable bondage.

The doctrine which concerneth the bondage of our wil, must not make vs slothfull vnto good things, as if they did not appertaine vnto vs, but rather humble and carefull, that knowing our owne weakues, we presume not to trust vnto our selues.

Sith we haue seene, that the dominion of sinne, since the time that it held the first man bound vnto it, doth not onely raigne in all mankinde, but also wholy possesseth euery soule: now must we more neerely examine, since we are brought into that bondage, whether we be spoyled of all Freedome or no: and if yet there remaine any parcell, how farre the force thereof proceedeth. But to the ende that the truth of this question may more easily appeare vnto vs, I will by the way set vp a marke, whereunto the whole summe may be directed. And this shall be the best way to auoide errour, if the dangers be considered that are like to fall on both sides. For when man is put from all vprightnesse, by and by he thereby taketh occasion of slothfulnesse: and because it is said, that by himselfe he can doe nothing to the studie of righteousnesse, foorthwith he neglecteth it wholy, as if it pertained nothing vnto him. Againe, he can presume to take nothing vpon himselfe, be it neuer so little, but that both Gods honour shal be thereby taken from him, & man himselfe be ouerthrowne with rash confidence. Therefore to the ende we strike not vpon these rockes, this course is to be kept, that man being enformed that there remaineth in him no goodnesse, and being on euery side compassed about with most miserable necessitie, may yet be taught to aspire to the goodnesse whereof he is void, and to the libertie whereof he is depriued, and may be more sharply stirred vp from slouthfulnesse, than if it were faigned that he is furnished with greatest power. How necessarie this second point is, euery man seeth. The first, I see is doubted of by moe than it ought to be. For this being set out of controuersie, it ought then plainly to stand for truth, that nothing is to be taken away from man of his owne, as far as it behooueth that he be throwne downe from false boasting of himselfe. For if it were not graunted to man to glory in himselfe euen at that time, when by the bountifulnes of God he was garnished with most singular ornaments, how much ought he now to be humbled, sith for his vnthankfulnesse he is thrust downe from high glorie into extreme shame? At that time (I say) when he was aduanced to the highest degree of honour, the Scripture attributeth nothing else vnto him, but that he was created after the image of God, whereby it secretly teacheth, that man was blessed, not by his owne good things, but by the partaking of God. What therefore remayneth now, but that he being naked and destitute of all glory, doe acknowledge God, to whose liberalitie he could not be thankfull when he flowed full of the riches of his grace: and that now at length with confession of his owne pouertie he glorifie him, whom in the acknowledging of his good gifts, he did not glorifie? Also it is as much for our profit, that all praise of wisedome and strength be taken from vs, as it pertaineth to the glory of God that they ioyne our ruine with the robberie of God, that giue vnto vs any thing more than that which is true. For what is else done when we are taught to fight of our owne force, but that we be lifted vp one hie on a staffe of a reede, that it may by and by breake, and we fall to the ground? Albeit, our forces are yet too much commended when they are compared to the staffe of a reede. For it is but smoke all that vaine men haue imagined and doe babble of them. Wherefore not without cause is this excellent sentence oft repeated by Augustine, that Free will is rather throwne downe headlong, than ſtabliſhed by them that defend it. This I thought needfull to ſpeake before, as by way of Preface for many mens ſakes, which when they heare mans power ouerthrowne from the ground, that the power of God may be builded in man, doe much hate this manner of diſputing as daungerous, much more ſuperfluous, which yet appeareth to be both in religion neceſſarie, and for vs moſt profitable.

2 Whereas we haue a little before ſaid, that in the vnderſtanding minde, and in the hart are placed the powers of the ſoule, now let vs conſider what they both are able to doe. The Philoſophers indeed with great conſent doe imagine that in the vnderſtanding minde ſitteth reaſon, which like a lampe giueth light to all counſels, and like a Queene gouerneth the will; for they ſay that it is ſo endued with diuine light, that it can giue good counſell, and ſo excelleth in liuely force that it is able well to gouerne. On the other ſide, that ſenſe is dull and bleare eied, that it alway creepeth on the ground, and walloweth in groſſe obiects, and neuer lifteth vp it ſelfe to true inſight. That the appetite, if it can abide to obey reaſon, and doe not yeelde it ſelfe to ſenſe to be ſubdued, is carried on to the ſtudie of vertues, holdeth on the right way, and is transformed into will: but if it giue it ſelfe ſubiect into the bondage of ſenſe, it is by it corrupted and peruerted, ſo that it degendreth into luſt. And whereas by their opinion there doe ſit in the ſoule thoſe powers that I haue ſpoken of before, vnderſtanding, ſenſe, appetite or will, which word will is now more commonly vſed, they ſay that vnderſtanding is endued with reaſon, the beſt gouerneſſe toward good and bleſſed life, ſo that it doe hold it ſelfe within his owne excellencie, and ſhew foorth the force that is naturally giuen it. But that inferior motion of it, which is called ſenſe, wherewith man is drawne to error and deceit, they ſay to be ſuch, that it may be tamed with the rod of reaſon, and by little and little be vanquiſhed. They place will in the midſt betweene reaſon and ſenſe, as a thing at her owne ordering, and hauing libertie whether it liſt to obey to reaſon, or giue foorth it ſelfe to be rauiſhed by ſenſe.

The opinion of Philoſophers concerning the freedome of mans will.

3 Sometime in deed they doe not denie, being ouercome by very experience, how hardly man ſtabliſheth reaſon to raigne as Queene within himſelfe, while ſometime he is tickled with entiſements of pleaſure, ſometime deceiued with falſe ſemblance of good things, ſometimes importunately ſtriken with immoderate affections, and violently haled out of the way as it were with ropes or ſtrings of ſinewes, as Plato ſaith. For which reaſon Cicero ſaith that theſe ſparkes giuen by nature, are with peruerſe opinions and euill manners by and by quenched: But when ſuch diſeaſes haue once gotten places in the mindes of men, they graunt that they doe more outragiouſly ouerflow, than that they eaſily may be reſtrained: and they ſticke not to compare them to wilde horſes which throwing away reaſon as it were caſting the Chariot driuen, do range vnruledly and without meaſure. But this they make no queſtion of, that vertues and vices are in our owne power. For if (ſay they) it be in our choiſe to doe this or that, then is it alſo in our choiſe not to doe. Now if it be in our choiſe not to doe, then is it alſo to do, but of free choiſe we ſeeme to doe thoſe things that we do, and to forbeare thoſe things that we forbeare. Therefore if we doe any good thing when we liſt, we may likewiſe leaue it vndone: if we doe any euill, we may alſo eſchew the ſame. Yet ſome of them haue burſt foorth into ſo great licentiouſneſſe, that they haue boaſted that it is in deed Gods gift that we liue, but our owne that we liue well and holily. And thence commeth that ſaying of Cicero in the perſon of Cotta: becauſe euery man himſelfe getteth vertue to himſelfe, therefore neuer any of the wiſe men did thanke God for it. For (ſaith he) for vertue we be praiſed, and in vertue we glorie, which ſhould not be if it were the gift of God, and not of our ſelues. And a little after: This is the iudgement of all men that Fortune is to be asked of God, but wiſedome to be taken of himſelfe. This therefore is the ſumme of the opinion of all the Philoſophers: that the reaſon of mans vnderſtanding is ſufficient for a right gouernance: that Will being ſubiect to it, is in deede mooued by Senſe to euill things. But euen as it hath free election, ſo can it not be ſtopped, but that it follow reaſon for her guide in all things.

Philoſophers imagine that man hath in and of himſelfe habilitie as to be vertuous, ſo to make himſelfe vertuous.

4 Among the Eccleſiaſticall writers, albeit there haue beene none that did not acknowledge both that the ſoundneſſe of reaſon in man hath beene ſore wounded by of contradicting the common receiued opinion of Philosophers, & least they should noozle men in sloth haue too much aduanced the strength of mans both reason and will.

sinne, and his will exceedingly entangled with peruerse desires, yet many of them haue too much assented to the Philosophers, of which the ancient, as I thinke, did so much aduance the strength of man vpon this consideration, least if they should haue expressly confessed his weakenesse, first they should haue made the Philosophers, with whom they then contended, to laugh at them: and then least they should giue to the flesh, which of it selfe was dull to goodnesse, a new occasion of slothfulnes. Therfore because they would not teach any thing that were an absurditie in the cõmon iudgement of men, their studie was to make the doctrine of the Scripture halfe to agree with the teachings of the Philosophers. But that they principally regarded that secõd point, not to make place for slothfulnes, appeareth by their own words. Chrysostome hath in one place: Because God hath put good & euill things in our owne power, he hath giuen vs Fredome of election, & he withholdeth not the vnwilling, but embraceth the willing. Againe, oftentimes he that is euill, if he will, is turned into good, and he that is good by slothfulnesse falleth and becommeth euill, because God made our nature to haue freewill, and he layeth not necessitie vpon vs, but giuing conuenient remedies, suffreth all to lie in the minde of the patient. Againe, As vnlesse we be holpen by the grace of God, we can neuer doe any thing well: so vnlesse we bring that which is our owne, we cannot obtaine the fauour of God. And he had said before, that it should not be all of Gods helpe, but wee must also bring somewhat. And this is commonly a familiar worde with him, let vs bring that which is ours, God will supply the rest. Wherewith agreeth that which Hierome saieth, that it is our part to begin, but Gods to make an ende: our part to offer what we can, his to fulfill what we cannot. You see now that in these sayings they gaue to man toward the studie of vertue more than was meete, because they thought that they could not otherwise awake the dulnesse that was naturally in vs. But if they did prooue that in it onely we sinned, with what apt handeling they haue done the same, we shall after see. Surely that the sayings which we haue rehearsed are most false, shall by and by appeare. Now although the Grecians more than other and among them principally Chrysostome haue passed measure in aduancing the power of mans will, yet all the olde writers, except Augustine, doe in this point so either varie, or wauer, or speake doubtfully, that in maner noe certaintie can be gathered of their writings. Therefore we will not tarrie vpon exact reckoning of euerie one of their sayings, but here and there wee will touch out of euery one of them so much as the plaine declaration of the matter shall seeme to require. As for them that followed after, while euerie one for himselfe sought the praise of wit, in defending of mans nature, they fell continually by little and little one after another into worse and worse, till it came so farre, that man was commonly thought to be corrupted onely in his sensuall part, and to haue reason altogether, and will for the more part vncorrupted. In the meane time this flew about in all mens mouthes, that the naturall giftes were corrupted in man, and the supernaturall were taken away. But to what meaning that tended, scarcely the hundreth man did euen slightly vnderstand. As for my part, if I would plainly shew of what sort is the corruption of nature, I could be easily contented with these wordes. But it is much materiall that it be heedfully weyed what a man, being in all parts of his nature corrupted and spoyled of his supernaturall gifts, is able to doe. They therefore which boasted themselues to be the disciples of Christ, spake of this matter too much like Philosophers. For the name of Freewill still remained among the Latines, as if man had still abiden in vncorrupted state. And the Grecians were not ashamed to vse the word much more arrogantly: For they called it Autexousion, that is to say, of her owne power, as if a man had the power himselfe. Because therefore all, euen to the common people, had receiued this principle, that man was endued with Freewill, and many of them that would seeme excellent, cannot tell how far it extendeth: first let vs search out the force of the word it selfe, & then let vs proceede on by the simplicitie of the Scripture, to shew what man is able to doe of his owne nature, toward good or euill. What Freewill is, whereas it is a word commonly found in all mens writings, yet few haue defined. Yet it seemeth that Origen rehearsed that thing whereof they were all agreed, when he said, that it is a power of reason to discerne good or euill, and a power of will to choose either of them.

Dialog 3. contra Pelagium.

Lib. 3. περὶ ἀρχῶν.

And

And Auguſtine varieth not from him, when he teacheth, that it is a power of reaſon and will, whereby good is choſen while grace aſſiſteth, and euill when grace ceaſeth. Bernard, while he meaneth to ſpeake more ſubtelly, ſpeaketh more darkly, which ſayeth, that it is a conſent by reaſon of the libertie of will that cannot be loſt, and the iudgement of reaſon that cannot be auoyded. And the definition of Anſelmus is not familiar enough, which ſaith that it is a power to keepe vprightneſſe for it ſelfe. Therefore Peter Lombard and the other Schoolemen, haue rather imbraced Auguſtines definition, becauſe it both was plainer and did not exclude the grace of God, without the which they ſaw that will was not ſufficient for it ſelfe. But they bring alſo of their owne ſuch things as they thought either to be better, or to ſerue for plainer declaration. Firſt, they agree that the name of Arbitrium, that is free choiſe, is rather to be referred to reaſon, whoſe part is to diſcerne betweene good and euill things: and the adiectiue Free, pertaineth properly to will, which may be turned to either of both. Wherefore, ſith Freedome properly belongeth to will, Thomas ſaith, that it would very well agree, if Free will be called a power of choſing, which being mixt of vnderſtanding and appetite, doth more encline to appetite. Now haue we in what things they teach that the power of Free will conſiſteth, that is to ſay, in reaſon and will. Now remaineth that we ſhortly ſee how much they giue to either part.

Lib. 2. Diſt. 24.

Par. 1. quæſt. 83. art. 3.

5 They are commonly wont to make ſubiect to the free determination of man things meane, that is, which belong not to the kingdome of God: but they do referre true righteouſnes to the ſpeciall grace of God & ſpirituall regeneration. Which thing while the Author of the booke, Of the calling of the Gentiles meaneth to ſhew, he reckoneth vp three ſortes of Willes, the firſt Senſitiue, the ſecond Naturall, the third Spirituall, of which he ſaith, that man hath the firſt two at his owne libertie, the laſt is the worke of the holy Ghoſt in man. Which whether it be true or not, ſhall be entreated in place fit for it, for now my purpoſe is but ſhortly to rehearſe the opinions of other, and not to confute them. Hereby it commeth to paſſe, that when writers ſpeake of Free will, they principally ſeeke not what it is able to doe to ciuill or outward doings, but what it can do to the obedience of the law of God. Which later point I thinke ſo to be the principall, that yet I thinke the other is not to be neglected. Of which meaning I truſt, I ſhall ſhew a good reaſon. There hath beene a diſtinction receiued in Schooles, that reckoneth vp three ſortes of freedomes, the firſt, from neceſſitie, the ſecond from ſinne, the third from miſerie. Of which the firſt ſo naturally ſticketh faſt in man, that it can by no meane be taken away: the other two are loſt by ſinne. This diſtinction I willingly receiue, ſauing that there neceſſitie is wrongfully confounded with compulſion: betweene which two how much difference there is, and how neceſſarie that difference is to be conſidered, ſhall appeere in another place.

Amb. lib. 1. cap. 1.

6 If this be receiued, then ſhall it be out of controuerſie that man hath not free will to doe good workes, vnleſſe he be holpen by grace, and that by ſpeciall grace, which is giuen to the onely elect by regeneration. For I doe not paſſe vpon theſe phrantike men, which babble that grace is offered generally and without difference. But this is not yet made plaine, whether he be altogether depriued of power to doe well, or whether he haue yet ſome power, although it be but little and weake, which by it ſelfe in deed can doe nothing, but by helpe of grace doth alſo her part. While the Maſter of the Sentences goeth about to make that plaine, he ſaith there are two ſorts of grace neceſſary for vs, whereby we may be made meete to doe a good worke: the one they call a working grace, whereby we effectually will to doe good: the other a Together working grace, which followeth good will in helping it. In which diuiſion this I miſlike, that while he giueth to the grace of God an effectuall deſire of good, he ſecretly ſheweth his meaning that man alreadie of his owne nature, after a certaine manner, deſireth good though vneffectually. As Bernard affirming that good will is in deede the worke of God, yet this he granteth to man, that of his owne motion he deſireth that good will. But this is farre from the meaning of Auguſtine, from whom yet Lombard would ſeeme to haue borrowed this diuiſion. In the ſecond part of the diuiſion, the doubtfulneſſe of ſpeech offendeth me, which hath bred a wrong expoſition. For the thought that we do therfore worke togither with the ſecond grace of God, becauſe it lieth in our power, either to make voide the first grace by refusing it, or to confirme it by obediently following it. Whereas the authour of the booke, Of the calling of the Gentiles, doth thus expresse it, that it is free from them that vse the iudgement of reason, to depart from grace, that it may be woorthie reward not to haue departed, and that the thing which could not be done but by the working togither of the holy Ghost, may be imputed to their merits, by whose will it was possible to haue not beene done. These two things I had will to note by the way, that now, Reader, thou maist see how much I dissent from the soundest sort of the Schoolemen. For I doe much farther differ from the later Sophisters, euen so much as they be farther gone from the ancient time. But yet somewhat, after such a sort as it is, we perceiue by this diuision, after what manner they haue giuen free will to man. For at length Lombard saith, that we haue not free will therefore, because we are alike able either to doe or to thinke good and euill, but onely that we are free from compulsion: which freedome is not hindered, although we be peruerse and the bondmen of sinne, and can doe nothing but sinne.

Amb. lib. 2. cap. 4.

Lib. 2. dist 25.

The danger of vsing the name of free will though we take it in a harmelesse meaning.

7 Therefore, man shall be said to haue free will after this sort, not because he hath a free choise as well of good as of euill, but because he doth euill by Will, and not by compulsion. That is very well said: but to what purpose was it to garnish so small a matter with so proud a title? A goodly libertie forsooth, if man be not compelled to serue sinne: so is he yet a willing seruant that his will is holden fast bound with the fetters of sinne. Truely I doe abhorre striuing about words wherewith the Church is vainly wearied, but I thinke that such words are with great religious carefulnesse to be taken heede of, which sound of any absurditie, specially where the errour is hurtfull. How few I pray you, are there, which when they heare that free will is assigned to man, doe not by and by conceiue, that he is Lord both of his owne minde and will, and that he is able of himselfe to turne himselfe to whether part he will? But some one will say: that perill shall be taken away, if the people be diligently warned of the meaning of it. But rather forasmuch as the wit of man is naturally bent to falsitie, he will sooner conceiue an error of one little word, than a truth out of a long tale. Of which thing we haue a more certaine experience in this very word, than is to be wished. For omitting that exposition of the olde writers, all they in maner that came after, while they sticke vpon the naturall signification of the word, haue beene carried into a trust of themselues that bringeth them to destruction.

8 But if the authoritie of the Fathers do mooue vs, they haue indeed continually the word in their mouth: but they do withal declare, how much they esteeme the vse of it. First of all Augustine, which sticketh not to call it Bond will. In one place he is angrie with them that deny free will: but he declareth his chiefe reason why, when he saith only, Let not any man be so bold to denie the freedome of will, that he go about to excuse sinne. But surely in another place he confesseth, that the will of man is not free without the holy Ghost, forasmuch as it is subiect to lustes that do binde and conquer it. Againe, that when will was ouercome with sinne, whereinto it fell, nature began to want freedome. Againe, that man hauing ill vsed his free will, lost both himselfe and it. Againe, free will is become captiue, that it can doe nothing toward righteousnesse. Againe, that it cannot be free, which the grace of God hath not made free. Againe, that the iustice of God is not fulfilled when the law commandeth, and man doth of his owne strength, but when the holy Ghost helpeth, and mans will not free, but made free by God, obeyeth. And of all these things he shortly rendereth a cause, when in another place he writeth, that man receiued great force of free will when he was created, but he lost it by sinning. Therefore in anothe place, after that he had shewed that free will is stablished by grace, he sharpely inueyeth against them that take it vpon them without grace. Why therefore (saith he) dare wretched men either be proud of free will before that they be made free, or of their owne strength if they be already made free? And they marke not that in the very name of free will, is mention of freedome. But where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is freedome. If then they be the bondmen of sinne, why doe they boast them of free will? For of whom a man is ouercome, to him he is made bond. But if they be made free, why doe they boast them as of their owne worke? Are they so free, that they will not be his bondseruants, which saith:

Without

Without me ye can doe nothing? Beside that also in another place he seemeth sportingly to mocke at the vse of that word, when he said, that will was in deede free, but not made free, free to righteousnesse, but the bondseruant of sinne. Which saying in another place he repeateth and expoundeth, that man is not free from righteousnesse, but by choise of will, and from sinne he is not free but by grace of the Sauiour. He that doeth testifie, that the freedome of man is nothing else but a freemaking or manumission from righteousnesse, seemeth trimly to mocke at the vaine name thereof. Therefore if any man will permit the vse of this word with no euill signification, he shall not be troubled by me for so doing. But becausse I thinke it cannot be kept without great perill, and that it should turne to a great benefite to the Church, if it were abolished: neither will I my selfe vse it, and I would wish other, if they aske me counsell, to forbeare it.

Iohn 15. 5. De correpti. one & gratia. cap. 13.

9 I may seeme to haue brought a great preiudice against my selfe, which haue confessed, that all the ecclesiasticall writers, except Augustine, haue spoken so doubtfully or diuersly in this matter, that no certeintie can be had out of their writings. For some will so construe this, that I meant therefore to thrust them from giuing any voice herein, becausse they are all against me. As for me, I meant it to no other end but this, that I simply and in good faith would haue godly wits prouided for, which if they wait vpon those mens opinions in this point, they shall alway wauer vncertaine. In such sort doe they sometime teach, man being spoiled of all strength of free will, to flee to grace onely: sometime they furnish or seeme to furnish him with his owne armour. But it is not hard to make appeere, that in such doubtfulnesse of speech, they nothing, or very little esteeming mans strength, haue giuen the praise of all good things to the holy Ghost, if I heere recite certaine sentences of theirs, whereby that is plainely taught. For what meaneth that saying of Cyprian, which Augustine so often repeateth, that we ought to glorie of nothing, becausse we haue nothing of our owne, but that man wholy despoiled in himselfe, may learne to hang all vpon God? What meaneth that saying of Augustine and Eucherius, when they expound, that Christ is the tree of life, to whom he that reacheth his hand, shall liue? and that the tree of knowledge of good and euill, is the free choise of will, whereof who so tasteth, forsaking the grace of God, he shall die? What meaneth that of Chrysostome, that euery man is naturally not onely a sinner, but also altogether sinne? If we haue no good thing of our owne: If man from top to toe be altogether sinne: if it be not lawfull to attempt how much the power of free will is able to doe, how then may it be lawfull to part the praise of a good worke betweene God and man? I could rehearse of this sort very many sayings out of other, but least any man should cauill, that I choose out those things onely that make for my purpose, and doe craftily leaue out such things as make against me, therefore I doe forbeare such rehearsall. Yet this I dare affirme, howsoeuer they be sometime too busie in aduancing free will, that this yet was their purposed marke, to teach man being altogether turned away from trust of his owne power, to haue his strength reposed in God alone. Now come I to the simple setting foorth of the truth, in considering the nature of man.

That the fathers who in considerations before alleaged Section 4. seeme sometimes to furnish man with his owne armour, doe notwithstanding giue the praise of all good things to the holy Ghost.

Homilia in aduent.

10 But I am heere constrained to repeate that, which in the beginning of this Chapter, I spake by way of preface. As any man is most discouraged and throwen downe with conscience of his owne miserie, needinesse, nakednesse and shame, so hath he best profited in knowledge of himselfe. For there is no danger to be feared, least man will take too much from himselfe, so that he learne, that what he wanteth is to be recouered in God, but to himselfe he can take nothing more than his owne right, be it neuer so little, but that he shall destroy himselfe with vaine confidence, and conueying the honour of God to himselfe, become guiltie of hainous sacrilege. And truely so oft as this lust inuadeth our minde, that we desire to haue somewhat of our owne, which may rest in our selues rather than in God, let vs know that this thought is ministred vs by no other counseller, but by him that persuaded our first parents to haue a will to be like vnto Gods, knowing both good and euill. If it be the word of the diuell that raiseth vp man in himselfe, let vs giue no place vnto it, vnlesse we list to take counsell of our enemie. It is pleasant in deede, for a man to haue so much strength of his owne, that he may rest in himselfe. But that we be not allured to this vaine affiance, let so many ſore ſentences make vs afraide, by which we be throwen downe: as are, Curſed is he which truſteth in man, and ſetteth fleſh to be his arme. Againe, that God hath not pleaſure in the ſtrength of a horſe, neither deliteth in the legs of man, but deliteth in them that feare him, and attend vpon his mercie. Againe, that it is he which giueth ſtrength vnto him that fainteth, and vnto him that hath no ſtrength, he increaſeth power, euen the yoong men ſhall faint and be wearie, and the yoong men ſhall ſtumble and fall, but they that wait vpon the Lord, ſhall renew their ſtrength. All which ſayings tend to this end, that we leane not vpon any opinion of our owne ſtrength, be it neuer ſo little, if we meane to haue God fauourable vnto vs, which reſiſteth the proud, and giueth grace to the humble. And then againe, let theſe promiſes come into our remembrance: I will powre out water vpon the thirſtie, and flouds vpon the drie ground. Againe, all yee that thirſt, come vnto the waters. Which promiſes doe teſtifie, that none are admitted to receiue the bleſſings of God, but they that pine away with feeling of their owne peuertie. And ſuch promiſes are not to be paſſed ouer, as is that of Eſay: Thou ſhalt haue no more Sunne to ſhine by day, neither ſhall the brightneſſe of the Moone ſhine vnto thee: for the Lord ſhall be thine euerlaſting light, and the God thy glorie. The Lord in deede doth not take away the ſhining of the Sunne or Moone from his ſeruants, but becauſe he will himſelfe alone appeere glorious in them, he calleth their confidence farre away, euen from thoſe things, that are counted in their opinion moſt excellent.

Humilitie therfore a precious vertue, becauſe in acknowledging mans baſeneſſe, Gods highneſſe is aduanced. Hom. de perf. euangel. Epiſt. 56. ad Dioſ. In Ioan. hom. 49. Lib. de Nat. & gratia, cap. 52. in Pſal. 45.

11 Truely, that ſaying of Chryſoſtome hath alway exceedingly well pleaſed me, that the foundation of our Wiſedome is humilitie: but yet more that ſaying of Auguſtine, as (ſayeth he) that ſame Rhetorician being asked, what was the firſt thing in the rules of eloquence, anſwered Pronunciation: and what was the ſecond, he anſwered Pronunciation: and what was the third, he anſwered Pronunciation: ſo if one aske me of the rules of Chriſtian religion, the Firſt, the Second, and Third time, and alwaies I would anſwere Humilitie. But he meaneth not humilitie, when a man knowing ſome little vertue to be in himſelfe, abſtaineth from pride and hawtineſſe of minde, but when he truly feeleth himſelfe to be ſuch a one, as hath no refuge but in humilitie: as in another place he declareth: Let no man (ſayeth he) flatter himſelfe: of his owne he is a diuell. That thing whereby he is bleſſed, he hath of God onely. For what haſt thou of thine owne, but ſinne? Take away from thee ſinne which is thine owne, for righteouſneſſe is Gods. Againe, why is the poſſibilitie of nature ſo preſumed on? it is wounded, maimed, troubled and loſt, it needeth a true confeſſion, and not a falſe defence. Againe, when euery man knoweth that in himſelfe he is nothing, and of himſelfe hath no help, his weapons in himſelfe are broken, the wars are ceaſed. But it is needefull, that all the weapons of wickedneſſe be broken in ſunder, ſhiuered in peeces and burnt, that thou remaine vnarmed and haue no help in thy ſelfe. How much more weake thou art in thy ſelfe, ſo much the more the Lord receiueth thee. So vpon the threeſcore and ten Pſalme he forbiddeth vs to remember our owne righteouſneſſe, that we may acknowledge the righteouſneſſe of God: and he ſheweth that God doth ſo commend his grace vnto vs, that we may know our ſelues to be nothing, that we ſtand only by the mercy of God, when of our ſelues we are nothing but euill. Let vs not therefore ſtriue heere with God for our right, as if that were withdrawen from our ſaluation which is giuen to him. For as our humbleneſſe is his highneſſe, ſo the confeſſion of our humbleneſſe hath his mercie readie for remedie. Neither yet doe I require that man not conuinced ſhould willingly yeeld himſelfe: nor if he hath any power, that he ſhould turne his minde from it, to be ſubdued vnto true humilitie. But that laying away the diſeaſe of ſelfeloue and deſire of victorie, wherewith being blinded, he thinketh too highly of himſelfe, he ſhould well conſider himſelfe in the true looking glaſſe of the Scripture.

Man through ſinne was made emptie of ſupernaturall gifts, as faith, loue, righteouſneſſe: naturall, as both vnderſtanding

12 And the common ſaying which they haue borrowed out of Auguſtine pleaſeth me well, that the naturall gifts were corrupted in man by ſinne, and of the ſupernaturall he was made emptie. For in this latter part of ſupernaturall gifts, they vnderſtand as well the light of faith as of righteouſneſſe, which were ſufficient to the attraining of heauenly life and eternall felicitie. Therefore baniſhing himſelfe from the kingdome of God, he was alſo depriued of the ſpirituall gifts wherewith he had beene furniſhed to the hope of eternall ſaluation. Whereupon followeth, that he is ſo baniſhed from the kingdome of God, that all things that belong to the bleſſed life of the ſoule, are extinguiſhed in him, vntill by grace of regeneration he recouer them. Of that ſort are faith, the loue of God, charitie toward our neighbours, the ſtudie of holineſſe and righteouſneſſe. All theſe things, becauſe Chriſt reſtoreth them vnto vs, are counted things comming from another to vs, and beſide nature, and therefore we gather that they were once taken away. Againe, ſoundneſſe of the vnderſtanding minde and vprightneſſe of heart were then taken away together, and this is the corruption of naturall gifts. For though there remaine ſomewhat left of vnderſtanding and iudgement together with will, yet can we not ſay, that our vnderſtanding is ſound and perfect, which is both feeble and drowned in many darkneſſes. And as for our will, the peruerſneſſe thereof is more than ſufficiently knowen. Sith therefore reaſon, whereby a man diſcerneth betweene good and euill, whereby he vnderſtandeth and iudgeth, is a naturall gift, it could not be altogether deſtroyed, but it was partly weakned, partly corrupted, ſo that foule ruines thereof appeare. In this ſenſe doth Iohn ſay, that the light ſhineth yet in darkneſſe, but the darkneſſe comprehended it not. In which words both things are plainely expreſſed, that in the peruerted and degendred nature of man, there ſhine yet ſome ſparkes that ſhew that he is a creature hauing reaſon, and that he differeth from bruit beaſts, becauſe he is endued with vnderſtanding: and yet that this light is choaked with great thickneſſe of ignorance, that it cannot effectually get abroad. So will, becauſe it is vnſeperable from the nature of man, periſhed not, but was bound to peruerſe deſires, that it can couet no good thing. This indeed is a full definition, but yet ſuch as needeth to be made plaine with more words. Therefore, that the order of our talke may proceede according to that firſt diſtinction, wherein we deuided the ſoule of man into vnderſtanding and will: let vs firſt examine the force of vnderſtanding. So to condemne it of perpetuall blindneſſe, that a man leaue vnto it no maner of skill in any kinde of things, is not onely againſt the word of God, but alſo againſt the experience of common reaſon. For we ſee that there is planted in man a certaine deſire to ſearch out trueth, to which he would not aſpire at all, but hauing felt ſome ſauour thereof before. This therefore is ſome ſight of mans vnderſtanding, that he is naturally drawen with loue of trueth, the neglecting whereof, in bruite beaſts prooueth a groſſe Senſe without reaſon, albeit, this litle deſire, ſuch as it is, fainteth before it enter the beginning of her race, becauſe it by and by falleth into vanitie. For the wit of man cannot for dulneſſe keepe the right way to ſearch out trueth, but ſtraieth in diuers errours, and as it were groping in darkneſſe, oftentimes ſtumbleth, till at length it wander and vaniſh away, ſo in ſeeking trueth, it doth bewray how vnfit it is to ſeeke and find trueth. And then it is ſore troubled with another vanitie, that oftentimes it diſcerneth not thoſe things, to the true knowledge whereof it were expedient to bend it ſelfe, and therefore it tormenteth it ſelfe with fond curioſitie, in ſearching out things ſuperfluous and nothing worth: and to things moſt neceſſarie to be knowen, it either taketh no heede, or negligently or ſeldome turneth, but ſurely ſcarſe at any time applyeth her ſtudie earneſtly vnto them. Of which peruerſneſſe, whereas the prophane writers doe commonly complaine, it is found, that all men haue entangled themſelues with it. Wherefore Salomon in all his Eccleſiaſtes, when he had gone through all theſe ſtudies, in which men thinke themſelues to be very wiſe, yet he pronounceth that they are all vaine and trifling.

and will, though they be not quite taken away, yet the ſoundnes of them is loſt: the vnſoundneſſe of his vnderſtanding may be ſeene both by his often ſtraying in that which he ſeeketh, and his not ſeeking that which belongeth moſt vnto him.

Iohn 1.5.

13 Yet doe not all trauailes of Wit ſo alway become voide, but that it attaineth ſomewhat, ſpecially when it bendeth it ſelfe to theſe inferiour things. Yea, and it is not ſo blockiſh, but that it taſteth alſo ſome litle of the higher things, howſoeuer it more negligently apply the ſearching of them, but yet not that with like power of conceiuing. For when it is carried vp aboue the compaſſe of this preſent life, then is it principally conuinced of her owne weakneſſe. Wherefore, that we may the better ſee how far according to the degrees of her abilitie, it proceedeth in euery thing, it it good that I put foorth a diſtinction. Let this therefore be the diſtinction, that there is one vnderſtanding of earthly things, an other of heauenly things. Earthly things I call thoſe that doe not concerne God and his kingdome, true righteouſneſſe and the bleſſedneſſe of eternall life, but haue all their reſpect and relation to this preſent life, and are as it were were contained within the bounds thereof. Heauenly things, I call the pure knowledge of God, the order of true righteousnesse, and the mysteries of the heauenly kingdome. Of the first sort are policie, gouernance of houshold, all handie crafts, and liberall Sciences. Of the second sort are the knowledge of God and Gods will, and the rule to frame our life according to it. Concerning the first, this we must confesse, because man is a creature by nature giuen to liue in companies together: he is also by naturall instinction bent to cherish and to preserue the fellowship of these companies, therefore we see that there are in the mindes of all men vniuersall impressions of a certaine ciuill honestie and order. Hereby it commeth to passe, that there is found no man that vnderstandeth not, that all companies of men ought to be kept in order with lawes, and that conceiueth not in his minde the principles of these lawes. Hereof commeth that same perpetuall consent, as well of all nations as of all men vnto lawes, because the seeds thereof are naturally planted in all men without any teacher or lawmaker. And I weye not the dissentions and fightings that afterward arise while some desire to peruert lawe and right, the loose absolute gouernement of Kings, that lust strayeth abroade in steed of right, as theeues and robbers; some (which is a fault more than common) thinke that to be vniust, which other haue stablished for iust: and on the other side stiffely say, that to be laudable, which other haue forbidden. For these men doe not therefore hate lawes, because they doe not know that lawes are good and holy, but for that they raging with headie lust, doe fight against manifest reason, and for their fansie doe abhorre that, which in vnderstanding of minde they allow. The latter sort of it striuing in such, that taketh not away the first conceiuing of equitie. For when men doe striue among themselues concerning the points of lawes, they agree together in a certaine summe of equitie. Wherein is prooued the weakenesse of mans wit, which euen then when it seemeth to follow the right way, yet halteth and staggereth, but still this remaineth true, that there is sowen in all men a certaine seede of politike order. And that is a large proofe, that in the ordering of this life, no man is void of the light of reason.

Mans naturall capatitie may attaine to the knowledge of things belonging to this preſent life. As firſt there are in all mens mindes certaine ſeedes of vnderſtanding thoſe things wherein ciuill order & policie is grounded.

Men haue naturally a power and facilitie to learne and finde out artes: wherein notwithstanding the liberalitie of God shineth: without which all would be as some are euen meere naturals.

14 Now doe follow the artes, both the liberall, and the handie crafts, in learning whereof, because there is in vs all a certaine aptnesse, in them also doeth appeare the force of mans wit: but albeit, all men be not apt to learne them all, yet is this a token certaine enough of the common naturall power, that there is a most no man found, whose conceit of wit doth not in some arte or other shew foorth it selfe. Neither haue they onely a power or facilitie to learne, but also to deuise in euery arte some new thing, either to amplifie or make perfecter that which hath been learned of an other that went before, which thing, as it mooued Plato erroniously to teach, that such conceiuing is nothing else but a calling to remembrance, so by good reason it ought to compell vs to confesse, that the beginning thereof is naturally planted in the wit of man. These points therefore doe plainely testifie, that there is giuen to men naturally an vniuersall conceiuing of reason and of vnderstanding. Yet is it so an vniuersall benefit, that therein euery man ought for himselfe to acknowledge the peculiar grace of God. To which thankefulnesse the creator himselfe doth sufficiently awake vs, when he createth naturall fooles, in whom he maketh vs to see with what gifts mans soule excelleth, if it be not endued with his light, which is so naturall in all men, that it is yet altogether a free gift of his liberalitie towards euery man. But the inuention and orderly teaching of the same artes, or a more inward and excellent knowledge of them which is proper but to a few, is no perfect argument of the common conceiuing of wit, yet because without difference it happeneth to the godly and vngodly, it is rightfully reckened among naturall gifts.

The skill which Philosophers had in sundry artes and sciences, sheweth what good God hath still left the nature of man enriched withall, al-

15 So oft therefore as we light vpon prophane writers, let vs be put in minde by that maruellous light of truth that shineth in them, that the wit of man, how much soeuer it be peruerted and fallen from the first integritie, is yet still clothed and garnished with excellent gifts of God. If we consider that the spirit of God is the onely fountaine of truth, we will neither refuse nor despise the truth it selfe, whereseeuer it shall appeare, except we will dishonorably vse the spirit of God: for the gifts of the holy Ghost cannot be set light by, without contempt and reproch of himselfe: And what? shall we denie that the truth shined to the old Lawyers, which haue set foorth Ciuill order and

Discipline

Diſcipline with ſo great equitie? Shall we ſay that the Philoſophers were blinde both in that exquiſite contemplation, and cunning deſcription of nature? Shall we ſay that they had no wit, which by ſetting in order the arte of ſpeech, haue taught vs to ſpeake with reaſon? Shall we ſay that they were mad, which in ſetting foorth Phiſicke, haue employed their diligence for vs? What of all the Mathematicall ſciences? Shall we thinke them doting errours of mad men? No, rather we cannot reade the writings of the old men concerning theſe things, without great admiration of their wit. But ſhall we thinke any thing praiſeworthie or excellent, which we doe not reknowledge to come of God? Let vs be aſhamed of ſo great vnthankfulneſſe into which the heathen Poets fell not, which confeſſed that both Philoſophie and Lawes, and all good Artes, were the inuentions of gods. Sith then it appeareth that theſe men whom the Scripture calleth naturall men, were of ſo ſharp and deepe ſight in ſearching out of inferiour things, let vs learne by ſuch examples how many good things the Lord hath left to the nature of man, after that it hath beene ſpoyled of the true God.

though he hath robbed and ſtripped himſelf of the chiefeſt gifts wherewith God endued him.

16 But in the meane time yet let vs not forget, that theſe are the moſt excellent good gifts of the ſpirit of God, which for the common benefite of mankinde he dealeth abroade to whom it pleaſeth him. For if it behooued, that the vnderſtanding and skill that was required for the framing of the tabernacle, ſhould be powred into Beſeleel and Oliab by the ſpirit of God, it is no maruell if the knowledge of thoſe things which are moſt excellent in mans life, be ſaid to be communicated vnto vs by the ſpirit of God. Neither is there cauſe why any man ſhould aske, what haue the wicked to doe with Gods ſpirit, which are altogether eſtranged from God. For where it is ſaid that the ſpirit of God dwelleth in the faithfull onely: that is to be vnderſtanded of the ſpirit of ſanctification, by the which we are conſecrate to God himſelfe, to be his temples: yet doth he neuertheleſſe fill, mooue, and quicken all things with the vertue of the ſame ſpirit, and that according to the propertie of euery kinde which he hath giuen to it by law of creation. If it haue been the Lords will that we ſhould be holpen by the trauell and ſeruice of the wicked in naturall Philoſophy, Dialectike, the Mathematicall knowledges, and other: let vs vſe it, leaſt if we neglecting the gifts of God, willingly offered in them, we ſuffer iuſt puniſhment for our ſlothfulneſſe. But leſt any ſhould thinke a man to be bleſſed, when vnder the elements of this world there is graunted vnto him ſo great an abilitie to conceiue truth: it is alſo to be added, that all this power to vnderſtand, and the vnderſtanding that followeth thereof, is a vaniſhing and tranſitorie thing before God, where is not a ſtedfaſt foundation of truth. For Auguſtine teacheth moſt truely, whom (as we haue ſaid) the Maſter of the Sentences, and the other Schoolemen are compelled to aſſent vnto, as the free gifts were taken from man after his fall, ſo theſe naturall giſts which remained, were corrupted. Not that they be defiled of themſelues in aſmuch as they come from God, but becauſe they ceaſe to be pure to a defiled man, that he ſhould haue no praiſe of them.

The knowledge of artes and ſciences is the gift of the ſpirit of God: neither is it to be neglected, although before God it be but a vaniſhing tranſitorie thing.

Exod. 31.2. & 35.30.

Lib. 2. diſt. 25.

17 Let this be the ſumme: that it is ſeene that in all mankinde is reaſon which is proper to our nature, which maketh vs to differ from brute beaſts, as brute beaſts doe differ in ſenſe from things without life. For whereas there be borne certaine naturall fooles and idiots, that default obſcureth not the generall grace of God: but rather by ſuch ſight we are put in minde, that what is left vnto our ſelues, ought iuſtly to be aſcribed to the kindneſſe of God, becauſe if he had not ſpared vs, our rebellion had drawne with it the deſtruction of our whole nature. But whereas ſome doe excell in ſharpneſſe of conceiuing, ſome other doe paſſe in iudgement, ſome haue a quicker wit to learne this or that arte: in this varietie God ſetteth foorth his grace vnto vs, that no man ſhould claime to himſelfe as his owne, that which floweth from Gods meere liberalitie. For how becommeth one more excellent than an other, but that in common nature might appeare aboue other the ſpeciall grace of God, which in omitting many, ſaith openly that it is bound to none. Beſide that, God powreth in ſingular motions, according to the calling of euery man. Of which thing we meete with many examples in the bookes of the Iudges, where it is ſaid, that the ſpirit of the Lord clad them, whom he called to rule the people. Finally, in euery noble act there is a ſpeciall inſtruction. By which reaſon the ſtrong men followed Saul, whoſe hearts the Lord

As God hath in common indued men with reaſon, ſo he doth particularly for ſpeciall purpoſes powre ſpeciall meaſures into them.

Iudg. 6.34.

1.Sam.10.6. Lord had touched. And when his ministring in the kingdome was prophecied of, Samuel said thus: The spirit of the Lord shall come vpon thee, and thou shalt be another man. And this was continued to the whole course of gouernement: as after it is spoken 1.Sam.16.13. of Dauid, that the spirit of the Lord came vpon him from that day forward. But the same is spoken in another place as touching particular motions: yea, in Homer men are said to excell in wit, not onely as Iupiter hath dealt to euery man, but also as the time required. And truely experience teacheth, while many times such men stand amased as were most sharpe and deepe witted, that the wits of men are in the hand and will of God to rule them at euery moment: for which reason it is said, that he taketh wit from Psal.107.40. the wise, that they may wander out of the way. But yet in this diuersitie we see remaining some marks of the image of God, which doe make difference betweene all mankinde and other creatures.

Touching heauenly things, as the knowledge of God, of his fauour towards vs, and of the way to frame our liues after his will, mans naturall reason conceiueth very little in the first, in the second nothing at all.

18 Now is to be declared what mans reason seeth, when it commeth to the kingdome of God and to that spirituall insight, which consisteth chiefly in three things: to know God, and his fatherly fauour toward vs, wherein our saluation standeth: and the way to frame our life according to the rule of his law. Both in the first two, and in the second properly they that are most wittie, are blinder then Moles. I denie not that there be heere and there read in Philosophers, concerning God, many things well and aptlie spoken, but yet such as doe alway sauour of a certaine giddie imagination. The Lord gaue them in deede, as is aboue said, a little taste of his Godhead, that they should not pretend ignorance to colour their vngodlinesse: and many times he mooued them to speake many things, by confession whereof themselues might be conuinced: But they so sawe the things that they sawe, that by such seeing they were not directed to the truth, much lesse did attaine vnto it, like as a wayfaring man in the middest of the field, for a sudden moment, seeth farre and wide the glistering of lightning in the night time, but with such a quickly vanishing sight, that he is sooner couered againe with the darkenesse of the night, than he can stirre his foote, so farre is it off that he can be brought into his way by such a helpe. Beside that, those small drops of trueth, wherewith as it were by chaunce, they sprinkle their bookes, with how many and how monstrous lies are they defiled? Finally, they neuer so much as smelled that assuredneſse of Gods good will toward vs, without which, mans wit must needs be filled with infinite confusion. Therefore mans reason neither approcheth, nor goeth toward, nor once directeth sight vnto this truth, to vnderstand who is the true God, or what a one he will be toward vs.

To know God is the speciall gift of God. Iohn 1.4.

19 But because we being drunke with a false perswasion of our owne deepe insight, doe very hardly suffer our selues to be perswaded, that in matters of God it is vtterly blinde and dull: I thinke it shall be better to confirme it by testimonies of Scripture, than by reasons. This doeth Iohn very well teach in that place which I euen now alleaged, when he writeth, that life was in God from the beginning, and the same life which should be the light of men, and that the light did shine in darknesse, and the darknesse comprehended it not. He sheweth in deede, that mans soule is lightened with the brightnesse of Gods light, so that it is neuer altogether without some small flame, or at least some sparkle of it, but yet, that with such a light he comprehendeth not God. And why so? because mans quickneſse of wit, as toward the knowledge of God, is but meere darkneſse. For when the holy ghost calleth men darknes, he at once Iohn 1.13. spoileth them of all abilitie of spirituall vnderstanding. Therefore he affirmeth, that the faithfull which embrace Christ, are borne not of bloud, or of the will of the flesh, or of man, but of God. As if he should say, flesh is not capeable of so high wisedome to conceiue God, and that which is Gods, vnlesse it be lightned with the spirit of God. As Mat.16.17. Christ testified, that this was a speciall reuelation of the Father, that Peter did know him.

It is the principall illumination of the spirit which openeth the eyes of Gods elect and theirs

20 If we were perswaded of this which ought to be out of all controuersie, that our nature wanteth all that, which our heauenly Father giueth to his elect by the spirit of regeneration, then heere were no matter to doubt vpon. For thus speaketh the faithfull people in the Prophet: For with thee is the fountaine of life, and in thy light we shall see light. The Apostle testifieth the same thing when he saith, that no man can

call

call Iesus the Lord, but in the holy Ghost. And Iohn Baptist seeing the dulnesse of his disciples, crieth out, that no man can receiue any thing, vnlesse it be giuen him from aboue. And that he meaneth by gift a speciall illumination, and not a common gift of nature, appeareth hereby, that he complaineth that in so many words as he had spoken to commend Christ to his disciples, he preuailed nothing. I see (saith he) that words are nothing to informe mens minds concerning diuine things, vnlesse the Lord giue vnderstanding by his spirit. Yea, and Moses, when he reprocheth the people with their forgetfulnesse, yet noteth this withall, that they can by no meanes grow wise in the mysteries of God, but by the benefit of God. Thine eies (saith he) haue seene those great tokens and woonders, and, The Lord hath not giuen thee a hart to vnderstand, nor eares to heare, nor eies to see. What should he expresse more, if he called vs blocks in considering the works of God? Whereupon the Lord by the Prophet promiseth for a great grace, that he wil giue the Israelites a heart, that they may know him: signifying thereby, that mans wit is onely so much spiritually wise, as it is lightened by him. And this Christ plainly confirmed with his owne mouth, when he sayeth, that no man can come to him, but he to whom it shall be giuen from the Father. What? is not he himselfe the liuely image of the Father in whom the whole brightnesse of his glorie is expressed vnto vs? Therefore he could not better shew what our power is to know God, than when he saith, that we haue no eies to see his image, where it is so openly set present before vs. What? came he not into the earth for this purpose, to declare his Fathers will vnto men? And did he not faithfully doe his office? Yes surely. But yet nothing is wrought by his preaching, vnlesse the inward schoolemaster the holy Ghost, set open the way to our mindes. Therefore none come to him, but they that haue heard and beene taught of the Father. What manner way of learning and hearing is this? Euen, when the holy Ghost by maruellous & singular vertue formeth the eares to heare, and the minds to vnderstand. And least that should seeme strange, he alleageth the prophesie of Esay, where when he promiseth the repairing of the Church, that they which shall be gathered together to saluation, shall be taught of the Lord. If God there foreshoweth some peculiar thing concerning his elect, it is euident that he speaketh not of that kinde of learning that was also common to the wicked and vngodly. It remaineth therefore that we must vnderstand it thus, that the way into the kingdome of God is open to no man, but to him to whom the holy Ghost by his enlightening shall make a new mind. But Paul speaketh most plainly of all, which of purpose entring into discourse of this matter, after he had condemned all mens wisedome of folly & vanitie, and vtterly brought it to nought, at the last concludeth thus: that the naturall man cannot perceiue those things that are of the spirit of God: they are foolishnesse vnto him, and he cannot vnderstand them, because they are spiritually iudged. Whom doeth he call naturall? euen him that stayeth vpon the light of nature. He I say comprehendeth nothing in the spirituall mysteries of God. Why so? is it because by slothfulnesse he neglecteth it? Nay, rather although he would trauell neuer so much, he can doe nothing, because forsooth they are spiritually iudged. What meaneth that? because being vtterly hidden from the sight of man, they are opened by the onely reuelation of the spirit: so that they are reckened for folly where the spirit of God giueth not light. Before he had auanced those things that God hath prepared for them that loue him, aboue the capacitie of eies, eares, and mindes. Yea, he testifieth that mans wisedome was a certaine veile, whereby mans minde was kept from seeing God. What meane we? The Apostle pronounceth, that the wisedome of this world is made folly by God: and shall we forsooth giue vnto it sharpnesse of vnderstanding, whereby it may pearce to the secret places of the heauenly kingdome? Far be such beastlinesse from vs.

Now thou heares that all wisedome and reuelation is the gift of God. What followeth? and lighten the eies of your minde. Surely if they neede a new reuelation, then are they blinde of themselues. It followeth after: That ye may know what is the hope of your calling, &c. Therefore he confesseth, that the wits of men are not capeable of so great vnderstanding, to know their own calling. The word of God can neuer enlighten mens mindes without his grace.

ſome Pelagian babble heere, that God doth remedie that dulneſſe or vnskilfulneſſe, when by the doctrine of his word he directeth mans vnderſtanding, whither without a guide he could not haue attained. For Dauid had a lawe, wherein was comprehended all the wiſedome that may be deſired, and yet not contented with that, he requireth to haue his eies opened that he may conſider the myſteries of the ſame law. By which ſpeech truly he ſecretly ſaith, that the Sunne riſeth vpon the earth where the word of God ſhineth to men: but they get not much thereby, vntill he himſelfe, that is therefore called the father of lights, doe giue them or open their eies, becauſe whereſoeuer he ſhineth not with his ſpirit, all things are poſſeſſed with darkenes. So the Apoſtles were well and largely taught by the beſt Schoolemaſter: yet if they had not needed the ſpirit of truth to inſtruct their minds in that ſame doctrine which they had heard before, he would not haue bidden them looke for him. If the thing that we aske of God, we doe thereby confeſſe that we want: and God in that that he promiſeth it vs, doth argue our neede, let no man doubt to confeſſe that he is ſo much able to vnderſtand the myſteries of God as he is inlightned with his grace. He that giueth to himſelfe more vnderſtanding, is ſo much the more blinde, for that he doth not acknowledge his owne blindnes.

Rom. 2. 14.

22 Now remaineth the third point, of knowing the rule of well framing of life, which we doe rightly call the knowledge of the works of righteouſneſſe, wherein mans wit ſeemeth to be of ſomewhat more ſharp ſight, than in the other two before. For the Apoſtle teſtifieth, that the Gentiles which haue no law, while they doe the works of the law, are to themſelues in ſtead of a Law, and doe ſhew the law written in their hearts, their conſciences bearing them witnes, and their thoughts accuſing them within themſelues, or excuſing them before the iudgement of God. If the Gentiles haue righteouſneſſe naturally grauen in their minds, ſurely we cannot ſay that we are altogether blind in the order of life. And nothing is more common, than that man by the law naturall, of which the Apoſtle ſpeaketh in that place, is ſufficiently inſtructed to a right rule of life. But let vs wey to what purpoſe this knowledge of the law is planted in men: then it ſhall by and by appeare, how farre it bringeth them toward the marke of reaſon and truth. The ſame is alſo euident by the words of Paul, if a man doe marke the placing of them. He had ſaid a little before, that they which ſinned in the Law, are iudged by the Law, they which haue ſinned without Law doe periſh without Law. Becauſe this might ſeeme vnreaſonable, that the Gentiles ſhould periſh without any iudgement going before, he by and by addeth, that their conſcience is to them in ſtead of a Law, and therefore is ſufficient for their iuſt damnation. Therefore the end of the law naturall is, that man may be made inexcuſable. And it ſhall be defined not ill after this ſort, that it is a knowledge of conſcience, that ſufficiently diſcerneth betweene iuſt and vniuſt, to take away from men the pretence of ignorance, while they are prooued guiltie by their owne teſtimonie. Such is the tenderneſſe of man toward himſelfe, that in doing of euils, he alway turneth away his minde ſo much as he may from the feeling of ſinne. By which reaſon it ſeemeth that Plato was mooued to thinke that there is no ſinne done but by ignorance. That indeede were fitly ſaid of him, if mens hypocriſie went ſo farre in hiding of vices, that the minde might not know it ſelfe guiltie before God. But when the ſinner ſeeking to eſchue the iudgement imprinted in him, is now and then drawne backe vnto it, and not ſuffered ſo to winke, but that he be compelled whether he will or no, ſometime to open his eyes: it is falſely ſaid that he ſinneth onely by ignorance.

In Protagora.

* The minde which knoweth generally that euill muſt be ſhunned, is notwithſtanding blinde in diſcerning particularly what it ſhould ſhun as euill, and carried ſometimes wittingly to embrace that euill which it knoweth.

Paraph. in lib. 3. de anima. cap. 46.

23 * Themiſtius ſaith more truely, which teacheth that vnderſtanding is ſeldome deceiued in the generall defining of things, that it is blindneſſe when it goeth any further, that is, when it commeth downe to the ſpecial caſe. Euery man, if it be generally asked, will affirme, that manſlaughter is euill: but he that conſpireth to kill his enemies, deliberateth vpon it, as on a good thing. The adulterer generally will condemne adulterie, but in his owne, priuately he will flatter himſelfe. This is ignorance, when a man comming to the ſpeciall caſe forgetteth the rule that he had lately agreed vpon in the generall queſtion. Of which thing Auguſtine diſcourſeth very finely in his expoſition of the firſt verſe of the lvij. Pſalme: albeit the ſame thing is not continuall. For ſometime the ſhamefulnes of the euill deede ſo preſſeth the conſcience, that not deceiuing himſelfe selfe vnder false resemblance of a good thing, but wittingly and willingly he runneth into euill. Out of which affection came these sayings: I see the better and allow it, but I follow the worse. Wherefore, me thinke, Aristotle hath very aptly made distinction betweene incontinence and intemperance. Where incontinence reigneth, he saith, that there by reason of troubled affection or passion, knowledge is taken away from the minde, that it marketh not the euill in his owne act, which it generally seeth in the like: and when the troubled affection is cooled, repentance immediately followeth. But intemperance is not extinguished or broken by feeling of sinne, but on the other side obstinately standeth still in her conceiued choise of euill.

Medea apud Ouidium. Ethic. 7. cap. 3.

24 Now when thou hearest iudgement vniuersally named in the difference of good and euill, thinke it not euery sound and perfect iudgement. For if mens hearts are furnished with choise of iust and vniust, onely to this end, that they should not pretend ignorance, it is not then needfull to see the truth in euery thing. But it is enough and more, that they vnderstand so farre that they cannot escape away, but being conuict by witnesse of their conscience, they euen now already begin to tremble at the iudgement seate of God. And if we will trie our reason by the law of God, which is the examplar of true righteousnesse, we shall finde how many waies it is blinde. Truly it attaineth not at all to those that are the chiefe things in the first table, as of confidence in God, of giuing to him the praise of strength and righteousnesse, of calling vpon his name, of the true keeping of the Sabbat. What soule euer by naturall sense did smell out, that the lawfull worshipping of God consisteth in these and like things? For when prophane men will worship God, although they be called away an hundred times from their vaine trifles, yet they alway slide backe thither againe. They denie in deede that sacrifices doe please God, vnlesse there be adioined a pureness of minde: whereby they declare, that they conceiue somewhat of the spirituall worshipping of God, which yet they by and by corrupt with false inuentions. For it can neuer be perswaded them, that all is true that the lawe prescribeth of it. Shall I say, that that wit excelleth in any sharp vnderstanding, which can neither of it selfe be wise, nor harken to teaching? In the commaundements of the second table it hath some more vnderstanding, by so much as they came neerer to the preseruation of ciuill fellowship among men. Albeit euen herein also it is found many times to faile. To euery excellent nature it seemeth most vnreasonable, to suffer an vniust, and too imperious a maner of gouerning ouer them, if by any meane he may put it away: and the iudgement of mans reason is none other, but that it is the part of a seruile and base courage to suffer it patiently: and againe, the part of an honest and free borne heart to shake it off. And reuenge of iniuries is reckened for no fault among the Philosophers. But the Lord condemning that too much nobleness of courage, commandeth his to keepe the same patience that is so ill reported among men. And in all the keeping of the lawe, our vnderstanding marketh not concupiscence at all. For a naturall man suffereth not himselfe to be brought to this, to acknowledge the diseases of his desires. The light of nature is choaked vp, before that it come to the first entrie of this bottomlesse depth. For when the Philosophers note immoderate motions of mind for faults, they meane those motions that appeare & shew foorth themselues by grosse tokens, but they make no account of those euill desires that doe gentlie tickle the mind.

The vnderstanding attaineth not at all to the chiefest duties of the first table of the law of God: in the second although it perceiue more, yet in many things it faileth and neuer marketh that the secret tickling desire vnto sin is sinne.

25 Wherefore, as Plato was worthily found fault withall before, for that he imputed all sinnes to ignorance, so is their opinion to be reiected, which teach that purposed malice and frowardnesse is vsed in all sinnes. For we finde it too much by experience, how oft we fall with our good intent. Our reason is ouerwhelmed with so many sorts of being deceiued, is subiect to so many errours, stumbleth at so many slayes, is entangled with so many straites, that it is farre from sure directing. But how little it is esteemed before the Lord in all parts of our life, Paul sheweth when he saith, that we are not sufficient to thinke any thing of our selues, as of our selues. He speaketh not of will or affection, but he taketh also this away from vs, that we should not thinke that it can come in our minds how any thing is to be done wel. Is our diligence, insight, vnderstanding and heed so corrupted, that it can deuise or thinke vpō nothing that is right before the Lord? that seemeth too hard to vs, that doe vnwillinglie suffer our selues to be spoiled of the sharpnesse of reason, which wee account a most precious gift. But to

Our vnderstanding is altogether impotent and blind, except it be by grace illuminated not once but continually in euery diuine and heauenly thing which we haue to learne. 2. Cor. 3. 5.

Pſal.94.11. the holy Ghoſt it ſeemeth moſt full of equitie, which knoweth that all the thoughts of wiſe men are vaine: and which pronounceth plainely, that all the inuention of mans heart is onely euill. If all that our wit conceiueth, deuiſeth vpon, purpoſeth and goeth about, is alway euill, how can it come in our mindes to purpoſe that which pleaſeth God, to whom onely holineſſe and righteouſneſſe is acceptable? So is it to be ſeene, that the reaſon of our minde, which waie ſoeuer it turne it ſelfe, is miſerablie ſubiect to vanitie. Dauid knewe this weakeneſſe in himſelfe, when he prayed to haue vnderſtanding giuen him, to learne the Lords commandements aright. For he ſecretlie ſaith therein, that his owne wit ſufficeth him not, which deſireth to haue a new giuen him. And that not onely once, but almoſt ten times in one Pſalme, he repeateth the ſame prayer. By which repeating he priuily declareth, with how great neede he is driuen to praie it. And that which he prayeth for himſelfe alone: Paul commonlie vſeth to praie for the Churches. Wee ceaſe not (ſaith he) to praie for you, and to deſire that yee may be filled with the knowledge of God in all wiſedome and ſpirituall vnderſtanding, that yee may walke worthily of God, &c. But ſo oft as he maketh that thing the good gift of God, let vs remember that he doth withall teſtifie, that it lieth not in mans power. And Auguſtine ſo farre acknowledged this default of reaſon to vnderſtand thoſe things that are of God, that he thinketh the grace of illumination to be no leſſe neceſſarie for our mindes, than the light of the ſunne is for our eies. And not content with that, he addeth a correction of that, ſaying, that we lift vp our eies to ſee the light: but the eies of our minde lie ſhut, vnleſſe the Lord open them. And the Scripture teacheth, that our mindes are not enlightned one day alone, that they may afterward ſee by themſelues: for that which I euen now alleaged out of Paul, belongeth to continuall proceedings and encreaſings. And this doth Dauid expreſſely ſet out in theſe words: With my whole heart haue I ſought thee, make me not to ſtray from thy commandements. For when he had beene regenerated, and had not ſlenderly profited in true godlineſſe, yet he confeſſeth, that for euery moment he needeth continuall direction, leaſt he ſhould ſwarue from the knowledge wherewith he is endued. Therefore, in another place he prayeth to haue the right ſpirit renued, which he had loſt by his owne fault, becauſe it belongeth to the ſame God to reſtore vnto vs the ſame thing being loſt for a time, which himſelfe gaue at the beginning.

Phil.1.4. Col.1.9. Aug.lib.2. De peccat. mer.& remiſ. ca.5. Pſal.119.10. Pſal.51.12.

Touching the will of man, the generall inclination whith it hath to that good whereof Philoſophers do ſo much talke, proueth not any freedome or habilitie of deſiring and aſpiring vnto vertue without the motion of the holie Ghoſt.

26 Now is will to be examined, wherein ſtandeth the thiefe libertie of free choiſe, for it hath beene alreadie ſeene, that choiſe doth rather belong to will, than to vnderſtanding. Firſt, that this thing which the Philoſophers haue taught, and is receiued with common conſent, that is, that all things by naturall inſtinction deſire that which is good, may not ſeeme to belong to the vprightnes of mans will: Let vs marke that the force of free will, is not to be conſidered in ſuch appetite, as rather proceedeth of the inclination of the eſſence, than of the aduiſement of the vnderſtanding minde. For euen the Schoolemen doe confeſſe, that free will hath no action, but when reaſon turneth it ſelfe to obiects, whereby they meane that the obiect of appetite muſt be ſuch as may be ſubiect to choiſe, and goe before deliberation, which prepareth the way for choiſe. And truely if a man conſider what is the naturall deſire of good in man, he ſhall finde that it is common to him with beaſts. For they alſo deſire to be well, and when any ſhewe of good appeareth that mooueth their ſenſe, they follow it. But man doth neither chooſe by reaſon, that he may follow with diligence that thing which is indeed good for him, according to the excellencie of his immortall nature, nor taketh reaſon to counſell, nor bendeth his minde, but without reaſon, without counſell, like a beaſt, followeth the inclination of nature. This therefore maketh nothing for the freedome of will, if a man by ſenſe of nature be carrried to deſire that which is good: but this is requiſite, that he diſcerne good by right reaſon, and when he hath knowne it, that he chooſe it, and when he hath choſen it, that he follow it. But leaſt any man ſhould doubt, there is to be noted a double ſophiſticall argument. For appetite is not heere called the proper manner of will, but a naturall inclination: and good is called not as of vertue or iuſtice, but of eſtate, as we ſay: This man is well, or in good caſe. Finally, although a man doe neuer ſo much deſire to attaine that is good, yet he followeth it not. As there is no man to whom eternall bleſſednesse is not pleaſant, yet is there none that aſpireth vnto it, but by the mouing of the holie Ghoſt. Wherefore ſith the naturall deſire in men to be well, maketh nothing to prooue the freedome of will, no more than in mettals and ſtones, doth the affection inclining to the perfection of their ſubſtance: let vs conſider in other things, whether Will be ſo infected and corrupted in all parts, that it engendreth nothing but euill: or whether it keepeth ſtill any parcell vnhurt, from whence doe grow good deſires.

27 They that doe attribute to the firſt grace of God, that we will effectually, ſeeme on the other ſide to ſay ſecretly, that there is in the ſoule a power of it ſelfe to aſpire to good, but it is ſo weake, that it cannot grow to a perfect affection, or raiſe vp any endeuour. And there is no doubt that the ſchoolemen haue commonly embraced this opinion, or which was borrowed by Origen and certaine of the old writers: forasmuch as they are wont to conſider man in pure naturall things, (as they terme it) ſuch a one as the Apoſtle deſcribeth him in theſe words: I doe not the good that I would, but the euill that I would not, that I doe. To will is preſent vnto me, but to performe it I finde not. But after this maner is the diſcourſe that Paul there followeth, altogether wrongfully peruerted. For he entreateth of the Chriſtian wraſtling (which he ſhortly toucheth to the Galathians) which the faithful continually feele within themſelues, in the battell betweene the fleſh and the ſpirit. But the ſpirit is not of nature, but of regeneration. And that the Apoſtle doth there ſpeake of the regenerate, appeareth by this, that when he had ſaid, that there dwelleth no goodneſſe in him, he addeth an expoſition, that he meaneth it of his fleſh. And therefore he ſaith, that it is not he that doth the euill, but ſinne that dwelleth in him. What meaneth this correction in me, that is, my fleſh? Euen as much as if he had ſaid thus: God dwelleth not in me of my ſelfe, for there is no good to be found in my fleſh. Hereupon followeth that maner of excuſe: I my ſelfe doe not the euill, but ſinne that dwelleth in me. Which excuſe belongeth onely to the regenerate, which doe with the chiefe part of their ſoule tend vnto good. Now, the concluſion that is adioyned after, declareth all this matter euidently. I am delighted (ſaith he) with the law, according to the inward man: But I ſee another law in my members, fighting againſt the law of my minde. Who hath ſuch a ſtriuing in himſelfe, but he that being regenerate by the ſpirit of God, carieth the leauings of his fleſh about with him? Therefore Auguſtine, where as once he had thought, that that had bene ſpoken of the nature of man, reuoked his expoſition as falſe, and ill agreeing together. And truely, if we allow this, that men without grace haue ſome motions to good, though they be but ſmall, what ſhall we anſwere to the Apoſtle which ſaith, that we are not ſufficient ſo much as to thinke any good? What ſhall we anſwere to the Lord that pronounceth by Moſes, that euery inuention of mans heart is onely euill? Wherefore ſith they haue ſtumbled by falſe taking of one place, there is no cauſe why we ſhould ſtay vpon their iudgement. Let rather this ſaying of Chriſt preuaile. He that doth ſinne is the ſeruant of ſinne. We are all ſinners by nature, therefore we be all holden vnder the yoke of ſinne. Now if whole man be ſubiect to the dominion of ſinne, then muſt it needs be, that the will it ſelfe which is the chiefe ſeate thereof, be bound faſt with moſt ſtraite bondes. For otherwiſe the ſaying of Paul would not ſtand together, that it is God which worketh will in vs, if any will did goe before the grace of the Holy Ghoſt. Away therefore with all that many haue triflingly ſpoken concerning preparation. For although ſometime the faithfull doe pray to haue their heart formed to the obedience of the law, as Dauid doth in many places: yet it is to be noted, that euen that deſire of praying is from God. Which we may gather of his words, for when he wiſheth to haue a cleane heart created within him, ſurely he taketh not on himſelfe the beginning of creation. Therefore, let rather this ſaying of Auguſtine haue place with vs: God will preuent thee in all things: And ſometime preuent thou his wrath. How? Confeſſe that thou haſt all theſe things of God, that whatſoeuer good thou haſt, is of him: whatſoeuer euill, it is of thy ſelfe. And a little after: Nothing is ours but ſinne.

It is not ſufficient to confeſſe that grace maketh the deſires of our will effectuall, which otherwiſe would not be able to attaine any good thing which is wiſhed for: but we muſt acknowledge that it is the grace of the holy ghoſt which worketh in vs the very firſt beginning to thinke of wiſhing well.

THE THIRD CHAPTER.

That out of the corrupt nature of man proceedeth nothing but dammable.

The whole mind of man and not only the sensuall part is corrupted.
Iohn 3.6.
Rom.8.6.

BVT man cannot be any way better knowne in either part of his soule, than if he come foorth with his titles wherwith the Scripture doth set him out. If he be painted whole in these words of Christ, That which is borne of flesh, is flesh: as it is easie to prooue, then is he prooued to be a very miserable creature. For the affection of the flesh, as the Apostle witnesseth, is death, for as much as it is enimitie against God, and so is not subiect, nor can be subiect to the law of God. Is flesh so peruerse, that with all her affection she continually vseth enimitie against God? that she cannot agree with the righteousnesse of the lawe of God? Finally, that she can bring foorth nothing but matter of death? Now, graunt that in the nature of man is nothing but flesh, and gather any good out of it if thou canst. But (they say) the name of flesh belongeth onely to the sensuall, and not to the higher part of the soule. But that is sufficiently confuted by Iohn 3.6. the words of Christ, and of the Apostle. It is the Lords argument, that man must be borne againe, because he is flesh. He commandeth not to be borne againe according to the bodie. But in mind he is not borne againe, if a part of it be amended, but when it is all renewed. And that doth the comparison, set in both places, confirme. For the spirit is so compared against the flesh, that there is left no meane thing betweene them. Therefore whatsoeuer is not spirituall in man, is after the same reason called fleshly. But we haue nothing of the Spirit but by regeneration. It is therefore flesh whatsoeuer we haue of nature. But of that matter, if otherwise we could haue any doubt, that is Ephe.4.13. taken away from vs by Paul, where after he had described the old man, whom he had said to be corrupt with concupiscences of errour, he biddeth vs to be renewed in the spirit of our minde: you see he doth not place vnlawfull and euill lusts onely in the sensitiue part, but also in the very minde, and therefore requireth a renewing of it. And truely a little before he had painted out such an image of mans nature, as did shew Ephe.4.17. that there was no part wherein we were not corrupted and peruerted: for whereas he writeth that all nations doe walke in the vanitie of their minde, are darkened in vnderstanding, estranged from the life of God, by reason of the ignorance that is in them, and the blindnesse of their heart: it is no doubt that this is spoken of all them whom the Lord hath not reformed to the vprightnesse both of his wisedome and iustice: which is also made more plaine by the comparison by and by adioyned, where he putteth the faithfull in minde, that they haue not so learned Christ. For of these words we gather, that the grace of Christ, is the onely remedie whereby we be deliuered from Esai.60.2. that blindnesse, and the euils that ensue thereof. For so had Esay also prophecied of the kingdome of Christ, when he promised, that the Lord should be an euerlasting light to his Church, when yet darkenesse couered the earth, and a mist the peoples. Whereas he testifieth, that the light of God shall arise onely in the Church, truely without the Church he leaueth nothing but darkenesse and blindnesse. I will not rehearse particularly such things as are written euery where, specially in the Psalmes and in the Pro-
Psal.62.10. phets against the vanitie of man. It is a great thing that Dauid writeth, if he be weyed with vanitie, that he shall be vainer than vanitie it selfe. His wit is wounded with a grieuous weapon, when all the thoughts that come out of it are scorned as foolish, trifling, mad and peruerse.

The manifold diseases wherewith the soule either openly or couertly swarmeth, reckned vp by the Apostle.

Esai.59.7.

2 No easier is the condemnation of the heart, when it is called guilefull and peruerse aboue all things: but because I studie to be short, I will be content with one place alone, but such a one as shall be like a most bright looking glasse, wherein we may behold the whole image of our nature. For the Apostle, when he goeth about to throw downe the arrogancie of mankinde, doth it by these testimonies: That there is not one righteous man, there is not one man that vnderstandeth or that seeketh God, All are gone out of the way, they are made vnprofitable together, there is none that doth good, no not one: their throte is an open sepulcher, with their tongues they worke deceitfully, the poyson of Serpents is vnder their lips, whose mouth is full of cursing and bitternesse: whose feete are swift to shed bloud, in whose waies is sorrow and vnhappinesse, vnhappineſſe, which haue not the feare of God before their eies. With theſe thunderbolts he inueyeth, not againſt certaine men, but againſt the whole nation of the ſonnes of Adam. Neither declameth he againſt the corrupt manners of one or two ages, but accuſeth the continuall corruption of nature. For his purpoſe is in that place, not ſimply to chide men, to make them amend, but to teach rather that all men are oppreſſed with calamitie, impoſſible to be ouercome, from which they cannot get vp againe, vnleſſe they be plucked out by the mercie of God. And becauſe, that could not be prooued vnleſſe it had beene by the ouerthrowe and deſtruction of nature, he brought forth theſe teſtimonies whereby is prooued that our nature is more than deſtroyed. Let this therefore remaine agreed, that men are ſuch as they be here deſcribed, not only by fault of euill cuſtome, but alſo by corrupteneſſe of nature. For otherwiſe the Apoſtles argument cannot ſtand, that there is no ſaluation for man but by the mercie of God, becauſe he is in himſelfe vtterly loſt and paſt hope. I will not here buſie my ſelfe in prooving the applying of theſe teſtimonies that no man ſhould thinke them vnfitly vſed. I will ſo take them as if they had beene firſt ſpoken by Paul, and not taken out of the Prophets. Firſt he taketh away from man righteouſneſſe, that is integritie and pureneſſe, and then vnderſtanding. The want of vnderſtanding, he prooueth by Apoſtaſie or departing from God, whom to ſeeke is the firſt degree of wiſedome. But that want muſt needes happen to them that are fallen away from God. He ſayeth further, that all are gone out of the way and become as it were rotten, that there is none that doth good, and then he adioyneth the haynous faultes, wherewith they defile their members that are once let looſe into wickedneſſe. Laſt of all he teſtifieth that they are voide of the feare of God, after whoſe rule our ſteppes ſhould haue beene directed. If theſe be the inheritable gifts of mankinde, it is in vaine to ſeeke for any good thing in our nature. In deede I grant that not all theſe faults doe appeare in euery man: yet can it not be denied that this Hydra lurketh in the harts of all men. For as the body while it already foſtreth encloſed within it, the cauſe and matter of diſeaſe, although the paine be not yet vehement, cannot be called healthie: no more can the ſoule be reckoned ſound, while it ſwarmeth full of ſuch diſeaſes of vices, albeit the ſimilitude doth not agree in all points. For in the body be it neuer ſo much diſeaſed, there remaineth a quickneſſe of life: but the ſoule being drowned in this gulfe of deſtruction, is not only troubled with vices, but alſo altogither voide of all goodneſſe.

3 The ſame queſtion in a manner which hath beene before aſſoyled, now riſeth vp againe of new. For in all ages there haue beene ſome, which by guiding of nature haue beene bent to vertue in all their life. And I regard it not, though many ſlippings may be noted in their manners: yet by the very ſtudie of honeſtly they haue ſhewed a proofe, that there was ſome pureneſſe in their nature. What reward ſuch vertues haue before God, although we will more fully declare when we ſhall ſpeake of the merits of works, yet we muſt ſomewhat ſpeake in this place: ſo farre as is neceſſarie for making plaine of this preſent argument. Theſe examples therefore ſeeme to put vs in mind, that we ſhould not thinke mans nature altogether corrupt, for that by her inſtruction ſome men haue not onely excelled in ſome noble actes, but alſo in the whole courſe of their life haue behaued themſelues moſt honeſtly. But here we muſt thinke, how in this corruption of nature there is ſome place for the grace of God, not to cleanſe it, but inwardly to reſtraine it. For if the Lord would ſuffer the mindes of all men as it were with looſe reines to runne wildly into all ſorts of luſtes, without doubt there would be no man, but he would in plaine experience make vs beleeue, that all thoſe euils wherewith Paul condemneth all nature, are moſt truely ſaid of him. For what? Canſt thou exempt thy ſelfe out of the number of them, whoſe feete are ſwift to ſhed blood, their handes defiled with robberies and manſlaughters, their throtes like vnto open ſepulchres, their toongs deceiptfull, their lips venemous, their workes vnprofitable, wicked, rotten, deadly, whoſe minde is without God, whoſe inwards are peruerſeneſſe, whoſe eies are bent to entrappings, their hearts lift vp diſpiteouſlie to triumph ouer other, and all the parts of them applyed to infinite miſcheeues. If euery ſoule be ſubiect to all ſuch monſters, as the Apoſtle boldly pronounceth, truely we ſee what would come to paſſe, if the Lord would ſuffer the luſt of man to wander after his owne inclination.

The morall honeſtie of prophane men is no argument of puritie in nature, becauſe it commeth not of them but of the grace of God working in thē: not the grace that regenerateth the hart, but that bridleth onely and reſtraineth the peruerſeneſſe of naturall inclination.

Rom. 3. 10.

nation. There is no madde beast that is so headlong carried away, there is no streame be it neuer so swift and strong, whereof the ouerflowing is so violent. The Lord healeth these diseases in his elect by this meane that we will by and by set foorth. In some he onely restraineth them with putting a bridle in their mouth, onely that they breake not out, so far as he foreseeth to be expedient for preseruing of the vniuersity of things. Hereby some are holden in by shame, some by feare of lawes, that they burst not forth into many sortes of filthinesse, howbeit they doe for a great part not hide their vncleanneſſe. Some becauſe they thinke that an honest trade of life is good, doe after a certaine sort aspire toward it. Some rise vp aboue the common sort, that by their maiestie they may keepe other in their duetie. So God by his prouidence bridleth the peruersenesse of nature, that it breake not foorth into dooings, but he cleanseth it not within.

The vertues of vngodly men do neither come of naturall goodnesse and by naturall corruption they are so polluted, that in the sight of God they are lothsome. Aug. lib. 4. cont. Iulianum.

4 But yet the doubt is not dissolued. For either we must make Camillus like vnto Catiline, or else in Camillus we shall haue an example that nature, if it be framed by diligence, is not altogither without goodnesse. I graunt indeede that those goodly gifts which were in Camillus both were the gifts of God and seeme worthie to be commended, if they be weyed by themselues, but how shall they be prooues of naturall goodnesse in him? must we not returne to the minde, and frame our argument in this sort? If a naturall man excelled in such vprightnesse of manners, then nature is vndoubtedly not without power toward the studie of vertue. But what if the minde were peruerse and crooked, and following any thing rather than vpright streightnesse? And that it was such, there is no doubt, if you graunt that he was a naturall man. Now what power of mans nature to goodnesse will you rehearse vnto me in this behalfe, if in the greatest shew of pureneſſe it be found that he is alway carried to corruption? Therefore, least ye commmend a man for vertue, whose vices deceiue you vnder vertues Image, doe not so giue vnto the will of man power to desire goodnesse, so long as it remaineth fast in her owne peruersenesse. Albeit this is a most sure and easie solution of this question, that these are not common gifts of nature, but speciall graces of God, which he diuersly and to a certaine measure dealeth among men that are otherwise vngodly. For which reason we feare not in common speech to call one man well natured, and another of euill nature, and yet we cease not to include them both vnder the vniuersall state of mans corruption, but we shew what speciall grace God hath bestowed vpon the one, which he hath not vouchsafed to giue to the other. When his pleasure was to make Saul King, he formed him as a new man. And that is the reason why Plato alluding to the fable of Homer, sayeth that Kings sonnes are created notable by some singular marke, becauſe God prouiding for mankinde, furnisheth these with a Princely nature whom he appointeth to beare gouernment: and out of this storehouse came all the great Captaines that are renowned in histories. The same is also to be thought of priuate men. But becauſe as euery man hath most excelled, so his ambition hath most mooued him forward (with which spot all vertues are defiled, so that they loose all fauour before God) it is to be accounted nothing woorth, whatsoeuer seemeth praise woorthie in vngodly men, beside that the chiefe part of vprightnesse faileth, where there is no studie to aduance the glory of God, which all they want whom he hath not regenerate with his spirite. Neither is it vainely spoken in Esay, that vpon Christ resteth the spirit of the feare of God, whereby we are taught, that so many as are strange from Christ are without the feare of God, which is the beginning of wisedome. As for the vertues that deceiue vs with vaine shew, I grant they shall haue praise in the court of policie, and in the common fame of men, but before the heauenly iudgement seate, they shall be of no value to deserue righteousnesse.

Esay. 11. 3.

The will of man being corrupt, is of necessitie yet without compulsion inclined vnto sinne. Iere. 31. 18.

5 With such bondage of sinne therefore as Will is detained, it cannot once moue it selfe to goodnesse, much lesse applie it selfe. For such mooving is the beginning of turning to God, which in Scriptures is wholy imputed to the grace of God. As Ieremie prayeth to the Lord to turne him, if he will haue him turned. Whereupon the Prophet in the same Chapter, describing the spirituall redemption of the faithfull people, saith that they were redeemed out of the hand of a stronger, meaning with how straite fetters a sinner is bound so long as being forsaken of the Lord, he liueth vnder the yoke of the Diuell. Yet Will ſtill remaineth, which with moſt bent affection is both enclined and haſteth to ſinne. For man was not depriued of Will when he did caſt himſelfe into this neceſſitie, but of the ſoundneſſe of Will. And Bernard ſaith not vnaptly, which teacheth that to Will is in vs all: but to Will good is a profiting, to Will ill is a default: and therefore ſimply to Will, is the worke of man: to Will euill of corrupt nature: to Will well of grace. Now, whereas I ſay, that Will put from libertie is by neceſſitie drawne or led into euill, it is maruell if that ſhould ſeeme a hard ſpeech vnto any man, which neither hath any abſurditie in it, nor varieth from the vſe of holy men: But it offendeth them that can make no difference betweene neceſſitie and compulſion. But if a man aske them, is not God of neceſſitie good? is not the Diuell of neceſſitie euill? what can they anſwere? For ſo is goodneſſe knit with Gods diuinitie, that it is no more neceſſarie that he be God than that he be good. And the Diuell is by his fall ſo eſtranged from partaking of goodneſſe, that he can doe nothing but euill. But now if any robber of God doe barke againſt this and ſay, that God deſerueth ſmall praiſe for his goodneſſe, which he is compelled to keepe: ſhall not this be a readie anſwere to him, that it commeth to paſſe by his infinite goodneſſe and not by violent impulſion, that he cannot doe euill. Therefore if this, that it is of neceſſitie that God doe well, doe not hinder the free will of God in doing well, if the Diuell which cannot doe but euill yet willingly ſinneth, who ſhall then ſay that a man doth therefore leſſe willingly ſinne for this that he is ſubiect to neceſſitie of ſinning? This neceſſitie, whereas Auguſtine each where ſpeaketh of it, euen then alſo when he was enuiouſly preſſed with the cauillation of Celeſtinus, he ſticked not to affirme in theſe words, by libertie it came to paſſe that man was with ſin, but now the corruptiō which flowed frō puniſhment, hath of libertie made neceſſitie. And ſo oft as he falleth into mention thereof, he doubteth not to ſpeake in this maner of the neceſſarie bondage of ſinne. Therefore let this ſumme of that diſtinction be kept, that man ſince he is corrupted, ſinneth indeed willingly & not againſt his will nor compelled, by a moſt bent affection of minde, and not by violent compulſion, by motion of his owne luſt, and not by forraine conſtraint: but yet of ſuch peruerſneſſe of nature as he is, he cannot but be mooued and driuen to euill. If this be true, then ſurely it is plainly expreſſed that he is ſubiect to neceſſitie of ſinning. Bernard agreeing to Auguſtine writeth thus, onely man among all liuing creatures is free: and yet by meane of ſinne, he alſo ſuffreth a certaine violence, but of will and not of nature, that euen thereby alſo he ſhould not be depriued of freedome, for that which is willing is free. And a little after, will being changed in it ſelfe into worſe, by I wot not what corrupt and maruellous maner, ſo maketh neceſſitie that very neceſſitie for as much as it is willing, cannot excuſe will, and will for as much as it is drawne by allurement, cannot exclude neceſſitie, for this neceſſitie is after a certaine maner willing. Afterward he ſaith that we are preſſed downe with a yoke, but yet none other but of a certaine willing bondage, therefore by reaſon of our bondage we are miſerable, by reaſon of our will we are inexcuſable, becauſe will when it was free, made it ſelfe the bondſeruant of ſinne. At length he concludeth, that the ſoule is ſo after a certaine maruellous and euill maner holden both a bond ſeruant and free, vnder this certaine willing and ill free neceſſitie: a bond ſeruant by reaſon of neceſſitie, free by reaſon of will, and that which is more maruellous and more miſerable, therein guiltie wherein it is free, therein bond wherein it is guiltie, and ſo therein bond wherein it is free. Hereby truely the Readers doe perceiue that I bring no new thing, which long agoe Auguſtine brought foorth out of the conſent of all godly men, and almoſt a thouſand yeeres after was kept ſtill in monkes Cloyſters. But Lombard when he could not deſtinguiſh neceſſitie from compulſion, gaue matter to a pernitious errour.

Sermone ſuper Cant. 81.

6 On the other ſide it is good to conſider what maner remedie is that of the grace of God, whereby the corruption of nature is amended and healed. For whereas the Lord in helping vs, giueth vs that which we want, when we ſhall know what his worke is in vs, it will ſtraightway appeare on the other ſide what is our needineſſe. When the Apoſtle ſaith to the Phillippians, that he truſteth that he which began a good worke in them, will performe it vnto the day of Ieſus Chriſt: it is no doubt, that by the beginning of a good worke, he meaneth the very beginning of conuerſion, which is is in will. Therefore God beginneth a good worke in vs by ſtirring vp in our hearts the loue, deſire and endeuour of righteouſneſſe, or (to ſpeake more properly) in bowing, framing and directing our hearts to righteouſneſſe: he endeth it in confirming vs to perſeuerance. And that no man ſhould cauill that good is begun by the Lord, when will being of it ſelfe weake is holpen: the holy Ghoſt in another place declareth what will is able to doe being left vnto it ſelfe. I will giue you (ſaith he) a new heart. I will Eze.36.1,16. put a new ſpirit in the mids of you. And I will take away the ſtonie heart from your fleſh, and I will giue you a heart of fleſh. And I will put my ſpirit in the mids of you, and I will make you to walke in my commaundements. Who ſhall ſay that the weakneſſe of mans will is ſtrengthned with helpe, whereby it may effectually aſpire to the choiſe of that that is good, when it muſt be wholy transformed and renewed? If there be any ſoftneſſe in a ſtone, which by ſome helpe being made tenderer will abide to be bowed euery way, then will I graunt that the heart of man is pliable to obey that which is right, ſo that that which in it is perfect, be ſupplied by the grace of God. But if he meant to ſhew by this ſimilitude, that no goodneſſe could euer be wroong out of our heart vnleſſe it be made throughly new: let vs not part betweene him and vs, that which he challengeth to himſelfe alone. If therefore a ſtone be transformed into fleſh, when God turneth vs to the deſire of that which is right: then is all that which was of our owne will taken away, and that which commeth in place thereof is all of God. I ſay that will is taken away, not in that it is will, becauſe in the conuerſion of man, that which was of the firſt nature abideth whole: alſo I ſay that it is created new, not that will then beginneth to be, but that it be turned from an euill will into a good. And this 2.Cor.3.6. I affirme to be wholly done by God, becauſe we are not able ſo much as to thinke, as Phil 2.13. the ſame Apoſtle witneſſeth: therefore in another place he ſaith, that God doth not only helpe our weake will, or amend our peruerſe wil, but that he worketh in vs to will. Whereupon is eaſily gathered, that which I ſaid before, that whatſoeuer good is in will, it is the worke of only grace. In which ſenſe in another place he ſaith, that it is God that 2.Cor.12.16. worketh all in all. Neither doth he there entreat of the vniuerſall gouernment, but giueth vnto God alone the praiſe of all good things that the faithfull haue. And in ſaying all, truely he maketh God the authour of ſpirituall life, euen from the beginning to the end. Which ſelfe ſame thing he had taught before in other words, ſaying that the faithfull are of God in Chriſt, where he plainly maketh mention of the new creation, where- 1.Cor.8.6. in that which was of common nature before, is deſtroyed. For there is to be vnderſtood a compariſon betweene Adam and Chriſt, which in another place he more plainly expreſſeth, where he teacheth that we are the worke of God created in Chriſt to good works, which he hath prepared that we ſhould walke in them. For he goeth about by this reaſon to proone, that our ſaluation is of free gift, becauſe the beginning of all goodneſſe, is at the ſecond creation, which we obtaine in Chriſt. But if there were any power of our ſelues, were it neuer ſo ſmall, we ſhould haue alſo ſome portion of merit. But he to proone vs altogether nothing worth, reaſoneth that we haue deſerued nothing, becauſe we are create in Chriſt to good works, which God hath prepared. In which words he ſignifieth againe, that all parts of good works euen from the firſt motion, are proper to God onely. For this reaſon, the Prophet after he had ſaid in the Pſalme that we are the workmanſhip of God, that there ſhould be no partition, addeth by and by, we made not our ſelues. That he ſpeaketh there of regeneration, which is the beginning of ſpirituall life, appeareth by the tenor of the text, where it by and by after followeth, that we are his people and the flocke of his paſtures. We ſee now how he not cõtented ſimply to haue giuen to God the praiſe of our ſaluation, doth expreſſely exclude vs from all fellowſhip with him, as if he would ſay, that there reſteth no peece, be it neuer ſo litle, for man to glorie in, becauſe it is all of God.

It is not enough to make God the principall actor and leader of our will vnto good things, but the whole proceſſe muſt be aſcribed entirely vnto him.* Ad Bonif. Epi. 106.

7 *But there be ſome peraduenture will graunt, that Will being of her owne nature, turned away from good, is conuerted by the onely power of the Lord: but ſo that being prepared before, it hath alſo her owne part in doing, as Auguſtine teacheth, that grace goeth before euery good worke, but ſo, that will doth accompanie it and not lead it, as a waiting maide after it, and not a foregoer. Which thing being not euill ſpoken by the holy man, Peter Lombard doth diſorderly writhe to this purpoſe. But I affirme, affirme, that as well in the words of the Prophet which I haue alleaged, as in the other places, these two things be plainly signified, that the Lord doth both correct our corrupted will, or rather destroy it, and also of himselfe putteth in place thereof a good will. In as much as it is preuented by grace, in that respect I giue you leaue to call it a waiting maide: but for that being reformed, it is the worke of the Lord, that is wrongfully giuen to man that he doth with will comming after, obey grace going before. Therefore it is not well written of Chrysostome, that neither grace without will, nor will without grace can worke any thing: as if grace did not worke very well it selfe, as euen now we haue seene by Paul. Neither was it Augustines purpose, when he called mans will the waiting maide of grace, to assigne vnto her a certaine second office in dooing a good worke, but because this onely was his intent, to confute the wicked doctrine of Pelagius, which did set the principall cause of saluation in mans deseruing: therefore he stood only vpon this point, that grace was before all deseruing: which was sufficient for the matter that he then had in hand, not medling in the meane time with the other question, concerning the perpetuall effect of grace, which yet in another place he excellently well handleth. For sometimes when he saith, that the Lord doth preuent the willing that he may will, and followeth the willing that he will not in vaine, he maketh him altogither the whole Author of the good worke. Albeit his sentences touching this matter, are too plaine to neede any long arguing vpon them. Men (saith he) doe labour to finde in our will something that is our owne and not of God, but how it may be found I know not. And in his first booke against Pelagius and Celestius, where he doth expound that saying of Christ, Euery one that hath heard of my father commeth to me, he saith: Free will is so holpen not only that it may know what is to be done, but also may do it when it hath known it. And so when God teacheth, not by the letter of the law, but by the grace of the spirit, he so teacheth, that he that hath learned, doth not onely see it knowing, but also desire it in willing, and performe it in doing.

Aug. li. 2. de remiss. pecc. cap. 18. Iohn 6. 45.

8 And because we are now in hand with the chiefe point whereupon the matter hangeth, let vs goe forward and proue the summe thereof to the readers, onely with a few and the most plaine testimonies of the Scripture. And then, least any man should accuse vs of wrongfull wresting the Scripture, let vs shew that the truth which we affirme being taken out of the Scripture, wanteth not the testimony of this holy man, I meane Augustine. For I thinke it not expedient, that all the things be rehearsed that may be brought out of the scriptures, for confirmation of our meaning, so that by the most chosen that shall be brought foorth, the way may be prepared to vnderstand all the rest that are here and there commonly read. And againe, I thinke it shal not be vnfitly done, if I openly shew that I agree well with that man whom worthily the consent of godly men doth much esteeme. Surely, it is euident by plaine and certaine proofe that the beginning of goodnesse is from no where else but onely from God, for there cannot be found a will bent to good, but in the elect. But the cause of election is to be sought out of man. Whereupon followeth, that man hath not right will of himselfe, but it proceedeth from the same good pleasure, whereby we are elect before the creation of the world. There is also another reason not vnlike vnto that. For whereas the beginning of willing and doing well is of Faith, it is to be seene whence Faith it selfe commeth. For as much as the whole scripture crieth out that it is a free gift of God, it followeth, that it is of the meere grace of God, when we, which are with all our minde naturally bent to euill, begin to will that which is good. Therefore the Lord, when he nameth these two things in the conuersion of his people, to take away from them a stonie hart, and to giue them a hart of flesh, plainly testifieth that that which is of our selues must be done away, that we may be conuerted to righteousnes: and that whatsoeuer commeth in place thereof, is from himselfe. And he vttereth not this in one place only. For he saith in Ieremie. I will giue them one hart and one way, that they may feare me all their daies. And a little after, I will giue the feare of my name into their hart, that they depart not from me. Againe in Ezechiel: I will giue them one hart, and I will giue a new Spirit in their bowels. I will take away the stony hart out of their flesh, and I will giue them a hart of flesh. He could not more euidently claime to himselfe, and take from vs whatsoeuer is good and right in our will, then when he declareth that our conuersion

Sith there is found a will bent to good in none but onely in the elect, and the beginning to will well is faith, of whom our election and Faith commeth of him the conuersion of our will must also of necessitie proceede.

sion is a creation of a new Spirit, and of a new hart. For it followeth alway, that both out of our will procedeth no goodnesse till it be reformed, and that after reformation, so much as it is good, is of God, and not of vs.

The praiers of holy men to haue their harts framed vnto good things: the testimonie of Christ that without him we are like fruitlesse and dry sticks: of Paul & Dauid ascribing both the first and last in our wils to God as the Author, proue sufficiently that our liking, desiring, following, attaining good, our going forward and continuing in it, is of him.

9 And so read we the prayers of holy men made to that effect, as, The Lord encline our hart to him (saith Salomon) that we may keepe his commaundements. He sheweth the forwarnesse of our heart which naturaly reioyceth to rebell against the Lawe of God if it be not bowed. And the same thing is in the Psalme: Lord incline my heart to thy testimonies. For the comparison of contrarietie is alway to be noted, which is betweene the peruerse motion of the heart, whereby it is carried to obstinacie, and this correction whereby it is led to obedience. When Dauid feeling himselfe for a time without the directing grace, prayeth God to create a new hart within him, to renew a right Spirit within his bowels: doth he not acknowledge that all the parts of his heart are full of vncleanesse, and his Spirit writhen with crooked peruersnesse? and in calling the cleanesse which he prayeth for, the creature of God, doth he not attribute it wholy to God? But if any man take exception and say, that the very prayer is a token of a godly and holy affection: our answer is readie, that though Dauid were by that time somewhat come to amendment, yet doth he still compare his first state with that sorrowfull fall that he had felt. Therefore taking vpon him the person of a man estranged from God, he for good cause prayeth to haue giuen him all these things that God giueth to his elect in regeneration. And so being like a dead man, he wisheth himselfe to be created of new, that of the bondslaue of Sathan, he may be made the instrument of the holy Ghost. Maruellous and monstrous surely is the lust of our pride. God requireth nothing more earnestly, than that we should most religiously keepe his Sabbath, that is in resting from our owne workes, but of vs nothing is more hardly obtained, than bidding our owne workes farewell, to giue due place to the workes of God. If sluggishnesse hindreth not, Christ hath giuen testimonie euident enough of his graces to make them not to be enuiously suppressed. I am (saith he) the Vine, you be the branches: My Father is a husbandman. As the branch cannot beare fruit of it selfe, vnlesse it abide in the Vine, no more can you, vnlesse you abide in me. For without me you can doe nothing. If we beare fruit none otherwise than a braunch buddeth being plucked out of the ground and without moisture: we neede no more to seeke what is the aptnesse of our nature to goodnesse. And this is a plaine conclusion: Without me you can doe nothing. He doth not say that we are too weake to be sufficient for our selues: but in bringing vs to nothing, he excludeth all opinion of power be it neuer so little. If we being graffed in Christ, beare fruit like a Vine, which taketh her efficacie of liuelinesse both from the moysture of the earth, and from the dew of heauen, and from the cherishing of the Sunne: I see nothing remaine for vs in doing a good worke, if we keepe whole for God that which is his. The fonde subtle deuise is alleaged in vaine, that there is iuice alreadie enclosed within the branch, and a certaine power to bring forth fruit, and that therefore it taketh not all from the earth or from the first roote, because it bringeth some of her owne. For Christ doth meane nothing else, but that we are a drie sticke and nothing woorth, when we be seuered from him, because by our selues being separate, we haue no power to doe well: as also in another place he saith. Euery tree that my Father hath not planted shall be rooted vp. Wherefore the Apostle ascribeth all the whole vnto him in the place alreadie alleaged. It is God (saith he) that worketh in vs both to will and to performe. The first part of a good worke is will: the second is a strong indeuour in doing it: the Author of both is God. Therefore we steale it from God, if we take to our selues any thing, either in will or in effectuall working. If it were said that God doth helpe our weake will, then somewhat were left for vs. But when it is said that he maketh will, now all the good that is in it, is set out of vs. And because the good will is yet still oppressed with weight of our flesh that it cannot rise vp: He said further, that to ouercome the hardnesse of that battell there is ministred vnto vs stedfastnesse of endeuour euen to the elect. For otherwise it could not stand together which he teacheth in another place, that it is God alone that bringeth to effect all things in all, wherein we we haue before taught that the whole course of spirituall life is comprehended. For which reason, Dauid, after he had prayed to haue the waies of the Lord opened vnto him, that he might walke in his truth, by and by addeth: Vnite thou my hart to feare thy name. In which words he signifieth, that euen they that are well minded, are subiect to so many withdrawings of minde, that they easily vanish or fall away if they be not stablished to constancie. For which reason in another place, after he had prayed to haue his steppes directed to keepe the word of God, he requireth also to haue strength giuen him to fight. Let not any iniquitie (saith he) beare rule ouer me. After this sort therefore doth the Lord both begin and ende a good worke in vs: that it may all be his worke, that will conceiueth a loue of that which is right, that it is enclined to the desire thereof, that it is stirred vp and mooued to endeuour of following it. And then that our choise, desire, and endeuour faint not, but doe proceede euen to the effect: last of all, that man goeth forward constantly in them, and continueth to the end.

Psal. 119. 133.

10 And he mooueth the will, not in such sort as hath in many ages beene taught and beleeued: that it is afterward in our choise, either to obey or withstand the motion, but with mightily strengthning it. Therefore that must be reiected which Chrysostome so oft repeateth: whom he draweth, he draweth being willing. Whereby he secretly teacheth that God doth onely reach out his hand to see if we will be holpen by his aide. We graunt that such was the state of man while he yet stoode, that he might bow to either part. But sith he hath taught by his example how miserable is free will, vnlesse God both will and can in vs: what shall become of vs, if he giue vs his grace according to that small proportion? But rather we doe obscure and extenuate it with our vnthankefulnesse. For the Apostle doth not teach, that the grace of a good will is offered vs, if we doe accept it, but that he will performe it in vs: which is nothing else, but that the Lord by his Spirit doth direct, bow and gouerne our hart, and reigneth in it as in his owne possession. Neither doth he promise by Ezechiel, that he will giue to the elect a new spirit onely for this ende, that they may be able to walke in his commandements, but to make them walke in deede. Neither can Christs saying, (Euery one that hath heard of my Father commeth to me) be otherwise taken, than to teach that the grace of God is effectuall of it selfe: as Augustine also affirmeth. Which grace God vouchsafeth not to giue to all men generally without regard, as that saying (as I thinke) of Occam, is commonly spoken among the people, that it denieth nothing to him that doth what lieth in him. Men are in deede to be taught that Gods goodnesse is laid open for all men, without exception that seeke for it. But forasmuch as they onely begin to seeke for it, whom the heauenly grace hath breathed vpon, not so much as the little peece ought to be plucked away from his praise. Truely this is the prerogatiue of the elect, that being regenerate by the spirit of God, they are mooued and gouerned by his guiding. Therefore Augustine doth worthily as well mocke them, that claime any part of willing to themselues, as he doth reprehend other which thinke, that that is generally giuen to all men, which is the speciall testimonie of free election. Nature (saith he) but not grace, is common to all men. Calling it a brickle subtletie of witte like glasse, that glistereth with meere vanitie, where it is generally extended to all which God giueth onely to whom it pleaseth him. And in another place: How camest thou? by beleeuing. Feare thou, lest while thou takest vpon thee that thou hast found the iust way, thou perish out of the iust way, I came (sayest thou) by Free will, I came by mine owne will, why swellest thou? wilt thou heare that this also is giuen thee? Heare euen him that calleth: No man commeth to me vnlesse my Father drawe him. And it is without controuersie gathered out of Iohns words, that the harts of the godly are so effectually gouerned by Gods working, that they follow with an vnchangeable affection. He that is begotten of God (saith he) can not sinne, because the seede of God abideth in him. For we see that the meane motion which the Sophisters imagine which we at our libertie may either obey or refuse, is openly excluded, where an effectuall constancie to continue is affirmed.

God doth not onely make our will the offer to incline it, whatsoeuer we accept it worketh & not otherwise, but he setteth good before vs, giueth vs eyes to see it & effectually boweth our minds vnto it.

growen in force, that it is diſtributed according to the deſert of men, as euery man hath ſhewed himſelfe not vnthankefull to the firſt grace. But foraſmuch as this error hath growen vpon that point, that they thought it to be in our hand to refuſe or receiue the grace of God offered, that opinion being driuen away, this other doth alſo fall of it ſelfe. Albeit herein they doe erre two maner of waies. For beſide this that they teach that our thankefulneſſe toward the firſt grace and our lawfull vſe thereof are rewarded with the latter giftes: they adde alſo, that now grace alone doth not worke in vs, but that it is onely a worker together with vs. Of the firſt this we ought to beleeue, that the Lord while he dayly enricheth and heapeth his ſeruants with new gifts of his grace, becauſe he liketh and fauoureth the worke which he hath begun in them, findeth in them ſomewhat whereupon to beſtowe greater graces. And hereto ſerue thoſe ſayings, To him that hath, ſhall be giuen. Againe, Oh, good ſeruant, becauſe thou haſt beene faithfull in few things, I will ſet thee ouer many. But here two things are to be taken heede of, that neither the lawfull vſe of the firſt grace be ſaid to be rewarded with the later graces, nor it be ſo counted a rewarding, that it ceaſe to be reckoned the free grace of God. I graunt therefore, that this bleſſing of God is to be looked for of the faithfull, that how much the better they haue vſed the firſt graces, they ſhall be encreaſed with ſo much the greater. But I ſay, that this vſe alſo is of the Lord, and that this rewarding is of his free good will. And they vſe no leſſe wrongfully than vnhappily that olde deſtinction of working and together working grace. Auguſtine vſed the ſame in deede, but delaying it with a fit definition, that God in together working with vs doth end that which in working he beginneth, and that it is ſtill the ſame grace but changeth name, according to the diuers maner of effect. Whereupon followeth, that he doth not part it betweene God and vs, as if there were a mutuall meeting together by the motion of both, but onely noteth the multiplication of grace. To which purpoſe belongeth that which in another place he teacheth, that many giftes of God doe goe before the good will of man, among the which the ſelfe ſame is one. Whereupon followeth, that he leaueth nothing that it may claime to it ſelfe. Which thing Paul alſo hath namely expreſſed: For when he had ſaid that it is God, which worketh in vs both to will and to performe, he by and by addeth that he doth them both of his good will, declaring by this word, that it is his free goodneſſe. Whereas they are wont to ſay, that after we haue once giuen place to the firſt grace, our owne indeuors doe now worke together with the grace that followeth. To this I anſwer: If they meane that we, after we haue beene once by the power of the Lord broken to the obedience of righteouſneſſe, doe of our owne accord goe forward, and are inclined to follow the working of grace, I ſpeake nothing againſt it. For it is moſt certaine, that there is ſuch a readineſſe of obeying, where the grace of God reigneth. But whence commeth that, but from this, that the Spirit of God alway agreeing with it ſelfe, doth cheriſh and confirme to ſtedfaſtneſſe of continuing the ſame affection of obeying, which it ſelfe engendred at the beginning. But if they meane that man taketh of himſelfe ſomewhat whereby to labour with the grace of God, they are moſt peſtilentlie deceiued.

Phil.2.13.

1.Cor.15.10. The Apoſtle S. Paul wreſted by Sophiſters to maintaine the freedome of mans will as a ioynt worker with the grace of God.

12 And to this purpoſe is that ſaying of the Apoſtle wrongfully wreſted by ignorance: I haue labored more than they all: not I, but the grace of God with me. For they take it ſo: that becauſe it might ſeeme ſomewhat arrogantly ſpoken that he preferred himſelfe before them all, therefore he corrected it with referring the praiſe to the grace of God, but yet ſo, that he calleth himſelfe a worker together with grace. It is maruell that ſo many which otherwiſe were not euill men, haue ſtumbled at this ſtrawe. For the Apoſtle doth not write that the grace of the Lord laboureth with him, to the intent to make himſelfe partener of the labour, but rather by this correction he giueth away all the praiſe of the labor to grace only. It is not I (ſaith he) that haue labored, but the grace of God that was with me. But the doubtfulneſſe of the ſpeech deceiued them: but ſpecially the ill tranſlation wherein the force of the Greeke article was left out. For if it be tranſlated word for word, he doth not ſay, that grace was a worker together with him, but that the grace that was with him was the worker of all. And the ſame thing doth Auguſtine teach, not darkely, though ſhortly, where he thus ſaith:

The

The good will of man goeth before many gifts of God, but not before all. But of them which it goeth before, it selfe is one, then followeth his reason: because it is written: His mercy hath preuented me: And his mercy shall follow me. It preuenteth man not willing, to make him will: and it followeth him willing, that he will not in vaine. With whom Bernard agreeth bringing in the Church speaking thus: Draw me in a maner vnwilling, that thou maiest make willing: draw me lying slothfull, that thou maiest make me runne. Psal. 59. 11. Psal 23. 6. Ser. 2. in Cant

13 Now let vs heare Augustine speaking in his owne words, least the Pelagians of our age, that is to say, the Sophisters of Sorbon, should as they are wont, lay to our charge that all antiquitie is against vs, wherein they follow their father Pelagius, by whom long agoe Augustine was drawen foorth into the same contention. In his booke of Correption and grace written to Valentine he entreateth largely that which I will rehearse shortly, but yet doe it in his owne words: that to Adam was giuen the grace of continuing in good if he would: and to vs is giuen to will, and by will to ouercome concupiscence: that he therefore had to be able if he would, but not to will that he might be able: to vs is giuen both to will and to be able. That the first libertie was to be able not to sinne, ours is much greater, not to be able to sinne. And least he should be thought to speake of the perfection to come after immortalitie (as Lombard wrongfully draweth it to that meaning) within a litle after he plucketh out this doubt. For (saith he) the will of holy men is so much kindled by the holy Ghost, that they therefore are able, because they so will: they therefore will, because God worketh that they so will. For if in so great weaknes, in which yet it behoooueth the power to be made perfect, for repressing of pride, their owne will were left vnto them, that by the helpe of God they may if they will, and God doth not worke in them to will: then among so many temptations will should needs fall downe for weaknesse, and therefore could not continue. Therefore is succour giuen to the weaknesse of mans will, that it should be mooued without sweruing or seuering by the grace of God, and therefore should not faint how weake so euer it be. Then he entreateth more largely how our hearts doe of necessitie follow the mooning of God that worketh affection in them. And he saith, that the Lord doth draw men in deede with their owne wils, but with such as he himselfe hath wrought. Now haue we that thing testified by Augustines mouth, which we principally desire to obtaine, that grace is not onely offered by God to be receiued or refused at euery mans Free election, but also that grace is the same, that formeth the election and will in the heart: so that euery good worke that followeth after, is the fruit and effect thereof, and that it haue no other will obeying it, but the same which it hath made. For these are also his words out of another place, that nothing but grace maketh euery good worke in vs.

S. Augustines doctrine, not that God doth offer his grace which man hath free election to receiue or refuse, but that the will and election of euery receiuer is by him thereunto framed. Cap. 2. 2. Cor. 12. 9. Cap. 14.

14 But whereas he saith in another place, that will is not taken away by grace, but from an euill will turned into a good, and holpen when it is good: he meaneth only that man is not so drawen, that without any motion of heart he is carried as by an outward impulsion, but that he is inwardly so affected, that from his very heart he obeyeth. That grace is specially and freely giuen to the elect, he writeth thus vnto Boniface: We know that grace is not giuen to all men, and to them to whom it is giuen, it is not giuen according to the merits of works, nor according to the merits of will, but of free fauour: and to them to whom it is not giuen, we know that it is by the iust iudgment of God that it is not giuen. And in the same Epistle he strongly fighteth against that opinion, that the grace following is giuen to the deseruings of men, because in not refusing the first grace, they shewed themselues worthy. For he will haue Pelagius graunt, that grace is necessarie to vs for euery of our dooings, and is not giuen in recompense to workes, that it may be grace in deed. But the matter cannot be comprehended in a shorter summe, than out of the eight Chapter of his booke to Valentine of Correption and Grace, where first he teacheth that mans will obtaineth not grace by libertie, but libertie by grace: and that by the same grace, by affection of delight printed in him, it is framed to continuance, that it is strengthned with inuincible force: that while grace gouerneth, it neuer faileth away: when grace forsaketh, it by and by tumbleth downe. That by the free mercie of God it both is conuerted to good, and

and being conuerted abideth in it, that the direction of mans will to good, and ſtedfaſtneſſe after direction, hangeth vpon the onely will of God, and not vpon any merit of his owne. And ſo to man is left ſuch a free will, if we liſt ſo to call it, as he writeth of in another place, that can neither be turned to God, nor abide in God but by grace, and by grace is able all that it is able.

THE FOVRTH CHAPTER.

How God worketh in the hearts of men.

Satan ſitteth and ruleth in the wils of wicked men, who of themſelues are moſt willing to be ſtirred, led and guided by him.

IT is ſufficiently prooued, as I thinke, that man is ſo holden captiue with the yoke of ſinne, that of his owne nature he can neither aſpire by deſire, nor trauell by endeuour to goodneſſe: beſide that, we haue rehearſed a diſtinction betweene compulſion and neceſſitie, whereby it might appeare, that when he ſinneth of neceſſitie, yet nevertheleſſe he ſinneth willingly. But foraſmuch as while he is ſubiect in bondage to the Diuell, he ſeemeth rather to be lead by the diuels will than his owne, it reſteth now to be declared of what ſort are both kinds of working. And then is this queſtion to be aſſoyled, whether in euill works there be any thing to be attributed to God: in which the Scripture ſheweth that there is vſed ſome working of his. In one place Auguſtine compareth mans will to a horſe, which is readie to be ruled by the will of his rider and God and diuell he compareth to riders. If God (ſaith he) ſit vpon it, he like a ſober and cunning rider, gouerneth it temperately, ſpurreth it forward if it be too ſlow, plucketh it backe if it to quicke, reſtraineth the wantonneſſe and wildneſſe of it, tameth the ſtubbornneſſe of it, and guideth it into the right way. But if the Diuell haue poſſeſſed it he like a fooliſh and wanton rider, violently carrieth it through places where no way is, drieueth it into ditches, rolleth it downe ſteepe places, ſpurreth it forward to ſtubbornneſſe and fearceneſſe: which ſimilitude we will for this time be contented with, ſith there commeth not a better in place. Where it is ſaid that the will of naturall man is ſubiect to the rule of the diuell, to be ſtirred by him, it is not meant thereby that man as it were ſtriuing againſt it, and reſiſting is compelled to obey, as we compell bondſlaues againſt their will, by reaſon of being their Lords, to doe our commandements: but that being bewitched with the deceits of Satan, it of neceſſitie yeeldeth it ſelfe obedient to euery leading of him. For whom the Lord vouchſafeth not to rule with his Spirit, them by iuſt iudgement he ſendeth away to be moued of Satan. Wherefore the Apoſtle ſayeth, that the God of this world hath blinded the mindes of the vnbeleeuers ordained to deſtruction, that they ſhould not ſee the light of the Goſpell. And in another place: That he worketh in the diſobedient children. The blinding of the wicked, and all the wicked deedes that follow thereupon, are called the works of Satan, of which yet the cauſe is not to be ſought elſewhere, than in the will of man, out of which ariſeth the roote of euill, wherein reſteth the foundation of the kingdome of Sathan, which is ſinne.

2.Cor.4.4.

Eph.2.2.

God and Sathan and man working one and the ſelfeſame act, worke diuerſly in reſpect as well of the end as the maner of doing.

Iob.1.

2 But farre other is the order of Gods doing in ſuch things. And that the ſame may appeare more certainely vnto vs: let the hurt done to the holy man Iob by the Chaldees, be an example. The Chaldees killed his heardmen, and like enimies in warre, droue away his cattell for booties. Now is their wicked deed plainly ſeene, and in that worke Sathan is not idle, from whom the Hiſtorie ſaith, that all this did proceede. But Iob himſelfe did acknowledge the worke of the Lord in it, whom he ſaith to haue taken away from him thoſe things, that were taken away by the Chaldees. How can we refer the ſelfeſame worke to God, as Author, to Sathan as Author, and to man as Author of it, but that we muſt either excuſe Sathan by the company of God, or report God to be the Author of euill? Very eaſily: if firſt we looke vpon the end, why it was done, and then the maner how. The purpoſe of the Lord is by calamitie to exerciſe the patience of his ſeruant: The diuell goeth about to driue him to diſpaire. The Chaldees againſt right and law, ſeeke gaine of that which is another mans. Such diuerſitie in purpoſes, maketh great difference in the worke. And in the maner of dooing there is no leſſe diuerſitie. The Lord leaueth his ſeruant to Sathan to be afflicted: and the Chaldees, whom he did choſe for miniſters to execute it, he did leaue and deliuer to him to be driuen to it. Sathan with his venemous ſtings, pricked forward the mindes of the Chaldees which otherwiſe were peruerſe of themſelues to doe that miſchiefe: they furiouſly runne to doe wrong, and doe binde and defile all their members with wicked doing. Therfore it is properly ſaid, that Sathan doth worke in the reprobate, in whom he exerciſeth his kingdome, that is to ſay, the kingdome of wickedneſſe. It is alſo ſaid that God worketh in them after his manner, becauſe Sathan himſelfe, foraſmuch as he is the inſtrument of his wrath, according to his bidding and commandement, turneth himſelfe hither and thither to execute his iuſt iudgements. I ſpeak not here of Gods vniuerſall mooving, whereby as all creatures are ſuſteined, ſo from thence they take their effectuall power of doing any thing. I ſpeake onely of that ſpeciall doing, which appeareth in euery ſpeciall act. We ſee therefore that it is no abſurditie, that one ſelfe act be aſcribed to God, to Sathan, and to man: but the diuerſitie in the ende and maner of dooing, cauſeth that therein appeareth the iuſtice of God to be without fault, and alſo the wickedneſſe of Sathan and man bewrayeth it ſelfe to their reproch.

In the euill motions of wicked men God worketh after two ſortes, the one by withholding his grace, wherby they might be mooued vnto good, the other by vſing the miniſterie of Sathan to ſtir, frame and encline their wils. Lib. de prædeſt. & grat.

3 The olde writers in this point alſo, are ſometime preciſely afraid, ſimply to confeſſe the truth, becauſe they feare leſt they ſhould ſo open a window to wickedneſſe, to ſpeake irreuerently of the works of God. Which ſobrietie as I embrace, ſo I thinke it nothing dangerous, if we ſimply hold what the Scripture teacheth. Auguſtine himſelfe ſometime was not free from the ſuperſtition, as where he ſaith, that hardning and blinding, pertaine not to the worke of God, but to his foreknowledge. But the phraſes of Scripture allow not theſe ſubtleties, which phraſes doe plainly ſhew that there is therein ſomewhat elſe of God, beſides his foreknowledge. And Auguſtine himſelfe in his fift booke againſt Iulianus, goeth earneſtly about with a long proceſſe to prooue that ſinnes are not onely of the permiſſion or ſufferance of God, but alſo of his power, that ſo former ſinnes might be puniſhed. Likewiſe, that which they bring foorth, concerning permiſſion, is too weake to ſtand. It is oftentimes ſaid, that God blindeth and hardeneth the reprobate, that he turneth, boweth, and mooueth their harts as I haue elſe where taught more at large. But of what maner that is, it is neuer expreſſed, if we flee to free foreknowledge or ſufferance. Therefore we anſwer that it is done after two manners. For firſt, where as when his light is taken away, there remaineth nothing but darkneſſe and blindneſſe: whereas when his Spirit is taken away, our harts waxe hard and become ſtones: whereas when his direction ceaſeth, they are wreſted into crookedneſſe, it is well ſaid that he doth blind, harden and bow them from whom he taketh away the power to ſee, obey and doe rightly. The ſecond maner, which commeth neere to the propertie of the words, is that for the executing of his iudgements by Sathan the miniſter of his wrath, he both appointeth their purpoſes to what ende it pleaſeth him, and ſtirreth vp their wils, and ſtrengtheneth their endeuours. So when Moſes rehearſeth that King Sehon did not giue paſſage to the people, becauſe God had hardened his Spirit, and made his hart obſtinate, he by and by adioyneth the ende of his purpoſe: that he might (ſaith he) giue him into our hands. Therefore becauſe it was Gods will to haue him deſtroyed, the making of his hart obſtinate, was Gods preparation to his deſtruction.

Deut. 2. 30.

4 After the firſt maner this ſeemeth to be ſpoken. He taketh away the lip from the ſpeakers of truth, and taketh away reaſon from the Elders. He taketh the heart away from them that are ſet ouer the people, he maketh them to wander where no way is. Againe, Lord, why haſt thou made vs mad, and hardened our hart, that we ſhould not feare the? Becauſe they iudge rather of what ſort God maketh men by forſaking them, than how he performeth his worke in them. But there are other teſtimonies that go further: as are theſe of the hardening of Pharao. I will harden the hart of Pharao, that he doe not heare you, and let the people goe. Afterward he ſaith, that he hath made heauy and hardened his hart. Did he harden it, in not ſuſtayning it? That is true in deede: but he did ſomewhat more, that he committed his hart to Sathan to be confirmed with obſtinacie. Whereupon he had before ſaid: I will hold his hart. The people went out of Ægypt, the inhabitants of that countrey came forth and met them like enimies. By whom were they ſtirred vp? Truely Moſes affirmeth to the people that it was the Lord that had hardened their hearts. And the Prophet reciting the ſame hiſtorie, ſaith, that he turned their hearts, that they ſhould hate his people. Now can you not ſay, that they ſtumbled being left without the counſell of God. For if they be hardened and turned, then they are of purpoſe bowed to that ſelfe thing. Moreouer ſo oft as it pleaſed him to puniſh the tranſgreſſions of the people, how did he performe his worke in the reprobate? ſo as a man may ſee, that the effectualneſſe of working was in him, and they onely did ſeruice as miniſters. Wherefore ſometime he threatned that he would call them out with his whiſtle, ſometime that they ſhould be like a net for him to entangle them, and ſometime like a mallet, to ſtrike the Iſralites. But ſpecially he then declared how he is not idle in them, when he called Sennacherib an Axe, which was both directed and driuen by his hand to cut. Auguſtine in one place doth not amiſſe appoint it after this ſort: that in as much as they ſinne, it is their owne: in as much as in ſinning they doe this or that, it is of the power of God, that deuided the darkneſſe as pleaſeth him.

5 Now that the miniſterie of Sathan is vſed to pricke forward the reprobate, ſo oft as the Lord by his prouidence appointeth them to this or to that, may ſufficiently be prooued, though it were but by one place onely. For it is oftentimes ſaid in Samuel, that the euill ſpirit of the Lord, and an euill ſpirit from the Lord, did either violently carrie or leaue Saul. To ſay that this ſpirit was the holy Ghoſt, is blaſphemous. Therefore the vncleane ſpirit is called the ſpirit of God, becauſe it anſwereth at his commandement and power, being rather his inſtrument in dooing, than an authour of it ſelfe. This is alſo to be added withall, which Paul teacheth, that the efficacie of errour and deceiuing is ſent by God, that they which haue not obeyed the trueth, may beleeue lies. But there is alway great difference in one ſelfe ſame worke, betweene that which the Lord doth, and that which Satan and the wicked goe about. He maketh the euill inſtruments that hee hath vnder his hand, and may turne whether hee liſt to ſerue his iuſtice. They, in as much as they are euill, doe bring foorth in effect the wickednes that they haue conceiued by corruptneſſe of nature. The reſt of ſuch things as ſerue for to deliuer the maieſtie of God from ſlaunder, and to cut off all ſhifting from the wicked, are already ſet foorth in the Chapter concerning Prouidence. For in this place my purpoſe was onely to ſhew how Satan raigneth in the reprobate man, and how God worketh in them both.

Not onely in ſpirituall, but in the adminiſtration euen of outward things, it is the ſpeciall moouing of God, that maketh his creatures anſwere vnto our deſires in doing vs good, or turning euill away from vs.

6 Although we haue before touched, yet it is not plainly declared what libertie man hath in thoſe dooings, which are neither iuſt nor faultie of themſelues, and belong rather to the bodily than the ſpirituall life. Some in ſuch things haue graunted him free election, rather, as I thinke, becauſe they would not ſtriue about a matter of no great importance, than that they minded certainely to prooue the ſame thing that they graunt. As for me, although I confeſſe that they which doe hold that they haue no power to righteouſneſſe, doe hold the thing that is principally neceſſarie to ſaluation: yet I doe thinke that this point alſo is not to be neglected, that we may know that it is of the ſpeciall grace of the Lord, ſo oft as it commeth in our minde to chooſe that which is for our profit, ſo oft as our will enclineth thereunto: againe, ſo oft as our wit and minde eſchueth that which elſe would haue hurt vs. And the force of Gods prouidence extendeth thus far, not onely to make the ſucceſſes of things to come to paſſe, as he ſhall foreſee to be expedient, but alſo to make the wils of men to tend thereunto. Truely, if we conſider in our wit the adminiſtration of outward things, we ſhal thinke that they are ſo far vnder the will of man: but if we ſhall giue credit to ſo many teſtimonies, which cry out that the Lord doth in theſe things alſo rule the hearts of men, they ſhall compell vs to yeelde our will ſubiect to the ſpeciall moouing of God. Who did procure the good wils of the Ægyptians to the Iſraelites, to lend them all their moſt precious Iewels? They would neuer haue found in their hearts to haue ſo done of their owne accord. Therefore their hearts were more ſubiect to the Lord, than ruled by themſelues. And truely if Iacob had not bene perſwaded that God put into men diuers affections as pleaſeth him, he would not haue ſaid of his ſonne Ioſeph, whom he thought to be ſome Heathen Ægyptian: God graunt you to finde mercy before this man. As alſo the whole Church confeſſeth in the Pſalme, when it pleaſed God to haue mercy vpon it, he meekened the hearts of the cruell nations. Againe, when Saul so waxed on fire with anger, that he prepared him to warre, the cause is expressed, for that the spirit of God did enforce him. Who turned away Absolons minde, from embracing the counsell of Achitophel, which was woont to be holden as an oracle? Who enclined Rehoboam to be perswaded with the yoong mens aduise? Who made the nations that were before great, to be afraid at the comming of Israel? Truely, the harlot Rahab confessed, that it was done by God. Againe, who threw downe the hearts of Israel, with dread and fearefulnesse, but he that in the law threatned that he would giue them a fearefull heart?

7 Some man will take exception and say, that these are singular examples, to the rule whereof all things vniuersally ought not to be reduced. But I say, that by these is sufficiently prooued that which I affirme, that God so oft as he meaneth to prepare the way for his prouidence, euen in outward things doth bow and turne the wils of men, and that their choise is not so free, but that Gods will beareth rule ouer the freedome thereof. That thy minde hangeth rather vpon the mooving of God, than vpon the freedome of thine own choise, this daily experience shall compell thee to thinke whether thou wilt or no: that is, for that in things of no perplexitie thy iudgement and wit oft faileth thee, in things not hard to be done thy courage fainteth: againe in things most obscure, by and by present aduise is offred thee: in things great and perillous, thou hast a courage ouercõming all difficulty. And so do I expound that which Salomon saith: That the eare may heare, that the eie may see, the Lord worketh both. For I take it that he speaketh not of the creation, but of the speciall grace of vsing them. And when he writeth that the Lord holdeth in his hand and boweth whether he will the heart of the King as the streames of waters: truely vnder the example of one speciall sort, he comprehendeth the whole generalitie. For if the will of any man be free from subiection, that preeminence principally belongeth to the will of a King, which vseth as it were a kingdome vpon the wils of other: but if the will of the King be ruled with the hand of God, no more shall our will be exempted from the same estate. Vpon this point there is a notable saying of Augustine: The Scripture if it be diligently looked vpon doth shew, that not onely the good wils of men which he of euill maketh good, and so being made by himselfe doth direct to good doings and to eternall life, but also these wils that preserue the creatures of the world, are so in the power of God, that he maketh them to be enclined whether he will and when he will, either to doe benefits, or to execute punishments, by a iudgement most secret indeed, but the same most righteous.

Daily experience may enforce any man to confesse that in common outward things the fredome of our choise is ruled and guided by the hand of God without which we could not of our selues see and attaine that which is good, discerne & auoide that which is euill. Pro. 20. 12. Pro. 21. 1.

Lib. de gratia & libero arb. ad Valent. cap 20.

8 * Here let the Readers remember, that the power of mans will is not to be weyed by the successe of things, which some vnskilfull men are vnorderly wont to doe. For they seeme to themselues to prooue trimly and wittily that mans will is in bondage, because euen the highest Monarches haue not all things flowing after their owne desire. But this power whereof we speake, is to be considered within man and not be measured by outward successe. For in the disputation of freewill, this is not to the question, whether man may for outward impediments, performe and put in execution all those things that he hath purposed in minde: but whether he haue in euery thing both a free election of iudgement, and a free affection of will, which both if man haue, then Attilius Regulus, enclosed in the narrownesse of a tunne, set full of sharpe pricks, shall no lesse haue freewill than Augustus Cæsar, gouerning a great part of the world with the becke of his countenance.

* The meaning of the question concerneth the freedome of mans will, is not whether he be often hindred or no from obtaining the things he wisheth for, but whether his iudgment & affection be so addicted vnto euill that he cannot of himselfe discerne or desire that which is good.

THE FIFTH CHAPTER.

A confutation of the obiections that are wont to be brought for defence of Freewill.

IT might seeme that we haue said enough alreadie, concerning the bondage of mans will, if they that with false opinion of libertie, labour to throw it downe headlong, did not on the contrarie part pretend certaine reasons to assaile our meaning. First they heape vp together diuers absurdities, whereby they may bring it in hatred as a thing abhorring

The necessitie of sinning doth not excuse vs when we sinne, both because A-abhorring from common reason: afterward they set vpon it with testimonies of Scripture. Both these engines we shall beare backe in order. If (say they) Sinne be of necessitie, then ceaseth it to be sinne: if it be voluntarie, then may it be auoided. These were also the weapons of Pelagius to assaile Augustine, with whose name we will not yet haue them oppressed, till we haue satisfied them, concerning the matter it selfe. I denie therefore that sinne ought the lesse to be imputed, because it is necessarie. I denie againe that this doth follow which they conclude, that it may be auoided, because it is voluntarie. For if any man will dispute with God, and seeke to escape from his iudgement by this pretence, because he could none otherwise doe: God hath that answere ready which we in another place haue spoken of, that it is not of creation, but of the corruption of nature that men being made bondslaues to sinne, can will nothing but euill. For whence commeth this want of power which the wicked would gladly pretend, but vpon this, that Adam of his owne accord made himselfe subiect to the tyrannie of the Diuell? Hereupon therefore grew the corruption, with the bonds whereof we are holden fast tied, for that the first man fell from his Creator. If all men be iustly holden guiltie of his falling away, let them not thinke themselues excused by necessitie, in which it selfe they haue a most euident cause of their damnation. And this I haue aboue plainely set foorth, and I haue giuen an example in the Diuell himselfe, whereby it might appeare, that he which necessarily sinneth, doth neuertheless willingly sinne: as againe in the elect Angels, whereas their will cannot decline from good, yet it ceaseth not to be a will. Which same thing Bernard also aptly teacheth: that we are therefore the more miserable, because our necessitie is voluntarie: which yet holdeth vs so subiect vnto it, that we be the bondslaues of sinne, as we haue before rehearsed. The second part of their argument is faultie, because from voluntarie it straightway leapeth to free: but we haue before prooued, that it is voluntarily done which yet is not subiect to free election.

dam of his owne accord made himselfe and his subiect thereunto, and also for that he which necessarily sinneth, doth neuertheless sinne voluntarily: which answereth their reason which argue in defense of free will. If sinne be necessarie, it ceaseth to be sinne: if voluntarie, then it may be auoided, and is not necessarie.

2 They further say, that if both vertues and vices proceede not of free choise of will, it is not reasonable that either punishment should be laid vpon man, or reward giuen to him. This argument, although it be Aristotles, yet I graunt is in some places vsed by Chrysostome and Hierome. But that it was a common argument with the Pelagians, Hierome himselfe hideth not, and also rehearseth it in their owne words. If the grace of God worke in vs: then it, not we that labour, shall be crowned. Of punishments I answer, that they are iustly laid vpon vs, from whom the guiltinesse of sinne proceedeth. For what matter maketh it, whether sinne be done by free or bond iudgement, so it be done by voluntarie lust: specially sith man is hereby prooued a sinner, for that he is vnder the bondage of sinne? As to the rewards of righteousnesse: a great absurditie forsooth it is, if we confesse that they hang rather vpon Gods bountifulnesse, than vpon our owne deseruings. How oft finde we this thing repeated in Augustine: that God crowneth not our deseruings, but his owne gifts: and that they are called rewards, not as due to our deseruings, but such as are rendred to the graces alreadie bestowed vpon vs? Wisely in deede they note this, that now there remaineth no place for deseruings, if they come not out of the fountaine of free will: but where they reckon that which we say so far differing from truth, they are much deceiued. For Augustine doubteth not, commonly to teach for necessarie, that which they thinke so vnlawfull to confesse, as where he saith: What be the merits of any men whatsoeuer they be? when he commeth, not with due reward, but with free grace, then he alone being free, and that maketh free from sinne? He findeth all men sinners. Againe, if that shall be rendred to thee that is due to thee, thou art to be punished: what is done then? God hath not giuen thee punishment which is due, but giueth thee grace which is not due. If thou wilt be estranged from grace, boast of thy deseruings. Againe: Thou art nothing of thy selfe, Sinnes are thine, but deseruings are Gods, punishment is due to thee: and when reward commeth, he shall crowne his owne gifts, and not thy deseruings. And in the same meaning in another place, he teacheth that grace is not of deseruing, but deseruing of grace. And a little after he concludeth, that God with his gifts goeth before all deseruings, that out of the same he may gather his owne deseruings, and doth giue altogether freely, because he findeth nothing whereupon to saue. But what neede is it to make a longer

A second argument in defense of free will, wherein it is obiected that the deniall thereof is repugnant to Gods punishing or rewarding men. But he punisheth them for their desert, though they sin of necessitie, because they are voluntarily in those bonds: and he rewardeth them of his owne mercie, though, because their doing well is meerly by grace, they cannot deserue to be rewarded.

longer regiſter, when ſuch ſentences are often found in his writings? But the Apoſtle ſhall yet better deliuer them from this errour, if they heare what beginning he comeyeth the glorie of the Saints: whom he hath choſen, them he hath called: whom he hath called, them he hath iuſtified: whom he hath iuſtified, them he hath glorified. Why then, as witneſſeth the Apoſtle, are the faithfull crowned? becauſe by the Lords mercie and not by their owne endeuour they are both choſen and called and iuſtified. Away therefore with this vaine feare, that there ſhall no more be any deſeruings, if free will ſhall not ſtand. For it is moſt fooliſh to be fraied away and to flee from that to which the Scripture calleth vs. If (ſaith he) thou haſt receiued all things, why glorieſt thou, as if thou hadſt not receiued them? Thou ſeeſt that for the ſame cauſe he taketh all things from free will, to leaue no place for deſeruings: but as the bountifulneſſe and liberalitie of God is manifold, and impoſſible to be ſpent out, thoſe graces which he beſtowed on vs, becauſe he maketh them ours, he rewardeth as if they were our owne vertues.

1.Cor.4.7.

1.Cor.4.7.

3 Moreouer they bring foorth that which may ſeeme to be taken out of Chryſoſtome: If this be not the power of our will, to chooſe good or euill, then they that are partakers of the ſame nature, muſt either all be euill or all be good. And not farre from that is he, whatſoeuer he was, that wrote the booke Of the calling of the Gentiles, which is carried about vnder the name of Ambroſe, when he maketh this argument, that no man ſhould euer depart from the faith, vnleſſe the grace of God did leaue vnto vs the ſtate of mutabilitie: wherein it is marueil that ſo excellent men fell beſide themſelues. For how chanceth it came not in Chryſoſtomes minde, that it is Gods election that ſo maketh difference betweene men? As for vs, we feare not to graunt that which Paul with great earneſtneſſe affirmeth, that all together are peruerſe and giuen to wickedneſſe: but with him we adioyne this that by Gods mercie it commeth to paſſe that all abide not in peruerſeneſſe. Therefore whereas naturally we are all ſick of one diſeaſe, they onely recouer health vpon whom it hath pleaſed God to lay his healing hand. The reſt whom by iuſt iudgement he paſſeth ouer, pine away in their owne rottenneſſe till they be conſumed. Neither is it of any other cauſe that ſome continue to the end, and ſome fall in their courſe begun. For continuance it ſelfe is the gift of God, which he giueth not to all indifferently, but dealeth it to whom it pleaſeth himſelfe. If a man aske for a cauſe of the difference, why ſome continue conſtantly, and ſome faile by vnſtedfaſtneſſe, we know none other cauſe but that God ſuſtaineth the one ſort ſtrengthened with his power that they periſh not, and doth not giue the ſame ſtrength to the other ſort, that they may be examples of inconſtancie.

A third reaſon arguing that if mans will were not naturally free vnto good and euill, but neceſſarily ſubiect to the one or the other, either all men ſhould be good or all men euill. As in truth all men are by nature euill, that ſome are made good, it is by grace and not through the freedome of their will.
Lib.2.cap.4. Rom.3.10.

4 Further they preſſe vs, ſaying, that exhortations are vainely taken in hand, that the vſe of admonitions is ſuperfluous, that it is a fond thing to rebuke, if it be not in the power of the ſinner to obey. When the like things in time paſt were obiected againſt Auguſtine, he was compelled to write the booke of Correption and grace. Where although he largely wipe them away, yet he bringeth his aduerſaries to this ſumme: O man, in the commaundement learne what thou oughteſt to doe: in correction learne that by thine owne faule thou haſt it not: in prayer learne whence thou mayeſt receiue that which thou wouldeſt haue. Of the ſame argument in a maner is the booke of the Spirit and Letter, where he teacheth that God meaſureth not the commaundements of his lawe by the ſtrength of man, but when he hath commanded that which is right, he freely giueth to his elect power to fulfill it. And this is no matter of long diſputation. Firſt we are not onely in this cauſe, but alſo Chriſt and all the Apoſtles. Now let the other looke how they will get the maiſterie in ſtriuing, that match themſelues with ſuch aduerſaries. Doeth Chriſt, which teſtifieth that we can doe nothing without him, any thing the leſſe rebuke and chaſtiſe them, that without him did euill? Doeth he leſſe exhort euery man to apply himſelfe to good workes? How ſeuerely doth Paul inuey againſt the Corinthians for neglecting of charitie? and yet he prayeth for charitie to be giuen to the ſame men from God. He teſtifieth in the Epiſtle to the Romanes, that it is neither of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercie, and yet he ceaſeth not afterward to admoniſh, to exhort, and to rebuke. Why doe they not therefore ſpeake to the Lord, that he do not ſo loſe his labour in requiring of men thoſe things, things, which he himselfe alone can giue, and in punishing those things which are done for want of his grace? Why do they not admonish Paul to spare them, in whose power it is not to will or to runne, but in the mercy of God, going before them which now hath forsaken them? As if the Lord had not a very good reason of his doctrine, which offereth it selfe readily to be found of them that reuerently seeke it, but how much doctrine, exhortation and rebuking doe worke of themselues, to the changing of the minde, Paul declareth, when he writeth, that neither he that planteth is any thing, nor he that watereth, but the Lord that giueth the encrease onely, effectually worketh. So we see that Moses seuerally stablisheth the commaundements of the Law, and the Prophets doe sharpely call vpon them, and threaten the transgressors, whereas they yet confesse, that men do then onely waxe wise, when a heart is giuen them to vnderstand, that it is the proper worke of God to circumcise the hearts, and in steede of stonie hearts, to giue hearts of flesh, to write his law in the bowels of men: finally in renuing of soules to make that his doctrine may be effectuall.

A fourth argument for free will to proue that exhorting and threatening are in vaine, except man haue power in himſelfe to obey: whereas God himſelfe who threateneth and exhorteth men, teacheth them neuertheleſſe withall, that an obedient heart is his free gift.

1.Cor.3.7.

The vse of exhortations both vnto wicked & to godly men.

5 Wherefore then serue exhortations? For this purpose, if they be despised of the wicked with an obstinate heart, they shall be for a witnesse vnto them when they shall come to the iudgement seate of the Lord, yea and euen now already they beat and strike their conscience: for howsoeuer the most froward man laugheth them to scorne, yet can he not disproue them: but thou wilt say, what may silly miserable man doe, if the softnesse of hart, which was necessarily required to obedience, be denied him? Nay rather, why doth he excuse himselfe, when he can impute the hardnesse of heart to none but to himselfe? Therefore the wicked that are willingly ready to mocke them out if they might, are throwen downe with the force of them whether they will or no. But the chiefe profit towards the faithfull is to be considered: in whom as the Lord worketh all things by his spirit, so he leaueth not the instruments of his word, and vseth the same not without effect. Let this therefore stand which is true, that all the strength of the godly resteth in the grace of God, according to that saying of the Prophet: I will giue them a new heart, that they may walke in them. But thou wilt say, Why are they now admonished of their dutie, & not rather left to the direction of the holy Ghost? Why are they mooued with exhortation, sith they can make no more hast than the stirring forward of the holy Ghost worketh? Why are they chastised if at any time they be gone out of the way, sith they fell by the necessarie weakenesse of the flesh? O man, what art thou to appoint a law for God? If it be his pleasure, that we be prepared by exhortation to receiue the selfe same grace, whereby is wrought that the exhortation is obeyed, what hast thou in this order to bite or carpe at? If exhortations and rebukings did nothing else profit with the godly, but to reproue them of sinne, they were euen for that thing onely to be counted not altogether vnprofitable. Now, forasmuch as by the holy Ghost working inwardly, they much auaile to enflame the desire of goodnesse, to shake off sluggishnesse, to take away the pleasure and venemous sweetnesse of wickednesse, and on the other side to engender a hatred or yrkesomnesse thereof: who dare cauill that they are superfluous? If any man require a plainer answere, let him take this: God worketh after two sorts in his elect, inwardly by his spirit, outwardly by his word: By his spirit, by enlightning their mindes, by framing their hearts to the loue and keeping of iustice, he maketh them a new creature: By his word, he stirreth them to desire, to seeke and attaine the same renewing, by them both he sheweth foorth the effectuall working of his hand, according to the proportion of his distribution. When he sendeth the same word to the reprobate, though not for their amendement, yet he maketh it to serue for another vse: that both for the present time they may be pressed with witnesse of conscience, and may against the day of iudgement be made more inexcusable. So though Christ pronounce that no man commeth to him, but whom the Father draweth, and that the elect doe come when they haue heard and learned of the Father: yet doth not he neglect the office of a teacher, but with his voice diligently calleth them, whom it necessarily behoooueth to be inwardly taught by the holy Ghost, that they may any thing profit. And Paul teacheth, that teaching is not in vaine with the reprobate, because it is to them the sauour of death to death, but a sweete sauour to God.

6 They

6 They be very laborious in heaping together of teſtimonies of Scripture: and that they doe of purpoſe, that when they cannot oppreſſe vs with weight, they may yet with number. But as in battels, when it commeth to hand ſtrokes, the weaker multitude how much pompe and ſhew ſoeuer it hath, is with a few ſtripes diſcomfited and put to flight: ſo ſhall it be very eaſie for vs to ouerthrow them with all their rout. For, becauſe the places that they abuſe againſt vs, when they are once diuided into their orders, doe meete vpon a few ſpeciall points, we ſhall with one anſwere ſatisfie many of them: therefore it ſhall not be needfull to tarrie vpon diſſoluing euery one of them particularly. Their chiefe force they ſet in the commandements, which they thinke to be ſo tempered to our ſtrengths, that whatſoeuer is prooued to be required by the one, it neceſſarily followeth, that it may be perfourmed by the other. And therefore they runne through euerie of the commandements, and by them doe meaſure the proportion of our ſtrength. For (ſay they) either God mocketh vs when he chargeth vs with holineſſe, godlineſſe, obedience, chaſtitie, loue and meekeneſſe: and when he forbiddeth vs vncleanneſſe, idolatrie, vnchaſtneſſe, wrath, robberie, pride, and ſuch like: or he requireth onely thoſe things that are in our power. Now we may diuide into three ſorts in maner all the commandements that they heape together. Some require our firſt conuerſion to God, ſome ſpeake ſimplie of the keeping of the lawe: ſome command vs to continue in the grace of God that we haue receiued. Firſt let vs ſpeake of them all in generalitie, and then deſcend to the ſpeciall ſorts. To extend the power of man to the commandements of the lawe, hath indeede long ago begun to be common, and hath ſome ſhew: but it proceeded from moſt rude ignorance of the lawe. For they that thinke it a heinous offence, if it be ſaid that the keeping of the lawe is impoſſible, doe reſt forſooth vpon this moſt ſtrong argument, that elſe the lawe was giuen in vaine. For they ſpeake in ſuch ſort, as if Paul had no where ſpoken of the law. For, I beſeech them, what meane theſe ſayings, that the law was ſet becauſe of tranſgreſſions: That by the lawe is the knowledge of ſinne: that the lawe maketh ſinne: that the lawe entred, that ſinne might abound: was it ment that the law was to be limited to our ſtrengths, leaſt it ſhould be giuen in vaine? or rather that it was ſet farre aboue vs to conuince our weakeneſſe? Truely by the ſame mans definition, the end and fulfilling of the lawe is charitie. But when he wiſheth the mindes of the Theſſalonians to be filled with charitie, he doth ſufficiently confeſſe, that the lawe ſoundeth in our eares without profite, vnleſſe God inſpire the whole ſumme thereof in our hearts.

The lacke of free will in man and of abilitie to performe the lawe doth not proue the lawe to be giuen in vaine.

Gal. 3. 10. Rom. 3. 20. Rom. 7. 7. 1. Tim. 1. 5.

1. Theſſ. 3. 12.

7 Truely, if the Scripture did teach nothing elſe, but that the law is a rule of life whereunto we ought to frame our endeuour, I would alſo without delay agree to their opinion: but whereas it doth diligently and plainely declare vnto vs the manifold vſe of the lawe: it is conuenient rather to conſider by that interpretation, what the lawe may doe in man. For ſo much as concerneth this preſent cauſe: it teacheth that ſo ſoone as it hath appointed what we ought to doe, the power to obey commeth of the goodneſſe of God, and therefore mooueth vs to prayer, whereby we may require to haue it giuen vs. If there were onely the commaundement and no promiſe, then were our ſtrengths to be tried whether they were ſufficient to anſwere the commaundement, but ſith there are promiſes ioyned withall, which crie out, that not onely our aide, but alſo all our whole power conſiſteth in the helpe of Gods grace, they doe teſtifie ynough and more, that we are altogether vnfit, much more inſufficient to keepe the lawe. Wherefore let this proportion of our ſtrengths with the commandements of Gods law be no more enforced, as if the Lord had meaſured the rule of iuſtice, which he purpoſed to giue in his lawe, according to the rate of our weakeneſſe. Rather by his promiſes we ought to conſider, how vnreadie we are of our ſelues which in euery behalfe doe ſo much neede his grace. But who (ſay they) ſhall be perſwaded that it is like to be true, that the Lord appointed his lawe to ſtocks and ſtones? Neither doth any man goe about to perſwade it. For the wicked are neither ſtocks nor ſtones, whē being taught by the law that their luſts doe ſtriue againſt God, they are prooued guiltie by their owne witneſſe. Nor yet the godly, when being put in minde of their weakeneſſe, they flie vnto grace. For which purpoſe ſerue theſe ſayings of Auguſtine. The Lord commandeth thoſe things that we cannot doe, that we may know what we ought to aske of him.

The vſe which the law of God ſtandeth vs in, although our weakeneſſe doe not ſerue to fulfill it.

In Enchir. ad Laur. de grat. & arb. cap. 16. Ho. 29. in Io.

Great

Great is the profite of the commaundements, if ſo much be giuen to free will, that the grace of God be the more honoured. Faith obtaineth that which the lawe commaundeth, yea the lawe therefore commandeth, that faith may obtaine that which was commanded by the lawe: yea, God requireth faith it ſelfe of vs, and findeth not what to require vnleſſe he giue what to finde. Againe, Let God giue what he commandeth, and command what he will.

Ephe.2.4.

Our firſt conuerſion vnto God, our obedience when we are conuerted, and our continuance in obeying, commanded in the lawe, and yet his gift which doth command them.

8 That ſhall more plainely be ſeene in rehearſing the three ſorts of commandements which we touched before. The Lord oftentimes commandeth both in the law and in the Prophets, that we be conuerted vnto him. But on the other ſide, the Prophet anſwereth, Conuert me Lord, and I ſhall be conuerted: for after that thou didſt conuert me, I repented, &c. He commandeth vs to circumciſe the vncircumciſed skin of our hart: and by Moſes he declareth that this circumciſion is done by his owne hand. He each where requireth newneſſe of hart, but in another place he teſtifieth that it is giuen by himſelfe. That which God promiſeth (ſaith Auguſtine) we doe not by free will or nature, but he himſelfe doth it by grace. And this is the ſame note, that he himſelfe rehearſeth in the fifth place among the rules of Ticonius, that we well make difference betweene the lawe and the promiſes, or betweene the commandements and grace. Now let them go that gather by the commandements whether man be able to doe any thing toward obedience in ſuch ſort that they deſtroy the grace of God, by which the commandements themſelues are fulfilled. The commandements of the ſecond ſort are ſimple, by which we are bidden to honour God, to ſerue and cleaue vnto his will, to keepe his commandements, to follow his doctrine. But there are innumerable places that doe teſtifie that it is his gift whatſoeuer righteouſneſſe, holineſſe, godlineſſe, or puritie may be had. Of the third ſort was that exhortation of Paul and Barnabas to the faithfull, which is rehearſed by Luke, that they ſhould abide in the grace of God. But from whence that ſtrength of cõſtancie is to be had, the ſame Paul teacheth in another place. That remaineth, ſayeth he, brethren, be ye ſtrong thorough the Lord. In another place he forbiddeth vs, that we doe not grieue the ſpirit of God, wherewith we are ſealed vp vnto the day of our redemption. But becauſe the thing that he there requireth, could not be performed by men, therefore he wiſheth it to the Theſſalonians, from God, namely, that he would reckon them worthie of his holy calling: and fulfill all the purpoſe of his goodneſſe, and the worke of faith in them. Likewiſe in the ſecond Epiſtle to the Corinthians, intreating of almes, he oftentimes commendeth their good and godly will, yet a little after, he thanketh God that put it in the hart of Titus, to take vpon him to giue exhortation. If Titus could not ſo much as vſe the office of his mouth, to exhort other, but onely ſo farre as God did put vnto him, how ſhould other haue beene willing to doe, vnleſſe God himſelfe had directed their harts?

The ſhifts which defenders of free will vſe to delude the foreſaid teſtimonies of ſcripture.

9 The craftier ſort of them doe cauill at all theſe teſtimonies: becauſe there is no impediment, but that we may ioyne our owne ſtrengths, and God to helpe our weake endeuours. They bring alſo places out of the Prophets, where the effect of our conuerſion ſeemeth to be parted in halfe betweene God and vs. Turne ye to me, and I will turne to you. What maner of helpe the Lord bringeth vs, we haue aboue ſhewed, and it is not needefull heere to repeate it. This one thing I would haue graunted me, that it is vainely gathered, that there is required in vs a power to fulfill the lawe, becauſe God doth commaund the obedience of it: For as much as it is euident, that for the fulfilling of all the commaundements of God, the grace of the law-giuer is both neceſſarie for vs, and promiſed vnto vs. Thereby then it appeareth, that at the leaſt there is more required of vs than we are able to pay. And that ſaying of Hieremie cannot be wiped away with any cauillations: that the couenant of God made with the ancient people was void, becauſe it was onely literall, and that it could no otherwiſe be ſtabliſhed, than when the ſpirit commeth vnto it, which frameth the hearts to obedience. Neither doth that ſaying, Turne ye to me, and I will turne vnto you, fauour their errour. For there is meant, not that turning of God, wherewith he reneweth our hearts to repentance, but wherewith he by proſperitie of things doth declare himſelfe fauourable and mercifull: as by aduerſitie he ſometime ſheweth his diſpleaſure. Whereas therefore the people being vexed with many ſorts of miſeries, and calamities, did complaine that that God was turned away from them: he answereth, that they shall not be destitute of his fauour, if they returne to vprightnesse of life, and to himselfe that is the patterne of righteousnesse: Therefore the place is wrongfully wrested, and it is drawen to this purpose, that the worke of our conuersion should seeme to be parted betweene God and men. These things we haue comprehended so much the shorther, because the proper place for this matter shall be where we intreat of the Law.

10 The second sort of their arguments is much like vnto the first. They alleadge the promises whereby God doth couenaunt with our will, of which sort are: Seeke good and not euill, and ye shall liue. If ye will and doe heare, ye shall eate the good things of the earth: but if yee will not, the sword shall deuoure you, because the Lords mouth hath spoken it. Againe, if thou put away thine abhominations out of my sight, then shalt thou not be driuen out: If thou shalt obey diligently the voice of the Lord thy God, and obserue and doe all his commaundements which I commaund thee this day, then the Lord thy God will set thee on high aboue all the nations of the earth. And other like. They doe inconueniently and as it were in mockerie thinke, that these benefits which the Lord doth offer in his promises, are assigned to our owne will: vnlesse it were in vs to stablish them or make them voide. And right easie it is to amplifie this matter with eloquent complaints, that the Lord doth cruelly mocke vs, when he pronounceth that his fauour hangeth vpon our will, if the same will be not in our power And that this liberalitie of God should be a goodly thing forsooth, if he so set his benefits before vs, that we haue no power to vse them: and a maruellous assuredneſse of his promises, which hang vpon a thing impossible, so as they might neuer be fulfilled. But of such promises as haue a condition adioyned, we will speake in another place: so that it shall be plaine, that there is no absurditie in the impossible fulfilling of them. And for so much as concerneth this place: I denie that God doth vngently mocke vs when he mooueth vs to deserue his benefits, whom he knoweth to be vtterly vnable to doe it. For whereas the promises are offered both to the faithfull and to the wicked, they haue their vse with both sorts. As God with his commaundements pricketh the consciences of the wicked, that they should not too sweetely take pleasure in their sinnes, without any remembrance of his iudgements: so in his promises he doth in a maner take them to witnesse, how vnworthy they are of his goodnesse. For who can denie that it is most rightfull and conuenient, that the Lord doe good to them of whom he is honoured, and punish the despisers of his Maiestie, according to his seueritie? Therefore God doth well and orderly when in his promises he adioyneth this condition to the wicked that are bound with the fetters of sinne, that they shall then onely enioy his benefits, if they depart from their wickednesse: or for this purpose onely, that they may vnderstand that they are woorthily excluded from these things, that are due to the true worshippers of God. Againe, because he seeketh by all meanes to stir vp the faithfull to call vpon his grace, it shall not be inconuenient, if he attempt the same thing also by promises, which we haue shewed that he hath done to great profit with commaundements toward them. Being enformed of the will of God, by his commaundements, we are put in minde of our miserie, which doe with all our heart too far dissent from the same, and we be therewithall pricked forward to call vpon his spirit, whereby we may be directed into the right way. But because our sluggishnesse is not sufficiently sharpened with commaundements, there are added promises which with a certaine sweetnesse may allure vs to the loue of them. And that the more desire that we haue of righteousnes, we may be the more feruent to seeke the fauour of God. Loe how in these requests (if you will: If you shall heare,) the Lord neither giueth vs power to will nor to heare, and yet mocketh vs not for our want of power.

11 The third sort of their arguments, hath also great affinitie with the two former. For they bring foorth the places wherein God reprocheth the vnthankfull people, and saith that they themselues onely were the cause that they receiued not of his tender loue all kinde of good things. Of which sort are the places: Amaleck and the Chananee are before you, with whose sword you shall fall, because yee would not obey the Lord, because I called and yee answered not, I will doe to this house as I did to Silo. Againe, this nation hath not heard the voice of the Lord their God, nor hath receiued diſcipline, therefore it is caſt away from the Lord. Againe, becauſe ye haue hardned your heart and would not obey the Lord, all theſe euils are hapned vnto you. How (ſay they) could ſuch reproches be laid againſt them which might redily anſwere? As for vs, we loued proſperitie, and feared aduerſitie. But where as for to obtaine the one and auoid the other we obeyed not the Lord, nor hearkned to his voice: this was the cauſe thereof, for that it was not at our libertie ſo to doe, becauſe we were ſubiect to the dominion of ſinne. Vainely therefore are theſe euils laid to our charge, which it was not in our power to auoid. But leauing the pretence of neceſſitie, wherein they haue but a weake and ſickly defence, I aske of them whether they can purge themſelues of all fault. For if they be found guiltie of any fault, then the Lord doth not without cauſe reproch them, that it came to paſſe by their peruerſneſſe, that they felt not the fruit of his clemencie. Let them anſwere therefore, whether they can denie, that their froward will was the cauſe of their ſtubbornneſſe. If they finde the ſpring head of the euill within themſelues, why gape they to finde out forreine cauſes, that they might ſeeme not to haue beene authors of their owne deſtruction? But if it be true that by their owne fault and none others, ſinners are both depriued of the benefits of God, and chaſtiſed with puniſhments, then is there great reaſon why they ſhould heare theſe reproches at the mouth of God: that if they goe obſtinately forward in their faults, they may learne in their miſeries rather to accuſe and abhorre their owne wickedneſſe, than to blame God of vniuſt crueltie: that if they haue not caſt off all willingneſſe to learne, they may be wearie of their ſinnes, by the deſeruings whereof they ſee themſelues miſerable and vndone, and may returne into the way, and acknowledge the ſame with earneſt confeſſion which the Lord reherſeth in chiding them. For which purpoſe it appeareth by the ſolemne praier of Daniel, which is in the ninth Chap. that thoſe chidings of the Prophets which are alleaged, did auaile with the godly. Of the firſt vſe we ſee an example in the Iewes, to whom Ieremy is cõmanded to declare the cauſe of their miſeries, whereas yet it ſhould not haue falle otherwiſe then the Lord had foreſaid. Thou ſhalt ſpeake vnto thẽ all theſe words, and they ſhall not heare thee: thou ſhalt call them, and they ſhall not anſwere thee. To what end then did they ſing to deafe men? that being euen loth & vnwilling, yet they ſhould vnderſtand that it was true that they heard, that it were wicked ſacriledge if they ſhould lay vpon God the blame of their euils which reſted in thẽſelues. By theſe few ſolutions thou maiſt eaſily deliuer thy ſelfe frõ the infinite heape of teſtimonies, which, for to erect an image of free will, the enemies of the grace of God are wont to gather together, as well out of the commandements as out of the proteſtations againſt the profeſſors of the law. It is reprochfully ſpoken in the Pſalme concerning the Iewes: a froward generation that haue not made their heart ſtraight. Alſo in another Pſalme, the Prophet exhorteth the men of his age, not to harden their hearts, and that becauſe all the fault of obſtinacie remaineth in the peruerſneſſe of men. But it is fondly gathered thereof, that the heart is pliable to either ſide, the preparing whereof is onely of God. The Prophet ſaith: I haue inclined my heart to keepe thy commandements, becauſe he had willingly and with a cherefull earneſt affection of minde addicted himſelfe to God, and yet he doth not boaſt himſelfe to be the author of his owne inclination, which he confeſſeth in the ſame Pſalme to be the gift of God. Therefore we muſt hold in minde the admonition of Paul, where he biddeth the faithfull to worke their owne ſaluation with feare and trembling, becauſe it is the Lord that worketh both the willing and the perfourming. In deede he aſſigneth them offices, to be doing, that they ſhould not giue themſelues to ſluggiſhneſſe of the fleſh: but in that he commaundeth them to haue feare and carefulneſſe, he ſo humbleth them, that they may remember that the ſame thing which they are commaunded to doe, is the proper worke of God, wherein plainely he expreſſeth, that the faithfull worke paſſiuely, as I may ſo call it, in ſo much as power is miniſtred them from heauen, that they ſhould claime nothing at all to themſelues. Wherefore when Peter exhorteth vs that we ſhould adde power in faith, he graunteth not vnto vs a ſecond office, as if we ſhould doe any thing ſeuerally by our ſelues, but onely he awaketh the ſlothfulneſſe of the fleſh, wherewith commonly faith it ſelfe is choaked. To the ſame purpoſe ſeemeth that ſaying of Paul: Extinguiſh not the ſpirit, for ſlothfulneſſe doth oftentimes creepe vpon the faithfull, if it be not corrected. But if any man conclude thereupon, that it is in their owne choise to cherish the light being offred them, his ignorance shall be easily confuted: because the selfe same diligence that Paul requireth, commeth onely from God. For we are also oftentimes commanded to purge our selues frō all filthinesse: whereas the holy Ghost doeth claime to himselfe alone the office of making holy. Finally, that by way of graunting, the same thing is conueyed to vs that properly belongeth to God, is plaine by the words of Iohn: Whosoeuer is of God, saueth himselfe. The aduancers of free will take hold of this saying, as if we were saued partly by the power of God, and partly by our owne: as though we had not from heauen the very same safe keeping, whereof the Apostle maketh mention. For which cause, Christ also prayeth his Father to saue vs from euill, and we know that the godly, while they warre against Satan, doe get the victorie by no other armour and weapons, but by the armour and weapons of God. Wherefore when Peter commanded vs, to purifie our soules in the obedience of truth, he by and by addeth as by way of correction, (by the holy Ghost.) Finally, how all mens strength is of no force in the spirituall battell, Iohn briefly sheweth, when he saith, that they which are begotten of God, cannot sinne, because the seede of God abideth in them. And in another place he rendreth a reason why: for that our faith is the victory that ouercommeth the world.

12 Yet there is alleaged a testimonie out of the law of Moses, which seemeth to be much against our saluation. For after the publishing of the Law, he protesteth vnto the people in this maner. The commandement that I command thee this day, is not hid from thee, neither farre off: It is not in heauen, but hard by thee, it is in thy mouth and in thy hart, thou shouldest doe it. Truly, if this be taken to be spoken of the bare commandements, I graunt they be of no small weight to this present matter. For though it were easie to mocke it out with saying, that here is spoken not of the easinesse and readinesse of obseruation, but of knowledge: yet euen so peraduenture it would also leaue some doubt. But the Apostle which is no doubtfull expositor, taketh away all doubt from vs, which affirmeth that Moses here spake of the doctrine of the Gospel. But if any obstinate man will say, that Paul violently wrested those words, that they might be drawen to the Gospell, although his boldnesse so to say shall not be without impietie, yet is there sufficient matter beside the authority of the Apostles to conuince him withall. For if Moses spake of the commandements only, then he puffed vp the people with a most vaine confidence. For what should they else haue done, but throwen themselues downe headlong, if they had taken vpon them the keeping of the Law by their owne strength, as a thing not hard for them? Where is then that so ready easinesse to keepe the Law, where there is no accesse vnto it, but by a headlong fall to destruction. Wherefore there is nothing more certain, then that Moses in these words did meane the couenant of mercy, which he had published together with the streight requiring of the law. For in a few verses before he had taught, that our harts must be circūcised by the hand of God, that we may loue him. Therefore he placed that easinesse, whereof he straightway after speaketh, not in the strength of man, but in the helpe and succor of the holy Ghost, which performeth his worke mightily in our weakenesse. Albeit the place is not simply to be vnderstanded of the cōmandements, but rather of the promises of the Gospell, which are so farre from stablishing a power in vs to obtaine righteousnesse, that they vtterly ouerthrow it. Paul considering that same, prooueth by this testimony, that saluation is offred vs in the Gospel, not vnder that hard and impossible cōdition, wherewith the law dealeth with vs, that is, that they only shall attaine it which haue fulfilled all the commandements, but vnder a condition that is easie, readie, and plaine to come vnto. Therfore this testimony maketh nothing to chalenge freedom to the will of man.

When Moses doth seeme to intimate a kind of facilitie in man to fulfill the law of God: he meaneth by the law the promises of the Gospell, which are easily receiued vs in respect of our habilitie, but of Gods mercie which worketh mightily in framing our harts.

13 There are also certaine other places wont to be obiected, whereby is shewed that God sometime withdrawing the succor of his grace, trieth men, and waiteth to see to what end they will apply their endeuours, as is that place in Osee: I will goe to my place till they put it in their hart and seeke my face. It were a fond thing (say they) if the Lord should consider whether Israel would seeke his face, vnlesse their minds were pliable that they might after their own will encline themselues to the one side or the other. As though this were not a thing commonly vsed with God in the Prophets, to make a ſhew as if he did deſpiſe and caſt away his people, till they haue amended their life. But what will the aduerſaries gather out of ſuch threatnings? If they meane to gather, that the people being forſaken of God, may purpoſe their owne ſaluation: all the Scripture ſhall cry out againſt them in ſo doing. If they confeſſe that the grace of God is neceſſary to conuerſion, why ſtriue they with vs? But they ſo graunt it neceſſary, that ſtill they will haue mans power preſerued vnto him. How proue they that? truely not by this place, nor any like to it. For it is one thing, to depart aſide from man, and to looke what he will doe being giuen ouer and left to himſelfe, and another thing to helpe his little ſtrength after the meaſure of his weakeneſſe. What then (will ſome man ſay) doe theſe maners of ſpeaking meane? I anſwere that they are aſmuch in effect, as if God had ſaid: For aſmuch as I preuaile nothing with this ſtubborne people by admoniſhing, exhorting and rebuking, I will withdraw my ſelfe awhile: and ſit ſtill and ſuffer them to be afflicted: I will ſee if at length, after long miſeries, they will begin to remember me, to ſeeke my face. The Lords going farre away, ſignifieth the taking away of Prophecie: his looking what men will doe, ſignifieth that he keeping ſilence, and as it were hiding himſelfe, doth for a time exerciſe them with diuers afflictions. Both theſe things he doth to humble vs the more. For we ſhould ſooner be dulled than amended with the ſcourges of aduerſitie, vnleſſe he did frame vs to that tractableneſſe by his ſpirit. Now whereas the Lord being offended, and in a maner wearied with our obſtinate ſtubbornneſſe, doth for a time leaue vs (that is by taking away his word in which he is wont to giue vs a certaine preſence of himſelfe) and doth make a proofe what he would doe in his abſence, it is falſly gathered hereof that there is any ſtrength of free will that he ſhould behold and trie, foraſmuch as he doth it to no other end, but to driue vs to acknowledge our owne being nothing.

As the euill works which we doe are ours, ſo the good works which are termed ours we doe: howbeit, ſo that to doe is ours by nature, but to doe well by grace which is giuen vs from aboue. Mat. 6.

14 They bring alſo for their defence the continuall maner of ſpeaking that is vſed both in the Scriptures and in the talke of men. For good works are called ours, and it is no leſſe ſaid that we doe the thing that is holy and pleaſing to God, then that we commit ſinnes. But if ſinnes be juſtly imputed to vs, as proceeding from vs, truly in righteous doings alſo ſomewhat by the ſame reaſon ought to be aſſigned vnto vs. For it were againſt reaſon that it ſhould be ſaid that we doe thoſe things, to the doing whereof being vnable of our owne motion, we are mooued by God like ſtones. Therefore though we giue the chiefe part to the grace of God, yet theſe maners of ſpeaking doe ſhew that our endeuour hath alſo yet a ſecond part. If that thing onely were ſtill enforced, that good works are called ours, I would obiect againe, that the bread is called ours, which we pray to haue giuen vs of God. What will they get by the title of poſſeſſion, but that by the bountifulneſſe and free gift of God, the ſame thing becommeth ours, which otherwiſe is not due vnto vs? Therefore either let them laugh at the ſame abſurditie in the Lords prayer, or let them not recken this to be laughed at, that good works are called ours, in which we haue no propertie, but by the liberalitie of God. But this is ſomewhat ſtronger, that the Scripture oftentimes affirmeth that we our ſelues doe worſhip God, obey the Law and apply good works. Sith theſe are the dueties properly belonging to the mind and will: how could it agree that theſe things are both referred to the holy Ghoſt, and alſo attributed to vs, vnleſſe there were a certaine communicating of our endeuour with the power of God? Out of theſe ſnares we ſhall eaſily vnwinde our ſelues, if we well conſider the maner how the ſpirit of the Lord worketh in the holy ones. The ſimilitude wherewith they enuiouſly preſſe vs is from the purpoſe, for who is ſo fond to thinke that the mouing of man differeth nothing from the caſting of a ſtone? Neither doth any ſuch thing follow of our doctrine. We recken among the naturall powers of man, to allow and refuſe, to will and not to will, to endeuour and to reſiſt, that is, to allow vanitie, and to refuſe perfect goodneſſe, to will euill, and to be vnwilling to good, to endeuour our ſelues to wickedneſſe, and to reſiſt righteouſneſſe. What doth the Lord herein? If it be his will to vſe that peruerſeneſſe as an inſtrument of his wrath, he directeth and appointeth it to what end he will, that he by an euill hand may execute his good worke. Shal we then compare a wicked man that ſo ſerueth the power of God, when he laboureth onely to obey his owne luſt, to a ſtone that being throwen by the violence of another, is caried neither with mouing nor ſenſe nor will

of his owne? We ſee how much difference there is. But what doth he in good things, of which is our principall queſtion? when he erecteth his kingdome in them, he by his ſpirit reſtraineth mans will, that it be not caried vp and downe with wandering luſts, according to the inclination of nature: and that it may be bent to holineſſe and righteouſneſſe, he boweth, frameth, faſhioneth and directeth it to the rule of his righteouſneſſe: and that it ſhould not ſtumble or fall, he doth ſtabliſh and confirme it with the ſtrength of his ſpirit. For which reaſon Auguſtine ſaith: Thou wilt ſay vnto me: then are we wrought and worke not. Yea, thou both workeſt and art wrought, and thou workeſt well when thou art wrought of that which is good. The ſpirit of God that worketh thee, helpeth them that worke, and giueth himſelfe the name of a helper, for that thou alſo workeſt ſomewhat. In the firſt part he teacheth, that mans working is not taken away by the moouing of the holy Ghoſt, becauſe will is of nature, which is ruled to aſpire to goodnes. But where he by and by addeth, that by the name of helpe, may be gathered that we alſo doe worke ſomewhat, we ought not ſo to take it, as if he did giue any thing ſeuerally to vs: but becauſe he would not cheriſh ſlothfulneſſe in vs, he ſo matcheth the working of God with ours, that to will may be of nature, and to will well of grace. Therefore he ſaid a little before, Vnleſſe God helpe vs, we ſhall not be able to ouercome, no nor yet to fight at all.

15 Hereby appeareth, that the grace of God (as the word is taken when we ſpeake of regeneration) is the rule of the ſpirit, to direct and gouerne the will of man. And it cannot gouerne it, vnleſſe it correct it, reforme it, and renew it (from whence we ſay that the beginning of regeneration is, that that which is ours might be deſtroyed) and vnleſſe it moouе it, ſtirre it, driue it forward, carie it, and hold it. Whereupon we doe truely ſay, that all the doings that proceede from it, are wholy the onely worke of the ſame grace. In the meane time we deny not that it is very true that Auguſtine teacheth, that will is not deſtroyed by grace, but rather repaired. For both theſe things doe ſtand very well together: that mens will be ſaid to be reſtored, when the faultineſſe and peruerſeneſſe thereof being reformed, it is directed to the true rule of iuſtice: and alſo that a new will be ſaid to be created in man, foraſmuch as it is ſo defiled and corrupted, that it needeth vtterly to put on a new nature. Now is there no cauſe to the contrary, but that we may well be ſaid to doe the ſame thing that the ſpirit of God doth in vs, although our owne will doe of it ſelfe giue vs toward it nothing at all that may be ſeuered from his grace. And therfore we muſt keepe that in mind which we haue elſewhere alleaged out of Auguſtine, that ſome doe in vaine trauell to finde in the will of man ſome good thing that is properly her owne. For whatſoeuer mixture men ſtudy to bring from the ſtrength of free will to the grace of God, it is nothing but a corrupting of it, as if a man would delay wine with dirtie and bitter water. But although whatſoeuer good is in the will of man it proceedeth from the meere inſtinct of the holy Ghoſt, yet becauſe it is naturally planted in vs to will, it is not without cauſe ſaid, that we doe thoſe things whereof God chalengeth the praiſe to himſelfe. Firſt, becauſe it is ours whatſoeuer by his goodnes he worketh in vs, ſo that we vnderſtand it to be not of our ſelues: and then becauſe the minde is ours, the will is ours, the endeuor is ours, which are by him directed to good.

Theſe things whilſt the grace of the Spirit worketh in vs, we our ſelues are ſaid to doe, becauſe the faculties whereby we worke and the very act of working are ours, although the moouing and the framing them to good be wholy and meerely his.

16 Thoſe other teſtimonies beſide theſe, that they ſcrape together here and there, ſhall not much trouble euen meane wits that haue well conceiued onely the ſolutions aboue ſaid. They alleage that ſaying out of Geneſis, Thine appetite ſhal be vnder thee, and thou ſhalt beare rule ouer it. Which they expound of ſinne, as if the Lord did promiſe to Cain, that the force of ſinne ſhould not get the vpper hand in his minde, if he would labour in ſubduing of it. But we ſay that it better agreeth with the order of the text, that this be taken to be ſpoken of Abel. For there Gods purpoſe was to reproouе the wickednes of the enuie that Cain had conceiued againſt his brother. And that he doth two waies: One, that in vaine he imagined miſchiefe to excell his brother in Gods ſight, before whom no honour is giuen but vnto righteouſnes: the other, that he was too much vnthankful for the benefit of God which he had alredy receiued, which could not abide his brother, although he had him ſubiect vnder his authority. But leſt we ſhould ſeeme therefore to imbrace this expoſition becauſe the other is againſt vs: let vs admit that God ſpake of ſinne. If it be ſo, then God either promiſeth or commaundeth that which he there declareth. If he commaund, then haue we already ſhewed, that thereby followeth no proofe of the power man. If he promiſe, where is the fulfilling of the promiſe? for Cain became ſubiect to ſinne, ouer which he ſhould haue had dominion. They will ſay, that in the promiſe was included a ſecret condition, as if it had beene ſaid, that he ſhould haue the victory if he would ſtriue for it. But who will receiue theſe crooked compaſſes? For if this dominion be meant of ſinne, then no man can doubt that it is ſpoken by way of commandement, where in is not determined what we are able to doe, but what we oughe to doe, yea though it be aboue our power. Albeit both the matter it ſelfe and the order of Grammar doe require, that there be a compariſon made of Cain and Abel, becauſe the elder brother ſhould not haue bene ſet behind the yoonger, vnleſſe he had become woorſe by his owne wicked doing.

S. Pauls words ſpeaking in one place of mans will and Gods mercy, in another of their labour with God whoſe ſeruice God vſeth, foully abuſed by vpholders of free-will.

17 They vſe alſo the teſtimonie of the Apoſtle, which ſaith, that it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy. Whereby they gather that there is ſomewhat by mans will and endeuour, which of it ſelfe though it be weake, being holpen by the mercy of God, is not without proſperous ſucceſſe. But if they did ſoberly wey what matter Paul there entreateth of, they would not ſo vnaduiſedly abuſe this ſentence. I know that they may bring foorth Origen and Hierome for maintainers of their expoſition: and I could on the other ſide ſet Auguſtine againſt them. But what they haue thought it maketh no matter to vs, if we know what Paul meant. There he teacheth that ſaluation is prepared onely for them, to whom the Lord vouchſafeth his mercy: and that ruine and deſtruction is prepared for all thoſe that he hath not choſen. He had vnder the example of Pharao declared the ſtate of the reprobate, and had alſo confirmed the aſſuredneſſe of free election by the teſtimonie of Moſes, I will haue mercie vpon whom I will haue mercie. Now he concludeth that it is not of him that willeth, or of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercie. If it be thus vnderſtood, that will or endeuour are not ſufficient, becauſe they are too weake for ſo great a weight, that which Paul ſaith, had not beene aptly ſpoken: Therefore away with theſe ſubtleties, to ſay: It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, therefore there is ſome will, there is ſome running. For Pauls meaning is more ſimply, thus: It is not will, it is not running that gets vs the way to ſaluation, herein is onely the mercy of God. For he ſpeaketh no otherwiſe in this place than he doth to Titus, where he writeth, that the goodneſſe and kindnes of God appeareth not by the works of righteouſneſſe which we haue done, but for his infinite mercie. They themſelues that make this argument, that Paul meant that there is ſome will and ſome running, becauſe he ſaid, that it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, would not giue me leaue to reaſon after the ſame faſhion, that we haue done ſome good works, becauſe Paul ſaith, that we haue not attained the goodneſſe of God by the good works that we haue done. If they ſee a fault in this argument, let them open their eies, and they ſhall perceiue that their owne is not without the like deceit. For that is a ſure reaſon that Auguſtine reſteth vpon, if it were therefore ſaid that it is not of him that willeth nor of him that runneth, becauſe neither the will nor the running is ſufficient. Then it may be turned on the contrarie part that it is not of the mercie of God, becauſe it alone worketh not. Sith this ſecond is an abſurditie, Auguſtine doth rightfully conclude, that this is ſpoken to this meaning, that there is no good will of man, vnleſſe it be prepared of the Lord, not but that we ought both to wil and to run, but becauſe God worketh both in vs. No leſſe vnaptly do ſome wreſt that ſaying of Paul: We are the workers with God, which out of doubt ought to be reſtrained onely to the miniſters: and that they are called workers with him, not that they bring any thing of themſelues, but becauſe God vſeth their ſeruice, after that he hath made them meete and furniſhed with neceſſarie gifts.

1. Cor. 3. 9.

A ſentence of Eccleſiaſticus wreſted alſo to like purpoſe.

18 They bring foorth Eccleſiaſticus, who, as it is not vnknowen, is a writer of whoſe authoritie is doubted. But although we refuſe it not (which yet we may lawfully doe) what doth he teſtifie for freewill? He ſaith, that man ſo ſoone as he was created, was left in the hand of his owne counſell: that comaundements were giuen him, which if he obſerued, he ſhould againe be preſerued by them: that before man was ſet life & death, death, good and euill: that whatsoeuer he would, should be giuen him. Be it, that man receiued from his creation power to obtaine either life or death. What if on the other side we answere that he lost it? Truely my minde is not, to speake against Salomon, which affirmeth that man at the beginning was create vpright, and he forged vnto himselfe many inuentions. Eccle.7.30. But because man in sweruing, lost as it were by shipwrack both himselfe and all his good things, it followeth not by and by, that all that is giuen to his first creation belongeth to his nature being corrupted and degenerate. Therefore I answere, not to them onely, but also to Ecclesiasticus himselfe whatsoeuer he be. If thou meane to instruct man, to seeke within himselfe power to attaine saluation, thy authoritie is not of so great force with vs, that it may be any preiudice, be it neuer so small, against the vndoubted word of God. But if thou onely studie to restraine the malice of the flesh, which in laying the blame of her owne euils vpon God, vseth to seeke a vaine defence for it selfe, and therefore thou answerest that vprightnesse was giuen vnto men, whereby it may appeare that himselfe was cause of his owne destruction, I willingly agree vnto it: so that againe thou agree in this with me, that now by his owne fault he is spoyled of those ornaments, wherewith God had clothed him at the beginning: and that we confesse together, that now he more needeth a Phisitian than a defender.

19 Yet they haue nothing ofmer in their mouth than the parable of Christ of the wayfaring man, whom theeues laid abroad halfe dead in the way. I know that it is common almost with all writers, that the calamitie of mankinde is represented vnder the figure of that wayfaring man. Therevpon doe our aduersaries gather an argument, that man is not so maymed with the robbery of sinne and the Deuill, but that he keepeth still remayning the leauings of his former good things, forasmuch as it is said, that he was left halfe aliue. For where is that halfe life, vnlesse some portion both of right reason and will remayned? First if I would not giue place to their Allegorie, I beseech you, what would they doe? For there is no doubt that it was deuised by the Fathers beside the naturall sense of the Lords words. Allegories ought to goe no further than they haue the rule of Scripture going before them: so farre is it off, that they be by themselues sufficient to ground any doctrines. And there want not reasons, whereby I can, if I list, ouerthrow this deuise, for the word of God leaueth not to man halfe a life, but teacheth that he is vtterly dead, forasmuch as concerneth blessed life. And Paul when he speaketh of our redemption, doth not say that we were healed, when we were halfe dead and halfe aliue, but that we were raised vp againe when we were dead. He calleth not vpon them that are halfe aliue to receiue the light of Christ, but them that sleepe and are buried. And in like maner speaketh the Lord himselfe, when he saith, that the houre is come when the dead shall rise againe at his voice. With what face would they set this light allusion against so many plaine sentences? But let this Allegorie haue the force of a certaine testimonie, yet what shall they wring out of vs thereby? Man is halfe aliue, therefore he hath somewhat left safe. I graunt: he hath a wit capable of vnderstanding, although it pearce not to the heauenly and spirituall wisedome: he hath true iudgement of honestie: he hath some feeling of the Godhead, howbeit that he attaine not the true knowledge of God. But to what purpose come all these things? Truely they bring not to passe that the same saying of Augustine be taken from vs, which is also approoued by common consent of the Schooles: that after mans fall the freely giuen good things, wherevpon saluation hangeth, are taken away from him, and that his naturall gifts are corrupted and defiled. Let therefore this trueth remaine with vs vndoubted, which can be shaken by no engines, that the minde of man is so estranged from the righteousnesse of God, that it conceiueth, coueteth, and enterpriseth all wickednesse, filthinesse, vncleannesse, and mischiefe: that his heart is so throughly soked in poyson of sinne, that it can breath out nothing but corrupt stinke: But if at any time they doe vtter any goodnesse in shew, yet still the minde remaineth alway wrapped in hypocrisie and deceitfull crookednesse, and the heart entangled with inward peruersnesse.

The will of man through the wound of originall sinne was not left halfe dead and halfe aliue, as some would gather by the parable of the waifaring man, whom theeues left lying in the high way. Luc.10.30.

THE

THE SIXTH CHAPTER.

That man being loſt, muſt ſeeke for redemption in Chriſt.

Except we know the fatherly goodneſſe of God ſhining in the face of Ieſus Chriſt, which knowledge is attained vnto by the Goſpell, other knowing of God ſo farre forth as he may be knowen by his creatures, neither hath beene to any ones ſaluation ſince the fall of Adam, neither can be to ours ſufficiently auailable.

SIth all mankinde hath periſhed in the perſon of Adam, that excellencie and nobilitie of beginning which we haue ſpoken of, would ſo little profit vs, that it would rather turne to our greater ſhame, till God appeare the redeemer in the perſon of his onely begotten Sonne, which acknowledgeth not men defiled and corrupted with ſinne to be his worke. Therefore ſith we are fallen from life into death, all that knowledge of God the Creator whereof we haue entreated, were vnprofitable, vnleſſe there followed alſo faith ſetting foorth God a Father vnto vs in Chriſt. Truely this was the naturall order that the frame of the world ſhould be a Schoole vnto vs to learne godlineſſe, from whence might be made a paſſage for vs to eternall life and perfect felicitie: but ſince our falling away, whither ſoeuer we turne our eies, vpward and downeward, the curſe of God ſtill preſenteth it ſelfe vnto our ſight, which while it poſſeſſeth and enwrappeth innocent creatures by our fault, muſt needes ouerwhelme our owne ſoules with deſperation. For although Gods will is that his fatherly fauour toward vs doe ſtill many waies appeare: yet by beholding of the world we can not gather that he is our Father when our conſcience inwardly pricketh vs, and ſheweth that there is in ſinne juſt cauſe of forſaking, why God ſhould not account and recken vs for his children. Beſide that there is in vs both ſlothfulneſſe and vnthankefulneſſe: becauſe both our mindes, as they be blinded, doe not ſee the truth, and alſo as all our ſenſes be peruerſe, we maliciouſly defraude God of his glory. Therefore we muſt come to that ſaying of Paul: becauſe in the wiſedome of God, the world knew not God by wiſedome, it pleaſed God by the fooliſhneſſe of preaching to ſaue them that beleeue. The wiſedome of God he calleth this honourable ſtage of heauen and earth, furniſhed with innumerable miracles, by beholding whereof we ought wiſely to haue knowne God: But becauſe we ſo ill profited therein, he calleth vs backe to the faith of Chriſt, which for that it ſeemeth fooliſh, the vnbeleeuers doe diſdaine. Wherefore although the preaching of the Croſſe doe not agree with mans wit, yet ought we humbly to embrace it, if we deſire to returne to God our Creator and maker, that he may begin againe to be our Father. Truely ſince the fall of the firſt man, no knowledge of God auailed to ſaluation, without the Mediator. For Chriſt ſpeaketh not of his owne age onely, but comprehendeth all ages, when he ſaith that this is the eternall life, to know the Father the one true God, and him whom he hath ſent Ieſus Chriſt. And ſo much the fowler is their ſluggiſhneſſe, which take vpon them to ſet open heauen to all prophane and vnbeleeuing men, without his grace, whom the Scripture each where teacheth to be the onely gate whereby we enter into ſaluation. But if any will reſtraine that ſaying of Chriſt onely to the publiſhing of the Goſpell, we haue in readineſſe wherewith to confute him. For this hath beene a common ſentence in all ages and among all nations, that without reconciliation they that are eſtranged from God, and pronounced accurſed, and the children of wrath, cannot pleaſe God. And here may be alſo alleaged that which Chriſt anſwered to the woman of Samaria: Yee worſhip what yee know not, but we worſhip that which we know: becauſe the ſaluation is from the Iewes. In which wordes he both condemneth of falſhood all the religions of the Gentiles, and alſo aſſigneth a reaſon why, for that the Redeemer was promiſed vnder the Law to the onely choſen people. Whereupon it followeth, that no worſhip euer pleaſed God, but that which had reſpect vnto Chriſt. For which cauſe alſo Paul affirmeth that all the nations of the Gentiles were without God, and voide of the hope of life. Now where as Iohn teacheth that life was from the beginning in Chriſt, and that all the world fell from it, we muſt returne to the ſame fountaine Chriſt. And therefore Chriſt, inſomuch as he is the reconciler, affirmeth himſelfe to be the life. And truely the entrance of heauen belongeth to none, but to the children of God. But it is not meete that they be accounted in the place and degree of children, that are not grafted into the body of the onely begotten Sonne. And Iohn plainly teſtifieth, that they which beleeue in his name, name, are made the children of God. But becauſe it is not directly my purpoſe yet to diſcourſe of Faith in Chriſt, therefore it ſhall for this time be ſufficient to haue touched it by the way.

That the fathers vnder the law neuer promiſed any happineſſe to the Church otherwiſe then by Chriſt.

2 And therefore God neuer ſhewed himſelfe mercifull to the olde people, nor euer did put them in any hope of grace without the Mediatour. I omit to ſpeake of the ſacrifices of the Law, wherein the faithfull were openly and plainely taught, that ſaluation is no where elſe to be ſought, but in the clenſing which was performed by Chriſt alone. Onely this I ſay, that the bleſſed and happy ſtate of the Church hath beene alway grounded vpon the perſon of Chriſt. For though God comprehended all the iſſue of Abraham in his couenant, yet doth Paul wiſely reaſon, that Chriſt is properly that ſeede in whom all nations were to be bleſſed, foraſmuch as we know that not all they were reckened his ſeede that were begotten of him according to the fleſh. For (to ſpeake nothing of Iſmael and other) how came it to paſſe, that of the two ſonnes of Iſaac, that is Eſau and Iacob, brethren borne at one birth, while they were yet togither in their mothers wombe, the one was choſen the other refuſed? Yea, how came it to paſſe that the elder was reiected and the yoonger onely tooke place? And how alſo came it to paſſe, that the greater part ſhould be forſaken? It appeareth therefore, that the ſeede of Abraham was principally reckened in one perſon, and that the promiſed ſaluation did neuer ſtand ſure till it came to Chriſt, whoſe office is to gather together the things that were ſcattered abroad. Therefore the firſt adoption of the choſen people did hang vpon the grace of the Mediator. Which though it be not in ſo plaine words expreſſed by Moſes, yet it ſufficiently appeareth that it was commonly knowen to all the godly. For before that there was any King create among the people, Hanna the mother of Samuel entreating of the felicitie of the godly, euen then ſaid thus in her ſong: God ſhall giue ſtrength to his King, and ſhall exalt the horne of his annointed. In which words ſhe meaneth that God ſhall bleſſe his Church. Wherewith alſo agreeth the oracle that is within a little after adioyned: The Prieſt whom I ſhall appoint ſhall walke before mine annointed. Neither is it to be doubted, but that the will of the heauenly Father was to haue the liuely image of Chriſt to be ſeene in Dauid and his poſteritie. Therefore meaning to exhort the godly to the feare of God, he biddeth them to kiſſe the Sonne. Wherewith this ſaying of the Goſpell alſo agreeth: He that honoureth not the ſonne, honoureth not the Father. Therefore although by falling away of ten tribes the kingdome decaied: yet it behooued the couenant to ſtand which God had made in Dauid and his ſucceſſors: as alſo he ſaid by the Prophets: I will not altogither cut off the kingdome, for Dauid my ſeruants ſake, and for Hieruſalems ſake, whom I haue choſen: but there ſhall remaine one tribe to thy ſonne. Where the ſame thing is repeated the ſecond & third time. It is alſo expreſſely added: I will afflict the ſeede of Dauid, but not for euer. Within a little ſpace of time after, it is ſaid: For Dauid his ſeruants ſake God hath giuen a light in Hieruſalem, to raiſe vp a Sonne, and to keepe Hieruſalem in ſafetie. Now when the ſtate grew toward deſtruction, it was ſaid againe: God would not ſcatter Iuda for Dauid his ſeruants ſake, becauſe he had ſpoken that he would giue a light to him and his ſonnes for euer. Finally, this is the ſumme, that all other being paſſed ouer, onely Dauid was choſen, vpon whom the good pleaſure of God ſhould reſt. As in another place it is ſaid: He hath refuſed the tabernacle of Silo, and the tabernacle of Ioſeph, and he hath not choſen the tribe of Ephraim, but he hath choſen the tribe of Iuda, the mount Sion which he hath loued. He hath choſen his ſeruant Dauid to feede Iacob his people, and Iſrael his inheritance. To conclude, it pleaſed God ſo to ſaue his Church, that the ſafetie and preſeruation thereof ſhould hang vpon that one head, and therefore Dauid crieth out, The Lord, the ſtrength of his people, the ſtrength of the ſaluations of his Chriſt. And by and by he addeth a praier: Saue thy people and bleſſe thine inheritance: meaning that the ſtate of the Church is with vnſeperable knot ioyned to the gouernment of Chriſt. And in the ſame meaning in another place: Lord ſaue vs: Let the King heare vs in the day that we ſhall call vpon him. In which words he plainly teacheth, that the faithfull did vpon none other confidence flie to the helpe of God, but becauſe they were hidden vnder the ſuccour of the King.

Psal.118.25. 26. Which is gathered by another Psalme. Lord saue vs: Blessed is he that commeth in the name of the Lord. Where it is plaine enough, that the faithfull are called backe vnto Christ, that they may hope that they shall be saued by the hand of God. The same respect hath the other praier, where all the Church calleth vpon the mercie of God.

Psal.80.18. Let thy hand be vpon the man of thy right hand, vpon the sonne of man, whom thou hast preserued (or appointed) to thy selfe. For though the author of the Psalme bewaileth the scattering abroad of the whole people, yet he praieth for their restitution in the head alone. Where, when the people was led away into exile, the land wasted, and all

Lam.4.20. things to mans seeming destroyed, Ieremie lamenteth the ouerthrow of the Church, he doth principally complaine that by destruction of the kingdome all hope was cut off from the faithfull. Christ (saith he) the Spirit of our mouth is taken in our sinnes, to whom we said: In thy shadow we shall liue among the nations. Hereby now it sufficiently appeareth that because God cannot be mercifull to mankinde without the Mediatour, therefore Christ was alway set before the holy fathers in time of the law, to whom they might direct their faith.

The auncient Prophets neuer spake of the Churches deliuerance out of misery, but they taught withall, that through Christ they were deliuered.

3 Now, where comfort is promised in affliction, specially where the deliuerance of the Church is described, there the banner of affiance and hope is auaunced in Christ alone. God went out to the sauing of his people with his Messiah, saieth Habacuc. And so oft as the Prophets make mention of the restoring of the Church, they call backe the people to the promise made to Dauid, concerning the euerlasting continuance of the kingdome. And no maruell. For otherwise there had beene no assurance of the couenant. For which purpose serueth that notable answer of Esay. For when he saw that the vnbeleeuing king Achaz refused that which he had declared to him of the raising of the siege of Hierusalem and of present safetie, as it were sodainely, he passed ouer to Messias. Behold a Virgine shall conceiue and bring foorth a sonne, meaning indirectly that though the king and his people by their frowardnesse refused the promise offered vnto them, as though they did of purpose bend themselues to discredite the truth of God, yet the couenant should not be voide, but that the redeemer should come at his appointed time. Finally, it was the care of all the Prophets, to the end they might shew that God would be mercifull, alway to set out that kingdome of Dauid, whereupon hanged the redemption and euerlasting saluation. So Habak.3.13. Esay 7.14.

Esay 55.3. Esay saith: I will make a couenant with you the faithfull mercies of Dauid. Behold I haue giuen him for a witnesse vnto nations, that is, because the faithfull when their state is at the worst, could not otherwise haue any hope, but by the meanes of him being witnesse, that God would be appeaseable toward thē. Likewise Hieremie, to raise them vp Hier.23.6. being in dispaire, saith: Behold the daies come, wherein I will raise vp vnto Dauid a righteous branch, and then shall Iuda be saued, & Israel shall dwell in safetie. And Ezechiel saith, I will raise vp one sheephearde ouer my sheepe, euen Dauid my seruant. I the Eze 34.23. Lord will be a God to them, and my seruant Dauid for a sheepeheard. And I will make a couenant of peace with them. Also in another place, after he had entreated of the in-

Eze 37.25. credible renewing, he saith: my seruant Dauid shall be their king, and there shall be one sheepeheard ouer all, and I will make an euerlasting couenant of peace with them. I gather here and there a few places out of many, because I onely meane to haue the readers put in minde, that the hope of all the godly hath alway beene reposed no where else but in Christ. And all the other Prophets also speake agreeable hereunto, as it is said in

Ose.1.12. Osee. The children of Iuda and the children of Israell shall be gathered together, and shall appoint to themselues one head. Which he afterward more plainely expoundeth, Ose.3.5. The children of Israel shall returne, and shall seeke for the Lord their God, and Dauid their King. And Michee speaking of the returne of the people expressely saith, Miche.2.13. Amos.9.11. The King shall goe before them, and the Lord in their head. So Amos meaning to praise the renewing of the people saith: I will in that day raise vp the tabernacle of Dauid that is fallen downe, and I wil hedge vp the gaps, and raise vp the places ouerthrowen, euen because that was the onely standard of saluation, to haue the royall glory to rise vp againe on high in the stocke of Dauid, which is fulfilled in Christ. Therefore

Zach.9.9. Zacharie, as his age was neerer to the appearing of Christ, so doth he more plainely crie out: be glad thou daughter of Sion, reioyce thou daughter of Hierusalem. Behold thy thy King commeth, righteous and ſaued. Which agreeth with the place of the Pſalme before alleaged: The Lord the ſtrength of the ſaluations of his annointed, Lord ſaue vs. Where ſaluation is deriued from the head to the whole body. Pſal.28.8.

4 It was Gods will to haue the Iewes inſtructed with theſe prophecies, that to ſeeke for their deliuerance, they ſhould bend their eies directly to Chriſt. And though they had ſhamefully ſwarued, yet could not the remembrance of the generall principle be aboliſhed, that God by the hand of Chriſt, as he had promiſed to Dauid, would be the deliuerer of the Church, and ſo the couenant ſhould be of his owne free graunt, whereby God had adopted his choſen. Hereby it came to paſſe, that this ſong ſounded in the mouth of the children when Chriſt a little before his death entred into Hieruſalem, Hoſanna to the Sonne of Dauid. For it appeareth that it was commonly knowen and ſpoken of, and according to common vſe that they ſung that the onely pledge of Gods mercie remained vnto them, in the comming of the Redeemer. For this cauſe Chriſt himſelfe, to make his Diſciples plainly and perfectly beleeue in God, biddeth them to beleeue on himſelfe, Beleeue yee in God (ſaith he) then beleeue alſo in me. For though (to ſpeake properly) Faith climeth vp from Chriſt to the father, yet he meaneth that the ſame Faith, albeit it reſt vpon God, doth by little and little vaniſh away vnleſſe he become a meane to holde it in aſſured ſtedfaſtneſſe. Otherwiſe the Maieſtie of God is too high for mortall men, which creepe vpon the ground like wormes, to attaine vnto it. Wherefore I allow that common ſaying, that God is the obiect of Faith, but in ſuch ſort that it needeth correction. Becauſe Chriſt is not in vaine called the inuiſible Image of God, but by this title we are put in minde, that if we finde not God in Chriſt, ſaluation cannot be knowen vnto vs. For although among the Iewes, the Scribes and Phariſies had darkened with falſe inuentions, that which the Prophets had ſpoken concerning the Redeemer: yet Chriſt tooke it for a thing confeſſed as receiued by common conſent, that there was none other remedie in a diſpaired caſe, and none other meane of deliuering the Church, but by giuing the Mediator. In deede that was not commonly knowen among the people as it ought to haue beene, which Paul teacheth, that Chriſt is the ende of the Law. But how true and aſſured it is, doth plainely appeare by the Law and the Prophets. I ſpeake not yet of Faith, becauſe there ſhall be elſewhere a more conuenient place for it. Onely let the Readers hold this as faſt ſtabliſhed, that the firſt degree of godlineſſe be, to acknowledge God to be a Father, vnto vs, to defend, gouerne, and cheriſh vs, till he gather vs together into the euerlaſting inheritance of his kingdome: and that hereby it plainly appeareth which we ſaid euen now, that the knowledge of God which bringeth ſaluation, ſtandeth not without Chriſt, and that therefore from the beginning he hath beene ſet foorth vnto all the elect, that they ſhould looke vpon him, and that in him ſhould reſt all their affiance. According to this meaning writeth Ireneus, that the Father which is vnmeaſurable, is in his Sonne meaſured, becauſe he hath applied himſelfe to the meaſure of our capacitie, leaſt he ſhould drowne our minds with the vnmeaſurableneſſe of his glory. Which thing the phrentike men not conſidering, do wreſt a profitable ſentence to a wicked fantaſie, as though there were in Chriſt but a portion of the godhead deriued from the whole perfection: whereas it meaneth nothing elſe, but that God is comprehended in Chriſt alone. That ſaying of Iohn hath alwaies beene true. He that hath not the Sonne, neither hath he the Father. For though in old time many did boaſt that they worſhipped the ſoueraigne God, the maker of heauen and earth: yet becauſe they had no Mediator, it was impoſſible that they ſhould truely taſte of the mercie of God, and ſo be perſwaded that he was their Father. Therefore becauſe they knew not the head that is Chriſt, the knowledge of God was but vaine among them, whereby alſo it came to paſſe, that at length falling into groſſe and filthie ſuperſtitions, they bewraied their owne ignorance. As at this day the Turks although they report with full mouth, that the Creator of heauen and earth is their God, yet doe they thruſt an idoll in place of the true God while they ſwarue from Chriſt.

It was a common principle generally retained among ſt the Iewes, though not ſo perfectly vnderſtood as behoued, that their deliuerer ſhould be Chriſt, without whoſe knowledge all other nations vainely worſhipped God. Mat.21.9. Iohn.14.1. Col.1.15. Rom.10.4. 1.Iohn.2.23.

THE

THE SEVENTH CHAPTER.

That the Law was giuen, not to hold ſtill the people in it, but to nouriſh the hope of ſaluation in Chriſt, vntill his comming.

The law was giuen by Moſes to nouriſh men in hope of ſaluation by Chriſt, as appeareth by the often mention which he maketh of the couenant, and by the whole forme of ceremonies and ſeruice therein preſcribed, which without ſpirituall relation vnto this were vaine and idle.

BY this continuall proceſſe that we haue rehearſed, may be gathered, that the law was added about fower hundred yeeres after the death of Abraham, not for this intent to leade away the choſen people from Chriſt: but rather to keepe their mindes in expectation vntill his comming, to kindle a deſire of him, and to confirme them in looking for him, that they ſhould not waxe faint with long tariance. I meane by this word Law, not onely the ten commaundements, which preſcribe a rule how to liue godlily and righteouſly; but alſo the forme of religion deliuered by the hand of Moſes. For Moſes was not made a lawgiuer to aboliſh the bleſſing promiſed to the kindred of Abraham: but rather we ſee how euery where he putteth the Iewes in remembrance of the free couenant made with their Fathers whoſe heires they were, as if he had beene ſent to renew the ſame. That was moſt plainly ſet foorth by the ceremonies. For what were more vaine and fond, than for men to offer vp loathſome ſtinke of the fat of cattell, to reconcile themſelues to God thereby: to flee to the ſprinkling of water or bloud to waſh away their filthineſſe? Finally, all the ſeruice of God appointed in the law (if it be conſidered by it ſelfe, and doe not containe ſhadowes and figures, which the trueth ſhould anſwere vnto) ſhall be but a very mockerie. Wherefore not without a cauſe both in Stephens ſermon, and in the Epiſtle to the Hebrues, is that place ſo diligently weyed. Where God commaundeth Moſes to make all things pertaining to the tabernacle, according to the paterne that had beene ſhewed him in the mount. For if there had not beene ſome ſpirituall thing appointed that they ſhould tend vnto, the Iewes ſhould no leſſe haue fondly ſpent their labour in them, than the Gentiles did in their trifles. Prophane men that neuer earneſtly applied the ſtudie of godlineſſe, can not without loathſome tediouſneſſe abide to heare ſo many ſundry faſhions of vſages: and they not onely marueil why God wearied his people with ſuch a heape of ceremonies, but alſo they deſpiſe and ſcorne them as childrens plaies. And the cauſe is, for that they conſider not the end, from which if the figures of the law be ſeuered, they muſt needes be condemned of vanitie. But that ſame figure ſheweth, that God did not therefore commaund ſacrifices becauſe he would occupie them that worſhipped him with earthly exerciſes, but rather to raiſe vp their mindes higher. Which may alſo plainly appeare by his nature: for as he is ſpirituall, ſo he is delighted with no other worſhipping but ſpirituall. This doe the ſayings of the Prophets teſtifie, wherein they rebuke the Iewes of ſluggiſhneſſe, for that they thought that any ſacrifices were of any value with God. Is that becauſe their purpoſe is to derogate any thing from the law? No, but according as they were true expoſitors of the law, ſo they would by this meane haue mens eies directed to the marke from which the common people ſtraied. Now by the grace offered to the Iewes it is certainly gathered, that the law was not voide of Chriſt. For Moſes did ſet foorth vnto them this end of the adoption, that they ſhould become a prieſtly kingdome to God. Which they could not obtaine vnleſſe there were had for the meane thereof a great and more excellent reconciliation than by the bloud of beaſts. For what is leſſe likely than Adams children, which by inheritably deſcending infection are all borne the bondſlaues of ſinne, to be aduanced to royall dignitie, and ſo to become partakers of the glory of God, vnleſſe that ſo excellent a benefit ſhould come vnto them from elſewhere than from themſelues? Alſo how could the right of Prieſthood remaine in force among them, who by filthineſſe of ſinnes were abhominable to God, vnleſſe they had bene conſecrate in a holy head? Wherefore Peter doth very aptly turne that ſaying of Moſes, where he teacheth, that the fulneſſe of grace, the taſte whereof the Iewes had taken vnder the law, was giuen in Chriſt: Yee are (ſaith he) a choſen kindred, a kingly Prieſthood. For to this end tendeth that turning of the words, to ſhew that they, to whom Chriſt appeared by the Goſpell, haue obtained more than their Fathers, becauſe they are all endued both with Prieſtly and Kingly honour, that truſting vpon their Mediatour, tour they may freely be bold to come foorth into the ſight of God.

2 And here by the way it is to be noted, that the kingdome which at length was erected in the houſe of Dauid, is part of the law, and contained vnder the miniſterie of Moſes. Whereupon followeth, that aſwel in all the kindred of the Leuites as in the poſtetie of Dauid. Chriſt was ſet before the eies of the old people as in a double loking glaſſe. For, I ſaid euen now, they could not otherwiſe be before God either Kings or Prieſts, which were both the bondſlaues, of ſinne and death, and defiled by their owne corruption. Hereby appeareth that that ſaying of Paul, is moſt true, that the Iewes were holden as vnder the keeping of a ſchoolemaſter, till the ſeede came for whoſe ſake the promiſe was giuen. For, becauſ Chriſt was not yet familiarly knowen, they were like vnto children, whoſe weakeneſſe could not yet beare a full knowledge of heauenly things, but how they were by ceremonies, as it were led by the hand to Chriſt, is ſpoken before, & may be better vnderſtanded by many teſtimonies of the Prophets. For although it was commanded them to come dayly with new ſacrifices to appeaſe God: yet Eſay promiſeth that all their ſinnes ſhall be clenſed with one only ſacrifice. Wherewith Daniel agreeably ſaith: the Prieſts appointed of the tribe of Leui, did enter into the Sanctuarie: but of the onely Prieſt it was once ſaid, that by an oath he was choſen of God to be a prieſt for euer, according to the order of Melchiſedec. At that time the annointing with oyle was viſible: but Daniel by his viſion pronounceth that there ſhall be another maner of annointing. And becauſe I will not tarry vpon many examples, the Author of the Epiſtle to the Hebrues euen from the fourth Chapter to the eleuenth doth largely and plainly enough ſhew, that the ceremonies are nothing woorth & vaine till we come to Chriſt. As concerning the ten commandements: that leſſon of Paul is likewiſe to be kept in minde, that Chriſt is the end of the law vnto ſaluation, to euery one that beleeueth. And an other leſſon, that Chriſt is the Spirit that quickneth the letter which of it ſelfe ſlaieth. For in the firſt of theſe two, he meaneth that righteouſnes is vainly taught by commandements, vntill Chriſt doe giue it both by free imputation and by the Spirit of regeneration. Wherefore he worthily calleth Chriſt the fulfilling or end of the law. Becauſe it ſhould nothing profite vs to know what God requireth of vs, vnleſſe he did ſuccour vs fainting and oppreſſed vnder the yoke and vntollerable burden. In another place he teacheth that the law was made for tranſgreſſions, that is to bring men to humilitie, being proued guiltie of their owne damnation. And becauſe this is the true and onely preparation to ſeeke Chriſt, whatſoeuer he teacheth in diuerſe words doe all very well agree togither. But becauſe he then was in contention with peruerſe teachers, which fained that we doe deſerue righteouſneſſe by the workes of the law, to confute their errour, he was compelled ſometime to ſpeake preciſely of the bare law, which yet otherwiſe is clothed with the couenant of free adoption.

Gal. 3. 9.

3 But now it is good to know, how being taught by the morall law, we are made more inexcuſable, that our own guiltineſſe may mooue vs to craue pardon. If it be true that we be taught perfection of righteouſneſſe in the law: then this alſo followeth, that the abſolute keeping thereof is perfect righteouſneſſe before God, that is, whereby a man may be deemed & accounted righteous before the heauenly throne of iudgement. Wherefore Moſes whē he had publiſhed the law, doubted not to proteſt before heauen and earth, that he had ſet before Iſrael life and death, good and euill. And we may not denie, but that the reward of eternall ſaluation belongeth to the vpright obedience of the law, as the Lord hath promiſed it. Againe, yet it is good to examine, whether we performe that obedience, vpon deſert whereof we may conceiue a truſt of that reward. For to what ſmall purpoſe is it, to ſee the reward of eternall life ſet in keeping of the Law, vnleſſe we further know whether we may by that way attaine to eternall life? But herein the weakeneſſe of the law doth ſhew it ſelfe. For becauſe that keeping of the Law is found in none of vs all, we are excluded from the promiſes of life, and doe fall into curſe onely. I doe not now tell what doth come to paſſe, but what needes muſt come to paſſe. For whereas the doctrine of the law is farre aboue the power of man, he may indeede a farre off, looke at the promiſes, but yet not gather any fruit of them. Therefore this one thing remaineth, that by the goodnes of them he may the better wey his owne miſerie, while he conſidereth, that all hope

Although the law doe promiſe and would no doubt performe life vnto them that keepe the law, yet can we looke for no fruite at all by thoſe promiſes, but feele our owne miſerie therby the more increaſed becauſe of our weakenes which anſwereth not the righteouſnes preſcribed by the Law.

Deut. 30. 19.

of ſaluation being cut off, death doth certeinly hang ouer him. On the other ſide doe preſſe vs terrible penall lawes, which doe hold entangled and faſt bound, not onely a few of vs, but euery one without exception: they preſſe vs, I ſay, and doe purſue vs, with an vnappeaſable rigour, ſo that we may ſee moſt preſent death in the law.

The promiſes of the law being conditionall, are not of no effect vnto vs, though we be vnable to performe the condition, becauſe our not performing is through mercy pardoned, and our weake obedience accepted and rewarded, as if it were full performance.

4 Therefore if we looke onely vpon the law, we can doe nothing but be diſcouraged, be confounded, and deſpaire, foraſmuch as by it we are all damned and curſed, and kept far off from the bleſſedneſſe that he offreth to them that worſhip him. Wilt thou ſay then, Doth the Lord ſo mocke vs? For how ſmally doth it differ from mocking, to ſhew foorth a hope of felicitie, to allure and exhort men vnto it, to proteſt, that it is laid open for vs, when in the meane ſeaſon the entry vnto it is forecloſed and impoſſible to be come to? I anſwere: although the promiſes of the law, in ſo much as they are conditionall, doe hang vpon the perfect obedience of the law, which can no where be found, yet are they not giuen in vaine. For when we haue learned that they ſhall be voide and of no effect vnto vs, vnleſſe God embrace vs with his free goodneſſe without regard of our works, and vnleſſe we doe embrace by faith the ſame goodneſſe giuen vs by the Goſpell, then want they not their effectualneſſe, yea with their condition annexed. For then he doth ſo freely giue all things vnto vs, that he addeth this alſo to the heape of his bountifulneſſe, that not refuſing our halfe full obedience, and remitting ſo much as it wanteth of full performance, he ſo maketh vs to enioy the fruit of the promiſes of the law, as if we our ſelues had fulfilled the condition. But we will at this preſent proceede no further in this matter, becauſe it ſhall be more largely to be entreated of, when we ſhall ſpeake of the iuſtification of Faith.

The law is therefore ſaid to be impoſſible for men to performe becauſe no man euer hitherto hath beene, and the ſcripture teacheth that no man ſhall be ſo perfect.

5 Whereas we ſaid that it is impoſſible to keepe the law, that is in few words to be both expounded and prooued. For it is woont among the people commonly to be accounted an opinion of great abſurditie, ſo farre that Hierome doubted not to pronounce it accurſed: what Hierome thought, I doe nothing ſtay vpon: as for vs, let vs ſearch what is trueth. I will not here make long circumſtances of diuers ſorts of poſſibilities. I call that impoſſible, which both neuer hath beene, and alſo is hindered by the ordinance and decree of God, that it neuer hereafter may be. If we record from the fartheſt time of memorie, I ſay that there hath none of the holy men, that being clothed with the bodie of death, hath euer attained to that full perfection of loue, to loue God with all his heart, with all his minde, with all his ſoule, with all his power: Againe, that there hath beene none that hath not beene troubled with concupiſcence. Who can ſay nay? I ſee in deede what maner holy men fooliſh ſuperſtition doth imagine vnto vs, euen ſuch whoſe pureneſſe the heauenly Angels doe ſcarcely counteruaile: but againſt both the Scripture and proofe of experience. I ſay alſo, that there ſhall none hereafter be, that ſhall come to the marke of true perfection, vnleſſe he be looſed from the burden of his bodie. For this point there are open teſtimonies of Scripture. Salomon ſaid, there is not a righteous man vpon the earth that ſinneth not. 1 Reg. 8. 46. And Dauid ſaid: euery liuing man ſhall not bee iuſtified in thy ſight. Iob in many places affirmeth the ſame. But Paul moſt plainly of all: that the fleſh luſteth againſt the ſpirit, and the ſpirit againſt the fleſh. And by no other reaſon he proueth that all that are vnder the law are ſubiect to the curſe, but becauſe it is written, that curſed are all they that do not abide in all the commandements thereof: meaning, or rather taking it as a thing confeſſed, that no man can abide in them. And whatſoeuer is foreſpoken by the Scriptures, that muſt be holden for perpetuall, yea and neceſſarie. With ſuch ſubtletie did the Pelagians trouble Auguſtine, ſaying, that there is wrong done to God, to ſay that he doth commaund more than the faithfull are able by his grace to perfourme. Auguſtine, to auoide their cauillation confeſſed, that the Lord might in deede, if he would, aduance a mortall man to the pureneſſe of Angels: but that he neither hath done ſo at any time, nor will doe, becauſe he hath otherwiſe affirmed in the Scriptures. And that doe I alſo not denie. But I adde further, that it is inconuenient to diſpute of his power againſt his trueth, and that therefore this ſentence is not ſubiect to cauillations if a man ſhould ſay, that that thing is impoſſible to be, whereof the Scriptures doe pronounce that it ſhall not be. But if they diſpute of the word: when the Diſciples asked the Lord, who may be ſaued, he anſwered with men indeede deede it is impossible, but with God all things are possible. Also Augustine with a most strong reason stiffley defendeth, that in this fleth we neuer yeelde to God the due loue that we owe him. Loue (saith he) so followeth knowledge, that no man can perfectly loue God, but he that hath first fully knowen his goodnesse. We, while we wander in this world, see by a glasse and in a darke speech: it followeth therefore, that our loue is vnperfect. Let this therefore remaine out of controuersie, that in this fleth it is impossible to fulfill the law, if we behold the weakenesse of our owne nature, as it shall yet also in another place be prooued by Paul.

Mat.19 25. Lib.de spiritu & litera.

6 But that the whole matter may be more plainly set foorth: let vs in a compendious order gather vp together the office and vse of the law which they call Morall. Now, as far as I vnderstand, it is contained in these three parts. The first is, that while it sheweth to euery man the righteousnesse of God, that is, the righteousnesse which onely is acceptable to God, it admonish, certifie, prooue guiltie, yea and condemne euery man of his own vnrighteousnes. For so is it needfull that man blinded and drunk with loue of himselfe, be driuen both to the knowledge and the confession of his owne weakenesse, and vncleannesse: for as much as if his vanitie be not euidently conuinced, he swelleth with mad affiance of his owne strength, and can neuer be brought to thinke of the slendernesse thereof, so long as he measureth it by the proportion of his owne will. But so soone as he beginneth to compare his strength to the hardnesse of the law, there he findeth matter to abate his courage. For howsoeuer he before conceiued a great opinion of it, yet by and by he feeleth it to pant vnder so great a burden, and then to shake and falter, at last euen to fall downe and faint. So being taught by the schooling of the law, he putteth off that arrogancie wherewith before he was blinded. Likewise he is to be healed of another disease of pride, whereof we haue said that he is sicke. So long as he is suffered to stand to his owne iudgement, he deuiseth hypocrisie in steede of righteousnesse, wherewith being contented, he riseth vp in courage, by I wot not what forged righteousnesse, against the grace of God. But so soone as he is compelled to try his life by the balance of the law, then leauing the presumption of the counterfeit righteousnesse, he seeth himselfe to be an infinite space distant from holinesse: Againe, that he floweth full of iufinite vices, whereof before he seemed cleane. For the euils of lust are hidden in so deepe and crooked priuie corners, that they easily deceiue the sight of man. And not without cause the Apostle saith, that he knew not lust, except the law had said: Thou shalt not lust: because except it be by the law disclosed out of her lurking holes, it destroyeth miserable man so secretly, that he see'eth not the deadly dart thereof.

Rom 8.3. The first vse of the morall law to make men know their owne vnrighteousnes, that they be not besotted through selfe-liking, nor deceiued with a vaine shadow of holinesse in steed of that which is sound and perfect.

7 * So the law is like a certaine looking glasse wherein we behold, first our weaknesse, and by that our wickednesse, and last of all by them both our accursednesse, euen as a glasse representeth vnto vs the spots of our face. For when power faileth man to follow righteousnesse, then must he needs sticke fast in the mire of sinnes. And after sinne by and by followeth curse. And of how much the greater transgression the law holdeth vs guiltie and conuict, with so much the more grieuous iudgement it condemneth vs. For this purpose maketh the saying of the Apostle, that by the law is the knowledge of sinne. For there he speaketh onely of the first office of the law, the proofe whereof is in sinners not yet regenerate. And like to this are these two sayings, that the law entred that sinne might abound, and therefore that it is the ministration of death that worketh wrath and slaieth. For without doubt so much more groweth iniquitie with how much more vnderstanding of sin the conscience is striken, because vnto breach of law is added obstinacie against the maker of the law. It followeth therefore that the law armeth the wrath of God to the destruction of the sinner, because of it selfe it can do nothing but accuse, condemne & destroy. And as Augustine writeth, if the spirit of grace be absent, the law is present with vs, onely to this end, to accuse vs & kill vs. And yet when this is said, neither is the law dishonoured thereby, nor any thing taken from the excellencie thereof. Truly if our will were wholly framed and disposed to the obedience of the law, then plainly the onely knowledge of it were sufficient to saluation. But forasmuch as our fleshly and corrupt nature fighteth, as an enemie with the spirituall law of God, and is nothing amended with the discipline thereof,

Rom.7.7 * It is no dishonour to the law of God to say that it doth but represent vnto vs our inhabilitie to obey, our disobeying, and our cursed estate through disobedience: because in this we are taught both how our owne wickednes hindereth vs from enioying the blessednes of the law, and how the mercie of God aboundeth in giuing vs that blessednes from which our owne wickednes doth in it selfe exclude vs. Rom.3.22. Rom.5.20. 2.Cor.3. Rom.14.15. Decorre.& grat. vide Ambros. cap.1.de Iac. & vita beata. cap 6.

this followeth that the law which was giuen for ſaluation, (if it had found fit hearers) turneth to the occaſion of ſinne and death. For ſith we are all prooued tranſgreſſours of it, the more plainely that it openeth the righteouſneſſe of God, ſo much the more on the other ſide it diſcloſeth our iniquitie: the more ſurely that it confirmeth the reward of life and ſaluation laid vp for righteouſneſſe, ſo much the more aſſured it maketh the deſtruction of the wicked. So farre is it off therefore that theſe ſayings ſhould be to the diſhonour of the law, that they much auaile to the more glorious commendations of Gods bountie. For truely it heereby appeareth that we are hindred by our owne wickedneſſe, and peruerſneſſe, that we enioy not the bleſſedneſſe of life ſet openly abroad for vs by the law. Whereby the grace of God that helpeth vs without the ſuccour of the law, is made ſo much the ſweeter, and the mercie more louely that giueth it vnto vs, whereby we learne that he is neuer wearied with often doing vs good and heaping new gifts vpon vs.

The end why the law doth bring men to the ſight of their owne miſery, is not that they might deſpaire, but that forſaking all confidence in themſelues, they might reſt vpon the mercie of God in Ieſus Chriſt alone. Rom. 3. 19. Rom. 11. 32.

8 And whereas the iniquitie and condemnation of vs all is ſealed by the teſtimonie of the law, it is not done for this purpoſe (if at leaſt we well profit in it) to make vs fall downe with deſpaire, or with diſcouraged mindes to tumble downe headlong. Indeede the reprobate are amaſed after that maner, but that is by reaſon of their obſtinacie, but with the children of God there behoueth to be another end of inſtruction. I graunt the Apoſtle teſtifieth that we are all condemned by iudgement of the law, that euery mouth may be ſtopped, and that all the world may become bound vnto God: but yet the ſame Apoſtle in another place teacheth, that God hath concluded all vnder vnbeliefe, not to deſtroy all, or to ſuffer all to periſh, but that he might haue mercie of all, that leauing the fooliſh opinion of their owne ſtrength, they might vnderſtand, that they ſtand and are vpholden by the onely hand of God: that they being naked & emptie, may flee to his mercie, that they may reſt themſelues wholly vpon it, hide themſelues wholly in it, take hold of it alone in ſteede of righteouſneſſe and merits, which is laid open in Chriſt for all men whoſoeuer they be that with true faith doe deſire and looke for it. For God in the commaundements of the law appeareth but a rewarder of perfect righteouſneſſe, whereof we all are deſtitute, and on the other ſide a rigorous iudge of euill doings. But in Chriſt, his face ſhineth full of grace and lenetie, euen toward the wretched and vnworthy ſinners.

Man being condemned of ſin by the law, the effect thereof in the good is the craning of helpe from God, in the bad their deſpairing of themſelues without aſpiring to any helper. Epiſt. 89. Epiſt. 200. Epiſt. 90. Lib. de correp. & gratia. In Pſal. 70. In Pſal. 118. Ser. 27.

9 Of profiting, to craue the grace of his helpe, Auguſtine ſpeaketh oft, as when he writeth to Hilarie, The law commaundeth that endeuouring to doe the things commaunded, and being wearied with our weakneſſe vnder the law, we ſhould learne to aske the helpe of grace. Againe to Aſelius: The profit of the law is to conuince man of his owne weakneſſe, and compell him to craue the Phiſicke of grace that is in Chriſt. Againe to Innocent of Rome: The law commaundeth, and grace miniſtreth ſtrength to doe. Againe to Valentine: God commaundeth thoſe things that we cannot doe, that we may learne to know what to aſke of him. Againe: The law was giuen to accuſe you, that being accuſed you ſhould feare, that fearing you ſhould craue pardon, and not preſume of your owne ſtrengthes. Againe: The law was giuen for this purpoſe, of great to make litle, to ſhew that thou haſt no ſtrength of thine owne to righteouſneſſe, that thou as poore, vnworthy and needie, ſhouldeſt flee vnto grace. After, he turneth his ſpeech to God and ſaith: Doe ſo Lord, doe ſo mercifull Lord, command that which cannot be fulfilled: yea, commaund that which cannot but by thy grace be fulfilled, that when men cannot fulfill it by their owne ſtrength, euery mouth may be ſtopped, and no man may thinke himſelfe great. Let all be litle ones, and let al the world be guiltie before thee. But I am not wiſe to heape vp ſo many teſtimonies, ſith that holy man hath written a booke properly of that matter, which he hath intituled, Of the Spirit and Letter. The ſecond profiting he doth not ſo liuely deſcribe, either becauſe he knew that it did hang vpon the former, or becauſe he did not ſo well vnderſtand it, or becauſe he wanted words wherewith diſtinctly and plainly to expreſſe his meaning of it, which yet he rightly conceiued: but this firſt office of the law is not idle euen in the reprobate alſo. For though they go not thus far forward with the children of God, that after the throwing downe of their fleſh they be renued & flouriſh againe in the inward man, but amaſed with the firſt terror do lie ſtil in deſperatiõ: yet it ſerueth to ſhew foorth the equitie of Gods iudgement, that their conſciences be tolled with ſuch waues. For they euer willingly deſire to make ſhift againſt the iudgement of God. Now while the ſame is not yet opened, they yet ſo aſtoniſhed with the teſtimonie of the law and their conſcience doe bewray in themſelues what they haue deſerued.

10 The ſecond office of the law, is that they which are touched with no care of that which is iuſt and right, vnleſſe they be compelled, when they heare the terrible penall ordinances therein, may be reſtrained at leaſt with feare of puniſhment. But they are reſtrained, not becauſe their inward minde is mooued or affected withall, but becauſe being as it were bridled, they withhold their hand from outward worke and doe keepe in their peruerſneſſe within them, which otherwiſe they would haue outragiouſly poured out. Thereby they become truely neither the better, nor the more righteous before God. For although being letted either by feare or ſhame, they dare not put that in practiſe which they haue conceiued in their minde, nor openly blow abroad the rages of their luſt: yet haue they not a heart framed to the feare and obedience of God, yea, the more that they hold backe themſelues, ſo much the ſtronger within they are kindled, they burne, they boile, readie to doe any thing, and to breake foorth any whether, if this terrour of the law did not ſtay them. And not that onely, but alſo they moſt ſpitefully hate the law, and doe deteſt God the lawmaker, ſo that if they could, they would very faine take him away, whom they cannot abide, neither when he commaundeth righteous things, nor when he reuengeth him vpon the deſpiſers of his Maieſtie. In ſome indeed more darkly, and in ſome more plainly, but in all generally that are not regenerate, is this feeling, that they are drawen to the following of the law not by willing ſubmiſſion, but reſiſting and againſt their wils, onely by violence of feare. But this conſtrained and enforced righteouſneſſe is neceſſarie for the publick common ſtate of men, the quiet whereof is herein prouided for, while order is taken that all things be not confounded with vprore, which would come to paſſe, if all things were lawfull for all men. Yea, it is not vnprofitable for the children of God to be exerciſed with this Schooling, ſo long as they before their calling being yet deſtitute of the ſpirit of ſanctification, are ſtill wanton with the folly of the fleſh. For when they are drawen backe, though it be but from outward licentiouſnes, by the terror of Gods vengeance, although for that they are not yet tamed in minde, they goe for the preſent time but a litle forward, yet they partly grow in vre to beare the yoke of Chriſt. ſo that when they are called, they be not altogether rude and raw to diſcipline, as to a thing vnknowen. This office the Apoſtle ſeemeth properly to haue touched, when he ſaith that the law was not ſet for the righteous man, but for the vnrighteous and diſobedient, wicked and ſinners, euill doers and prophane men, ſlayers of their parents, and murtherers, fornicators, Sodomites, robbers of children, lyers and periured men, and whatſoeuer elſe is againſt ſound doctrine. For he ſaith, that it is a ſtay to the wilde outraging luſtes of the fleſh, that elſe would ſtray abroad without meaſure.

The ſecond office of the law is the bridling of their vnruinneſſe through feare of puniſhment, whom the ſpirit of ſanctification hath not yet endued with an inward heartie deſire otherwiſe to ſerue God.

1. Tim. 1. 9.

11 But to both may that be applied which he ſaith in another place, that the law was to the Iewes a ſchoolemaſter to Chriſt, for there are two ſorts of men, whom with her ſchooling ſhe leadeth by the hand to Chriſt. The one ſort, of whom we firſt ſpake, becauſe they are too full of affiance of their owne ſtrength or righteouſneſſe, are not meete to receiue the grace of Chriſt, vnleſſe they be firſt emptied: therefore the law bringeth them downe to humilitie by knowledge of themſelues, that ſo they may be prepared to deſire that which before they thought they wanted not. The other ſort neede a bridle to be holden backe, leaſt they ſo giue looſe the reines to the wantonneſſe of their fleſh, that they fall off altogether from all ſtudie of righteouſneſſe. For where the ſpirit of God doth not yet gouerne, there ſometime luſtes doe ſo boyle, that it is in great perill leaſt they throw downe the ſoule that is ſubiect to them into the forgetfulnes & deſpiſing of God: and ſo would it come to paſſe if God did not with this remedie prouide for it. Therefore thoſe whom he hath appointed to the inheritance of his kingdome, if he do not by and by regenerate them, he keepeth them by the works of the law vnder feare, vntill the time of his viſitation, not that chaſt and pure feare ſuch as ought to be in children, but yet a profitable feare for this that they may according to their capacitie be taught by introduction to true godlines. Of this we haue ſo many Both ſorts of men ſchooled by the terrour of the law as well they that would otherwiſe thinke too highly of their owne righteouſneſſe as they which too boldly would follow the ſway of their owne luſt.

Gal. 3. 24.

prooues, that it needeth no example. For whosoeuer haue any time continued in not knowing of God, will confesse that this happened vnto them, that they were holden by the bridle of the Law in some feare and obedience of God, vntill the time that being regenerate by his Spirit, they began hartily to loue him.

The third office of the law respecting properly them that are regenerated by the spirit of grace, is first to instruct them what the will of God is, and secondly to breede in them eger desire still more and more to goe forward in obseruing it.

12 The third vse, which is also the principall vse, and more neerely looketh vnto the proper end of the Law, concerneth the faithfull, in whose harts alreadie liueth and reigneth the Spirit of God. For although they haue the law written and grauen in their harts by the finger of God, that is to say, be so affectioned and minded by the direction of the spirit that they desire to obey God, yet doe they still two waies profit in the law. For it is to them a very good meane, whereby they may daily better and more assuredly learne what is the will of the Lord which they aspire vnto, and may be confirmed in the vnderstanding thereof. As if a seruant be alreadie bent with all the affection of his hart, to please his Lord: yet hath he neede diligently to search out and marke the fashions of his Lord, that he may frame and apply himselfe vnto them. And let none of vs exempt himselfe from this neede. For no man hath hitherto attained to so great wisedome, but that he may by dayly instruction of the law get new profit in proceding to the purer knowledge of Gods will. Then because we neede not onely doctrine but also exhortation: this other profit shall the seruant of God take by the law, to be by the often meditation thereof stirred vp to obedience, to be strengthened in it, to be holden backe from the slipperie way of offending. For after this maner, must these holy ones driue forward themselues, which with how great cheerefulnesse so euer they trauaile to Godward according to the spirit, yet they are alway loaden with the sluggishnesse of the flesh, that they proceede not with such full readinesse as they ought. To this flesh is the law giuen as a whip, that like a slowe and dull Asse it may be pricked forward to worke. Yea to the spirituall man, because he is not yet dispatched of the burden of the flesh, it shall be a continuall pricke that suffereth him not to stand still. Euen to this vse Dauid had respect, when he did set foorth the law with those notable praises: The law of the Lord is vndefiled, conuerting Soules: the iustices of the Lord are vpright, & chearing harts: the cõmandement of the Lord is bright, that giueth light to the eies, &c. Againe: A lanterne to my feete is thy word, and a light vnto my pathes, and innumerable other that he rehearseth in all that Psalme. Neither are these things against the sayings of Paul, wherein is shewed, not what vse the Law ministreth to the regenerate, but what it is able to giue to man of it selfe. But here the Prophet reporteth with how great profit the Lord doth instruct them by reading of the Law, to whom he inwardly inspireth a readinesse to obey. And he taketh hold not of the Commandements onely, but also of the promise of grace annexed to the things which onely maketh the bitternes to waxe sweete. For what were lesse amiable than the Law, if it should onely with requiring and threatning trouble soules carefully with feare, and vexe them with terror? But specially Dauid sheweth, that he in the law conceiued the Mediator, without whom there is no delite or sweetenesse.

Psal. 19.8.

Psal. 119.105.

The Law because it ingendreth death is not therefore to be shaken off, but must be followed as a rule which serueth to direct all the actions of our life.

13 Which while some vnskilfull men cannot discerne, they boldly shake away all Moses, and bid the two tables of the law farewell, because they thinke it is not agreeable for Christians to cleaue to that doctrine that conteineth the ministration of death. Let this prophane opinion depart farre out of our minds. For Moses taught excellently well, that the same law which with sinners can engender nothing but death, ought in the holy to haue a better and more excellent vse. For thus, when he was readie to die, he openly said to the people: Lay your harts vpon all the words that I doe testifie to you this day, that ye may commit them to your children, that ye may teach them to keepe, to doe, and to fulfill all the things that are written in the volume of this law, because they are not vainely commanded you, but that euery one should liue in them. But if no man can denie that there appeared in it an absolute paterne of righteousnesse, then either we must haue no rule at all to liue iustly and vprightly, or else it is not lawfull for vs to part from it. For there are not many but one rule of life, which is perpetuall and cannot be bowed. Therefore, whereas Dauid maketh the life of a righteous man continually busied in the meditation of the law, let vs not referre that to one age onely, because it is most meete for all ages to the end of the world: and let vs not therefore therefore be frayed away, or flee from being instructed by it, because it appointeth a much more exact holynesse then we shall performe, while we shall carry about the person of our body. For now it executeth not against vs the office of a rigorous exacter that will not be satisfied, but with his full taske perfourmed: but in this perfection whereunto it exhorteth vs, it sheweth vs a marke, toward which in all our life to endeuor, is no lesse profitable for vs, than agreeable with our duetie. In which endeuour if we faile not, it is well. For all this life is a race, the space whereof being runne out, the Lord will graunt vs to attaine to that marke, toward which our endeuours doe trauaile a farre off.

14 Now therefore, whereas the Law hath toward the faithfull a power to exhort, not such a power as may binde their consciences with curse, but such as with often calling on, may shake off sluggishnesse and pinch imperfection to awake it: many when they meane to expresse this deliuerance from the curse thereof, doe say, that the Law is abrogate to the faithfull. (I speake yet of the Law morall) not that it doth no more command them that which is right, but onely that it be no more vnto them that which it was before, that is, that it doe no more, by making afraid and confounding their consciences, damne and destroy them. And truly such an abrogation of the Lawe, Paul doth plainely teach, and also that the Lord himselfe spake of it, appeareth by this, that he would not haue confuted that opinion that he should dissolue the lawe, vnlesse it had beene commonly receiued among the Iewes. But forasmuch as it could not rise causelesly and without any colour, it is likely that it grew vpon false vnderstanding of his doctrine, as in a maner all errours are wont to take occasion of truth, but least we should also stumble at the same stone, let vs diligently make distinction what is abrogate in the lawe, and what remaineth yet in force. Where the Lord protesteth that he came not to destroy the law but to fulfill it: and that till heauen and earth passe away, no one iote of the law should passe away, but that all should be fulfilled: he sufficiently confirmeth that by his comming nothing should be taken away from the due keeping of the law. And for good cause: sith he came rather for this end, to heale offences. Wherefore the doctrine of the law remaineth for all Christians, inuiolable, which by teaching, admonishing, rebuking and correcting, may frame and prepare vs to euery good worke.

The abrogating of the Law of God to the faithfull in their deliuering from the curse threatned in the Law, not from the duetie of continuall endeuouring to fulfill that which the law inioyneth.

Mat. 5. 17.

15 As for these things that Paul speaketh of the curse, it is euident that they belong not to the very instruction, but onely to the force of binding the conscience. For the law not onely teacheth, but also with authoritie requireth that which it commandeth. If it be not performed, yea if duetie be slacked in any part, it bendeth her thunderboult of curse. For this cause the Apostle saith, that all they that are of the works of the law, are subiect to the curse, because it is written: Cursed is euery one, that fulfilleth not all. And he saith, that they be vnder the works of the law, that doe not set righteousnesse in the forgiuenesse of sinnes, by which we are loosed from the rigour of the Law. He teacheth therefore that we must be loosed from the bonds of the Law, vnlesse we will miserably perish vnder them. But from what bonds? the bonds of that rigorous and sharp exacting, that releaseth nothing of the extremitie of the Law, and suffreth not any offence vnpunished. From this curse (I say) that Christ might redeeme vs, he was made a curse for vs. For it is written: Cursed is euery one that hangeth vpon the tree. In the Chapter following indeed he saith, that Christ was made subiect to the Lawe, to redeeme them that were vnder the Lawe, but all in one meaning, for he by and by addeth, that by adoption we might receiue the right of children. What is that? that we should not be oppressed with perpetuall bondage, that should hold our conscience fast strained with anguish of death. In the meane time this alway remaineth vnshaken, that there is nothing withdrawen of the authoritie of the Law, but that it ought still to be receiued of vs with the same reuerence and obedience.

The bonds of the law from which we are loosed are those exactions, the rigor and extremitie whereof, if it were not mitigated, would cause dispaire, and not those iniunctions of obedience, the authority whereof doth and must stand in force for euer. Gala. 3. 10. Deut. 27. 26. Galat. 3. 12. & 5. 4.

16 * Of ceremonies it is otherwise, which we abrogate not in effect, but in vse onely. And this, that Christ by his comming hath made an end of them, doth so nothing diminish their holinesse, that it rather setteth them foorth, and maketh them glorious. For as they should haue giuen but a vaine shew to the people, vnlesse the power of the death and resurrection of Christ had been shewed therein, so if they had not ceased, we could not at this day discerne to what purpose they were ordained. Therefore Paul, to prooue

* The exercise of the law ceremoniall taken away yet the holinesse thereof confirmed by the performance of that which was therein shadowed.

Col. 2. 17. proouе that the keeping of them now is not onely superfluous, but also hurtfull, teacheth, that they were shadowes, whereof we haue the body in Christ. We see therefore how in the abolishing of them, the truth shineth better than if they did still a farre off, and as it were with a veile spred before, shew a figure of Christ that hath alreadie plainly appeared. And therfore the veile of the Temple at the death of Christ was torne in two peeces and fell downe: because now the true and expresse image of the heauenly good things was come to light, which before had beene but vnperfectly begun with darke rude draughts, as the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues saith. Hereunto serueth that saying of Christ, that the Law & the Prophets were vnto the time of Iohn, and that from that time forward, the kingdome of God began to be ioyfully preached: not meaning that the holy Fathers were without the preaching that containeth the hope of saluation, and of eternall life, but because a farre off, and vnder shadowes onely they did behold that which we at this day see in the full light. But why it behooued that the Church of God should climbe vp higher from those first instructions Iohn the Baptist declareth, for that the Law is giuen by Moses, but grace and trueth began by Iesus Christ. For although the purging of sinnes were truely promised in the olde sacrifices and the Arke of the couenaunt was a sure pledge of the fatherly fauour of God, yet all this had beene but a shadow, if it had not beene grounded vpon the grace of Christ, wherein is found, perfect and eternall stedfastnesse. Let this then remaine sure, that although the ceremoniall vsages of the Law haue ceased to be obserued, yet by the end of them it is the better knowen how great was the profit of them before Christs comming, which in taking away the vse of them hath sealed the force and effect of them with his death.

Mat. 27. 51.

Heb. 10. 1. Luke 16. 26.

Iohn 1. 15.

In what sense the ceremoniall law is termed a handwriting against them which did obserue it.

17 Somewhat more hard is the point that Paul noteth. And he hath renewed you together with him, when ye were dead by sinnes, and the vncircumcision of your flesh, forgiuing you all your offences, blotting out the hand writing that remained in the decrees against vs, which was contrarie vnto vs, and he hath taken it away, fastning it to the crosse, &c. For it seemeth to stretch the abolishing of the law somewhat further than now we haue, nothing to doe with the decrees thereof. For they erre that expound it of the law morall whose vnappeaseable rigour rather than doctrine thereof they thinke to be taken away. Some more deepely waying the words of Paul, doe espie that it is properly spoken of the law ceremoniall, and doe shew that this word Decree, doth more than once so signifie in Paul. For to the Ephesians he saith thus: He is our peace, that maketh both to be one, that maketh voide the law of commaundements consisting in the decrees, that he might make two in himselfe into one new man. It is no doubt that he speaketh there of the ceremonies, for he calleth it the partition wherwith the Iewes were seuered from the Gentiles: wherefore I graunt that those first exposi ours are righteously reproued by these: but yet me thinkes that these doe not sufficiently well set foorth the minde of the Apostle. For I like not at all, to haue these two places compared together in all points, when his purpose was to aduertise the Ephesians of their adoption into the fellowship of Israel, he teacheth that the stop is taken away, whereby they were before time kept asunder, that was in ceremonies. For the vsages of washings and sacrifices, wherewith the Iewes were made holy vnto the Lord, doe seuer them from the Gentiles. But in the Epistle to the Colossians, who seeth not that he toucheth a higher mysterie? Indeed the point of the disputation there, is of Mosaicall obseruations whereunto the false Apostles did labour to driue the Christian people. But, as in the Epistle to the Galathians he searcheth that controuersie further off, and as it were bringeth it backe to the first head thereof, so doth he also in this place. For if in the ceremonies you consider nothing else but a necessitie of the vse of them, to what purpose was it, to call it a hand writing against vs? moreouer to set the whole sum in a maner of our redemption in this, that it should be cancelled? Wherefore the matter it selfe crieth out, that here is some more secret thing to be considered. And I trust that I haue attained the naturall vnderstanding of it if at least this be graunted me to be true, which in one place is most truely written by Augustine, yea that he hath taken out of the plaine words of the Apostle, that in the Iewish ceremonies was rather a confession than a cleansing of sinnes. For what did they else by sacrifices, but confesse themselues

in their conſcience guiltie of death, that did put cleanſings in their place? What did they with their clenſings, but teſtifie themſelues to be vncleane? And ſo was the hand-writing of their ſinne and vncleanneſſe oft renued by them, but there was no diſcharge in that teſtifying thereof. For which cauſe the Apoſtle writeth that at length by meane of the death of Chriſt, was perfourmed the redemption of the offences that remained vnder the old Teſtament. Therefore the Apoſtle doth worthily call the ceremonies handwritings againſt thoſe that obſerue them: foraſmuch as by them they did openly ſeale to their owne damnation and vncleanneſſe. And it hindereth not, that they were alſo partakers of the ſame grace with vs. For this they obtained in Chriſt, not in the ceremonies, which there the Apoſtle doth ſeuer from Chriſt, becauſe being at that time vſed, they did obſcure the glory of Chriſt. Thus learne we, that the ceremonies if they be conſidered by themſelues, are well and fitly called handwritings againſt the ſaluation of men, becauſe they were as ſolemne inſtruments that teſtified their being bound. When the falſe Apoſtles went about to binde the Chriſtian Church to them againe: Paul did not without cauſe admoniſh the Coloſſians, by fetching the ſignification of them further off, to what point they ſhould fall backe againe, if they ſuffered themſelues in ſuch ſort to be yoked by them. For herewithall was the benefit of Chriſt wreſted away from them, in aſmuch as he hauing once performed the eternall clenſing, hath vtterly aboliſhed thoſe dayly obſeruations which were onely of force to ſeale ſinnes, but could doe nothing to the putting away of them. Heb 9.15.

THE EIGHT CHAPTER.

An expoſition of the Morall Law.

The worſhip due to God, and the vnrighteouſneſſe which is in vs, becauſe the inward law naturally written in our harts cannot ſufficiently teach, therefore God himſelfe hath giuen a law which doth.

HEre I thinke it ſhall not be from the purpoſe, to interlace the tenne Commandements of the Law, with a ſhort expoſition of them, becauſe thereby both that ſhall better appeare which I haue touched, that the ſame keeping of them which God hath once appointed, remaineth yet in force: and then alſo we ſhall haue beſides that a proofe of the ſecond point, that the Iewes did not onely learne by it what was the true force of godlineſſe, but alſo by the terrour of the iudgement, ſith they ſaw themſelues vnable to keepe it, they were compelled whether they would or no, to be drawen to the Mediator. Now in ſetting foorth the ſumme of thoſe things that are required in the true knowledge of God, we haue alreadie taught, that we cannot conceiue him according to his greatneſſe, but that by and by his Maieſtie preſenteth it ſelfe vnto vs, to binde vs to the worſhip of him. In the knowledge of our ſelues we haue ſet this for the chief point that being void of the opinion of our own ſtrength, and cleane ſtripped of the truſt of our owne righteouſneſſe, and on the other ſide diſcouraged and beaten downe with conſcience of our owne needineſſe, we ſhould learne perfect humilitie and abaſement of our ſelues. The Lord ſetteth foorth both theſe points in the Law, where firſt chalenging to himſelfe due power to gouerne, he calleth vs to the reuerence of his diuine Maieſtie, and appointeth out vnto vs wherein it ſtandeth and conſiſteth: and then publiſhing a rule of his righteouſneſſe, (againſt the righteouſneſſe whereof our nature as it is peruerſe and crooked, doth alway ſtriue, and beneath the perfection whereof our power as of it ſelfe it is weake and feeble to doe good, lieth a great way below) he reprooueth vs both of weakeneſſe and vnrighteouſneſſe. Moreouer, that inward law which we haue before ſaid to be grauen and as it were imprinted in the harts of all men, doth after a certaine maner enforme vs of the ſame things that are to be learned of the two tables. For our conſcience doth not ſuffer vs to ſleepe a perpetuall ſleepe without feeling, but that it inwardly is a witneſſe and admoniſher of thoſe things that we owe to God, and layeth before vs the difference of good and euill, and ſo accuſeth vs when we ſwarue from our duety. But man being wrapped in ſuch darkeneſſe of errors as he is, ſkarſe euen ſlenderly taſteth by that law of nature, what worſhip pleaſeth God: but truely he is very farre diſtant from the right knowledge thereof. Beſide that, he is ſo ſwollen with arrogancie and ambition, and ſo blinded with ſelfeloue, that he cannot yet looke vpon, and as it were, deſcend into himſelfe to learne to ſubmit and humble himſelfe, and confeſſe his owne miſery. Therefore (as it was neceſſarie both for our dulneſſe and ſtubbornneſſe) the Lord hath ſet vs a law written, which ſhould both more certainely teſtifie that which in the law naturall was too obſcure, and alſo ſhould ſhake away our drouſineſſe, and more liuely touch our minde and remembrance.

By the law we vnderſtand that we owe God obedience, and that he loueth righteouſneſſe which we muſt ſeeke after, not excuſing our ſelues by our inhabilitie which is no excuſe.

2 Now it is eaſie to vnderſtand what is to be learned of the law, that is, that as God is our Creator, ſo of right he hath the place of our Father and Lord, and that by this reaſon we owe to him glorie, reuerence, loue, and feare. Yea, and alſo that we are not at our owne libertie, to follow whither ſoeuer that luſt of our minde doth moue vs, but that we ought to hang vpon his becke, and to reſt onely vpon that which pleaſeth him. Then we learne, that he delighteth in righteouſneſſe, that he abhorreth wickedneſſe, and therefore that vnleſſe we will with wicked vnthankfulneſſe fall away from our creator, we muſt neceſſarily obſerue righteouſneſſe all our life long. For if then onely we yeeld vnto him the reuerence that we owe, when we preferre his will before our owne, it followeth, that there is no other due worſhip of him, but the obſeruation of righteouſneſſe, holineſſe, and cleanneſſe. Neither may we pretend this excuſe that we want power, and like waſted detters be not able to pay. For it is not conuenient that we ſhould meaſure the glorie of God by our owne power: for whatſoeuer we be, he alway abideth like to himſelfe, a louer of righteouſneſſe, a hater of wickedneſſe. Whatſoeuer he requireth of vs (becauſe he can require nothing but that which is right) by bond of nature we muſt of neceſſitie obey: but that we are not able, is our owne fault. For if we be holden bound of our owne luſt wherein ſinne raigneth, ſo that we are not looſe at libertie to obey our Father, there is no cauſe why we ſhould alleage neceſſitie for our defence, the euill whereof is both within vs, and to be imputed vnto our ſelues.

The law bringeth men by ſhipwracke to the hauen.

3 When we haue thus farre profited by the teaching of the law, then muſt we by the teaching of the ſame lawe alſo deſcend vnto our ſelues: whereby at length we may carrie away two things. The firſt is, by comparing the righteouſneſſe of the law with our life, to learne, that we are farre off from being able to ſatisfie the will of God, and that therefore we are not worthie to haue place among his creatures, much leſſe to be reckened among his children. The ſecond is, in conſidering our ſtrength, to learne that it is not onely ſufficient to fulfill the law, but alſo vtterly none at all. Hereupon followeth both a diſtruſt of our owne ſtrength, and a care and fearefulneſſe of minde. For conſcience cannot beare the burthen of iniquitie, but that by and by the iudgement of God is preſent before it: and the iudgement of God cannot be felt, but that it ſtriketh into vs a dreadfull horrour of death. And likewiſe being conſtrained with prooues of her owne weakeneſſe, it cannot chooſe but by and by fall into diſpaire of her owne ſtrength. Both theſe affections doe ingender humilitie and abatement of courage. So at length it commeth to paſſe, that man made afraid with feeling of eternall death, which he ſeeth to hang ouer him by the deſeruing of his owne righteouſneſſe, turneth himſelfe to the onely mercie of God, as to the onely hauen of ſaluation: that feeling that it is not in his power to pay that he oweth vnto the law, deſpairing in himſelfe, he may take breath againe and begin to craue and looke for help from elſewhere.

The vſe of the promiſes and threatnings of the law.

4 But the Lord not contented to haue procured a reuerence of his righteouſneſſe hath alſo added promiſes and threatnings to fill our hearts with loue of him, and with hatred of wickedneſſe. For, becauſe our minde is too blinde, to be mooued with the onely beautie of goodneſſe, it pleaſed the moſt mercifull Father of his tender kindneſſe to allure vs with ſweetneſſe of rewards to loue and long for him. He pronounceth therfore, that with him are rewards laid vp for vertue, and that he ſhall not ſpend his labour in vaine, whoſoeuer he be, that ſhall obey his commandements. He proclaimeth on the other ſide, that he not onely abhorreth vnrighteouſneſſe, but alſo that it ſhall not eſcape vnpuniſhed, for that he will be a reuenger of the contempt of his Maieſtie. And to exhort vs by all meanes, he promiſeth as well the bleſſings of this preſent life, as alſo eternall bleſſednes to their obedience that keepe his commandements: and to the tranſgreſſors thereof, he threatneth both preſent miſeries, and the puniſhment of eternall death. For the ſame promiſe, (he that doth theſe things ſhall liue in them:) and alſo the threatning that anſwereth it, (the ſoule that ſinneth, that ſame ſhall die) doe without doubt belong to the immortalitie or death that is come, and ſhall neuer be ended. Albeit, whereſoeuer is mentioned the good will or wrath of God, vnder the one is contained tained the eternitie of life, vnder the other eternall deſtruction. Of preſent bleſſings and curſes there is a longer regiſter rehearſed in the law. And in the penall ordinances appeareth the ſoueraigne cleanneſſe of God, that can ſuffer no iniquitie: but in his promiſes, beſides his great loue of righteouſneſſe, (which he cannot finde in his hart to defraude of her reward) there is alſo prooued by his maruellous bountifulneſſe. For whereas we and all ours are indebted vnto his Maieſtie, by good right whatſoeuer he requireth of vs, he demandeth it as due debt, but the paiment of debt is not worthie of reward. Therefore he departeth with his owne right, when he offereth reward to our obediences, which we doe not yeeld of our ſelues as things that were not due: but what thoſe promiſes doe bring vnto vs, is partly ſaid alreadie, and partly ſhall appeare more plainely in place fit for it. It ſufficeth for this preſent, if we remember and conſider, that there is in the promiſes of the law no ſmall commendations of righteouſneſſe, that it may the more certainly appeare how much the keeping thereof pleaſeth God: that the penall ordinances are ſet for the more deteſtation of vnrighteouſneſſe, leaſt the ſinner delited with the ſweete flatterings of vices, ſhould forget that the iudgement of the lawmaker is prepared for him.

Leu. 18. 5. Ezec. 18. 4. & 20.

Leu.26.4. Deut.28.1.

5 Now whereas the Lord giuing a rule of perfect righteouſneſſe, hath applied all the parts thereof to his owne will, therein is declared that nothing is to him more acceptable than obedience, which is ſo much more diligently to be marked, as the wantonneſſe of mans minde is more readie to deuiſe now and then diuers ſorts of worſhipping to win his fauour withall. For in all ages that irreligious affectation of religion, becauſe it is naturally planted in the wit of man, hath ſhewed and yet doth ſhew foorth it ſelfe, that men doe alway delite to inuent a way to obtaine righteouſneſſe beſide the word of God, whereby it commeth to paſſe that the commandements of the lawe haue but ſmall place among the works that are commonly called good works, while that innumerable rout of mens works occupieth almoſt all the roome. But what other thing meant Moſes than to reſtraine ſuch licentiouſneſſe, when after the publiſhing of the law he ſpake thus to the people: Giue heed, and heare all the things that I command thee, that it may be well to thee and to thy children after thee for euer, when thou ſhalt doe that which is good and pleaſant before thy God. What I command thee, that onely doe: adde not vnto it, nor diminiſh it. And before, when he had proteſted, that this was his wiſedome and vnderſtanding before other nations, that he had receiued iudgements, righteouſneſſe, and ceremonies of the Lord, he ſaid further, Keepe therefore thy ſelfe and thy ſoule carefully, that thou forget not the words which thine eies haue ſeene, and that at no time they fall out of thy hart. For, becauſe God did foreſee, that the Iſraelites would not reſt, but that after they had receiued the lawe, they would beſide it trauell in bringing foorth new righteouſneſſe, if they were not ſeuerely holden backe: therefore he pronounceth that herein is contained the perfection of righteouſneſſe, which ſhould haue been the ſtrongeſt ſtay to hold them backe, and yet they did not ceaſe from that boldneſſe ſo much forbidden them. But what of vs? we are ſurely comprehended within the ſame charge: for it is no doubt that that continueth ſtill whereby the Lord hath chalenged to his lawe the abſolute doctrine of righteouſneſſe, yet we not contented therewith, doe monſtrouſly trauaile with forging and coyning of new good works one vpon another. For the healing of this fault, the beſt remedie ſhall be, if this thought ſhall be ſtedfaſtly ſetled in vs, that the law is giuen vs from God to teach vs a perfect righteouſneſſe: that therein is taught no righteouſneſſe, but the ſame that is examined, by the appointed rule of Gods will: that therefore new formes of works are vainely attempted to win the fauour of God, whoſe true worſhip ſtandeth in onely obedience: but rather that ſuch ſtudie of good works as wandreth out of the law of God, is an intollerable defiling of Gods righteouſneſſe and of the true righteouſneſſe. Auguſtine alſo ſaith moſt truly, which calleth the obedience that is done to God, ſometime the mother and keeper, ſometime the originall of all vertues.

God by making his will and preſcription the onely rule of our obedience, excludeth all our owne by inuentions of pleaſing him as vnpleaſant and vnacceptable.

Deut.12.28.

Deut.4.9.

Lib.4.de ciuit. Dei cap.12. De bono coniugali. Contr. aduer. Legis & prophet.

6 But when we haue expounded the law of the Lord, then more fitly and with more profit ſhall that be confirmed which I haue before ſpoken of the office and vſe of the law. But before that I begin to diſcourſe euery ſeuerall commandement by it ſelfe, it ſhall be good now to giue ſuch leſſons as ſerue to the vniuerſall knowledge thereof.

The firſt rule for right vnderſtanding of the law is that it requireth not onely outward but inward holinesse: which is plaine to him that noteth the difference betweene God and mortall lawmakers.

First let vs hold for determined, that the life of man is instructed in the law not onely to outward honestie, but also to inward and spirituall righteousnesse. Which thing whereas no man can denie, yet there be few that rightly marke it. That commeth to passe, because they looke not vpon the lawmaker, by whose nature the nature of the law also ought to be weied. If any King doe by Proclamation forbid to commit fornication, to kill, or to steale: in this case I grant that if a man doe onely conceiue in his minde a lust to commit fornication, to sinne, or to steale, and doe not commit any of these things in deede, he is out of the compasse of this prohibition. And the reason is, for that because the foresight of a mortall lawmaker, could not extend but to outward ciuilitie: his commandements are not broken, but when the outward offences are committed. But God (whose eie nothing escapeth, and which regardeth not so much the outward shew as the cleannesse of the hart) vnder the forbidding of fornication, manslaughter, and theft, forbiddeth lust, wrath, hatred, coueting of another mans, guile, and whatsoeuer is like to these. For insomuch as he is a spirituall lawmaker, he speaketh no lesse to the soule than to the body. But the manslaughter of the soule, are wrath and hatred: the theefe of the soule, is euill desire and couetousnesse: the fornication of the soule, is lust. But mans lawes also (will some man say) haue regard to intents and wils, and not to successes of fortune. I grant, but yet they are such intents and wils, as haue outwardly broken out. They wey with what intent euery outward act hath been done, but they search not the secret thoughts. Therefore they are satisfied when a man onely withholdeth his hands from offending. On the other side, because the heauenly law is made for our mindes, therefore the restraint of mindes is principally needfull to the keeping thereof. But the common sort of men, euen when they mightily dissemble their contempt of the law, doe frame their eies, their feete, their hands, and all the parts of their bodies to some obseruation of the lawe, in the meane time they hold their hart most farre off from all obedience, and thinke themselues well discharged, if they keepe close from men that which they doe in the sight of God. They heare it said: Thou shalt not kill: Thou shalt not commit adulterie: Thou shalt not steale: they draw not out their sword to kill: they ioyne not their bodies with harlots: they lay not their hands vpon other mens goods. All this is well hitherto. But in their whole hearts they breath out murthers, they boyle in lust, they cast their eies aside at all mens goods, and deuoure them with coueting. Now wanteth that which was the chiefe point of the lawe. Whence, I pray you, commeth so grosse dulnesse, but that leauing the lawmaker, they rather measure righteousnesse by their owne wit? Against these doth Paul mightily cry out, affirming that the law is spirituall, whereby he meaneth, that it not onely demandeth an obedience of the soule, minde and will, but also requireth an Angelike pureneſse, which hauing all the filthinesse of the flesh cleane wiped away, may sauour nothing but of the spirit.

Rom. 7. 14.

This Christ sheweth by expounding the law, not by teaching a new and another lawe perfecter and better as some perniciously imagine.

7 When we say that this is the meaning of the lawe, we thrust not in a new exposition of our owne, but we follow Christ, the best expositor of the lawe. For when the Pharisees had infected the people with a false opinion, that he performeth the law that hath with outward worke committed nothing against the lawe, he reprooueth this most perilous errour, and pronounced that vnchaste looking at a woman is fornication: he protested that they are manslayers that hate their brother, for he maketh them guiltie of iudgement that haue but conceiued wrath in their minde, and them guiltie of the councel that in murmuring or grudging haue vttered any token of a displeased minde: and them guiltie of hell fire, that with taunts and railing breake foorth into open anger. They that haue not espied these things, haue faigned Christ to be another Moses, the giuer of the lawe of the Gospell which supplied the imperfection of the law of Moses. Whereupon commeth that common principle of perfection of the law of the Gospell, which farre passeth the old lawe, which is a most pernitious opinion. For hereafter, where we shall gather a summe of the commaundements, it shall appeare by Moses himselfe, how reprochfully they dishonour the lawe of God. Truly it sheweth that all the holinesse of the fathers did not much differ from hypocrisie, and it leadeth vs away from that onely and perfect rule of righteousnesse. But it is very easie to confute that errour: for that they thought that Christ did adde vnto the lawe, whereas he did but but reſtore the lawe to her integritie, which while he made it free, and cleanſed it being obſcured with lies, and defiled with leauen of the Phariſees.

8 Let this be our ſecond note, that there is alway more contained in the commandements and prohibitions, than is by words expreſſed, which yet is ſo to be tempered, that it be not like a Leſbian rule, whereby licentiouſly wreſting the Scriptures, we may make of euery thing what we liſt. For many bring to paſſe by this vnmeaſured libertie of running at large, that with ſome the authoritie of Scripture groweth in contempt, and otherſome deſpaire of vnderſtanding it. Therefore if it be poſſible, we muſt take ſome ſuch way, that may by right and perfect path leade vs to the will of God, we muſt I ſay ſearch how farre our expoſition may exceede the bounds of the words, that it may appeere that it is not an addition of mens gloſes knit to the word of God, but rather that the pure and naturall meaning of the lawgiuer is faithfully rendred. Truly in a maner in all the commandements it is ſo manifeſt, that there are figuratiue ſpeeches, meaning more in expreſſing part that he may woorthily be laughed at that will reſtraine the meaning of the lawe to the narrowneſſe of the words. It is euident therefore, that ſober expoſition doeth paſſe beyond the words: but how farre, that remaineth hard to iudge, vnleſſe there be ſome meaſure appointed: wherefore I thinke this to be the beſt meaſure, that if it be directed to the intent of the commandement, that is, that in euery commandement be weied, why it was giuen vs. As for example: Eugry commandement is either by way of bidding, or of forbidding: the truth of both ſorts ſhall foorthwith be found, if we conſider the intent or the end thereof. As the end of the fifth commandement is, that honour is to be giuen to them to whom God appointeth it. This therefore is the ſumme of the commandement, that it is right and pleaſeth God, that we honour them to whom he hath giuen any excellencie, and that he abhorreth contempt and ſtubborneſſe againſt them. The intent of the firſt commandement is, that God alone be honoured. The ſumme therefore of the commandement ſhall be, that true godlineſſe, that is to ſay, true worſhip of his maieſtie pleaſeth God, and that he abhorreth vngodlineſſe. So in euery commandement we muſt looke vpon what matter it treateth: then muſt we ſearch out the end, till we finde what the lawmaker doth teſtifie therein properly to pleaſe or diſpleaſe him: and laſt of all muſt we drawe an argument from the ſame to the contrarie, after this maner: If this pleaſeth God, then the contrarie diſpleaſeth him: if this diſpleaſe him, then the contrarie pleaſeth him: if he command this, then he forbiddeth the contrarie: if he forbid this, then he commandeth the contrarie.

The ſecond rule to vnderſtand the lawe by, is, that in euery commandement more is ment than the naked words doe literally import, and how much more the ſcope of each commandement compared with the matter thereof together with the contrary will ſhew.

9 That which is now ſomewhat darkly touched, ſhall in expounding of the commandements become very plaine by practiſe, wherefore it ſufficeth to haue touched it, ſauing that this laſt point is to be ſhortly confirmed with ſome proofe thereof, becauſe otherwiſe either it ſhould not be vnderſtanded, or being vnderſtand, it might perhaps at the beginning ſeeme to ſound like an abſurditie. This needeth no proofe, that when a good thing is commanded, the euill is forbidden that is contrary to it: for there is no man but he will graunt it me. And common iudgement will not much ſtick to admit, that when euill things are forbidden, the contrary duties are commanded. It is an vniuerſall opinion that vertues are commended, when the contrary vices are condemned. But we require ſomewhat more than thoſe formes of ſpeech doe ſignifie commonly among the people. For they for the moſt part take the vertue contrary to any vice, to be the abſtaining from the ſame vice: we ſay that it proceedeth farther, that is, to contrarie duties and doings. Therefore in this commandement, Thou ſhalt not kill, the common ſenſe of men will conſider nothing elſe, but that we muſt abſtaine from all hurt doing, or luſt to doe hurt. I ſay, that there is further contained, that we ſhould by all the helps that we may, ſuccour the life of our neighbour. And, leaſt I ſpeake without a reaſon, I prooue it thus: God forbiddeth that our brother be hurt or miſuſed, becauſe he willeth that our neighbours life be deere and precious vnto vs: he doth therefore require withall thoſe duties of loue that may be done by vs for the preſeruation of it. And ſo may we ſee how the end of the commandement doth alway diſcloſe vnto vs all that we are therein commanded or forbidden to doe.

That the forbidding of euill in the law, implieth a commanding of the contrarie duties which are good.

10 But why God, in ſuch as it were halfe commandements, hath by figures ra-

The cause why God hath forbidden the very secret motion vnto sinne by the name of the grosse and actuall deede, is that the foulnesse of such termes might make vs the better to vnderstand the vglinesse of those faults, which being expresst by more proper and soft names, wee would make lesse account of.

ther secretly signified, than expressed what his will was, whereas there are woont to be many reasons rendred thereof, this one reason pleaseth me above the rest. Because the flesh alway endeuoureth to extenuate the filthinesse of sinne, and to colour it with faire pretenses, sauing where it is euen palpable for grossenesse, he hath set foorth for an example in euery kinde of offence that which was most wicked and abhominable, at the hearing whereof our very senses might be mooued with horror, thereby to imprint in our mindes a more hainous detesting of euery sort of sinne. This many times deceiueth vs in weying of vices, that if they be any thing secret, we make them seeme small. These deceits the Lord doth disclose, when he accustometh vs to referre all the whole multitude of vices to these principall heads, which doe best of all shew, how much euery kinde is abhominable. As for example, wrath and hatred are not thought so hainous euils, when they are called by their owne names, but when they are forbidden vs vnder the name of manslaughter, we better vnderstand how abhominable they are before God, by whose word they are set in the degree of so horrible an offence: and we mooued by his iudgement, doe accustome our selues better to weigh the hainousnesse of those faults that before seemed but light vnto vs.

The reason of diuiding the law into two parts or tables, whereof the former containeth the dutie which we owe properly vnto God, in for that his worship is the fountaine, head and foundation, without which there can no good or acceptable duty passe from man to man.

11 Thirdly is to be considered, what meaneth the diuiding of the law of God into two tables, whereof all wise men will iudge that there is sometime mention made not vnfitly from the purpose, nor without cause. And we haue a cause readie, that doth not suffer vs to remaine in doubt of this matter. For God so deuided his law into two parts, in which is contained the whole righteousnesse, that he hath assigned the first to the duties of religion that doe peculiarly pertaine to the worshipping of his Godhead, the other to the duties of Charitie which belong vnto men. The first foundation of righteousnesse is the worship of God: which being once ouerthrowen, all the other members of righteousnesse are torne in sunder and dissolued, like to the parts of an house vnioynted and fallen downe. For what maner of righteousnesse wilt thou call it, that thou vexest not men with robberie and extorsions, if in the meane time by wicked sacrilege thou spoilest Gods maiestie of his glorie? that thou defilest not thy bodie with fornication, if with thy blasphemies thou prophanely abuse the sacred name of God? that thou murderest no man, if thou trauell to destroy & extinguish the memorie of God. Wherefore righteousnesse is vainely boasted of without religion, and maketh no better showe, than if a mangled bodie with the head cut off, should be brought foorth for a beautifull sight. And religion is not onely the principall part of righteousnesse, but also the very soule wherewith it breatheth, and is quickned. For men keepe not equitie and loue among themselues without the feare of God. Therefore we say, that the worship of God is the beginning and foundation of righteousnesse, because when it is taken away, all the equitie, continence and temperance that men vse among themselues, is vaine and trifling before God. We say also that it is the spring head and liuely breath of righteousnesse, because hereby men doe learne to liue among themselues temperately and without hurt doing one to another, if they reuerence God as the iudge of right and wrong. Wherfore in the first table he instructeth vs to godlinesse and the proper duties of religion, wherwith his Maiestie is to be worshipped: in the other he prescribeth how for the feares sake of his name, we ought to behaue our selues in the fellowship of men.

Matth. 22. 37. Luke 10. 27.

And for this reason our Lord (as the Euangelists rehearse it) did in a summe gather the whole lawe into two principall points: the one, that we should loue God with all our hart, with all our soule, with all our strength: the other, that we loue our neighbour as our selues. Thus thou seest how of the two parts wherein he concludeth the whole lawe, he directeth the one toward God, and appointeth the other toward men.

That in the former table besides a generall preface to the law, foure commandements are contained, in the later table fiue.

12 But although the whole lawe be contained in two principall points, yet to the end to take away all pretense of excuse, it pleased our God to declare in the ten Commandements more largely and plainely all things that belong both to the honor, feare, and loue of himselfe, and also to that charitie which he commandeth vs to beare to men for his sake. And thy studie is not ill spent to know the diuision of the commandements, so that thou remember that it is such a matter wherein euery man ought to haue his iudgement free, for which we ought not contentiously to striue with him that thinketh otherwise. But we must needs touch this point, least the Readers should either scorne or marueil at the deuision that we shall vse, as new and lately deuised. That the law is deuided in ten words, because it is oft approoued by the authoritie of God himselfe, it is out of controuersie, wherefore there is no doubt of the number, but of the maner of deuiding. They that so deuide them, that they giue three commaundements to the first table, and put other seuen into the second, doe wipe out of the number the commaundement concerning Images, or at least they hide it vnder the first: whereas without doubt it is seuerally set by the Lord for a commaundement, and the tenth commandement of not coueting the things of his neighbour, they doe fondly teare into two. Beside that it shall by and by be done to vnderstand, that such maner of deuiding was vnknowen in the pure age. Other doe reckon, as we doe, foure seuerall commaundements in the first table, but in place of the first they set the promise without the commaundement. As for me, because vnlesse I be conuinced by euident reason, I take the ten words in Moses for ten commaundements, me thinkes I see so many deuided in very fit order. Therefore, leauing to them their opinion, I will follow that which I best allow, that is, that the same which these later sort make the first commaundement, shall be in steede of a preface to the whole law, and then shall follow the commaundements, fower of the first table, and sixe of the second, in such order as they shall be rehearsed. Augustine also to Boniface agreeth with vs, which in rehearsing them keepeth this order: that God onely be serued with obedience of religion, that no Idol be worshipped, that the name of the Lord be not taken in vaine, when he had before seuerally spoken of the shadowish commaundement of the Sabbat. In another place indeed that first deuision pleaseth him, but for too slender a cause, that is, because in the number of three, if the first table consist of three commaundements, the mysterie of the Trinitie more plainly appeareth. Albeit in the same place he sticketh not to confesse that otherwise he rather liketh our deuision. Besides these, the authour of the Vnperfect worke vpon Mathew is of our side. Iosephus, vndoubtedly according to the common consent of his time, assigneth to either table fiue commaundements. Which is both against reason, because it confoundeth the distinction of religion and charitie, and also is confuted by the authoritie of the Lord himselfe, which in Mathew reckeneth the commandement of honouring our parents, in the number of the second table. Now let vs heare God himselfe speaking in his owne words.

Math. 19. 19.

The first Commandement.

I am the Lord thy God, which hath brought thee out of the land of Ægypt, out of the house of bondage. Thou shalt haue no strange Gods before my face.

13 Whether you make the first sentence a part of the first commaundement, or read it seuerally, it is indefferent vnto me, so that you doe not denie me that it standeth insteed of a preface to the whole law. First in making of lawes is heed to be taken, that they be not shortly after abrogate by contempt. Therefore God first of all prouideth, that the maiestie of the law that he shal make, may neuer at any time come in contempt. For stablishing whereof he vseth three maner of arguments. First he challengeth to himselfe power and right of dominion, whereby he may constraine his chosen people, that they must of necessitie obey him: then he setteth foorth a promise of grace with sweetnesse thereof to allure them to studie of holinesse. Thirdly he reciteth the benefit that he did for them, to reproue the Iewes of vnthankfulnesse, if they doe not with obedience answere his kindnesse. Vnder the name of Iehouah, the Lord, is ment his authoritie and lawfull dominion. And if all things be of him, and doe abide in him, it is right that all things be referred to him, as Paul saith. Therefore we are with this word alone sufficiently brought vnder the yoke of Gods maiestie, because it were monstrous for vs to seeke to withdraw our selues from vnder his gouernment, out of whom we cannot be.

To kepe the law from growing into contempt the lawmaker in the preface thereunto vseth three meanes: the first is a declaration of his greatnes which to shew he termeth himselfe the Lord.

Rom. 11. 36.

14 After that he hath shewed that it is he that hath power to command, to whom obedience is due, least he should seeme to draw by onely necessitie, he also alloureth with sweetnes in pronouncing, that he is the God of the Church. For there is hidden in this ſpeech a mutuall relation, which is conteined in the promiſe: I will be to them a God, and they ſhall be to me a people. Whereupon Chriſt prooueth that Abraham, Iſaac, and Iacob, haue immortall life, by this that God teſtified that he is their God. Wherefore it is as much in effect, as if he ſhould ſay thus: I haue choſen you to be my people, not onely to doe you good in this preſent life, but alſo to giue you the bleſſednes of the life to come. But to what end this tendeth, it is noted in diuers places in the law. For when the Lord doth vouchſafe to deale thus mercifully with vs, to call vs into the companie of his people, he choſeth vs (ſaith Moſes) that we ſhould be a peculiar people vnto himſelfe, a holy people, and ſhould keepe his commandements. From whence alſo cõmeth this exhortation: Be ye holy, for I am holy. Now out of theſe two is deriued that proteſtation that is in the prophet: The ſonne honoureth the father, and the ſeruant honoureth his Lord. If I be a Lord, where is my feare? If I be a father, where is my loue?

The third, a rehearſall of ſuch a benefit as could not but be vnto them that receiued it an euerlaſting bond of dutifull obedience.

15 Now followeth the rehearſall of his benefit, which ought to be of ſo much more force to moue vs, as the fault of vnthankfulneſſe is more deteſtable euen among men. He then did put Iſrael in remembrance of a benefit lately done, but ſuch a one as for the miraculous greatneſſe thereof being worthie to be had in remembrance for euer, ſhould remaine in force with their poſteritie. Moreouer it is moſt agreeable for this preſent matter. For the Lord ſeemeth to ſay that they were deliuered out of miſerable bondage for this purpoſe, that they ſhould with obedience and readineſſe of ſeruice honour him, the authour of their deliuerance. He vſeth alſo, (to the end to hold vs faſt in the true worſhipping of him alone) to ſet out himſelfe with certaine titles, whereby he maketh his ſacred Maieſtie to be differently knowen from all idols and forged gods. For, as I ſaid before, ſuch is our readie inclination to vanitie, ioyned with raſh boldneſſe, that ſo ſoone as God is named, our minde cannot take heed to it ſelfe, but that it by and by fallech away to ſome vaine inuention. Therefore, when the Lord meaneth to bring a remedie for this miſchiefe, he ſetteth out his owne godhead with certaine titles, and ſo doth compaſſe vs in as it were within certain grates, leaſt we ſhould wander hither and thether, & raſhly forge our ſelues ſome new God, if forſaking the liuing God, we ſhould erect an Idol. For this cauſe ſo oft as the Prophets meane properly to point out him, they clothe him, and as it were incloſe him within thoſe marks whereby he had opened himſelfe to the people of Iſrael. And yet when he is called the God of Abraham, or the God of Iſrael, when he is ſet in the temple of Hieruſalem among the Cherubins, theſe and like formes of ſpeech doe not binde him to one place or to one people, but are ſet onely for this purpoſe, to ſtay the thoughts of the godly in that God which by his couenant that he hath made with Iſrael, hath ſo repreſented himſelfe, that it is no way lawfull to vary from ſuch a paterne. But let this remaine ſtedfaſtly imprinted, that there is mention made of the deliuerance to this end, that the Iewes might the more cheerefully giue themſelues to the God that doth by right claime them vnto him. And we (leaſt we ſhould thinke that the ſame nothing belongeth to vs) ought to conſider, that the bondage of Ægypt is a figure of the ſpirituall captiuitie, wherein we are all holden bound, vntill our heauenly deliuerer doe make vs free by the power of his arme, and conuey vs into the kingdome of libertie. As therefore when in the old time he minded to gather together the Iſraelites that were ſcattered abroad, to the worſhipping of his name, he deliuered them out of the intolerable dominion of Pharao, wherewith they were oppreſſed: ſo all thoſe to whom at this day he profeſſeth himſelfe a God, he doth now deliuer from the deadly power of the diuell, which was in a ſhadow ſignified by that corporall bondage. Wherfore there is no man, but his minde ought to be inflamed to harken to the lawe which he heareth to haue proceeded from the ſoueraigne King. From whom as all things take their beginning, ſo is it meete that they haue alſo their end appointed and directed to him. There is no man (I ſay) but he ought to be rauiſhed to imbrace the lawmaker, to the keeping of whoſe commandements, he is taught that he is peculiarly choſen: from whoſe bountie he looketh both for flowing ſtore of all good things, and alſo the glorie of immortall life: by whoſe maruellous power and mercie he knoweth himſelfe to be deliuered out of the iawes of death.

Eſay 37. 16.

16 After that he hath grounded and ſtabliſhed the authoritie of his lawe, he ſetteth foorth the firſt commandement, That we haue no ſtrange gods before him. The end of this commauncommaundement is, that God will onely haue preeminence, and wholy enioy his owne authoritie among his people. And that it may ſo be, he commaundeth that there be farre from vs all vngodlineſſe and ſuperſtition, whereby the glorie of his godhead is either diminiſhed or obſcured: and by the ſame reaſon he commandeth, that we worſhip and honor him with true endeuour of godlineſſe. And the very ſimplicitie of the words themſelues doe in a maner expreſſe the ſame. For we cannot haue God, but we muſt alſo comprehend therein all things that properly belong to him. Whereas therefore he forbiddeth vs to haue other Gods, he meaneth thereby, that we ſhould not giue away elſewhere that which is proper to him. For although the things that we owe vnto God be innumerable, yet not vnfitly they may be brought vnto foure principall points: Adoration, whereunto as a thing hanging vpon it, is adioined ſpirituall obedience of conſcience: Affiance, Inuocation, and Thankſgiuing. Adoration I call the reuerence and worſhip which euery one of vs yeeldeth vnto him, when he ſubmitteth himſelfe vnto his greatneſſe: wherefore I doe not without cauſe make this a part thereof, that we yeeld our conſciences in ſubiection to his law. Affiance is an aſſuredneſſe of reſting in him by reknowledging of his powers, when repoſing all wiſedome, righteouſneſſe, power, truth, and goodneſſe in him, we thinke our ſelues bleſſed with only partaking of him. Inuocation, is a reſorting of our minde to his faith and help as to our only ſuccour, ſo oft as any neceſſitie preſſeth vs. Thankeſgiuing is a certaine thankfulneſſe whereby the praiſe of all good things is giuen vnto him. Of theſe, as God ſuffereth nothing to be conueyed away elſewhere, ſo he commandeth all to be wholy giuen to himſelfe. Neither ſhall it be ynough to abſtaine from hauing any ſtrange God, vnleſſe thou reſtraine thy ſelfe in this, that many wicked contemners are woont, which thinke the readieſt way to ſcorne all religions: but true religion muſt goe before, whereby our minds may be directed to the liuing God, with knowledge whereof they being endued may aſpire to reuerence, feare and worſhip his Maieſtie, to embrace the communicating of all his good things, euery where to ſeeke for his help, to reknowledge and aduance with confeſſion of praiſe the magnificence of his works, as to the onely marke in all the doings of our life. Then, that we beware of peruerſe ſuperſtition, whereby our mindes ſwaruing from the true God, are drawen hither and thether as it were vnto diuers gods. Wherefore, if we be contented with one God, let vs call to remembrance that which is before ſaid, that all forged gods are to be driuen farre away, and that the worſhip is not to be torne in ſunder, which he alone claimeth to himſelfe. For it is not lawfull to take away any thing from his glorie, be it neuer ſo little, but that all things that belong to him may wholy remaine with him. The parcell of ſentence that followeth (Before my face) encreaſeth the hainouſneſſe: for that God is prouoked to iealouſie, ſo oft as we thruſt our owne inuentions in his place, as if an vnchaſt woman by bringing in an adulterer openly before her husbands eies ſhould the more vexe his minde. Therefore when God teſtified that with his preſent power and grace he looked vpon the people that he had choſen, the more to fray them from the wicked act of falling from him, he giueth them warning that there can be no new gods brought in, but that he is witneſſe and beholder of their ſacrilege. For this boldneſſe is encreaſed with much wickedneſſe, that man thinketh that in his flyings away he can beguile the eies of God. On the other ſide, God crieth out that whatſoeuer we purpoſe, whatſoeuer we goe about, whatſoeuer we practiſe, it commeth in his ſight. Let therefore our conſcience be cleane euen from the moſt ſecret thoughts of ſwaruing from him, if we will haue our religion to pleaſe the Lord. For he requireth to haue the glorie of his godhead whole and vncorrupted not onely in outward confeſſion, but alſo in his eies, which doe behold the moſt ſecret corners of hearts.

The firſt Commandement wherein to eſtabliſh his ſole preeminence ouer his people, he requireth that which is due to be giuen him, and him alone, as adoration, affiance, inuocation, and thankeſgiuing, which if we doe not yeeld vnto him, or doe vnto others with him, either in whole, or in part, he hath a reuengeing eie to behold it, be it neuer ſo ſmall or ſecret.

The ſecond Commandement.

Thou ſhalt not make to thee any grauen image, nor any ſimilitude of thoſe things that are in heauen aboue or in earth beneath, or in the water vnder the earth. Thou ſhalt not worſhip them, nor ſerue them.

17 As in the firſt Commandement he pronounced that he is the one God, beſide whom there are no other gods to be deuiſed or had, ſo now he more openly declareth what to keep the worship of God pure from prophanation, he forbiddeth first to make any image for representation of God, and secondly to worship any image made.

The end of the ſecond Commandement being

what maner of God he is, and with what kind of worship he is to be honoured: that we may not presume to forge any carnall thing for him. The end therefore of this commandement is, that he will not haue the lawfull worship of him, to be prophaned with superstitious vsages. Wherefore in sum, he calleth and draweth vs away from the carnall obseruations, which our foolish minde is wont to inuent, when it conceiueth God according to her owne grosenes. And therfore he frameth vs to the lawfull worship of him, that is the spirituall worship, and which is appointed by him. He speaketh of the grossest fault that is in this offence, namely outward idolatrie. And there be two parts of this commaundement. The first restraineth our libertie, that we do not presume to make subiect to our senses or by any forme to represent God, which is incomprehensible. The second part forbiddeth vs to honour any images for religions sake. Moreouer he shortly reciteth all the formes wherewith he was wont to be expressed in shape, by the prophane and superstitious nations. By those things that are in heauen, he meaneth the Sunne, the Moone, and other Starres, and peraduenture also birdes, as expressing his meaning in the fourth of Deuteronomie he meaneth as well birds as stars. Which note I would not haue spoken of but that I saw some vnskilfully to apply it to Angels. Therefore I omit the other parts, because they are sufficiently knowen of themselues.

Deut. 4. 15.

And we haue already in the first booke taught plainly enough, that whatsoeuer visible formes of God man doth inuent, they are directly contrarie to his nature, and that therefore so soone as images come foorth, true religion is corrupted and defiled.

The penaltie annexed to the second commandement, which the better to imprint, God mentioneth his strength, his iealousie, his wont in shewing both vengeance and mercie, not slightly but with long continuance as well of the one as the other: and the reason why God of himselfe as in the person of an husband.

18 The penall ordinance that followeth ought not a litle to auaile to shake off our slothfulnesse. For he threateneth: That he is the Lord our God, a strong and ielous God, that visiteth the iniquitie of the fathers vpon the children vnto the third and fourth generation, in them that hate his name, & sheweth mercy vnto thousands to them that loue him and keepe his commandements. This is as much in effect, as if he should haue said, that it is he onely vpon whom we ought to sticke. And to bring vs therevnto, he speaketh of his power, that doth not without punishment suffer it selfe to be contemned or diminished. Here is indeed set the name El, which signifieth God. But because it is deriued of strength, to expresse the sense the better, I did not sticke so to translate it, or to put it into the text. Then he calleth himselfe ielous that can abide no fellow. Thirdly, he affirmeth that he will be a reuenger of his maiestie and glory if any doe transfer it to creatures or to grauen images, & that not with a short or slender reuenge, but such as shall extend to the children and childrens children, and childrens childrens children, that is such as shall be followers of their fathers vngodlines: as also he sheweth a perpetuall mercie and bountifulnes vnto long continuance of posteritie, to those that loue him and keepe his law. It is a common maner with God to take vpon him the person of a husband toward vs. For the coniunction wherewith he bindeth himselfe vnto vs, when he receiueth vs into the bosome of his church, is like vnto a certaine holy wedlock, that must stand by mutuall faithfulnesse. As he doth all the dueties of a faithfull & true husband, so againe he requireth of vs such loue and chastitie as ought to be in wedlock, that we yeeld not our soules to Satan, to lust, and to filthy desires of the flesh, to be defiled by them. Whereupon he that rebuketh the Apostasie of the Iewes, complaineth that they did throw away chastitie, and were defiled with adulteries. Therefore, as the husband, the more holy and chast that he himselfe is, the more is he kindled to anger if he see his wiues minde incline to a strange louer: so the Lord that hath wedded vs vnto himselfe in trueth, testifieth that he hath a most feruently burning iealousie, so oft as neglecting the pureness of his holy mariage, we are defiled with wicked lustes, but specially then when we transfer to any other, or doe infect with any superstition the worship of his name, which ought to be most vncorrupted: For asmuch as by this meane we doe not onely breake the faith giuen in wedlock, but also so defile the very wedding bed with bringing into it adulterers.

That by the punishment which God doth threaten to the children of the diso-

19 In the threatning is to be seene what he meaneth by this, when he saith, that he will visite the iniquitie of the fathers vpon the children vnto the third and fourth generation. For, beside that it standeth not with the equitie of Gods iustice, to punish the innocent for anothers offence, God himselfe also saith, that he will not make the sonne to beare the wickednesse of the Father. But this sentence is more than once repeated, of prolonging the punishment of the sinnes of the auncestours vpon the generation to come. For so doth Moses oftentimes speake vnto him: Lord, Lord, that rendrest the iniquitie of the fathers to the children, vnto the third and fourth generation. Likewise Hieremie: Thou that shewest mercy in thousands, that rendrest the iniquitie of the fathers into the bosome of the children after them. Many, while they trauell much in loosing this knot, thinke that it is to be vnderstood onely of temporall punishments, which the children suffer for the parents faults, it is no absurditie, for as much as they are oftentimes laid vpon them for their saluation, which is in deede true. For Esay declared to Ezechias, that his sonnes should be spoiled of the kingdome, and carried into exile for the sinne that he had committed. The houses of Pharao and Abimelech were plagued for offending Abraham. But when that is alleaged for alloyling of this question, it is rather a shift than a true exposition. For here and in like places he threatneth a more grieuous reuenge than it may be limited within the bounds of this present life. It is therefore thus to be taken: that the iust curse of the Lord, lieth not onely vpon the head of the wicked man himselfe, but also vpon his whole familie: when the curse once lieth vpon them, what is else to be looked for, but that the father being destitute of the spirit of God, liue most wickedly, and the sonne likewise forsaken of the Lord for the fathers fault, doe follow the same way of destruction: and finally the childes child, and the child of the childes child, the cursed seede of detestable men doe fall headlong after them?

bedient for their fathers faults that spirituall curse is meant whereby as the father being destitute of the spirit liueth wickedly, so the sonne likewise forsaken of God followeth the same way to destruction. Eze. 18. 20. Num. 14. 8. Ier. 32 18. Esay. 39 7. Gen. 12. 17. & 20. 3.

20 First let vs see, whether such reuenge be vnseemely for the iustice of God. If all the nature of man be damnable, we know that destruction is prepared for them, to whom the Lord vouchsafeth not to communicate his grace. Neuertheless they do perish by their owne vnrighteousnesse, and not by vnrighteous hatred of God. Neither is there left any cause to quarrell. Why they be not holpen by the grace of God to saluation as other are. Whereas therefore this punishment is laid vpon wicked men and euill doers for their offences, that their houses are depriued of the grace of God during many generations: who can accuse God for this most iust reuenge? But the Lord on the other side pronounceth, that the punishment of the fathers sinne shall not passe ouer vnto the sonne. Note what is there entreated of. When the Israelites had beene long and continually vexed with many calamities, they began to vse for a Prouerbe, that their fathers had eaten a sower grape, wherewith the childrens teeth were set on edge: whereby they meant that their fathers had committed sinnes, whereof they, being otherwise righteous, and not deseruing it, did suffer the punishment, rather by the vnappeasable wrathfulnesse of God, than by a moderate seueritie. The Prophet pronounceth vnto them that it is not so: because they are punished for their owne offences, and that it standeth not with the iustice of God, that the righteous sonne should suffer punishment for the naughtinesse of the wicked father. Which thing also is not contained in this present ordinance. For if the visiting, whereof mention is now made, be fulfilled when the Lord taketh away from the house of the wicked his grace, the light of his trueth and other helpes of saluation: in this that the children being blinded and forsaken of him, doe goe on in the steps of their fathers, they sustaine curses for their fathers offences. But inasmuch as they are put to temporall miseries, and at last to eternall destruction, herein they are punished by the iust iudgement of God, not for the sinnes of other, but for their owne iniquitie.

That for God so to plague men in their posteritie, it is neither vniust nor repugnant vnto that which the Prophet hath where he teacheth how childrens teeth are not set on edge by the sower grape which their fathers haue eaten. Eze. 18. 20.

21 On the other side is offered a promise of enlarging the mercie of God into a thousand generations, which promise is also often found in the Scriptures, and is set in the solemne couenant of the Church: I will be thy God, and of thy seede after thee. Which thing Salomon hauing respect vnto, writeth that the children of the righteous shall be blessed after their death, not onely by reason of holy bringing vp, which also not a little auaileth thereunto, but also for that blessing promised in the couenant, that the grace of God shall rest eternally in the houses of the godly. Hereupon groweth great comfort to the faithfull, great terror to the wicked. For if euen after death, a remembrance both of righteousnesse and wickednes be of so great force with God, that the cursing of the one, and the blessing of the other redoundeth vnto posterirtie much more shal it light & rest vpon the heads of the doers thēselues. But it maketh nothing against againſt vs, that the iſſue of the wicked many times commeth to good proofe, and the iſſue of the faithfull ſwarueth out of kinde: becauſe the Lawmaker meant not here to ſtabliſh ſuch a perpetuall rule as ſhould derogate his free election. For it ſufficeth for the comfort of the righteous and for the terror of the ſinner, that the penaltie is not vaine or of no effect, although it doe not alway take place. For as the temporall puniſhments that are laid vpon a few wicked men, are teſtimonies of the wrath of God againſt ſinnes, & of the iudgement that ſhall one day be giuen vpon all ſinners, although many eſcape vnpuniſhed euen to the end of their life: ſo when God giueth one example of this bleſſing to ſhew mercie and bountifulneſſe to the ſonne for the fathers ſake, he giueth a proofe of his conſtant and perpetuall fauour to them that worſhip him: and when he once purſueth the wickedneſſe of the father in the ſonne, he ſheweth what iudgement is prepared for all the reprobate for their owne offences. Which aſſuredneſſe he had in this place principally reſpect vnto. And by the way he commendeth vnto vs the largeneſſe of his mercie which he extendeth vnto a thouſand generations, wheras he aſſigned but onely foure generations to vengeance.

The promise of mercie towards them and theirs that feare God, breedeth comfort, is not contraried by their issues, swarming sometimes out of kind, and it setteth out the largenesse of his mercy to exceed the rigour of his iustice. Gen. 17. 7. Pro. 20. 7.

The third Commandement.

Thou ſhalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vaine.

The ende of the third commandement is the holy eſtimation of Gods name which excludeth al conceipts and ſpeaches concerning him which are not according to his highneſſe: all irreuerend mentioning of his word, all carping at his workes: and if all raſh, much more all impious abuſing thereof.

22 The ende of this Commandement is, that his will is to haue the maieſtie of his name to be holy among vs. Therefore the ſumme ſhall be that we doe not defile it with contemptuouſly and irreuerently vſing it. With which prohibition the commandement hangeth orderly together, that we take ſtudie and care godlily to reuerence it. Therefore we ought ſo to order our ſelues both in our mindes and in our tongues, that we neither thinke nor ſpeake any thing of God himſelfe or his miſteries, but reuerently and with much ſobrietie: that in weying his workes, we conceiue nothing but honorable toward him. Theſe three things I ſay, it behoooueth vs not negligently to marke, that whatſoeuer our minde conceiueth of him, whatſoeuer our tongue vttereth, it may ſauour of his excellencie, and may agree with the holy highneſſe of his name: and finally may ſerue to aduance his magnificence. That we doe not raſhly or diſorderly abuſe his holy word and reuerend myſteries either to ambition, or to couetouſneſſe, or to our owne triflings: but that as they beare the dignitie of his name imprinted in them, ſo they may keepe their honor and eſtimation among vs. Laſt of all, that we doe not carpe againſt or ſpeake euill of his works, as theſe wretched men are wont to babble reprochfully againſt them: but that whatſoeuer we rehearſe done by him, we report it with words of praiſe of his wiſedome, righteouſnes and goodneſſe. That is to ſanctifie the name of God. Where otherwiſe is done, it is defiled with vaine and peruerſe abuſe, becauſe it is violently carried from the right vſe whereunto onely it was appointed: and though there be no other hurt done, yet it is ſpoyled of his dignitie, and by little and little brought to contempt. Now, if there be ſo much euill in this raſh readineſſe to vſe the name of God out of ſeaſon, much more miſchiefe is in this, if it be imployed to euill vſes, as they doe that make it to ſerue the ſuperſtitions of Necromancie, cruell execrations, vnlawfull coniurations, and other wicked enchauntments. But ſwearing is chiefly mentioned in the cōmandement, as the thing wherein the peruerſe abuſe of Gods name is moſt deteſtable, that thereby we may be the better altogether frayed away from all defiling thereof. But that here is commandement giuen of the worſhip of God, and of the reuerence of his name, and not of the truth and equitie that is to be kept among men, appeareth by that that he afterward in the ſecond table condemneth periurie and falſe witneſſe, wherey hurt is done to the fellowſhip of men: but it were in vaine to repeat it againe, if this commandement intreated of the duetie of charitie. And alſo the diuiſion of the Law it ſelfe requireth it, bicauſe as it is ſaid, God did not in vaine appoint two tables for his Law, whereby is gathered that in this commandement he challengeth his own right to himſelfe, and defendeth the holineſſe of his name, and teacheth not what men owe to men.

The honour which God re-

23 Firſt is to be learned what is an oath. It is a taking of God to witneſſe, to confirme the truth of that which we ſpake. For thoſe curſed ſpeeches that containe manifeſt nifeſt reproches againſt God, are vnworthy to be reckened among othes. That ſuch taking to witnes, when it is rightly done, is a kinde of worſhipping of God, is ſhewed in diuers places of the Scripture. As when Eſay prophecieth of the calling of the Aſſyrians and Ægyptians into fellowſhip of the couenant with Iſrael, They ſhall ſpeake (ſaith he) in the tongue of Canaan, and ſhall ſweare in the name of the Lord. That is to ſay, in ſwearing by the name of the Lord, they ſhall yeeld a confeſſion of his religion. Againe, when he ſpeaketh of the enlargement of his kingdome, he ſaith. Whoſoeuer ſhall bleſſe himſelfe, ſhall bleſſe in the God of the faithfull: and he that ſhall ſweare in the land ſhall ſweare in the true God. Ieremie ſaith, if they ſhall teach the people to ſweare in my name as they haue taught them to ſweare by Baal, they ſhall be builded vp in the middes of my houſe. And for good cauſe it is ſaid, that when we call vpon the name of the Lord to witneſſe, we doe witneſſe our religion toward him. For ſo we confeſſe that he is the eternall and vnchangeable truth, whom we call vpon, not onely as a moſt ſubſtantiall witneſſe of truth aboue all other, but alſo as the only defence thereof, which is able to bring foorth hidden things into light, & then as the knower of hearts. For where teſtimonies of men doe faile, there we flee to God for witneſſe ſpecially where any thing is to be prooued that lyeth ſecret in conſcience. For which cauſe the Lord is bitterly angry with them that ſweare by ſtrange Gods, and he iudgeth that maner of ſwearing to be an argument of manifeſt falling from his allegeance: Thy ſonnes haue forſaken me, and doe ſweare by them that are no Gods. And he declareth the hainouſneſſe of this offence by the threatning of puniſhment: I will deſtroy them that ſweare by the name of the Lord, and ſweare by Melcham.

24 Now then we vnderſtand that it is the Lord his will that there be in our othes a worſhip of his name: ſo much the more diligent heed is to be taken, that in ſteed of worſhipping they doe not containe diſhonour, contempt or abacement of it. For it is no ſmall diſhonour, when periurie is committed in ſwearing by him, wherefore it is called in the law, Profanation. For what is left to the Lord when he is ſpoyled of his truth? he ſhall then ceaſſe to be God. But truely he is ſpoyled thereof, when he is made an affirmer and approouer of falſhood. Wherefore, when Ioſua minded to driue Achan to confeſſe the truth, he ſaid: My Sonne, giue glory to the Lord of Iſrael, meaning thereby, that the Lord is grieuouſly diſhonored if a man ſweare falſely by him. And no maruell. For we doe as much as in vs lyeth, in a maner to ſtaine his holy name with a lie. And that this maner of ſpeech was vſed among the Iewes ſo oft as any was called to take an othe, appeareth by the like proteſtation, that the Phariſees vſe in the Goſpell of Iohn. To this heedfulneſſe the formes of othes that are vſed in the Scriptures doe inſtruct vs: The Lord liueth, The Lord doe theſe things vnto me, and adde theſe things, The Lord be witneſſe vpon my ſoule. Which doe prooue, that we cannot call God for witneſſe of our ſayings, but that we alſo wiſh him to take vengeance of our periurie, if we ſpeake deceitfully.

25 The name of the Lord is made vile and common, when it is vſed in ſuperfluous othes, although they be true. For in ſuch caſe it is alſo taken in vaine. Wherefore it ſhall not be ſufficient to abſtaine from ſwearing falſely, vnleſſe we doe alſo remember that ſwearing was ſuffered and ordained not for luſt or pleaſure, but for neceſſities ſake: and therefore they goe beyond the lawfull vſe thereof, that apply it to things not neceſſarie. And there can no other neceſſitie be pretended, but where it is to ſerue either religion or charitie, wherein at this day men doe too much licentiouſly offend, and ſo much the more intolerably, for that by very cuſtome it hath ceaſſed to be reckoned for any offence at all, which yet before the iudgement ſeate of God is not ſlenderly weyed. For euery where without regard, the name of God is defiled in triſling talkes, and it is not thought that they doe euill, becauſe by long ſuffered and vnpuniſhed boldneſſe, they are come to reſt as it were in poſſeſſion of ſo great wickedneſſe. But the commandement of the Lord remaineth in force, the penaltie abideth in ſtrength, and ſhall one day haue his effect, whereby there is a certaine ſpeciall reuenge proclaimed againſt them that vſe his name in vaine. This commandement is alſo tranſgreſſed in another point, that in our othes we put the holy ſeruants of God in the place of God, with manifeſt vngodlineſſe, for ſo we tranſferre the glory of his Godhead to them.

them. Neither is it without cause that the Lord hath giuen a speciall commaundement to sweare by his name, and by speciall prohibition forbidden, that we should not be heard sweare by any strange Gods. And the Apostle euidently testifieth the same, when he writeth, that men in swearing doe call vpon a higher than themselues, and that God which had none greater than his owne glory to sweare by, did sweare by himselfe.

The folly of Anabaptists in collecting the simple vnlawfulnes of all othes out of the words of our Sauiour Christ. Mat.5. Iacob.5. Exod.22.11. Iohn 7.16.

26 The Anabaptistes not contented with this moderation of swearing, doe detest all othes without exception, because the prohibition of Christ is generall: I say vnto ye, sweare not at all, but let your talke be yea yea, and nay nay, whatsoeuer is more than this, is of euil. But by this meane, they do without consideration stumble against Christ: while they make him aduersarie to his Father, and as if he had come downe from heauen to repeale his Fathers decrees. For the eternall God doth not onely in the Law permit swearing as a thing lawfull, which were enough: but also in necessitie doth cõmand it. But Christ affirmeth that he is all one with his Father: that he bringeth no other thing, but that which his Father commanded him, that his doctrine is not of himselfe, &c. What then? will they make God contrarie to himselfe, which shall afterwards forbid and condemne the same thing in mens behauiours, which he hath before allowed by commanding it? But because there is some difficultie in the words of Christ, let vs a litle weigh them. But herein we shall neuer attaine the trueth, vnlesse we bend our eies vnto the intent of Christ, & take heed vnto the purpose that he there goeth about. His purpose is not either to release or restraine the Law, but to reduce it to the true and naturall vnderstanding, which had beene very much deprawed by the false glosses of the Scribes and Pharisees. This if we hold in minde, we shall not thinke that Christ did vtterly condemne othes, but onely those othes which doe transgresse the rule of the law. Thereby it appeareth, that the people at that time did forbeare no maner of swearing but periuries, whereas the law doth not onely forbid periuries, but also all idle & superfluous othes. The Lord therefore the most sure expositor of the law, doth admonish them, that it is not onely euill to forsweare, but also to sweare. But how to sweare? in vaine. But as for these othes that are commended in the Law, he leaueth them safe & at libertie. They seeme to fight somewhat more strongly when they take earnest hold of this word, At all, which yet is not referred to the word Swear, but to the forms of swearing that are after rehearsed. For this was also part of their errour, that when they did sweare by heauen and earth, they thought that they did not touch the name of God. Therefore after the principall kinde of offence against this commandement, the Lord doth also cut off from them all by shifts that they should not thinke that they haue escaped, if not speaking of the name of God they call heauen & earth to witnesse. For here by the way it is also to be noted, that although the name of God be not expressed, yet men by indirect formes doe sweare by him, as if they sweare by the liuely light, by the bread that they eare, by their Baptisme or other tokens of Gods liberalitie towards them. Neither doth Christ in that place where he forbiddeth them to sweare by heauen and earth and Hierusalem, speake it to correct superstition, as some men falsely thinke, but he rather confuteth their sophisticall subtletie, which thought it no fault bablingly to throw out indirect othes, as though they spared the holy name of God, which is engrauen in all his benefits. But otherwise it is, where either a mortall man, or a dead man, or an Angell is put in the place of God: as among the prophane nations flatterie deuised that stinking forme of swearing by the life or soule of the King: for then the false making of Gods doth obscure and minish the glory of the one onely God. But when we meane onely, to procure credit to our saying by the holy name of God, although the same be indirectly done, yet in all such trifling othes his maiestie is offended. Christ taketh from this licentiousnesse, all pretence of excuse, in this that he forbiddeth to sweare at all. And Iames to the same purpose, reciting the same words of Christ which I haue before alleaged, because the same rash boldnes hath alwaies beene in the world, which is a prophane misusing of the name of GOD. For if ye refer this word, at all, to the substance, as if without any exception it were altogether vnlawfull to sweare: wherefore serueth that exposition which is added afterward: Neither by heauen nor by earth, &c? Whereby it sufficiently appeareth that those cauillations are met withal, by which the Iewes thought their fault to be excused.

Mat 5.34.

Iac.5.12.

27 Therefore

27 Therefore it cannot now be doubtfull to ſound iudgements, that the Lord in that place did onely reproue thoſe othes that were forbidden by the law. For he himſelfe which ſhewed in his life an examplar of the perfectiō that he taught, did not ſticke to ſweare when occaſion required. And his Diſciples, who (we doubt not) did obey their Maſter in all things, followed the ſame example: who dare ſay that Paul would haue ſworne, if ſwearing had beene vtterly forbidden? but when the matter ſo required, he ſware without any ſticking at it, yea, ſometime adding an execration. But this queſtion is not yet ended, becauſe ſome doe thinke that onely publike othes are excepted out of this prohibition, as thoſe othes that we take when the Magiſtrate doth offer them to vs and require them of vs. And ſuch as Princes vſe to take in ſtabliſhing of leagues, or the people when they ſweare allegeance to their Prince, or the Souldiar when he is put to an oath for his true ſeruice in the war, and ſuch like. And to this ſort they adioyne, and that rightfully, ſuch othes as are in Paul, to confirme the dignitie of the Goſpell, for as much as the Apoſtles in their office are not priuate men but publike miniſters of God. And truely I deny not that thoſe are the ſafeſt othes, becauſe they are defended with ſoundeſt teſtimonies of Scripture. The Magiſtrate is commanded in a doubtfull caſe to driue the witneſſe to an oath, and he on the other ſide to anſwer by oath: and the Apoſtle ſaith, that mens controuerſies are by this meane ended. In this commandement both theſe haue a perfect allowance of their offices. Yea, and we may note, that among the olde heathen men, the publicke and ſolemne oath was had in great reuerence, but common othes that were vſually ſpoken without conſideration, were either nothing or very little regarded, becauſe they thought that in theſe they had not to doe with the maieſtie of God at all. But yet it were too much dangerous to condemne priuate othes, that are in neceſſarie caſes ſoberly, holily, and reuerently taken, which are maintained both by reaſon and examples. For if it be lawfull for priuate men in a weightie and earneſt matter to appeale to God as iudge betweene them, much more is it lawfull to call him to witneſſe. Put the caſe: thy brother will accuſe thee of falſe breach of faith, thou endeuoureſt to purge thy ſelfe according to the duetie of charitie, and he by no meanes will ſuffer himſelfe to be ſatisfied. If thy good name come in perill by his obſtinate malicioufneſſe, thou ſhalt without offence appeale to the iudgement of God, that it will pleaſe him in time to make thine innocencie knowne. Now if the weight of the words be conſidered, it is a leſſe matter to call him to witneſſe. Therefore I ſee not why in this caſe we ſhould affirme, that the calling him to witneſſe is vnlawfull. And we are not without many examples thereof. For though the othe of Abraham and Iſaac with Abimelech be ſaid not to ſerue for our purpoſe, becauſe it was made in the name of a publike companie, yet Iacob and Laban were priuate men, which ſtabliſhed a couenant with mutuall othe betweene themſelues. Booz was a priuate man which by the ſame meane confirmed his promiſe of marriage to Ruth. Abdias was a priuate man, a iuſt man and fearing God, which affirmed vnto Elias by oth, the thing that he meant to perſwade him. Therefore I haue no better rule, but that othes be ſo tempered, that they be not vnaduiſed, that they be not common without regard, that they be not vſed of raging luſt, nor trifling, but that they ſerue iuſt neceſſitie, as where the Lords glory is to be maintained, or the edification of our brother furthered, to which end the commandement of the law tendeth.

Othes not onely publike but alſo priuate ſoberly and reuerently taken allowable and according both to reaſon and to approued examples.

The fourth Commandement.

Remember that thou keepe holy the Saboth day. Sixe daies ſhalt thou worke and doe all thy workes. But on the ſeuenth day is the Saboth of the Lord thy God. In it thou ſhalt doe no worke, &c.

28 The end of this Commandement is, that we being dead to our owne affections and workes, ſhould be buſied in meditation of the kingdome of God, and to the ſame meditation ſhould be exerciſed, by ſuch meanes as he hath ordained. But becauſe this Commandement hath a peculiar and ſeuerall conſideration from the reſt, therefore it muſt haue alſo a ſeuerall maner of expoſition. The olde writers vſe to call it a ſhadowiſh Commandement, for that it conteineth the outward obſeruation of the day, which which by the comming of Christ was taken away with the other figures. Wherein I grant they say truely, but they touch but halfe the matter. Wherefore we must fetch the exposition of it further off. And (as I thinke) I haue marked that there are three causes to be considered, whereupon this commandement consisteth. For first the heauenly lawmaker meant vnder the rest of the seauenth day, to set out in figure to the people of Israel the spirituall rest, whereby the faithfull ought to cease from their owne workes, that they might suffer God to worke in them. Secondarily, his will was to haue one appointed day, wherein they should meete together to heare the Law, and execute the ceremonies, or at least bestow it peculiarly to the meditation of his workes: that by such calling to remembrance, they might be exercised to godlines. Thirdly, he thought good to haue a day of rest graunted to seruants, and such as liued vnder the gouernement of other, wherein they might haue some ceasing from their labor.

The Sabboth a figure of spirituall rest. Num. 13 22. Ezc 20.21. & 23.38. Ierc.17.12. & 27. Exod.31.13. & 35.2 Nehe.9.14.

29 But we are many waies taught, that the same shadowing of the spiritual rest was the principall point in the Sabboth. For the Lord required the keeping of no Commandement in a maner more seuerely, than this: when his meaning is in the Prophets to declare that all religion is ouerthrowen, then he complaineth that his Sabbothes are polluted, defiled, not kept, nor sanctified: as though that peece of seruice being omitted, there remained no more wherein he might be honored. He did set foorth the obseruing thereof with high praises. For which cause the faithfull did among other oracles maruellously esteeme the reueiling of the Sabboth. For in Nehemiah thus spake the Leuites in a solemne conuocation, Thou hast shewed to our Fathers thy holy Sabboth, and hast giuen them the Commandements and the ceremonies, and the law by the hand of Moses. You see how it is had in singular estimation among all the Commandements of the law. All which things doe serue to set foorth the dignitie of the mysterie, which is very well expressed by Moses and Ezechiel. Thus you haue in Exodus, See that yee keepe my Sabboth day, because it is a token betweene me and you in your generations: that you may know that I am the Lord that sanctifie you: keepe my Sabboth, for it is holy vnto you. Let the children of Israel keepe the Sabboth and celebrate it in their generations, it is an euerlasting couenant betweene me and the children of Israel, and a perpetuall token. Yet Ezechiel speaketh more at large. But the summe thereof commeth to this effect, that it is for a token whereby Israel should know that God is their sanctifier. If our sanctification be the mortifying of our owne will, then appeareth a most apt relation of the outward signe with the inward thing it selfe: we must altogither rest, that God may worke in vs: we must depart from our owne will, we must resigne vp our heart, we must banish all lustes of the flesh. Finally, we must cease from all the doings of our owne wit, that we may haue God working in vs: that we may rest in him, as the Apostle also teacheth.

Ezc.20.12.

Heb. 3.13 & 4.9.

God appointing the seuenth day for the sabboth, and his ratifying the same by his owne example, was to confirme the perfection of that euerlasting rest whereof the sabboth day being a figure is appointed on a day which following in orderly numeration beareth the name of a perfect number. Esa. 66. 23. 1.Cor.15.28.

30 This perpetual ceassing was represented to the Iewes, by the keeping of one day among seuen: which day, to make it be obserued with greater deuotion, the Lord commended with his owne example. For it auaileth not a little to stirre vp mans endeuour, that he may know that he tendeth to the following of his Creator. If any man search for a secret signification in the number of seuen: Forasmuch as that number is in the Scripture the number of perfection, it was not without cause chosen to signifie euerlasting continuance. Wherewith this also agreeth that Moses in the day that he declared that the Lord did rest from his works, maketh an ende of describing the succeeding of daies and nights. There may be also brought an other probable note of the number, that the Lord thereby meant to shew that the Sabboth should neuer be perfectly ended, till it came to the last day. For in it we begin our blessed rest, in it we doe daily proceede in profiting more and more. But bicause we haue still a continuall warre with the flesh, it shall not be ended vntill that saying of Esay be fulfilled, concerning the continuing of new Moone with new Moone, of Sabboth with Sabboth, euen then when God shall be all in all. It may seeme therfore that the Lord hath by the seuenth day set forth to his people the perfection to come of his Sabboth at the last day, that our whole life might by continuall meditation of the Sabboth, aspire to this perfection.

The principall thing in the sa-

31 If any man mislike this obseruation of the number as a matter too curious, I am not against him, but that he may more simply take it: that the Lord ordained one

certaine day, wherein his people might vnder the schooling of the law be exercised to the continuall meditation of the spirituall rest: And that he assigned the seuenth day, either because he thought it sufficient, or that by setting foorth the likenesse of his own example, he might the better mooue the people to keepe it or at least to put them in minde, that the Sabboth tended to no other ende, but that they should become like vnto their Creator. For it maketh small matter, so that the mysterie remaine which is therein principally set foorth, concerning the perpetuall rest of our works, to consideration whereof the Prophets did now and then call backe the Iewes that they should not thinke themselues discharged by carnall taking of their rest. Beside the places alreadie alleaged, you haue thus in Esay: If thou turne away thy foote from the Sabboth, that thou doe not thine owne will in my holy day, and shalt call the Sabboth delicate and holy of the glorious Lord, and shalt glorifie him while thou doest not thine own waies, and seekest not thine owne will to speake the word, then shalt thou be delited in the Lord, &c. But it is no doubt, that by the comming of our Lord Christ, so much as was ceremoniall herein, was abrogate. For he is the truth, by whose presence all figures doe vanish away, he is the bodie at sight whereof the shadowes are left, he, I say, is the true fulfilling of the Sabboth, we being buried with him by Baptisme, are grafted into the fellowship of his death, that we being made partakers of the resurrection, we may walke in newnesse of life. Therefore in another place the Apostle writeth that the Sabboth was a shadow of a thing to come: and that the true bodie, that is to say, the perfect substance of truth is in Christ, which in the same place he hath well declared. That is not contained in one day, but in the whole course of our life, vntill that we being vtterly dead to our selues, be filled with the life of God. Therefore superstitious obseruing of daies ought to be farre from Christians.

both is the mysterie of perpetuall rest: the ceremoniall vse thereof abrogated, the superstitious obseruation to be auoided.

Esay 58.13.

Rom.6.4.

Col.2.16.& 17.

32 But forasmuch as the two latter causes ought not to be reckoned among the old shadowes, but doe belong alike to all ages: since the Sabbat is abrogate, yet this hath still place with vs, that we should meete at appointed daies to the hearing of the word, to the breaking of the mysticall bread, and to publike prayer: and then that to seruants and labourers be graunted their rest from their labour. It is out of doubt that in commanding the Sabbat, the Lord had care of both these things. The first of them hath sufficient testimonie by the onely vse of the Iewes to prooue it. The second, Moses spake of in Deuteronomie in these words: that thy man seruant and thy maide seruant may rest as well as thou: remember that thou thy selfe didst serue in Ægypt. Againe, in Exodus: that thy Oxe and thy Asse may rest, and the sonne of thy bondwoman may take breath. Who can denie that both these things doe serue for vs as well as for the Iewes? Meetings at the Church, are commanded vs by the word of God, and the necessitie of them is sufficiently knowen in the very experience of life. Vnlesse they be certainely appointed and haue their ordinary daies, how can they be kept? All things by the sentence of the Apostle are to be done comely and in order among vs. But so farre is it off, that comelinesse and order can be kept without this policie and moderation, that there is at hand present trouble and ruine of the Church, if it be dissolued. Now if the same necessitie be among vs, for releese whereof the Lord appointed the Sabboth to the Iewes: let no man say that it belongeth nothing vnto vs. For our most prouident and tender Father, willed no lesse to prouide for our necessitie than for the Iewes. But thou wilt say, why doe we not rather daily meete together, that the difference of daies may be taken away? I would to God, that were granted, and truly spirituall wisedome was a thing worthy to haue dayly a peece of the time cut out for it. But if it cannot be obtained of the weakenesse of many to haue dayly meetings, and the rule of charitie doth not suffer vs to exact more of them, why should we not obey the order which we see laid vpon vs by the will of God.

Although the first vse of the Sabboth which was to signifie spirituall rest being ceremoniall be done away, yet the second and third, whereby it was appointed for the people of God to meete and for labourers to cease on doth still remaine.

Deut 5.14.
Exo.25.12.
1.Cor.14.40.

33 I am compelled here to be somewhat long, because at this day many vnquiet spirits doe raise trouble, concerning the Sunday. They crie out that the Christian people are nourished in Iewishnesse, because they keepe some obseruation of daies. But I answer, that we keepe those daies without any Iewishnesse, because we doe in this behalfe farre differ from the Iewes. For we keepe it not with straite religion as a ceremonie, wherein we thinke a spirituall mysterie to be figured, but we retaine it as a

The difference betweene Iewes and Christians in obseruing the Sabboth day: they keepe it as a shadowe of a thing spirituall, we onely for politicall partly, and partly for Ecclesiasticall orders sake. Col.2.16. Gal.4.10. Rom.14.5.

necessarie remedie to the keping of order in the Church. But Paul teacheth that in keeping thereof they are not to be iudged Christians, because it is a shadow of a thing to come. Therefore he feared that he had laboured in vaine among the Galathians, because they did still obserue daies. And to the Romanes he affirmeth that it is superstition if any man doe make difference betweene day and day. But who, sauing these madde men only doth not see, of what obseruing the Apostle meaneth? For they had no regard to this politicall end and the order of the Church, but whereas they kept thē still as shadowes of spirituall things, they did euen so much darken the glory of Christ and the light of the Gospell. They did not therefore cease from handie works, because they were things that did call them away frō holy studies & meditations, but for a certaine religion, that in ceasing from worke they did dreame that they still kept their mysteries of olde time deliuered thē. The Apostle, I say, inueigheth against this disordered difference of daies, and not against the lawfull choise of daies that serueth for the quietnesse of Christian fellowship: for in the Churches that he himselfe did ordaine, the Sabboth was kept to this vse. For he appointeth the Corinthians the same day, wherin they should gather the collection to relieue the brethren at Ierusalem. If they feare superstition, there was more danger thereof in the feast daies of the Iewes, than in the Sundaies that the Christians now haue. For so as was expedient for the ouerthrowing of superstition, the day that the Iewes religiously obserued is taken away: and, so as was necessarie for keeping of comlinesse, order, and quiet in the Church, another day was appointed for the same vse.

The blamelesse intent of Christians substituting the Sunday in steed of the Iewes Sabboth, and of others among Christians hauing other festiuall daies appointed for the same purposes: the principall exercises whereby the Sabboth sanctified: their trifling vanitie which see no difference betweene Iewes and Christians but the change of the day, when in the vse of the day in deed we principally differ. Hist. trip. lib. 9. cap. 38.

34 Albeit the olde Fathers haue not without reason of their choise, put in place of the Sabboth day, the day that we call Sunday. For whereas in the Resurrection of the Lord is the end & fulfilling of that rest, wherof the old Saboth was a shadow: the Christians are by the very same day that made an end of shadowes, put in minde that they should no longer sticke vnto the shadowish ceremonie. But yet I doe not so rest vpon the number of seuen, that I would binde the Church to the bondage thereof. Neither will I condemne those Churches, that haue other solemne daies for their meetings, so that they be without superstition, which shall be, if they be onely applied to the obseruation of Discipline and well appointed order. Let the sum hereof be this: as the truth was giuen to the Iewes vnder a figure, so is it deliuered vs without any shadowes at all. First, that in all our life long we should be in meditation of a continuall Sabboth or rest from our own works, that the Lord may worke in vs by his Spirit: then that euery man priuately so oft as he hath leisure, should diligently exercise himselfe in godly calling to minde the works of God, and also, that we all should keepe the lawfull order of the Church appointed, for the hearing of the word, for the ministration of the Sacraments and for publike praier: thirdly, that we should not vngently oppresse them that be vnder vs. And so doe the triflings of the false Prophets vanish away that in the ages past haue infected the people with a Iewish opinion, that so much as was ceremoniall in this commandement is taken away, which they in their tongue call the appointing of the seuenth day, but that so much as is morall remaineth, which is the keeping of one day in the weeke. But that is nothing else in effect, than for reproch of the Iewes to change the day, and to keepe still the same holinesse in their minde. For there still remaineth with vs the like signification of mysterie in the daies as was among the Iewes. And truely we see what good they haue done by such doctrine. For they that cleaue to their constitutions, doe by these as much exceede as the Iewes in grosse and carnall superstition of Sabboth: so that the rebukings that are read in Esay, doe no lesse fitly serue for them at these daies, than for those that the Prophet reproued in his time. But this generall doctrine is principally to be kept, that least religion should fall away or waxe faint among vs, holy meetings are to be diligently kept, and those outward helps are to be vsed that are profitable for to nourish the worshipping of God.

The fifth Commandement.

Honour thy Father and thy Mother, that thou maist liue long vpon the land which the Lord thy God shall giue thee.

The ende of the fift comman.

35 The ende of this commandement is, that because the Lord deliteth in the preseruation of his order, therefore he willeth that those degrees of preeminence which he

he hath ordeined be not broken, the ſumme therefore ſhall be that we reuerence thoſe whom the Lord hath ſet ouer vs, that we yeeld to them honour, obedience and thankfulneſſe. Whereupon followeth that it is forbidden vs, to withdraw any thing from their dignitie, either by contempt or obſtinacie or vnthankfulnes. For ſo doth the word Honour, in the Scripture ſignifie very largly: as when the Apoſtle ſaith, that the elders which rule well are worthy of double honour, he meaneth not onely that reuerence is due vnto them, but alſo ſuch recompence as their miniſterie deſerueth. And becauſe this commandement of ſubiection, doth moſt of all diſagree with the peruerſneſſe of mans nature, which as it ſwelleth with greedines of climbing high, ſo it hardly abideth to be brought low: therefore he hath ſet that kinde of ſuperioritie for example, which by nature is moſt amiable and leaſt enuious: becauſe he might the eaſily er meeken and reclaime our mindes to the vſe of ſubmiſſion. Therefore the Lord doth by litle and litle traine vs to all lawfull ſubiection by that which is moſt eaſie to beare, foraſmuch as the rule of all is alike. For to whom he giueth any preeminence, he doth communicate his owne name with them, ſo farre as is neceſſarie to preſerue the ſame preeminence: The name of Father, God, and Lord, doe ſo belong vnto him alone, that ſo oft as we heare one of them named, our minde muſt needs be touched with a feeling of his maieſtie. Therefore whom he maketh partakers of theſe things, he maketh to gliſter with a certaine ſparke of his brightneſſe, that they may be honorable euery one according to his degree. Therefore in him that is our father we haue to conſider ſomewhat of the nature of God, becauſe he beareth not the name of God without cauſe. He that is our Prince or our Lord, hath ſome partaking of honour with God.

dement is preſeruation of order, for which God cõmandeth all things belonging to the honor, and forbiddeth any thing tending to the diſhonor of ſuperiors whom he beautifieth with amiable names to meaken the mindes of men vnto obedience and ſubiection vnder them. 1. Tim. 1. 5.

36 Wherefore it ought not to be doubted that God doth here ſet a generall rule, that as we know any man to be by his ordinance ſet ouer vs, ſo we yeeld vnto him reuerence, obedience, thankfulneſſe, and ſuch other duties as it lieth in vs to doe. And it maketh no difference, whether they be worthy or vnworthy: For of what ſort ſoeuer they be, they haue not without the prouidence of God attained that place, by reaſon whereof the law-maker would haue them to be honoured. Yet namely he hath giuen cõmandement of reuerence to parents, that haue brought vs into this life, to which reuerence very nature ought in a maner to inſtruct vs. For they are monſters and not men, that breake the authoritie of parents with diſhonour or ſtubburnneſſe. Therefore the Lord commanded all the diſobedient to there parents, to be ſlaine, as men vnworthy to enioy the benefit of light, that doe not reknowledge by whoſe meanes they came into it. And by many additions of the law it appeareth to be true that we haue noted, that there are three parts of honour that he here ſpeaketh of, Reuerence, Obedience, and Thankfulneſſe. The firſt of theſe the Lord eſtabliſheth when he commandeth him to be killed that curſeth his Father or his Mother, for there he puniſheth the contempt and diſhonour of them. The ſecond he confirmeth when he appointeth the puniſhment of death for the diſobedient and rebellious childrē. To the third belongeth that ſaying of Chriſt in the fifteenth of Mathew, that it is the commandement of God that we doe good to our parents. And ſo oft as Paul maketh mention of a commandement, he expoundeth that therein obedience is required.

Vnto parents ſo tearmed in reſpect of their preeminence be they good or bad, as alſo vnto our natur all parents the honor of reuerence, obedience and thankfulnes is required at our hands. Exod. 21. Leui. 20. 9. Leui. 10. 9. Pro. 10 10. Deut. 21. 18. Mat. 15 4. Eph 5 1. Col. 3. 20.

37 There is annexed a promiſe for a commendation, which doth the rather put vs in minde, how acceptable vnto God is the ſubmiſſion that is here commanded. For Paul vſeth the ſame pricke to ſtirre vp our dulneſſe when he ſaith: that this is the firſt commandement with promiſe. For the promiſe that went before in the firſt Table, was not ſpecial and properly belonging to one commandement, but extended to the whole law. Now this is thus to be taken: The Lord ſpake to the Iſraelites peculiarly of the land which he had promiſed them for their inheritance. If then the poſſeſſion of land was a pledge of Gods bountifulneſſe: let vs not meruaile if it pleaſed God to declare his fauour by giuing length of life, by which a man might long enioy his benefit. The meaning therefore is thus: Honour thy Father and thy Mother, that by a long ſpace of life thou maieſt enioy the poſſeſſion of that land that ſhall be vnto thee for a teſtimonie of my fauour. But ſith all the earth is bleſſed to the faithfull, we doe worthily reckon this preſent life among the bleſſings of God. Therefore this promiſe doth likewiſe belong vnto vs, forſomuch as the continuance of this life is a proofe of Gods goodwill.

What is meant by the promiſe annexed to the firſt commandement, & how it may ſtand with the ſhortnes of their lines that are moſt obedient.

For it neither is promiſed to vs, nor was promiſed to the Iewes, as though it contained bleſſednesſe in it ſelfe, but becauſe it is woont to be to the godly a token of Gods tender loue. Therefore if it chaunce that an obedient childe to his parents be taken out of this life before his ripe age, which is oftentimes ſeene, yet doth God no leſſe conſtantly continue in the performance of his promiſe, than if he ſhould reward him with a hundred Acres of land, to whom he promiſed but one Acre. All conſiſteth in this, that we ſhould conſider that long life is ſo farre promiſed vs, as it is the bleſſing of God, and that it is his bleſſing ſo farre as it is a proofe of his fauour, which he by death doth much more plentifully and perfectly witneſſe and ſhew in effect to his ſeruants.

The curſes that fall vpon the diſobedient, in which number are all that withdraw their ſubiection from them to whom they owe all ſubmiſſion in the Lord, but no otherwiſe than in the Lord.

38 Moreouer, when the Lord promiſeth the bleſſing of this preſent life to the children that honor their parents with ſuch reuerence as they ought, he doth withal ſecretly ſay, that moſt aſſured curſe hangeth ouer the ſtubborne and diſobedient children. And that the ſame ſhould not want execution: he pronounceth them by his law ſubiect to the iudgement of death, and commaundeth them to be put to execution: and if they eſcape that iudgement, he himſelfe taketh vengeance on them by one meane or other. For we ſee how great a number of that ſort of men are ſlaine in battels and in fraies, and ſome other tormented in ſtrange vnaccuſtomed faſhions, and they all in a maner are a proofe that this threatning is not vaine. But if any eſcape to olde age, ſith in this life being depriued of the bleſſing of God, they doe nothing but miſerably languiſh, and are reſerued for greater paines hereafter, they are farre from being partakers of the bleſſing promiſed to the godly children. But this is alſo by the way to be noted, that we are not commanded to obey them but in the Lord. And that is euident by the foundation before laied: for they ſit on high in that place wherunto the Lord hath aduanced them, by communicating with them a portion of his honour. Therefore the ſubmiſſion that is vſed toward them, ought to be a ſtep toward the honouring of that ſoueraigne Father. Wherefore if they mooue vs to tranſgreſſe the law, then are they worthily not to be accounted Parents, but ſtrangers that labour to withdraw vs from obedience to the true Father. And ſo is to be thought of Princes, Lords, and all ſortes of Superiours. For it is ſhamefull and againſt conuenience of reaſon, that their preeminence ſhould preuaile to preſſe downe his highnes, ſith theirs as it hangeth wholly vpon it, ſo ought onely to guide vs vnto it.

The ſixt Commandement.

Thou ſhalt not kill.

The ſixt commandement tending to the vnitie & thereby to the ſafetie of all mankind, doth vnder the name of murder both forbid all hurt & enioyne all furtherance which may growe from man to man: which rule muſt bridle and direct not onely outward deeds, but alſo inward thoughts.

39 The ende of this commandement is, that foraſmuch as God hath bound together all mankinde with a certaine vnitie, that euery man ought to regard the ſafetie of all men, as a thing giuen him in charge, in ſome therefore, all violence and wrong, yea and all harme doing, whereby our neighbours body may be hurt, is forbidden vs. And therefore we are commanded, if there be any power of ſuccour in our trauaile to defend the life of our neighbours, that we faithfully imploy the ſame, that we procure thoſe things that may make for their quiet, that we watch to keepe them from hurt, and if they be in any danger, that we giue them our helping hand. If thou conſider that it is God the Lawmaker that ſo ſaith, then thinke withall that his meaning is by this rule alſo to gouerne thy ſoule. For it were a fond thing to thinke, that he which eſpieth the thoughts of the heart, and principally reſteth vpon them, ſhould inſtruct nothing but the body to true righteouſneſſe. Therefore the manſlaughter of the hart is alſo forbidden in this law, and an inward affection to preſerue our brothers life is here giuen in commandement. The hand in deede bringeth foorth the manſlaughter, but the minde conceiueth it, when it is infected with wrath and hatred. Looke whether thou canſt be angrie with thy brother without burning in deſire to do him hurt. If thou canſt not be angrie with him, then canſt thou not hate him, foraſmuch as hatred is nothing but an old rooted anger. Although thou diſſemble and goe about to winde out thy ſelfe by vaine circumſtances: yet where anger or hatred is, there is an affection to hurt. If thou wilt ſtill dally out with ſhifts to defend it, it is alreadie pronounced by the the mouth of the holy Ghoſt, that he is a manſlayer that hateth his brother in his hart. It is pronounced by the mouth of the Lord Chriſt, that he is guiltie of iudgement that is angrie with his brother: that he is guiltie of the councell that ſaith Rhacha: that he is guiltie of hell fire, that ſaith vnto him Foole. 1. Iohn 3. Matth. 5 22.

40 The Scripture noteth two points of equitie, vpon which this commandement is grounded: becauſe man is both the image of God and our owne fleſh, wherefore vnleſſe we will defile the image of God, we muſt haue care to touch man none otherwiſe, than as a ſacred thing: and vnleſſe we will put off all naturalneſſe of man, we muſt cheriſh him as our own fleſh. That maner of exhortation that is fetched from the redemption and grace of Chriſt, ſhall be intreated of in another place. God willed theſe two things naturally to be conſidered in man, that might perſwade vs to the preſeruation of him, that we ſhould both reuerence the image of God imprinted in him, and embrace our owne fleſh. He hath not therefore eſcaped the crime of manſlaughter, that hath kept himſelfe from ſhedding of bloud. If thou commit any thing indeed, if thou goe about any thing with endeuour, if thou conceiue any thing in deſire and purpoſe that is againſt the ſafetie of an other, thou art holden guiltie of manſlaughter. And againe: If thou doe not trauell to thy power and as occaſion may ſerue to defend his life, thou doeſt with like hainouſneſſe offend the law. But if there be ſo much care taken for the ſafetie of his body, let vs hereby gather, how much ſtudie and trauaile is due to the ſafetie of his ſoule, which in the Lords ſight doth infinitely excell the body. Two ſpeciall grounds of this commandment, the excellencie of mans creation, and the price of his redemption, in regard of which two, if ſo much care be due to his bodie, to his ſoule how much more?

The ſeuenth Commandement.

Thou ſhalt not commit adulterie.

41 The end of the commandement is, that becauſe God loueth chaſtitie & cleanneſſe, therefore all vncleanneſſe ought to depart farre away from vs. The ſumme therefore ſhall be, that we be defiled with no vncleanneſſe or luſtfull intemperance of the fleſh. Whereunto anſwereth the affirmatiue commandement, that we chaſtly and continently order all the parts of our life. But fornication he forbiddeth by name, to which all vnchaſte luſt tendeth: that by the filthineſſe of that which is more groſſe and ſenſible, for ſomuch as it alſo defileth the body, he might bring vs to abhorre all filthy luſt. Sith man was created in this eſtate, not to liue a ſolitarie life, but to vſe a helper ioyned vnto him: and ſince that by the curſe of ſinne he is driuen the more to this neceſſitie, the Lord hath in this behalfe prouided helpe for him ſo much as was ſufficient, when he ordained marriage, when he ſanctified with his bleſſing the fellowſhip begunne by his authoritie. Whereby followeth, that all other fellowſhip of man and woman out of marriage, is accurſed before him, and that the fellowſhip of marriage it ſelfe, was ordained for remedie of neceſſitie, that we ſhould not run out into vnbrideled luſt. Therefore let vs not flatter our ſelues, ſith we heare that man cannot be coupled with woman out of marriage, without the curſe of God. In the ſeuenth commandement chaſtitie and cleanneſſe being ſought, God by the vaine of actuall intemperance, doth make hateful whatſoeuer tendeth thereunto, and require a care of continuing our bodies and ſoules in puritie for preſeruation whereof marriage is eſtabliſhed.

42 Now foraſmuch as by the condition of nature, & by luſt more enkindeled ſince the fall of man, we are become doubly ſubiect to deſire of companie of women, except it be thoſe whom God of his ſingular grace hath exempted from it: let euery man looke well what is giuen vnto him. Virginitie, I grant, is a vertue not to be deſpiſed: but ſith it is to ſome denied, and to ſome granted but for a time, let them that are troubled with incontinencie, and ſtriuing with it, cannot get the vpper hand, reſort to the helpe of mariage, that ſo they may keepe chaſtitie in the degree of their vocation. For they that cannot conceiue this word, if they doe not ſuccour their owne intemperance with the remedie that is offered and granted them, they ſtriue againſt God and reſiſt his ordinance. And let no man carpe againſt me (as many doe at this day) that being aided with the helpe of God, he can doe all things. For the helpe of God is preſent onely with thoſe, that walke in his waies, that is in their vocation from which they do withdraw themſelues, which forſaking the helpes of God, doe trauaile to ouercome and maiſter their neceſſitie with vaine raſh boldneſſe. The Lord affirmeth that continencie is a ſingular gift of God, and of that ſort that are not giuen generally, nor vniuerſally To whom the gift of continencie is not giuen, they muſt vſe the remedie which God hath ordeined. Pſal. 19. 1. & 14.

to the whole body of the Church, but to a few members thereof. For first he saith, that there is a certaine kinde of men, that haue gelded themselues for the kingdome of heauen, that is, that they might the more loosely and freely apply themselues to the affaires of the heauenly kingdome. But, that no man should thinke that such gelding is in the power of man, he shewed a litle before, that all men are not able to receiue it, but they to whom it is peculiarly giuen from heauen, whereupon he concludeth: He that can take it, let him take it. But Paul yet affirmeth it more plainly, where he writeth, that euery man hath his proper gift of God, one thus, another thus.

Mat 19.12.

1.Cor.7.7.

They sinne grieuously against God which vse it not although they keep themselues vnstained with any bodily vncleane act.

43 Whereas we are by open declaration admonished, that it is not in euery mans power to keepe chastitie in single life, although with studie and trauaile he endeuour neuer so much vnto it, and that it is a peculiar grace, which God giueth but to certaine men, that he may haue them the more readie to his worke: doe we not striue against God and nature which he hath institute, if we doe not apply the kinde of life to the proportion of our power? Here the Lord forbiddeth fornication, therefore he requireth cleanneſſe and chastitie of vs. To keepe the same there is but one way, that euery man measure himselfe by his owne measure. Neither let a man despise mariage as a thing vnprofitable or superfluous for him, nor otherwise desire single life, vnlesse he be able to liue without a wife. And therein also let him not prouide onely for the quiet and commoditie of the flesh, but onely that being loosed from this bond, he may be the more in readinesse and prepared to all duties of godlinesse. And forasmuch as this benefit is giuen to many but for a time, let euery man so long abstaine from mariage as he shall be meete to liue to keepe single estate. If strength faile him to tame his lust, let him learne that the Lord hath now laid vpon him a necessitie to marrie. This the Apostle sheweth when he commandeth that to auoide fornication euery man haue his owne wife, and euery woman haue her owne husband, that he that cannot liue continently should marrie in the Lord. First he declareth that the most part of men are subiect to the vice of incontinence: and then of those that be subiect vnto it, he excepteth none, but commandeth all to that onely remedie, wherewith vnchastitie is resisted. Therefore if they that be incontinent doe neglect to helpe their infirmitie by this meane, they sin euen in this that they obey not the commandement of the Apostle. Neither let him flatter himselfe that toucheth not a woman as though he could not be rebuked of vnchastitie, while in the meane season his minde burneth inwardly with lust. For Paul defineth chastitie to be a cleanneſſe of the minde, ioyned with chastitie of the body. A woman vnmarried (saith he) thinketh vpon those things that are of the Lord, forasmuch as she is holy both in bodie and spirit. Therefore when he bringeth a reason to confirme that former commaundement, he doth not onely say, that it is better for a man to take a wife, than to defile himselfe with company of a harlot, but he saith, that it is better to marrie than to burne.

1.Cor.7.1.& 9.

1.Cor.6.24.

Mariage to be vsed as an holy remedie against euil, not as a couert of dissolute lust, all acts, causes and signes whereof must be auoided in thought, looke, raiment, speech, diet.

Amb. lib. de Phil.

44 Now if married folkes do confesse that their fellowship together is blessed of the Lord, they are thereby admonished not to defile it with intemperate and dissolute lust. For though the honestie of mariage do couer the filthines of incontinencie, yet it ought not forthwith to be a prouocation thereof. Wherefore let not married folks thinke, that all things are lawfull vnto them, but let euery husband haue his owne wife soberly, and likewise the wife her husband, and so doing, let them commit nothing vnseeming the honestie and temperance of marriage. For so ought mariage made in the Lord to be restrained to measure and modestie, and not to ouerflow into euery kind of extreame lasciuiousnesse. This wantonnesse Ambrose reproued with a saying very sore indeed, but not vnfit for it, when he calleth the husband the adulterer of his owne wife, which in vse of wedlock hath no care of shamefastnesse or honestie. Last of all, let vs consider what law-maker doth here condemne fornication, euen he which sith of his owne right he ought to possesse vs wholly, requireth pureneſſe of the soule, spirit and body. Therefore when he forbiddeth to commit fornication, he also forbiddeth with wanton attire of bodie, with vncleanly gestures, and with filthie talke to lay wait to trap anothers chastitie. For that saying is not without good reason, which Archelaus spake to a yong man aboue measure wantonly and deintily clothed, that it made no matter in what part he were filthily vnchast, if we haue a regard vnto God that abhorreth all filthinesse thineſſe in whatſoeuer part either of our ſoule or body it appeareth. And to put thee out of doubt, remember that the Lord here commendeth chaſtitie. If the Lord require chaſtitie of vs, then he condemneth all that euer is againſt it. Therefore if thou couet to ſhew obedience, neither let thy minde burne inwardly with euill luſt, nor let thine eies run wantonly into corrupt affections, nor let thy body be trimmed vp for allurement, nor let thy tongue with filthy talke entiſe thy minde to like thoughts, nor let thy glutonous belly enflame thee with intemperance. For all theſe vices are, as it were, certaine blots, wherewith the pureneſſe of chaſtitie is beſpotted.

The eight Commandement.

Thou ſhalt not ſteale.

45 The end of this commandement is, becauſe God abhorreth vnrighteouſneſſe, that euery man may haue his owne rendred vnto him. The ſumme therefore ſhall be, that we are forbidden to gape for other mens goods, and that therefore we are commaunded euery man to employ his faithfull trauaile to preſerue to each man his owne goods. For thus we ought to thinke that what euery man poſſeſſeth is not happened vnto him by chance of fortune, but by the diſtribution of the ſoueraigne Lord of all things: and therefore no mans goods can be gotten from him by euill meanes, but that wrong be done to the diſpoſition of God. But of theſts there be many kindes: one ſtandeth in Violence, when the goods of another are by any maner of force and robbing licentiouſneſſe bereaued. The other kinde conſiſteth in malicious deceit, where they are guilefully conueied away. An other ſort there is that ſtandeth in a more hidden ſubtletie, when they are wroong from the owner by colour of law. An other ſort in flatterie, where they are ſucked away by pretence of gift. But leaſt we ſhould tary too long vpon renting of all the ſeuerall kinds of theft, let vs know, that all craftie meanes whereby the poſſeſſions and money of our neighbours are conueyed vnto vs, when they once goe by crooked waies from ſincereneſſe of heart, to a deſire to beguile, or by any meane to doe hurt, are to be accounted for theſts. Although by pleading the law, they may preuaile, yet God doth not otherwiſe weigh them. For he ſeeth the long captious ſubtleties, wherewith the guilefull man beginneth to entangle the ſimpler minde, till at length he draw him into his nets. He ſeeth the hard and vngentle lawes, wherewith the mightier oppreſſeth and throweth downe the weaker. He ſeeth the allurements, wherewith as with baited hookes, the craftier taketh the vnware. All which things are hidden from the iudgement of man, and come not in his knowledge. And this maner of wrong is not onely in money, in wares, or in lands, but in euery mans right. For we defraud our neighbour of his goods, if we denie him thoſe duties which we are bound to doe for him. If any idle Factor or Bayliſe doe deuoure his maſters ſubſtance, and is not heedefull to the care of his thrift, if he either doe wrongfully ſpoile, or doe riotouſly waſt the ſubſtance committed vnto him, if a ſeruant doe mocke his maſter, if he diſcloſe his ſecrets by any meanes, if he betray his life and his goods: againe, if the Lord doe cruelly oppreſſe his houſhold, they are before God guiltie of theft. For he both withholdeth and conueyeth another mans goods, which performeth not that which by the office of his calling he oweth to other.

That euery man may haue his owne, we are in the eight commandement forbidden all praCtiſing whatſoeuer to the vniuſt loſſe and danger of others, & all withholding of any duety whereby we are bound to doe them good, for aſmuch as either of theſe doth make vs guiltie of theft.

46 We ſhall therefore rightly obey this commandement, if being contented with our owne eſtate, we ſeeke to get no gaine but honeſt and lawfull, if we couet not to waxe rich with wrong, nor goe about to ſpoile our neighbour of his goods that our own ſubſtance may increaſe, if we labor not to heape vp cruell riches and wrong out of other mens bloud. if we do not immeaſurably ſcrape together euery way, by right and by wrong, that either our couetouſneſſe may be filled, or our prodigalitie ſatiſfied. But on the other ſide, let this be our perpetuall marke, to aide all men faithfully by counſell & helpe to keepe their owne ſo far as we may: but if we haue to do with falſe and deceitfull men, let vs rather be ready to yeeld vp ſome of our owne, then to ſtriue with them. And not that onely, but let vs cõmunicate to their neceſſities, and with our ſtore relieue their neede, whom we ſee to be oppreſſed with hard and poore eſtate. Finally, let let euery man looke how much he is by dutie bound vnto other, and let him faithfully pay it. For this reason let the people haue in honor all those that are set ouer them, let them patiently beare their gouernement, obey their lawes and commandements, refuse nothing that they may beare, still keeping God fauourable vnto them. Againe, let them take care of their people, preserue common peace, defend the good, restraine the euill, and so order all things, as readie to giue account of their office to the soueraigne Iudge. Let the Ministers of Churches faithfully apply their ministerie, and not corrupt the doctrine of saluation, but deliuer it pure and syncere to the people of God, and let them instruct them not onely with learning, but also with example of life: finally, let them so be ouer them, as good sheepheards be ouer the sheepe. Let the people likewise receiue them for the messengers and Apostles of God, giue them that honor whereof the highest master hath vouchsafed them, and minister vnto them such things as are necessarie for their life. Let parents take on them to feede, rule, and teach their children, as committed to them of God, and greeue not, nor turne away their mindes from them with crueltie, but rather cherish and imbrace them with such lenitie and tenderneſſe, as becommeth their person. After which maner, we haue already said, that children owe to their parents their obedience. Let yoong men reuerence olde age, euen as the Lord willed that age to be honorable. Let old men also gouerne the weakeneſſe of youth with their wisedome and experience, wherein they excell yoong men, not rating with rough and loude brawling, but tempering seueritie with mildneſſe and gentleneſſe. Let seruants shew themselues diligent and seruiceable to obey: and that not to the eie, but from the heart, as seruing God himselfe. Also let Masters shew themselues not testie and hard to pleaſe, nor oppreſſe them with too much sharpneſſe, nor reprochfully vſe them, but rather acknowledge that they are their brethren and their fellow seruants vnder the heauenly Lord, whom they ought mutually to loue and gently to intreate. After this maner, I say, let euery man consider what in his degree and place he oweth to his neighbours, and let him pay that he oweth. Moreouer, our minde ought alwaies to haue respect to the lawmaker, that we may know that this lawe is made as well for our minds, as for our hands, that men should studie to defend and further the commodities and profit of other.

The ninth Commandement.

Thou shalt not be a lying witneſſe against thy neighbour.

To vphold truth we are in the ninth commandement forbidden the abuſe of the tongue in hindering our neighbour, and commanded to imploy it for his benefit.
Exod 23.1.
Leuit.19.15.

47 The end of this Commandement is, that becauſe God which is truth abhorreth lying, we ought to obserue truth without deceitfull colour. The summe therefore shall be, that we neither hurt any mans name either with slaunders or false reports, nor hinder him in his goods by lying: finally, that we offend no man, by luſt to speake euill, or to be buſie: with which prohibition is ioyned a commandement, that so farre as we may, we employ our faithfull endeuour for euery man in affirming the truth, to defend the safetie both of his name and goods. It seemeth that the Lord purposed to expound the meaning of his commandement in the three and twentie Chapter of Exodus, in these words: Thou shalt not vſe the voice of lying, nor shalt ioyne thy hand to speake false witneſſe for the wicked. Againe, Thou shalt flee lying. Also in another place he doth not onely call vs away from lying in this point that we be no accuſers, or whisperers in the people, but also that no man deceiue his brother, for he forbiddeth them both in seuerall commandements. Truely it is no doubt, but that as in the commandements before he hath forbidden crueltie, vnchastitie, and couetouſneſſe, so in this he restraineth falshood. Whereof there are two parts as we haue noted before. For either we offend the good name of our neighbours by maliciouſneſſe and froward minde to backbite, or in lying and sometime in euill speaking we hinder their commodities. There is no difference whether in this place be vnderstanded solemne and iudiciall testimonie, or common testimonie that is vſed in priuate talks. For we must alwaies haue recourſe to this principle, that of all the generall kinds of vices one speciall sort is set for an example, whereunto the rest may be referred, and that that is chiefly chosen, wherein the filthineſſe of the fault is most apparant. Albeit, it were conuenient to extend tend it more generally to ſlaunders and ſiniſter backbitings wherewith our neighbours are wrongfully grieued, for that falſhood of witneſſing which is vſed in iudiciall courts, is neuer without periurie. But periuries inſomuch as they doe prophane and defile the name of God, are alreadie ſufficiently met withall in the third commandement. Wherefore the right vſe of this commandement is, that our toong in affirming the truth, doe ſerue both the good name and profit of our neighbours. The equitie thereof is more than manifeſt. For if a good name be more precious than any treaſures, whatſoeuer they be: then is it no leſſe hurt to a man to be ſpoiled of the goodnes of his name than of his goods. And in bereauing his ſubſtance ſometime falſe witneſſe doth as much as violence of hands.

48 And yet it is maruellous with how negligent careleſneſſe men doe commonly offend in this point, ſo that there are found very few that are not notably ſicke of this diſeaſe: we are ſo much delighted with a certaine poiſoned ſweetneſſe both in ſearching out and in diſcloſing the euils of other. And let vs not thinke that it is a ſufficient excuſe, if oftentimes we lie not. For he that forbiddeth thy brothers name to be defiled with lying, willeth alſo that it be preſerued vntouched ſo farre as the truth will ſuffer. For howſoeuer he taketh heed to himſelfe onely, ſo that he tell no lie, yet in the ſame he ſecretly confeſſeth that he hath ſome charge of him. But this ought to ſuffice vs, to keepe ſafe our neighbours good name, that God hath a care of it. Wherefore without doubt all euill ſpeaking is vtterly condemned. But we meane not by euill ſpeaking that rebuking which is vſed for chaſtiſement: nor accuſarion, or iudiciall proceſſe, whereby remedie is ſought for an euill, nor publicke reprehenſion, which tendeth to put other ſinners in feare, nor bewraying of faults to them for whoſe ſafety it behoooueth that they ſhould be forewarned, leaſt they ſhould be in danger by ignorance: but we meane onely hatefull accuſing, which ariſeth of maliciouſnes, and of a wanton will to backbite. Alſo this commandement is extended to this point, that we couet not to vſe a ſcoffing kinde of pleaſantnes, but mingled with bitter taunts, thereby bitingly to touch other mens faults vnder pretence of paſtime, as many doe that ſeeke praiſe of merrie conceits with other mens ſhame yea and griefe: alſo when by ſuch wanton railing many times our neighbours are not a little reproched. Now if we bend our eies to the lawmaker, which muſt according to his rightfull authority beare rule no leſſe ouer the eares and minde then ouer the toong: truly we ſhall finde that greedineſſe to heare backbitings, and a haſtie readineſſe to euill iudgements are no leſſe forbidden. For it were very fond if a man ſhould thinke that God hateth the fault of euill ſpeaking in the toong, and doth not diſallow the fault of euill maliciouſneſſe in the heart. Wherefore if there be in vs a true feare and loue of God, let vs indeuour ſo farre as we may and as is expedient, and as charity beareth, that we giue neither our toong, nor our eares to euill ſpeakings, and bitter ieſtings, leaſt we raſhly without cauſe yeeld our minds to indirect ſuſpicions. But being indifferent expoſitours of all mens ſayings, and doings, let vs both in iudgement, eares, and toong, gently preſerue their honour ſafe.

The great libertie which men giue themſelues in tranſgreſſing this law by their wanton delight to backbite, to ſcoffe, to iudge, or to heare them that doe ſo.

The tenth Commandement.

Thou ſhalt not couet thy neighbours houſe, &c.

49 The end of this commandement is, that becauſe the Lords will is that our ſoule be wholly poſſeſſed with the affection of loue: all luſt is to be ſhaken out of our minde that is contrarie to charitie. The ſumme therefore ſhall be, that no thought creepe into vs, which may mooue our mindes with a concupiſcence hurtfull and turning toward an others loſſe: wherewith on the other ſide agreeth the commandement, that whatſoeuer we conceiue, purpoſe, will, or ſtudie vpon, be ioyned with the benefit and commoditie of our neighbours. But heere as it ſeemeth, ariſeth a hard and comberſome difficultie. For if it be truely ſaid of vs before, that vnder the names of fornication and theft, are contained the luſt of fornication, and the purpoſe to hurt and deceiue, it may ſeeme ſuperfluouſly ſpoken, that the coueting of other mens goods ſhould afterward be ſeuerally forbidden vs. But the diſtinction betweene purpoſe and coueting, will eaſily looſe vs this knot. For purpoſe (as we haue meant in ſpeaking of it in the other commandecommaundements before) is deliberate conſent of will, when luſt hath ſubdued the minde: but coueting may be without any ſuch either aduiſement or aſſent, when the minde is onely pricked and tickled with vaine and peruerſe obiects. As therefore the Lord hath heretofore commaunded, that the rule of charitie ſhould gouerne our wils, ſtudies, and works: ſo now he commaundeth the conceptions of our minde to be directed to the ſame rule, that there be none of them crooked and writhen, that may prouoke our minde an other way. As he hath forbidden our minde to be bowed and led into wrath, hatred, fornication, robberie, and lying: ſo he doth now forbid vs to be mooued thereunto.

As the former commandements haue deliuered a rule of charitie to gouerne our euill ſtudies and works: ſo the laſt commandement requireth the very firſt conceptions of the minde to be framed according to the ſame rule.

The laſt commandement by ſome rent amiſſe into two containeth not bare conceptions or fantaſies, but ſuch as doe bite and ſtir the mind with deſire repugnant to that which perfect charitie requireth, of which kinde of concupiſcences thoſe are rehearſed for examples ſake which are moſt vſuall in mens mindes.

50 And not without cauſe doth he require ſo great vprightneſſe. For who can denie that it is righteous, that all the powers of the ſoule be poſſeſſed with charitie? But if any of them doe ſwarue from the marke of charitie, who can denie that it is diſeaſed? Now whence commeth it that ſo many deſires hurtfull to thy neighbour, doe enter in thy heart, but of this, that neglecting him thou careſt onely for thy ſelfe? For if thy minde were altogether throughly ſoked with charitie, no parcel thereof ſhould be open to ſuch imaginations. Therefore it muſt needs be voide of charitie, ſo farre as it receiueth concupiſcence. But ſome man will obiect, that yet it is not meete that fantaſies that are without order toſſed in mans wit, and at length doe vaniſh away, ſhould be condemned for concupiſcence, whoſe place is in the heart. I anſwere that here our queſtion is of that kinde of fantaſies, which while they are preſent before our mindes, doe together bite and ſtrike our heart with deſire, foraſmuch as it neuer commeth in our minde, to wiſh for any thing, but that our heart is ſtirred vp and leapeth withall. Therefore God commandeth a maruelous feruentneſſe of loue which he willeth not to be entangled with neuer ſo ſmall ſnares of concupiſcence. He requireth a marueloufly framed minde, which he ſuffreth not ſo much as with ſleight prouocations to be any thing ſtirred againſt the law of loue. To this expoſition Auguſtine did firſt open me the way: becauſe thou ſhouldeſt not thinke that it is without conſent of ſome graue authoritie. And though the Lords purpoſe was to forbid vs all wrongfull coueting: yet in rehearſing the ſame, he hath brought foorth for example thoſe things that moſt commonly doe deceiue vs with a falſe image of delight: becauſe he would leaue nothing to concupiſcence when he draweth it from theſe things, vpon the which moſt of all it rageth & triumpheth. Loe, here is the ſecond Table of the law, wherein we are taught ſufficiently what we owe to men for Gods ſake, vpon conſideration whereof hangeth the rule of charitie. Wherefore you ſhall but vainely call vpon thoſe duties that are contained in this Table, vnleſſe your doctrine doe ſtay vpon the feare and reuerence of God, as vpon her foundation. As for them which ſeeke for two commandements, in the prohibition of coueting, the wiſe reader, though I ſay nothing, wil iudge that by wrong deuiſion, they teare in ſunder that which was but one. And it maketh nothing againſt vs, that this word, Thou ſhalt not couet, is the ſecond time repeated, for after that he had firſt ſet the houſe, then he reuieweth the parts thereof, beginning at the wife: whereby it plainly appeareth, that (as the Hebrues doe very well) it ought to be read in one whole ſentence, and that God in effect commandeth, that all that euery man poſſeſſeth ſhould remaine ſafe and vntouched, not onely from wrong and luſt to defraud them, but alſo from the very leaſt deſire that may mooue our mindes.

The drift of the law is to teach perfect holineſſe, which conſiſteth in pure loue towards God and man, and not to ſet downe onely certaine rudiments that were afterwards to be further perfected.
Deut. 10. 12. Deu. 6. 5. & 11. 13.

51 But now to what end the whole law tendeth, it ſhall not be hard to iudge: that is, to the fulfilling of righteouſneſſe, that it might frame the life of man after the example of the pureneſſe of God. For God hath therein ſo painted out his owne nature, as if a man do performe in deeds, that which is there commanded, he ſhall in a maner expreſſe an image of God in his life. Therfore when Moſes meant to bring the ſum thereof into the mindes of the Iſraelites, he ſaid: And now Iſrael, what doth the Lord thy God aske of thee, but that thou feare the Lord, and walke in his waies? loue him and ſerue him in all thy heart, and in all thy ſoule, and keepe his commandements? And he ceaſed not ſtill to ſing the ſame ſong againe vnto them, ſo oft as he purpoſed to ſhew the end of the law. The doctrine of the law hath ſuch reſpect hereunto, that it ioyneth man, or as Moſes in another place termeth it, maketh man to ſticke faſt to his God in holineſſe of life. Now the perfection of that holineſſe conſiſteth in the two principall points alreadie rehearſed: That we loue the Lord God with all our heart, all our ſoule, and all our ſtrength, and our neighbours as our ſelues. And the firſt indeed is, that our ſoule be in all parts filled with the loue of God. From that by and by of it ſelfe foorth floweth the loue of our neighbour. Which thing the Apoſtle ſheweth when he writeth, that the end of the lawe is loue out of a pure conſcience, and a faith not fained. You ſee how, as it were in the head, is ſet conſcience and faith vnfained, that is to ſay in one word true godlineſſe, and that from thence is charitie derived. Therefore he is deceiued, whoſoeuer thinketh that in the Law are taught onely certaine rudiments and firſt introductions of righteouſneſſe, wherewith men became to be taught their firſt ſchooling, but not yet directed to the true marke of good works: whereas beyond that ſentence of Moſes, and this of Paul, you can deſire nothing as wanting of the higheſt perfection. For how farre I pray you, will he proceede that will not be contented with this inſtitution, whereby man is inſtructed to the feare of God, to ſpirituall worſhipping, to obeying of the Commandements, to follow the vprightneſſe of the way of the Lord: finally to pureneſſe of conſcience, ſincere faith and loue? Whereby is confirmed that expoſition of the Law, which ſearcheth for and findeth out in the commandements thereof all the dueties of godlineſſe and loue. For they that follow onely the drie and bare principles, as if it taught but the one halfe of Gods will, know not the end thereof, as the Apoſtle witneſſeth. Matth. 22. 1. Tim. 1. 15.

52 But whereas in rehearſing the ſumme of the Law, Chriſt and the Apoſtle doe ſometime leaue out the firſt Table: many are deceiued therein while they would faine draw their words to both the Tables. Chriſt in Mathew calleth the chiefe points of the Law, mercie, iudgement, and faith: vnder the word Faith, it is not doubtfull to me, but that he meaneth truth or faithfulneſſe toward men. But ſome, that the ſentence might be extended to the whole Law, take it for religiouſneſſe toward God. But they labor in vaine. For Chriſt ſpeaketh of thoſe works wherewith man ought to proue himſelfe righteous. This reaſon if we note, we will alſo ceaſſe to marueil why, when a yoong man asked him what be the commandements by keeping whereof we enter into life: he anſwered theſe things onely: Thou ſhalt not kill. Thou ſhalt not commit adultery. Thou ſhalt not ſteale. Thou ſhalt beare no falſe witneſſe. Honor thy Father and thy Mother. Loue thy neighbor as thy ſelfe. For the obeying of the firſt Table conſiſted in maner all either in the affection of the heart, or in ceremonies: the affection of the heart appeared not, and as for the ceremonies the hypocrites did cõtinually vſe. But the works of charitie are ſuch, as by them we may declare a perfect righteouſneſſe. But this commeth each where ſo oft in the Prophets, that it muſt needs be familiar to a reader but meanely exerciſed in them. For in a maner alway, when they exhort to repentance, they leaue out the firſt Table, and onely call vpon Faith, Iudgement, Mercie, and Equitie. And thus they doe not ouerskip the feare of God, but they enquire the earneſt proofe thereof by the tokens of it. This is well knowne, that when they ſpeake of the keeping of the lawe, they doe for the moſt part reſt vpon the ſecond Table, becauſe therein the ſtudie of righteouſneſſe and vprightneſſe is moſt openly ſeene. It is needleſſe to rehearſe the places, becauſe euery man will of himſelfe eaſily marke that which I ſay.

The reaſon why in the Prophets and the Goſpell ſo oftentimes when the keeping of the law is ſpoken of the dueties onely of the ſecõd Table are expreſſly mentioned.
Mat. 5. 13.
Mat. 19. 28.

53 But thou wilt ſay, is it then more auaileable to the perfection of righteouſnes, to liue innocently among men, than with true godlineſſe to honor God? No, but becauſe a man doth not eaſily keepe charitie in all points, vnleſſe he earneſtly feare God, therefore it is thereby prooued, that he hath godlineſſe alſo. Beſide that, foraſmuch as the Lord well knoweth, that no benefit can come from vs vnto him, which thing he doth alſo teſtifie by the Prophet: therefore he requireth not our dueties to himſelfe, but doth exerciſe vs in good works toward our neighbor. Therefore not without cauſe the Apoſtle ſetteth the whole perfection of the holy ones in charitie. And not inconueniently in another place he calleth the ſame the fulfilling of the law: adding that he hath performed the law that loueth his neighbour. Againe, That all the law is comprehended in one word, Loue thy neighbour as thy ſelfe. For he teacheth no other thing but the ſame which Chriſt doth when he ſaith: Whatſoeuer ye will that men doe to you, doe ye the ſame to them: For this is the law and the Prophets: It is certaine that in the law law and the Prophets Faith and all that belongeth to the true worship of God, holdeth the principall place, and that Loue is beneath it in the lower degree: But the Lords meaning is, that in the Law is onely prescribed vnto vs an obseruation of right and equitie, wherein we be exercised to testifie our godly feare of him, if there be any in vs.

The law doth not teach vs to loue our selues, which we doe so vehemently without teaching that it setteth vp our affection this way as a marke which we ought to reach in loueing others. Vide Aug. li. 1. de doct. Chri. cap. 23.

54 Heere therefore let vs sticke fast, that then our life shall be best framed to Gods will and the rule of his Law, when it shall be euery way most profitable to our brethren. But in the whole Law there is not read one syllable that appointeth to man any rule of such things as he shall doe or leaue vndone to the commoditie of his owne flesh. And surely sith men are so borne of such disposition naturally that they be too much carried all headlong to the loue of themselues, and how much soeuer they fall from the truth yet still they keepe that selfe loue, there needed no law any more to enflame that loue, that was naturally of it selfe, too much beyond measure. Whereby it plainely appeareth, that not the loue of our selues, but the loue of God and of our neighbour is the keeping of the Commandements, and that he liueth best and most holily, that (so neere as may be) liueth and trauelleth least for himselfe, and that no man liueth worse and more wickedly than he that liueth and trauelleth for himselfe, and onely thinketh vpon and seeketh for things of his owne. And the Lord, the more to expresse with how great earnestnesse we ought to be led to the loue of our neighbours, appointed it to be measured by the loue of our selues as by a rule, because he had no other vehementer or stronger affection to measure it by. And the force of the maner of speaking is diligently to be weyed. For he doth not, as certaine Sophisters haue foolishly dreamed, giue the first degree to the loue of our selues, and the second to charitie, but rather that affection of loue which we doe all naturally draw to our selues, he giueth away vnto other, whereupon the Apostle saith, that Charitie seeketh not her owne. And their reason is not to be esteemed worth a haire, that the thing ruled is euer inferiour to his Rule. For God doth not make the loue of our selues, a rule whereunto charitie toward other should be subiect, but whereas by peruersenesse of nature the affection of loue was wont to rest in our selues, he sheweth that now it ought to be elsewhere spread abroad, that we should with no lesse cheerefulnesse, seruentnesse, and carefulnesse be readie to doe good to our neighbour than to our selues.

1. Cor. 13. 5.

Luc. 10. 36. The commandements of the law in speaking of our neighbours, meant not that we should restraine the duties of loue and charitie to our speciall acquaintãce.

55 Now sith Christ hath shewed in the parable of the Samaritane that vnder the name of Neighbour euery man is contained be he neuer so straunge vnto vs: there is no cause why we should restraine the commandement of loue within the bounds of our owne friendships and acquaintances. I deny not that the neerer that any man is vnto vs, the more familiarly he is to be holden with our endeuours to doe him good. For so the order of humanitie requireth, that so many moe dueties of friendship men should communicate together, as they are bound together with streighter bonds of kindred, familiaritie or neighborhood, and that without any offence of God, by whose prouidence we are in a maner driuen thereunto. But I say that all mankind without exception is to be embraced with one affection of charitie: and that in this behalfe is no difference of Barbarous or Grecian, of worthy or vnworthy, of friend or foe, because they are to be considered in God and not in themselues: from which consideration when we turne away, it is no maruell if we be entangled with many errours. Wherefore if we wil keepe the true trade of louing, we must not turne our eies vnto man, the sight of whom would ofter enforce vs to hate then to loue, but vnto God which commandeth that the loue which we offer him, be powred abroad among all men: that this be a perpetuall foundation, that whatsoeuer the man be, yet he ought to be loued because God is loued.

The absurditie of Schoolemen in turning the commandemẽts of the law into counsels whereunto all men are not bound.

56. Wherefore it was a most pestilent ignorance or malice, that the Schoolemen of these commandements, touching not desiring of reuengement, and louing our enemies, which in the old time both were giuen to the Iewes and at the same time were cõmonly giuen to all Christians, haue made Counsels which it is in our libertie to obey or not to obey. And the necessarie obeying of them, they haue posted ouer to Monkes which were thought but in this one point forsooth more righteous than simple Christians, that they willingly bound themselues to keepe the Counsels. And they render a reason why they receiue them not for lawes, for that they seeme too burdenous and heauie, heauie, specially for Christians that are vnder the lawe of grace. So dare they presume to repell the eternall law of God touching the louing of our neighbours. Is there any such difference in any leafe of the law? and are not therein the rather each where found commandements that doe most seuerely require of vs to loue our enemies? For what maner of saying is that, where we are commanded to feede our enemie when he is hungrie: to set into the right way his Oxen or Asses straying out of the way, or to ease them when they faint vnder their burden? Shall we doe good to his beasts for his sake without any good will to himselfe? What? is not the word of the Lord euerlasting? Leaue vengeance to me, and I will requite it. Which also is spoken more plainely at large in another place: Seeke not vengeance, neither be mindfull of the iniurie of thy citizens. Either let them blot these things out of the law, or let them acknowledge that the Lord was a lawmaker, and not lyingly faigne that he was a counsel-giuer.

Deut 32. 35. Leuit. 19. 18.

57 And what I pray you meane these things that they haue presumed to mocke withall in their vnsauorie glose? Loue your enemies, doe good to them that hate you, pray for them that persecute you, blesse them that curse you, that ye may be the childrē of your father which is in heauen. Who cannot heare reason with Chrysostome, that by so necessary a cause it plainelie appeareth that they are no exhortations but commandements? What remaineth more when we be blotted out of the number of the children of God? But by their opinion, only Monks shall be the children of the heauenly father, they only shal be bold to call vpon God their Father: what shall the Church doe in the meane season? it shall by like right be sent away to the Gentiles and Publicans. For Christ saith: If ye be friendly to your friends, what fauour looke you for thereby? doe not the Gentiles and Publicans the same? But we shall be in good case forsooth, if the title of Christians be left vnto vs, and the inheritance of the kingdome of heauen taken away from vs. And no lesse strong is Augustines argument. When (saith he) the Lord forbiddeth to commit fornication, he no lesse forbiddeth to touch the wife of thine enemie than of thy friend. When he forbiddeth theft, he giueth leaue to steale nothing at all, either from thy friend or from thine enemie. But these two, not to steale, and not to commit fornication, Paul bringeth within the compasse of the rule of loue, yea and teacheth that they are contained vnder this commandement, Thou shalt loue thy neighbour as thy selfe. Therefore, either Paul must haue bin a false expositor of the law, or it necessarily followeth hereby, that our enemies ought also to be loued, euen by commandement, like as our friends. Therefore they doe truely bewray themselues to be the children of Satan, that doe so licentiously shake off the common yoke of the children of God. It is to be doubted, whether they haue published this doctrine with more grosse dulnesse or shamelesnesse. For there are none of the old writers that doe not pronounce as of a thing certaine, that these are meere commandements. And that euen in Gregories age it was not doubted of, appeareth by his owne affirmation, for he without controuersie taketh them for commandements. And how foolish doe they reason? They say that they are too weightie a burden for Christians. As though there could be deuised any thing more weightie than to loue God with all our heart, with all our soule, with all our strength. In comparison of this law any thing may be counted easie, whether it be to loue our enemie, or to lay away all desire of reuenge out of our minde. In deede all things are high and hard to our weakenesse euen the least tittle of the law. It is the Lord in whom we vse strength. Let him giue what he commandeth, and command what he will. Christian men to be vnder the law of grace, is not vnbrideledly to wander without law, but to be grafted in Christ, by whose grace they are free from the curse of the Law, and by whose spirit they haue a law written in their hearts. This grace Paul vnproperly called a law, alluding to the law of God against which he did set it in comparison. But these men doe in the name of the law dispute vpon a matter of nothing.

We are not counselled onlie in the law, but commanded to loue, do good to, pray for, and blesse our enemies: as the reason annexed, that ye may be the children of your father doth shew: and so the fathers haue vnderstood it: neither is the reason any thing against it which they bring concerning the hardnesse of performing it. Mat. 5. 44. Lib. de compunctione cordis. Mat. 5. 46. Lib. de doctri. Christ. cap. 30. Rom. 13. 9.

58 *Of like sort it is that they called Veniall sinne, both secret vngodlinesse that is against the first Table, and also the direct transgressing of the last Commandement. For they define it thus, that it is a desire without aduised assent, which resteth not long in the heart. But I say, that it cannot come at all into the heart, but by want of those things that are required in the law. We are forbid to haue strange gods. Whē the mind shaken with the engines of distrust, looketh about elsewhere, when it is touched with a ſodaine deſire to remooue her bleſſedneſſe ſome other way: whence come theſe motions, although they quickly vaniſh away, but of this, that there is ſome thing in the ſoule emptie, to receiue ſuch tentations? And to the end not to draw out this argument to greater length, there is a commandement giuen to loue God with all our heart, with all our minde, with all our ſoule: if then all the powers of our ſoule be not bent to the loue of God, we haue alreadie departed from the obedience of the law, becauſe the enemies that doe therein ariſe againſt his kingdome, and interrupt his decrees, doe prooue that God hath not his throne well ſtabliſhed in our conſcience. As for the laſt commandement, we haue alreadie ſhewed that it properly belongeth hereunto. Hath any deſire of minde pricked vs? we are alreadie guiltie of coueting, and therewithall are made tranſgreſſors of the law, becauſe the Lord doth forbid vs, not onely to purpoſe and practiſe any thing that may be to anothers loſſe, but alſo to be pricked and ſwell with coueting it. But the curſe of God doth alway hang ouer the tranſgreſſion of the law. We cannot therefore prooue euen the very leaſt deſires free from iudgement of death.

Lib. 2 de bap. contra Donatiſt. cap. 6.

In weying of ſinnes (ſaith Auguſtine) let vs not bring falſe balances to weigh what we liſt and how we liſt at our owne pleaſure, ſaying: this is heauie and this is light: but let vs bring Gods balance out of the holy Scriptures, as out of the Lords treaſurie, and let vs therein weigh what is heauie: rather let vs not weigh, but reknowledge things alreadie weighed by the Lord. But what ſaith the Scripture? Truely when Paul ſaith that the reward of ſinne is death, he ſheweth that he knew not this ſtinking diſtinction. Sith we are too much inclined to hypocriſie, this cheriſhment thereof ought not to haue beene added to flatter our ſlothfull conſciences.

Rom. 6. 23.

59 I would to God they would conſider what that ſaying of Chriſt meaneth: He that tranſgreſſeth one of the leaſt of theſe commandements, and teacheth men ſo, ſhall be counted none in the kingdome of heauen. Are not they of that ſort, when they dare ſo extenuate the tranſgreſſion of the law, as if it were not worthie of death? but they ought to haue conſidered, not onely what is commanded, but what he is that commandeth, becauſe his authoritie is diminiſhed in euery tranſgreſſion, how little ſoeuer it be, of the law that he hath giuen in commandement. Is it a ſmall matter with them, that Gods maieſtie be offended in any thing? Moreouer, if God hath declared his will in the law, whatſoeuer is contrarie to the law, diſpleaſeth him. Will they imagine the wrath of God to be ſo diſarmed, that puniſhment of death ſhall not foorthwith follow vpon them? And he himſelfe hath pronounced it plainely, if they would rather finde in their hearts to heare his voice, than to trouble cleare truth with their vnſauourie ſubtleties of argument. The ſoule (ſaith he) that ſinneth, the ſame ſhall die. Againe, which I euen now alleaged, the reward of ſinne is death. But albeit they graunt it to be a ſinne, becauſe they cannot deny it: yet they ſtand ſtiffe in this, that it is no deadly ſinne. But ſith they haue hitherto too much borne with their own madneſſe, let them yet at length learne to waxe wiſer. But if they continue in dotage, we will bid them farewell: and let the children of God learne this, that all ſinne is deadly, becauſe it is a rebellion againſt the will of God, which of neceſſitie prouoketh his wrath, becauſe it is a breach of the law, vpon which the iudgement of God is pronounced without exception: and that the ſinnes of the holy ones are veniall or pardonable, not of their owne nature, but becauſe they obtaine pardon by the mercie of God.

Mat. 5. 19. Euery tranſgreſſion euen of the leaſt commandement diminiſheth his authoritie that commandeth, diſpleaſeth him, prouoketh his wrath, and is not otherwiſe pardonable then by mercy, but deſerueth in it ſelfe to be puniſhed with eternall death. Ezec. 18. 20. Rom. 6. 23.

THE NINTH CHAPTER.

That Chriſt although he was knowen to the Iewes vnder the law, yet was deliuered onely by the Goſpell.

Chriſt was knowen to the fathers vnder the law, but not ſo clearely as to vs he is manifeſted in the Goſpell. Mal. 4. 2.

BEcauſe it pleaſed God in the old time not vainely by expiations and ſacrifices to declare himſelfe a Father, and not in vaine he did conſecrate a choſen people to himſelfe: euen then without doubt he was knowen in the ſame image, wherein he now appeareth to vs with full brightneſſe. Therefore Malachie, after that he had bidden the Iewes to take heed to the lawe of Moſes, and to continue in ſtudie thereof, (becauſe after his death there ſhould come a certaine interruption of the office of the Prophets) did forthwith declare, that there ſhould ariſe a ſonne of righteouſneſſe.

In

In which words he teacheth, that the Law auaileth to this purpose, to hold the godly in expectation of Christ to come: but yet that there was much more light to be hoped for, when he should be come in deede. For this reason doth Peter say, that the Prophets did make search, and diligently enquire, of the saluation that is now opened by the Gospell: and that it was reuealed vnto them, that they should minister, not to themselues, nor to their owne age, but vnto vs, those things that are declared by the Gospel. Not that their doctrine was vnprofitable to the people in old time, or nothing auailed themselues: but because they enioyed not the treasure which God sent vnto vs by their hand. For at this day the grace whereof they testified, is familiarly set before our eies. And whereas they did but a litle sip of it, there is offred vnto vs a more plentifull enioying thereof. Therefore Christ himselfe, which affirmeth that he had witnesse borne him by Moses, yet extolleth the measure of grace whereby we excell the Iewes. For speaking to the Disciples, he said: Blessed are the eies that see that which ye see, and blessed are the eares that heare that which ye heare. For many Kings and Prophets haue wished it, and haue not obtained it. This is no small commendation of the reuealing of the Gospell that God preferred vs before the holy Fathers that excelled in rare godlinesse. With which sentence that other place disagreeth not, where it is said, that Abraham saw the day of Christ, and reioyced. For though the sight of a thing farre distant was somewhat darke, yet he wanted nothing to the assurance of good hope. And thence came that ioy which accompanied the holy Prophet, euen to his death. And that saying of Iohn Baptist: No man hath seene God at any time, the onely begotten that is in the bosome of the Father, hath declared him vnto vs, doth not exclude the godly which had bene dead before him, from the fellowship of the vnderstanding and light that shineth in the person of Christ: But comparing their estate with ours, he teacheth that those mysteries, which they saw but darkely vnder shadowes, are manifest to vs: as the Author of the Epistle to the Hebrues doth wel set out, saying, that God diuersly and many waies spake in old time by the Prophets, but now by his beloued sonne, although therefore that only begotten one, which is at this day to vs the brightnesse of the glorie, and the print of the substance of God the Father, was in old time knowen to the Iewes, as we haue in another place alleaged out of Paul, that he was the guide of the old deliuerance: yet is it true, which the same Paul elsewhere teacheth, that God which commanded the light to shine out of darknesse, hath now shined vpon our hearts to set foorth the knowledge of the glorie of God in the face of Iesus Christ: because when he appeared in this his Image, he did in a maner make himselfe visible in comparison of the darke and shadowish forme that had bene of him before. And so much the more foule and detestable is their vnthankfulnesse and peruersenesse, that are here so blind at mid-day. And therefore Paul saith, that their mindes are darkened by Sathan, that they should not see the glorie of Christ shining in the Gospel, though there be no veile set betweene them and it.

2 Now I take the Gospell for the cleare disclosing of the mysterie of Christ. I graunt truely, that in that respect that Paul calleth the Gospell the doctrine of faith, all the promises that we here and there finde in the law, concerning the free forgiuenesse of sinnes, whereby God reconcileth men to himselfe, are accounted parts thereof. For he compareth faith against these terrors, wherewith the conscience should be troubled and vexed, if saluation were to be sought by works. Wherevpon followeth, that in taking the name of the Gospell largely, there are contained vnder it all the testimonies that God in old time gaue to the fathers, of his mercy and fatherly fauor: But in the more excellent signification of it, I say it is applied to the publishing of the grace giuen in Christ. And that meaning is not onely receiued by cõmon vse, but also hangeth vpon the authoritie of Christ and the Apostles. Wherevpon this is properly ascribed vnto him, that he preached the Gospel of the kingdome. And Marke maketh his preface in this maner, The beginning of the Gospel of Iesus Christ. And there is no neede to gather places to proue a thing sufficiently knowen. Christ therefore by his comming hath made cleare the life and immortalitie by the Gospell. By which words Paul meaneth, not that the Fathers were drowned in darknesse of death, vntill the sonne of God did put on flesh: but claiming this prerogatiue of honour to the Gospell, Although in the law & the Prophets there be many promises concerning the free forgiuenesse of sins, yet the name of the Gospel properly taken is not applicable vnto thẽ but onely to the publishing of grace now giuen in Iesus Christ. 1. Tim. 4. 8. Mat. 4. 9. Mar. 1. 1.

he teacheth that it is a new and vnwonted kind of message, whereby God performed those things that he had promised, that the truth of his promises should be fulfilled in the person of the sonne. For although the faithfull haue alway found by experience that same saying of Paul to be true, that in Christ are all the promises, yea and Amen, 2. Tim. 1. 10. because they were sealed in their hearts: yet because he hath accomplished all parts of our saluation in his flesh, therefore that selfe liuely deliuering of the things rightfully obteined a new and singular title of praise. Whereupon commeth that saying of Christ, Iohn 1. 52. Hereafter ye shall see the heauens open, and the Angels of God ascending and descending vpon the sonne of man. For though he seeme to haue relation vnto the ladder shewed in a vision to the Patriarch Iacob: yet he setteth out the excellencie of his comming by this marke, that he opened the gate of heauen to all men, that the entrie thereof may stand familiarly open to all men.

We may not with Seruetus thinke that because the promises made before are accomplisht in Christ therefore they are abolisht, so as Christians are not to looke for any further enioying of things promised than they haue attained alreadie

3 But yet we must take heed of the diuelish imagination of Seruetus, which when he goeth about, or at least faigneth that he goeth about, to extoll the greatnesse of the grace of Christ, vtterly aboliſheth the promises, as if they were ended together with the law. He layeth for him, that by the faith of the Gospell there is brought vnto vs the accomplishment of all the promises: as though there were no difference betweene vs and Christ. I did in deede euen now declare that Christ left nothing vnperformed of the whole summe of our saluation: but it is wrongfully gathered thereupon, that we doe alreadie enioy the benefits purchased by him, as though that saying of Paul were false, that our saluation is hidden in hope. I graunt indeede, that we by beleeuing in Christ, doe also passe from death to life: But in the meane season we must hold this saying of Iohn, that although we know we be the children of God, yet it hath not as yet appeered, till we shall be like vnto him: that is, till we shall see him such as he is. Therefore although Christ offer vnto vs in his Gospell present fulnesse of spirituall good things, yet the enioying thereof lyeth still hid vnder the keeping of hope, till being vnclothed of the corruptible flesh, we be transfigured into the glorie of him that goeth before vs. In the meane time the holie Ghost biddeth vs to rest vpon the promises, whose authoritie ought with vs to put to silence all the barkings of that filthie dogge. For as Paul witnesseth, godlinesse hath a promise as well of the life to come, as of the life present. 1. Tim. 4. 8. For which reason he boasteth that he is an Apostle of Christ, according to the promise of life that is in him. 2. Tim. 1. And in another place he putteth vs in minde, that we haue the same promises which in the old time were giuen to the holy men. 2. Cor. 7. Finally, he setteth this for the summe of felicitie, that we are sealed vp with the holy spirit of promise, but yet we doe no otherwise enioy Christ, but so farre as we embrace him clothed with his promises. Whereby it commeth to passe, that he indeede dwelleth in our hearts, and yet we wander in iourney abroade from him, because we walke by faith and not by sight. And these two things doe not ill agree together, that we possesse in Christ all that pertaineth to the perfection of the heauenly life: and yet that faith is a beholding of good things that are not seene. Onely there is a difference to be noted in the nature or qualitie of the promises, because the Gospell sheweth with her finger that thing which the lawe did shadow vnder figures.

The Gospell is not so opposite to the law, as teaching another way of saluation, but the same more plainely.

4 And hereby also is their errour conuinced, which doe neuer otherwise compare the law with the Gospell, but as they compare the merits of works with the free imputation of righteousnesse. Although in deede this comparison of contraries be not to be reiected: because Paul doth oftentimes vnderstand by the name of the law, a rule to liue righteously, wherein God requireth of vs that which is his, not giuing vs any hope of life, vnlesse we in all points obey it: and on the other side adding a curse if we doe neuer so little swarue from it: that is in such places as he disputeth, that we doe freely please God, and are by pardon reckoned righteous, because the obseruation of the law whereunto the reward is promised, is no where found. Therefore Paul doth fitly make the righteousnesse of the law and of the Gospell, contrarie the one to the other. But the Gospell did not so succeede in place of the whole law, that it should bring any diuerse meane of saluation, but rather to confirme and prooue to be of force whatsoeuer the law had promised, and to ioyne the bodie to the shadowes. For when Christ saith, that the law & the Prophets were vntill Iohn: he maketh not the fathers subiect to the curse, which which the bondseruants of the law can not escape: but rather onely that they were instructed with certaine rudiments, so as they stayed a great way beneath the height of the doctrine of the Gospell. Therefore Paul calling the Gospell the power of God to saluation to euery beleeuer, by and by addeth, that it hath witnesse of the law and the prophets. But in the end of the same Epistle, although he shew that the title of praise of Iesus Christ is the reuelation of the mysterie kept secret in the euerlasting times: yet he doth qualifie that saying, with adding an exposition, teaching, that he is openly shewed by the writings of the Prophets. Whereupon we gather, that when we are to intreate of the whole law, the Gospell differeth from the law onely in respect of the plaine disclosing thereof. But yet for the inestimable flowing store of grace, which hath beene laid open for vs in Christ, it is now not without cause said, that at his comming the heauenly kingdome of God was erected in earth. Rom.1.16.

4 Now betweene the Law and the Gospell came Iohn, which had an office that was meane and of affinitie to them both. For though when he called Christ the lambe of God, and the sacrifice for the clensing of sinnes, he shewed foorth the summe of the Gospell: yet because he did not expresse that same incomparable strength and glorie, which at length appeered in his resurrection, therefore Christ saith, that he was not equall to the Apostles. For so doe those words of his meane: that though Iohn excell among the sonnes of women, yet he that is least in the kingdome of heauen, is greater than he. Because he doth not there commend the persons of men, but after he had preferred Iohn before the Prophets, he aduanceth the preaching of the Gospell to the highest degree: which preaching we see in another place signified by the kingdome of heauen. But whereas Iohn himselfe doth answere that he is but a voice, as though he were inferiour to the Prophets, he doth not that for fained humilities sake, but meaneth to teach that the proper office of the Embassadour was not committed to him, but that he onely executeth the office of an apparitor: as it was foretspoken by Malachie: Behold, I send Elias the Prophet, before that the great and terrible day of the Lord doe come. And truly he did nothing else in the whole course of his ministerie, but endeuour to get disciples to Christ: as also Esay prooueth, that this was enioyned him from God. And in this sense Christ is called a candle burning and shining, because the broad day had not yet appeered. And yet this is no let, but that he may be reckoned among the publishers of the Gospel, like as he vsed the same Baptisme, which was afterward deliuered to the Apostles. But that which he began, was not fulfilled but by the Apostles, with free proceeding, after that Christ was taken vp frō them into the heauenly glorie. The preaching of Iohn a meane betweene the lawe and the Gospell. In which respect his office differing both from the prophets and Apostles he is termed greater than the one, and lesse than he which was least of the other. Matt.11.11. Iohn 1.23. Mal.4.5. Iohn 5.35.

THE TENTH CHAPTER.

Of the likenesse of the old and new Testament.

BY the things aforesaid it may now appeere euidently, that all the men whom from the beginning of the world God adopted into the estate of his people, were with the same lawe, and with the bond of the same doctrine, which now remaineth in force among vs, bound in couenant to him. But because it is of no small importance that this point be well established, I will adioine vnto it for an addition, sith the fathers were partakers of all one inheritance with vs, and hoped for all one saluation by the grace of all one Mediatour, how farre their estate differed frō ours in this fellowship. But although the testimonies that we haue gathered out of the lawe and the Prophets for proofe thereof, doe make it plaine that there was neuer any other rule of religion and godlinesse in the people of God: yet because in writers there are oftentimes many things spoken of the difference of the old and new Testament, that may make the reader that is not of very sharp iudgement to be in doubt: therefore we shall rightfully appoint one peculiar place for the better and more exact discussing of this matter: Yea, and that thing also, which otherwise should haue beene very profitable for vs, is now made necessarie by that monstrous losell Seruetus, and by diuers other mad men of the sect of Anabaptists, which haue no other opinion of the people of Israell, than as of a heard of swine: which they fondly faigne to haue beene fatted vp by the Lord heere in this earth, without any hope of heauenly immortalitie. Therefore that we A thing necessary to know the agreement and difference betweene our selues, and the fathers vnder the law.

may keepe away this peſtilent errour from godly minds, and alſo to plucke out of them al doubts which are wont by and by to ariſe vpon hearing mention of the diuerſitie betweene the old and the new Teſtament: let vs by the way looke, what they haue in them like, and what vnlike one to the other: what couenant the Lord made with the Iſraelites in the olde time before the cõming of Chriſt, and what couenant he hath now made with vs ſince Chriſt hath beene openly ſhewed.

The fathers had the ſame couenant which we haue: they looked for immortalitie & had it promiſed: they expected it by mercie and not by merite: they knew that Chriſt was their mediator to obtaine mercie, as well as we.

2 And both theſe points may be made plaine with one word. The couenant of all the Fathers ſo differeth nothing from ours in ſubſtance and in matter it ſelfe, that it is altogether one and the ſelfe ſame: but the miniſtration is diuers. But becauſe of ſo great ſhortneſſe no man were able to attaine a certaine vnderſtanding, we muſt needes proceede on with a longer declaration if we meane to profit any thing at all. But in ſhewing how they are like or rather all one, it ſhall be ſuperfluous to diſcourſe againe of new vpon all the ſpeciall particulars that haue alreadie bene declared: and it ſhal be out of ſeaſon to mingle thoſe things together that remaine yet to be ſpoken in other places. Here we muſt chiefly reſt vpon three principall pointes: Firſt, that we hold, that carnall wealth and felicitie was not the marke appointed to the Iewes to aſpire vnto, but that they were by adoption choſen vnto the hope of immortalitie: and that the truth of this adoption was certainly aſſured vnto them both by oracles, and by the law, and by the prophecies. Secondarily, that the couenant whereby they were ioyned to the Lord, was vpholden not by any merits of theirs, but by the onely mercy of God that called them. Thirdly, that they both had and knew Chriſt the Mediatour, by whom they ſhould both be ioyned to God and enioy his promiſes. Of which points, becauſe the ſecond peraduenture is not yet ſufficiently knowen, it ſhall in place appointed for it be declared at large. For we ſhall confirme by many and cleare teſtimonies of the Prophets, that it was of his owne meere goodneſſe and tender fauour, whatſoeuer good the Lord at any time did, and promiſed to the people of Iſrael. The third alſo hath already had here and there ſome plaine declaration of it, and we haue not left the firſt altogether vntouched.

As well to the fathers vnder the law as to vs in the Goſpel promiſes were made of the life to come and not of temporall happines onely.

Rom. 1. 2.

Rom. 3. 21.

3 Therefore in ſetting out of this point, becauſe it moſt ſpecially belongeth to this preſent matter, and for that they make vs moſt controuerſie about it, we will employ the more earneſt trauell: but yet ſo that if there want yet any thing of the explication of the other, it may be by the way ſupplied, or in conuenient place be added. Truely, the Apoſtle taketh away all doubt of them all, when he ſaith, that God the Father long before by the Prophets in the holy Scriptures promiſed the Goſpell, which he afterward publiſhed according to the time appointed. Againe, that the righteouſneſſe of faith which is taught by the Goſpell it ſelfe, hath witneſſe of the law and the Prophets. For the Goſpell doth not hold the hearts of men in the ioy of this preſent life, but lifteth them vp to the hope of immortalitie: doth not faſten them to earthly delights, but preaching to them a hope laid vp in heauen, doth in a maner tranſport them thither. For thus he defineth in another place. Since that ye beleeued the Goſpell, ye are ſealed vp with the holy Spirit of promiſe, which is the earneſt of our inheritance, for the redemption of the poſſeſſion purchaſed. Againe, we haue heard of your faith in Chriſt Ieſu, and of your charitie toward the holy ones, for the hopes ſake that is laid vp for you in heauen, whereof ye haue heard by the true ſpeech of the Goſpell. Againe: He hath called vs by the Goſpel to the partaking of the glory of our Lord Ieſus Chriſt. Wherefore it is called both the word of ſaluation, and the power of God to ſaue the faithfull, and the kingdome of heauen. Now if the doctrine of the Goſpel be ſpirituall, & openeth the entry to the poſſeſſion of an incorruptible life: let vs not thinke that they to whom it was promiſed and declared, did paſſe ouer and neglect the care of their ſoule, and lie dully like beaſts in ſeeking pleaſures of the bodie. Neither let any man here cauill that the promiſes which are ſealed in the Law and the Prophets, concerning the Goſpel, were ordained for the new people. For within a litle after, that which he ſpake of the Goſpel promiſed in the law, he addeth, that all the things that the law containeth are without doubt properly directed to them that are vnder the law. I graunt indeed it is in another argument. But he was not ſo forgetfull, that when he had once ſaid that all the things which the law containeth belong to the Iewes, he did not remember what in a few

a few verſes before he had affirmed of the Goſpel promiſed in the law. Wherefore the Apoſtle ſheweth moſt plainly, that the old Teſtament chiefly tēded to the life to come, when he ſaith, that vnder it are contained the promiſes of the Goſpel.

4 By the ſame reaſon followeth, both that it ſtood vpon the free mercie of God, and alſo was confirmed by the meane of Chriſt. For the very preaching of the Goſpel pronounceth no other thing, but that ſinners are iuſtified by the fatherly kindneſſe of God, without their owne deſeruing, and the whole ſumme thereof is fulfilled in Chriſt. Who then dare make the Iewes without Chriſt, with whom we heare that the couenant of the Goſpel was made, whereof Chriſt is the onely foundation? Who dare make them ſtrangers from the benefit of free ſaluation, to whom we heare that the doctrine of the righteouſneſſe of faith was miniſtred? But, that we diſpute not long of an euident matter, we haue a notable ſentence of the Lord. Abraham reioyced that he might ſee my day, he ſaw it and was glad. And the ſame thing which Chriſt there teſtifieth of Abraham, the Apoſtle ſheweth that it was vniuerſall in the faithfull people, when he ſaith, that Chriſt abideth, yeſterday, this day, and for euer. For he ſpeaketh not there onely of the eternall Godhead of Chriſt, but alſo of his power, which was continually opened to the faithfull. Wherefore both the bleſſed Virgin and Zacharie in their ſongs, doe ſay, that the ſaluation reuealed in Chriſt, is the performance of the promiſes, which God in old time had made to Abraham and the Patriarches. If the Lord in giuing his Chriſt, diſcharged his old oath, it cannot be ſaid but that the end thereof was alway in Chriſt an euerlaſting life.

The ſame mercie by vertue of the ſame mediator ſaued the fathers which ſaueth vs.

Iohn 8.56.

Luk.1.54.& 72.

5 Yea, and the Apoſtle doth make the Iſraelites equall with vs, not onely in the grace of the couenant, but alſo in ſignification of ſacraments. For meaning by examples of puniſhments, wherewith the Scripture reciteth that they were corrected in the old time, to make the Corinthians afraid, that they ſhould not runne into the like offences, he beginneth with this preface, that there is no cauſe why we ſhould challenge any prerogatiue vnto our ſelues, to deliuer vs from the vengeance of God which they ſuſteined, foraſmuch as the Lord did not onely graunt vnto them the ſame benefits, but he hath glorioufly ſet foorth his grace among them with the ſame tokens: As if he ſhould haue ſaid: If ye truſt that ye be out of perill, becauſe both Baptiſme wherewith ye be marked, and the Supper which ye daily receiue, haue excellent promiſes, and in the meane time deſpiſing the goodnes of God, ye are licentiouſly wanton: Know yee, that the Iewes alſo were not without ſuch ſacraments, againſt whom yet the Lord did moſt ſeuerely put his iudgements in execution. They were Baptiſed in paſſing ouer the ſea, and in the clouds wherewith they were defended from the burning heate of the Sunne. They ſay, that that ſame paſſage was a carnall Baptiſme, which after a certaine proportion anſwereth to our ſpirituall Baptiſme. But if that were allowed true, the Apoſtles argument could not proceede, which meaneth heere to haue this taken away from the Chriſtians, that they thinke that they excell the Iewes by the prerogatiue of Baptiſme. Neither is that which by and by after followeth, ſubiect to this cauillation: that they did eate the ſame ſpirituall meate that we eate, and drunke the ſame ſpirituall drinke, which he expoundeth to be Chriſt.

Equalitie betweene the fathers and vs in the thing ſignified both by their and our ſacraments.

1 Cor.10.1.& 11.

6 To ouerthrow this ſentence of Paul, they obiect that which Chriſt ſaith: Your fathers did eate Manna in the wilderneſſe, and are dead: he that eateth my fleſh, ſhall not die for euer. Which two places are very eaſily made to agree together. The Lord, becauſe he then talked to hearers that ſought onely to be filled with foode of their bellies, but cared not for the meate of the ſoule, tempered his talke ſomewhat to their capacitie, but eſpecially he frameth the compariſon of Manna and of his bodie according to their ſenſe. They required that he, to get himſelfe ſome credit, would approoue his power with dooing ſome ſuch miracle, as Moſes did in the Wilderneſſe, when he obtained Manna from heauen. But in Manna they conceiued nothing but the remedie of carnall hunger, wherewith the people was then vexed: but they pierced not to that higher miſterie which Paul hath reſpect vnto, Chriſt therefore to ſhew how much greater a benefit they ought to looke for at his hand, than that which they reported that Moſes did beſtow vpon their fathers, frameth this compariſon: If it were a great miracle in your opinion, and worthy to be remēbred, that the Lord by Moſes miniſtred food food from heauen to his people, to ſuſtaine them for a ſmall time, that they ſhould not periſh for hunger in the wilderneſſe: gather hereby how much more excellent is the meate that giueth immortalitie. We ſee why the Lord paſſed ouer that thing which was principall in Manna, and ſpake onely of the baſeſt profit of it: euen becauſe the Iewes as it were of purpoſe to reproch him, did caſt Moſes in his teeth, which ſuccoured the neceſſitie of the people with remedie of Manna: he anſwered that he is the miniſter of a much higher grace, in compariſon whereof, the carnall feeding of the people, which alone they ſo much eſteemed, ought of right to be nothing regarded. But Paul, becauſe he knew that the Lord when he rayned Manna from heauen, did not onely powre it downe for the feeding of their belly, but alſo did diſtribute it for a ſpirituall myſterie, to be a figure of the ſpirituall quickening that is had in Chriſt, did not neglect that part that was moſt worthy of conſideration. Wherefore it certainely and cleerely followeth, that the ſame promiſes of eternall and heauenly life, which now the Lord vouchſafeth to grant vnto vs, were not onely communicated vnto the Iewes, but alſo ſealed with very ſpirituall Sacraments. Of which matter Auguſtine diſputeth largely againſt Fauſtus the Manichee.

* The words of Chriſt in ſaying: Your fathers did eate Manna and are dead: doe not contradict the Apoſtle which ſaith: They did eate the ſame ſpirituall meate that we eat. For they vnto whom Chriſt ſpeaketh gaue him occaſiō not to touch the myſterie but only the carnall vſe of their Manna.

Sith the fathers were enlightned and coupled vnto God by the ſeede of that word which is immortall, it ſheweth that they had the benefit of immortalitie and eternall life. 1.Pet.1.23. Eſay 40.6.

7 But if the readers had rather to haue teſtimonies alleaged vnto them out of the law and the Prophets, whereby they may perceiue that the ſpirituall couenant was common alſo to the Fathers, as we heare by Chriſt and the Apoſtles: I will alſo follow that deſire, and ſo much the more willingly, becauſe by that meane the aduerſaries ſhall be more ſurely conuinced, ſo that they ſhall haue afterward no way to dally. And I will begin at that proofe, which although I know that the Anabaptiſts pride will thinke very fond and in a maner to be laughed at, yet ſhall much auaile with ſuch readers as are willing to learne and haue their ſound wit. And I take it as a principle confeſſed, that there is ſuch effectuall force of life in the word of God, that whom ſo euer God vouchſafeth to be partakers thereof, it quickeneth their ſoules. For the ſaying of Peter hath alway beene of force, that it is the incorruptible ſeede which abideth for euer, as alſo he gathereth out of the words of Eſay. Now ſith God in the old time bound the Iewes vnto him with this holy bonde, it is no doubt that he did ſeuer them into the hope of eternall life. For when I ſay they imbraced the word, which ſhould ioyne them nigher to God, I take it for the maner of communicating it: not that generall maner, which is powred abroad throughout the heauen and earth and all the creatures of the world, which although it doe quicken all things, euery one after the proportion of their nature, yet it doth not deliuer them from neceſſitie of corruption: but I ſpeake of this ſpeciall maner, wherby the ſoules of the godly are both lightened vnto the knowledge of God, and in a maner coupled to him. By this enlightening of the word, ſith Adam, Abel, Noe, Abraham, and the other Fathers cleaued vnto God, I ſay that it is not doubtfull that they had an entrie into the immortall kingdome of God. For it was a ſound partaking of God, which cannot be without the benefite of eternall life.

The forme of the couenant of God with the Fathers promiſing to be their God, proueth that eternall life was promiſed them. Leui. 26.12. Pſal. 144.15. Pſal 33.12. Abac.1.12. Eſay 33 22. Deut 33.29.

8 But if this ſeeme ſomewhat entangled: goe to, let vs come to the very forme of the couenant, which ſhall not onely ſatisfie ſober wits, but alſo ſhall ſufficiently conuince their ignorance that bend themſelues to ſpeake againſt it. For God did alwaies thus couenant with his ſeruants: I will be to you a God, and ye ſhall be to me a people. In which words the Prophets themſelues are wont to expound, that both life and ſaluation, and the whole ſumme of bleſſedneſſe is comprehended. For Dauid doth not without cauſe often pronounce, that bleſſed is the people, whoſe God is the Lord: bleſſed is the nation, which he hath choſen to be his inheritance: and that not for earthly felicities ſake, but becauſe he deliuereth them from death, he preſerueth them for euer, and continually ſheweth them eternall mercie, whom he hath taken to his people: as it is in the other Prophets, Thou art our God, we ſhall not die: The Lord is our King, our lawmaker, he ſhall ſaue vs. Bleſſed art thou, O Iſrael, becauſe thou art ſaued in the Lord God. But, not to labour ouermuch in a thing needeleſſe, this admonition is found each where in the Prophets, that we ſhall want nothing toward all aboundance of good things, and aſſurance of ſaluation, ſo that the Lord be our God. And rightfully: For if his face ſo ſoone as it beginneth to ſhine, is a moſt preſent pledge of ſaluation, to what man ſhall he openly ſhew himſelfe for his God, but that he will alſo open to him his treasure of saluation? For he is our God with this condition, to dwell in the middest of vs: as he testified by Moses. But such presence cannot be obtained, but that life must be also together had in possession with it. And although there were no more expressed, yet had they a promise of spirituall life plaine ynough in these words: I am your God. For he did not declare that he would be a God vnto their bodies alone, but principally to their soules. But Soules vnlesse they be ioyned to God by righteousnesse remaine estranged from him in death. But on the other side, let that ioyning be present, it shall bring euerlasting saluation with it. Leui.26.12. Exod.6.7.

9 Beside that, he did not onely testifie that he was to them their God, but he also promised that he would be so alway: to the ende that their hope not contented with present benefites, should be extended to eternitie. And many sayings doe shew, that the speaking in the future time meant so much, as where the faithfull not onely in present euils, but also for the time to come, doe comfort themselues with this, that God will neuer faile them. Now as concerning the second part of the promise, he yet more plainely assured them of the blessing of God to be prolonged vnto them beyond the bounds of this life, in saying: I will be the God of your seed after you. For if he minded to declare his good will toward them being dead, in doing good to their posteritie, much more would his fauour not faile toward themselues. For God is not like vnto men, which doe therefore carie their loue to their friends children, because their power is interrupted by death, so that they can not employ their friendly doings vpon them to whom they did beare good will. But God, whose bountifulnesse is not hindered by death, taketh not away from the very dead the fruit of the mercie, which for their sakes he poureth out into a thousand generations. Therefore the Lords will was by a notable proofe to set foorth vnto them the greatnesse and flowing plentie of his goodnesse, which they should feele after death, when he described it to be such as should flowe ouer into all their posteritie. And the truth of this promise the Lord did then seale, and as it were brought foorth the fulfilling of it, when he named himselfe the God of Abraham, Isaac and Iacob, long after their death. For, what? had it not beene a fond naming, if they had vtterly perished? For then had it beene all one, as if he had said, I am the God of them that are not. Wherefore the Euangelists rehearse, that with this one argument the Sadduces were so driuen to a straite, that they could not denie that Moses did testifie the resurrection of the dead, for that they had learned by Moses, that all the Saints were in his hand. Whereupon it was easie to gather, that they are not destroyed by death, whom he that is the iudge of life and death had receiued into his safegard, custodie, and protection.

God in promising the fathers to be their God in time to come, and to continue his mercie to their children, likewise in affirming himselfe to be the God of the dead, gaue the liuing plaine hope of endlesse life. Gen.17.7. Exod.20.6. Exod.3.6. Mat.22.23. Luk.20.32. Deut.33.3.

10 Now (which is the principall point whereupon this controuersie hangeth) let vs looke, whether the faithfull themselues haue not beene so instructed of the Lord, that they perceiued that they should haue a better life elsewhere, and so neglecting this life, had an eye to the other. First the state of life that was enioyned them by God, was a continuall exercise, whereby they might be put in minde, that they were the most miserable of all men, if their happinesse were onely in this life. Adam, most vnhappie, euen with onely remembrance of the happinesse that he had lost, did with painefull labors hardly susteine his needinesse, and that he should not be pressed with the curse of God, in the onely labours of his hands, euen there receiued he extreme sorrow of that which remained for him to be his comfort. Of his two sonnes, the one was taken away by the wicked slaughter of his brother: the other he had left aliue, whose sight he worthily detested and abhorred. Abel cruelly murthered in the very floure of his age, became an example of the wretchednesse of men. Noe, while the whole world carelesly liued in pleasure, spent a good part of his age with great wearinesse in building the Arke. This that he escaped death, came to passe by his greater troubles, than if he should haue died an hundred deaths. For beside that the Arke was to him as a graue for tenne moneths, there is nothing more vnpleasant than to be holden so long in maner drowned in dung of beasts. When he had passed ouer so great difficulties, he fell into new matter of greefe, he saw himselfe scorned of his owne sonne, and was compelled with his owne mouth to curse him, whom by the great benefite of God he had receiued safe from the generall flood.

The estate of Adam, Abel, and Noe, declareth that they had an eye to a better than this present life. Gen.3.17. Gen.4.8. Gen.6.22. Gen.9.24.

11 Abraham

Gen. 12.4. None more miserable than Abraham, if his condition in this life only be respected.

11 Abraham indeed may be one alone to be compared with an hundred thousand, if we consider his faith, which is set foorth vnto vs for the best rule of beleeuing, of whose kindred we must be accounted, that we may be the children of God. But what more absurditie is there, than Abraham to be the father of all the faithfull, and not to possesse so much as the smallest corner among them? but he cannot be throwen downe out of the number no not from the most honorable degree, but that the whole Church must be destroied. Now as touching the experiences of his life: When he was first called by the commandement of God, he was plucked away from his countrey, his parents and his friends, in whom men thinke to be the chiefe sweetnesse of life: euen as if God of determinate purpose meant to spoile him of all the pleasures of life. So soone as he came into the land where he was commanded to dwell, he was driuen out from thence with famine. Thither he fled for succour, where to saue himselfe, he was compelled to deliuer out his wife to be abused, which we know not whether it were not more bitter to him than many deaths. When he was returned into the land of his owne dwelling, he was driuen out againe from thence with famine. What a felicitie is this, to dwell in that land, wherein a man must so oft be hungrie, yea die for famine if he run not away? And therwithal he was brought to that necessitie with Abimelech, that he must needs redeem his life with the losse of his wife, while many yeers long he wandred vncerteinly hither & thither he was compelled by the continual brawlings of his seruants to put away his Nephew whom he loued as his owne son. Which departing without doubt he did no otherwise take than if he had suffred the cutting off of one of his lims. A litle after, he heard that he was carried away captiue by his enemies. Whether soeuer he went, he found neighbors outragiously barbarous, which would not suffer him so much as to drinke water out of the wels that himselfe had digged with great labour. For he would not haue redeemed the vse of them at the hand of King Gerar, if he had not first beene forbidden. Now when he came to old age, he saw the thing which is the most vnpleasant and bitter that that age hath, himselfe punished with hauing no children, till beside all hope he begat Ismael, whose birth yet he paid deere for, when he was wearied with the brawling of Sara, as if he in maintaining the stubbornnesse of his bond-woman were himselfe the cause of the trouble of his household. At length Isaac was borne, but with this condition that his first begotten Ismael must, as forsaken, be cruelly cast out of doores. When onely Isaac was left, in whom the wearied age of the sillie good man might rest, within a little after he was commaunded to kill him. What can mans wit deuise more miserable, than the Father to be made the butcher of his owne sonne? If Isaac had died of any sickenesse, who would not haue thought the old man most miserable, that had a sonne giuen him in mockage, for whome his griefe of want of children should be doubled? If he had bene slaine by some stranger, the vnhappinesse of the thing would haue much encreased his miserie. But this passeth all examples of miserie, to haue him slaine with his Fathers owne hande. Finally, he was in all the whole course of his life so tossed and vexed, as if a man would in a table paint out an example of a miserable life, he could finde none more fit than this of Abraham. And let no man obiect that he was not altogether vnhappie, for that he at length prosperously escaped from so many and so great tempests. For we cannot say that he liueth a blessed life, which for a long space together painfully weareth out of infinite troubles, but him that without feeling of euils, quietly enioyeth present good things.

Gen. 12.12.

The liues of Isaac and Iacob especially, how far from outward happines?

12 Isaac that was lesse troubled with euils, yet scarse euer tooke any taste of sweetnesse. He hath also felt the same vexations, that doe not suffer a man to be blessed in the earth. Famine chased him out of the land of Chanaan: he had his wife violently plucked away from his bosome: his neighbours oft troubled him, and by all meanes oppressed him, so that he was faine to striue for his water: at home in his owne house, he suffred much troublesomenes by his childrens wiues, he was grieued with disagreements of his sons, and could not remedie that so great a mischiefe, but by the banishment of him whom he had blessed. But as for Iacob, he is nothing else but a notable example of extreme infelicitie. He passed his childhood most vnquietly at home among the threatnings & terrors of his elder brother, to which at length he was compelled to giue place.

When

When he was fled from his parents and his natiue Countrie, beſide that it was a greeuous thing to liue in baniſhment, he was nothing more kindly or gently receiued of his Vncle Laban. Then it ſufficed not that he had ſerued ſeuen yeere a hard and cruell ſeruice, but that alſo muſt be by guile defrauded of his wife. For an other wiues ſake he was driuen into new ſeruice, where he was all the day fried with heate of the ſunne, and all the night lay waking and pained with froſt and colde, as himſelfe complained. While he by the ſpace of twentie yeares ſuffred ſo hard a life, he was dayly vexed with new iniuries of his father in law. Neither was he quiet in his owne houſe, ſeeing it diuided and in a maner ſcattered abroad with the hatred, brawling and enuie of his wiues. When he was commanded to returne into his countrie, he was compelled to watch an aduantage to take his iourney, much like a ſhamefull running away: and yet could he not ſo eſcape the vniuſt dealing of his Father in law, but was faine to ſuffer his reproches and rebukes in the middes of his iourney. Then fell he into a much more cruell diſtreſſe. For when he came neere to his brother, he had ſo many deaths before his eies, as might be prepared by a cruell man and a bent enemie. So was he aboue meaſure tormented and as it were drawen inſunder with terrible feares, ſo long as he looked for his brothers comming. when he came once in his ſight, he fell downe as halfe dead at his feete, vntill he found him more fauourable than he durſt haue hoped. Beſide that, at his firſt entrie into the land, he loſt Rachel his deerely beloued wife. Afterward he heard word that the ſonne which he had by her, and whom therfore he loued aboue the reſt, was torne with wilde beaſts: by whoſe death how great griefe he conceiued, he himſelfe declared in this that after long weeping he obſtinately ſtopped vp all waies whereby comfort might come to him, leauing himſelfe nothing, but to goe downe to his ſonne wailing into the graue. In the meane time how great cauſes of griefe, waiting and wearineſſe were the rauiſhment and deflouring of his daughter, and the boldneſſe of his ſonnes in reuenging it, which not onely made him to be abhorred in ſight of all the inhabitants of that countrie, but alſo procured him moſt preſent perill of vtter deſtruction? Then followed that horrible outragious offence of Ruben his firſt begotten ſonne, which was ſuch as there could not chaunce a more grieuous. For whereas the defiling of a mans wife is reckoned among the higheſt ill fortunes: what is to be ſaid of it, when that wickedneſſe is committed by a mans owne ſonne? Within a little while after, his houſe is ſpotted with another vnnaturall adulterie: ſo that ſo many ſhames might well breake a heart, that otherwiſe were moſt conſtant and vnable to be vanquiſhed with calamities. Neere before the ende of this life, while he ſought to prouide ſuccour for the famine of himſelfe and other, he was ſtriken with tydings of a new misfortune, vnderſtanding that another of his ſonnes was kept in priſon, for recouering of whom he was compelled to leaue to the reſt Beniamin his only darling. Who can think, that in ſuch a heape of miſchiefes he had any one moment giuen him ſafely to take breath in? And therefore he himſelfe the beſt witneſſe of himſelfe, affirmed to Pharao, that his daies were ſhort and euill vpon the earth. Now truely he that declareth that he hath paſſed his life by continuall miſeries, denieth that he felt the proſperitie which the Lord had promiſed him. Therefore either Iacob did vnkindly and vnthankefully weigh the grace of God, or he truely profeſſed that he had beene miſerable vpon the earth. If his affirmation were true, then it followeth, that he had not his hope faſtened vpon earthly things.

13 If theſe holy Fathers looked for (as vndoubtedly they did) a bleſſed life at the hand of God, truely they both thought and ſaw it to be another maner of bleſſedneſſe, than the bleſſedneſſe of earthly life. Which thing the Apoſtle alſo doth ſhew excellently well: Abraham (ſaith he) direct by faith in the land of promiſe as in a ſtrange land, dwelling in tents with Iſaac and Iacob parteners with him of the ſame inheritance, for they looked for a Citie ſet vpon a good foundation, the maker and builder whereof is God, all theſe are dead in faith, not receiuing the things promiſed, but looking at them a farre off, and beleeuing and confeſſing that they were gueſtes and ſtrangers vpon the land. Whereby they declare that they ſought for a Countrie, and if they had beene mooued with deſire of that land from whence they came, they had power to returne. But they ſought for a better, that is the heauenly countrie. Wherefore God is not aſhamed med to be called their God, forasmuch as he hath prepared them a Citie. For they had beene duller than blockes, to follow promises so earnestly, whereof there appeared no hope in earth, vnlesse they had looked for the fulfilling of them elsewhere. But this he chiefly inforceth, and that not without good reason, that they called this life a iourney from home, euen as Moses reporteth. For if they were strangers & forreiners in the land of Chanaan, where is the Lords promise, whereby they were made heires of it? He sheweth plainely therefore, that the Lords promise, concerning the possession thereof, had a further respect. Wherefore they purchased not one foote in the land of Chanaan, but for buriall, whereby they testified, that they did not hope that they should receiue the fruite of the promise till after death. And that is the cause why Iacob so much esteemed to be buried there, that he compelled his Sonne Ioseph to promise it him, and to sweare to performe it: and why Ioseph willed his bones, certaine ages after, when they were long before fallen into powder, to be remooued thither.

The righteous of olde did accompt the end of this life to be the beginning of a better.

14 Finally, it appeareth plainely, that in all the trauailes of this life they had alway set before them the blessednesse of the life to come. For to what purpose should Iacob haue so much desired, and with so great danger sought the preeminence of the first begotten, which should procure him nothing but banishment, and in a maner to be cast off from being his childe: but no good at all, vnlesse he had respect to a higher blessing? And he declared, that he had this meaning by the words which he spake among his last breathings. Lord, I will looke for thy saluation. What saluation could he haue looked for, when he saw that he lay readie to giue vp the Ghost, vnlesse he had seene in death the beginning of a new life? But what dispute we of the holy ones and children of God, when euen he was not without a taste of such vnderstanding, which otherwise was enemie to the truth? For what meant Balaam when he said? Let my soule die the death of the righteous, and let my last times be like vnto theirs? but that he meant the same thing that Dauid afterward vttered, that the death of the Saints is precious in the sight of the Lord, but the death of the wicked, is very euill. If the furthest bound and end were in death, there could in it be noted no difference betweene the righteous and vnrighteous, they differ one from the other by the diuersitie of the estates that after death shall befall to them both.

The hope which Dauid had of immortalitie.

15 We are not yet come beyond Moses, Which (as these men say) had no other office, but to perswade the carnall people to worship God by the fruitfulnesse of the ground and plentie of all things. And yet (vnlesse a man will flee the light that willingly offereth it selfe) there is alreadie a plaine declaration of the spirituall couenant. But if we come downe to the Prophets, there with most full brightnesse both the life euerlasting and the kingdome of Christ doe vtter themselues. And first of all Dauid, which as he was before the other in time, so according to the order of Gods distribution, he shewed the heauenly mysteries in shadowes more darkely than the rest, yet with what plainnesse and certaintie directeth he all his sayings to that end? How he esteemed the earthly dwelling, this sentence testifieth: I am here a forreiner and stranger, as all my fathers were. Euery liuing man is vanitie, euery one walketh about as a shadow. But now what is my expectation, Lord? euen to thee is my hope. Truely he that confessing that in the earth there is nothing sound or stedfast, keepeth still a stedfastnesse of hope in God, considereth his felicitie laid vp in another place. To such consideration is he wont to call all the faithfull, so oft as he meaneth to comfort them truely. For in another place after he had spoken of the shortnesse, and the transitorie and vanishing image of mans life, he addeth: But the mercie of the Lord is for euer vpon them that feare him. Like whereunto is that which is in the hundred and second Psalme. At the beginning Lord thou didst lay the foundation of the earth, and the heauens are the workes of thy hands. They shall perish, but thou abidest: they shall waxe olde like a garment, and thou shalt change them as apparell, but thou remainest the selfe same, and thy yeeres shall not faile: the sonnes of thy seruants shall dwell, and thy posteritie shall be established before thee. If the godly cease not for the decay of heauen and earth to be stablished before the Lord, it followeth that their saluation is ioyned with the eternitie of God. But that hope cannot stand at all, vnlesse it rest vpon the promise that is set foorth in Esay: The heauens (saith the Lord) shall vanish away like smoke, the the earth ſhall be worne out like a garment, and the inhabitants of it ſhall periſh like thoſe things: But my ſaluation ſhall be for euer, and my righteouſneſſe ſhall not faile: where euerlaſtingneſſe is giuen to righteouſneſſe and ſaluation, not in reſpect that they remaine with God, but in reſpect that they are felt of men.

16 Neither may we otherwiſe take thoſe things, that he commonly ſpeaketh of the proſperous ſucceſſe of the faithfull, but to apply them to the open ſhewing of the heauenly glory. As theſe ſayings: The Lord keepeth the ſoules of the righteous, he ſhall deliuer them from the hand of the ſinner. Light is ariſen to the righteous, and ioy to the vpright in hart. The righteouſneſſe of the godly man abideth for euer: his horne ſhall be exalted in glory, the deſire of the ſinner ſhall periſh. Againe: but the righteous ſhall confeſſe vnto thy name, the vpright ſhall dwell with thy countenance. Againe: the righteous ſhall be in eternall remembrance. Againe: the Lord ſhall redeeme the ſoules of his ſeruants. For the Lord oftentimes leaueth his ſeruants to the luſt of the wicked, not onely to be vexed, but alſo to be torne in peeces and deſtroied: he ſuffereth the good to lie languiſhing in darkeneſſe and filth, while the wicked doe in a maner ſhine among the ſtarres. And he doth not ſo cheere them with the brightneſſe of his countenance, that they enioy long continuing gladneſſe. Wherefore euen he alſo hideth not, that if the faithfull faſten their eies vpon the preſent ſtate of things, they ſhall be ſtriken with a ſore temptation, as though there were no fauour or reward of innocencie with God. So much doth wickedneſſe for the moſt part proſper and floriſh, while the company of the godly is oppreſſed with ſhame, pouertie, contempt, and all kindes of croſſes. It wanteth but little (ſaith he) that my foote ſlipped not, and my ſteps fell not abroad, while the fortune of fooles grieueth me, and while I ſee the proſperitie of the wicked. At length after rehearſall of it he concludeth: I bent my thought, if I could vnderſtand theſe things. But it is a torment to my ſpirit, till I enter into the ſanctuarie of the Lord, and vnderſtand the laſt end of them.

What Dauid ſpeaketh of the faithfull mans proſperous ſucceſſe, it hath relation to future bleſſednes in the world to come.

Pſal. 73. 17.

17 Let vs therefore learne yet by this confeſſion of Dauid, that the holy Fathers vnder the olde Teſtament were not ignorant, how ſeldome or neuer God doth in this world performe to his ſeruants thoſe things that he promiſeth them, and that therefore they did lift vp their minds to Gods ſanctuarie, wherein they had that laid vp in ſtore, which appeareth not in the ſhadow of this preſent life. That was the laſt iudgement of God, which when they could not ſee with eyes, they were content to vnderſtand by faith. Truſting vpon which affiance, whatſoeuer happened in the world, yet they doubted not a time would once come, when the promiſes of God ſhould be fulfilled. As theſe ſayings doe witneſſe, I will behold the face of God in righteouſneſſe: I will be ſatisfied with thy countenance. Againe: I as a greene Oliue tree in the houſe of the Lord. Againe, The righteous ſhall floriſh as a Date tree, and ſhall ſpread in branches like the Cedar of Libanus, being planted in the houſe of the Lord, they ſhall floriſh in the Palaces of our God: They ſhall ſtill beare fruit, they ſhall be fat and greene in their old age. When he had ſaid a little before: How deepe are thy thoughts O Lord? while the wicked doe floriſh, they bud out like an herbe, that they may periſh for euer. Where is that faire ſhew and beautie of the faithfull, but when the face of this world ſhall be turned inward by diſcloſing of the kingdome of God? When they turned their eyes to that eternitie, they deſpiſed the hardneſſe enduring but a moment of preſent miſeries, and boldly burſt foorth into theſe words: Thou ſhalt not ſuffer for euer the righteous to die, but thou ſhalt throw downe the wicked headlong into the pit of deſtruction. Where is in this world the pit of eternall deſtruction that may ſwallow vp the wicked? Among whoſe felicities, this is alſo reckened in another place, that they cloſe vp the ende of their life in a moment without long languiſhing. Where is that ſo great ſtedfaſtneſſe of the holy ones, whom Dauid himſelfe eachwhere complaineth not onely to be ſhaken with trouble, but alſo to be oppreſſed, and vtterly broken in peeces? Forſooth, he did ſet before his eyes, not what the altering courſe of the world beareth, which is vnſtable and more vnſtedfaſt than the ebbing and flowing of tides, but what the Lord will doe, when he ſhall one day fit for the eternall ſetling of heauen & earth. As in another place he excellently well deſcribeth it: The fooliſh do ſtay vpon their wealthineſſe, and are proud becauſe of their great riches. And yet no man, though Psal.49.7. he floriſh in neuer ſo great dignitie, can redeeme his brother from death, no man can pay to God the price of his ranſome, but whereas they ſee that both the wiſe doe die, and that the wicked alſo and fooles doe periſh and leaue their riches to ſtrangers, yet they thinke that their houſes ſhall abide for euer, and their dwellings to the end of ages, and they aduaunce their names vpon the earth, but man ſhall not continue in honor: he ſhall be like to the beaſts that die. This imagination of theirs is extremeſt folly, which yet their poſteritie doe greedily follow. They ſhall be placed like a flocke in Hell, and death ſhall haue rule ouer them. When the light ariſeth, the vpright ſhall haue dominion ouer them, the beautie of them ſhall periſh, Hell is their dwelling houſe. Firſt, this laughing to ſcorne of the fooliſh for that they reſt on the ſlipperie and rolling good things of the world, doth ſhew that the wiſe muſt ſeeke a farre other felicitie. But there he more euidently diſcloſeth the myſterie of the reſurrection, where after the deſtruction and extinguiſhment of them, he erecteth the kingdome of the godly. For what riſing of light (I pray you) ſhall we call that, but the reueiling of the new life which followeth the end of this preſent life.

The faithfull could not haue comforted themſelues, as both Dauid and Samuel did with the momentanie ſhortneſſe of their troubles in the world except they had made a reckoning of endleſſe reſt afterwards.

18 From thence did ſpring vp that conſideration, which the faithfull oftentimes vſed for a comfort of their miſeries and remedie of patience: It is but a moment in the Lords diſpleaſure, and life in his mercy. How did they determine afflictions to ende in a moment, that were in affliction in a maner their life long? where did they eſpie ſo long an enduring of Gods kindneſſe, whereof they ſcarſly felt any little taſt? If they had ſticked faſt vpon the earth, they could haue found no ſuch thing, but becauſe they looked vpon heauen, they acknowledged that it is but a moment of time, while the Lord exerciſe his holy ones by the croſſe, but that his mercies, wherein they are gathered together, doe laſt the worlds age. Againe, they did foreſee the eternall and neuer ending deſtruction of the vngodly, which were as in a dreame happy for one day. Whereupon came theſe ſayings: The remembrance of the righteous ſhal be in bleſſing, but the name of the wicked ſhall rot. Precious is the death of the Saints in the ſight of the Lord, but the death of the wicked moſt euill. Againe, in Samuel: The Lord ſhall keepe the feete of the holy, and the wicked ſhall be put to ſilence in darkeneſſe. Which doe declare that they well knew, that howſoeuer the holy were diuerſly carried about, yet their laſt ende is life and ſaluation: and that the proſperitie of the wicked is a pleaſant way, whereby they by little and little ſlide forward into the gulfe of death. Therefore they called the death of ſuch, the deſtruction of the vncircumciſed, as of them from whom the hope of the reſurrection was cut away. Wherefore Dauid could not deuiſe a more grieuous curſe than this: Let them be blotted out of the boke of life, and not be written with the righteous.

Iobs hope of life in death. Neither was this in him, or the like in others the ſpeciall perſwaſion onely of ſome, but the generall doctrine deliuered all men to beleeue.
Iob 19.25.
Iob.13.15.

19 But aboue all other, notable is that ſaying of Iob: I know that my redeemer liueth, and in the laſt day I ſhall riſe againe out of the earth, & in my fleſh I ſhall ſee God, my ſauiour: This hope is laid vp in my boſome. Some that haue a mind to make a ſhew of their ſharpe wit, doe cauill that this is not to be vnderſtanded of the laſt reſurrection, but of the firſt day that Iob looked to haue God more gentle to him, which although we grant them in part, yet ſhall we enforce them to confeſſe whether they will or no, that Iob could not haue come to that largenes of hope, if he had reſted his thought vpon the earth. Therefore we muſt needes confeſſe, that he lifted vp his eyes to the immortalitie to come, which ſaw, that his redeemer would be preſent with him, euen lying in his graue. For to them that thinke onely of this preſent life, death is their vttermoſt deſperation: which very death could not put off Iobs hope. Yea though he kill me (ſaid he) neuertheleſſe I will ſtill hope in him. And let no trifler here carp againſt me and ſay, that theſe were the ſayings but of a few, whereby is not prooued that ſuch doctrine was among the Iewes. For I will by and by anſwer him, that theſe few did not in theſe ſayings vtter any ſecret wiſedome, whereunto onely certaine excellent wits, were ſeuerally and priuately ſuffered to attaine, but that as they were by the holy Ghoſt appointed teachers of the people, ſo they openly publiſhed thoſe myſteries of God, that were to be vniuerſally learned, & ought to be the principles of the common religion among the people. Therefore when we heare the publike oracles of the holy Ghoſt, wherein he ſpake of the ſpirituall life ſo clearely & plainely in the Church of the Iewes, it were a point of intollerable ſtubbornneſſe to ſend them away onely to the fleſhly couenant, wherein is mention made of nothing, but earth and earthly wealthineſſe.

20 If I come downe to the later Prophets, there we may freely walke as in our owne field. For if it were not hard for vs to get the vpper hand in Dauid, Iob, and Samuel, heere it ſhall be much more eaſie. For God kept this diſtribution and order in diſpoſing the couenant of his mercie, that how much the neerer it drew on in proceſſe of time to the full performance thereof, with ſo much greater increaſments of reuelation he did day by day more brightly ſhew it. Therefore at the beginning when the firſt promiſe of ſaluation was made vnto Adam, there gliſtered out but as it were ſmall ſparkles of it. After, hauing more added vnto it, a greater largeneſſe of light began to be put foorth: which from thence foorth brake out more and more, and diſplaied her brightneſſe farther abroad, till at length all the clouds were driuen away, and Chriſt the ſonne of righteouſneſſe fully lightned the whole world. We neede not therefore to feare that we faile of teſtimonies of the Prophets, if we ſeeke them to prooue our cauſe, but becauſe I ſee that there will ariſe a huge deale of matter, whereupon I ſhould be conſtrained of neceſſitie to tarie longer than the proportion of my purpoſe may beare, for it would ſo grow to a work of a great volume, and alſo becauſe I haue already, by thoſe things that I haue ſaid before, made plaine the way, euen for a Reader of meane capacitie, ſo as he may go forward without ſtumbling: therefore I will at this preſent abſtaine from long tediouſneſſe: which to doe is no leſſe neceſſarie: but giuing the readers warning before hand, that they remember to open their owne way with that key that we haue firſt giuen them in their hand. That is, that ſo oft as the Prophets ſpeake of the bleſſedneſſe of the faithful people, whereof ſcarcely the leaſt ſteps are ſeene in this preſent life, they may reſort to this diſtinction: that the Prophets the better to expreſſe the goodnes of God, did as in a ſhadow expreſſe it to the people by temporall benefits, as by certaine rough drawing of the portraiture thereof: but that the perfect image, that they haue painted thereof, was ſuch as might rauiſh mens mindes out of the earth, and out of the elements of this world, and of the age that ſhall periſh, and of neceſſitie raiſe it vp to the conſidering of the felicitie of the life that is to come and ſpirituall.

How the Prophets haue ſhadowed out vnſeene ſpirituall felicitie to come by temporall & earthly commodities preſently ſeen and known.

21 We will be content with one example. When the Iſraelites being caried away to Babylon, ſaw their ſcattering abroad to be like vnto death, they could hardly be remoued from this opinion that they thought that all was but fables that Ezechiel prophecied of their reſtitution: becauſe they reckoned it euen all one as if he had told thē that rotten carcaſes ſhould be reſtored againe to life. The Lord to ſhew, that euen the ſame difficultie could not ſtop him from bringing his benefit to effect, ſhewed to the Prophet in a viſion a field full of drie bones, to the which in a moment with the onely power of his word he reſtored breath and liuelineſſe. The viſion indeed ſerued to correct the incredulitie at that preſent time: but in the meane ſeaſon he did put the Iewes in minde how far the power of the Lord extended beyond the account of the people, which ſo eaſily quickened with his only beck, bones already rottē & ſcattered abroad: wherefore you ſhall compare that with another ſaying of Eſay. The dead ſhall riſe, my carcaſe, they ſhall riſe againe. Awake ye and reioice that dwell in the duſt, becauſe the deaw of the greene field is thy deaw, and thou ſhalt pluck downe the land of the Giants into ruine. Go my people, enter into thy tents: ſhut thy dores vpon thee, hide thee a litle while, till my diſpleaſure paſſe ouer. For behold, the Lord ſhall go out of his place, to viſit the iniquitie of the dweller vpon the earth againſt him, and the earth ſhall ſhew foorth her bloud, and ſhall no longer hide her ſlaine.

The power whuh God hath to giue life ſhewed by a viſion of breath and liuelineſſe reſtored to a field full of dead bones. Eze. 37. 4.

Eſa. 26. 19.

22 Albeit a man ſhould doe fondly, that would go about to draw all to ſuch a rule. For there be ſome places that without any couering do ſhew the immortalitie to come, that is prepared for the faithfull in the kingdome of God, of which ſort we haue recited ſome, and of like ſort are the moſt part of the reſt, ſpecially theſe two, the one in Eſay. As a new heauen, and a new earth which I make to ſtand before me, ſo ſhall your ſeede ſtand, and there ſhall be moneth of moneth, and Sabbat of Sabbat: all fleſh ſhall come to worſhip before my face, ſaith the Lord. And they ſhall goe out and ſee the dead carcaſes of the men that haue offended againſt me, that their worme ſhall not die, and their fire ſhall not be quenched. The other of Daniel. In that time ſhall riſe vp

Michael the great Prince, that ſtandeth for the ſonnes of his people, and there ſhall come a time of diſtreſſe, ſuch as was not ſince nations firſt began to be, and then ſhall all thy people be ſaued that ſhall be found written in thy booke. And of thoſe that ſleepe in the duſt of the earth, there ſhall awake ſome to eternall life, and ſome to euerlaſting ſhame.

Seeing that Chriſt promiſeth vs no reſt but with them, and Peter comprehendeth vs in the ſame couenant which God made with them: ſeeing Chriſt hath riſen vnto life accompanied with many of them, and hath witneſſed by Peter, that the ſpirit of faith which is in vs, was alſo in them: howſoeuer the Sadducees haue denied the heauenly, & the Iewes at this day doe expect an earthly kingdome, we may not take from the Fathers the inheritance of eternall life.

Act.3.25.
Mat.27.52.
Act.15.8.

23 Now, as for prooving the other two points that the Fathers had Chriſt for pledge of their couenant, and that they repoſed in him all their affiance of bleſſing, I will not trauaile therein at all, becauſe they haue both leſſe controuerſie and more plainneſſe. Let vs therefore boldly determine this, which by no engines of the diuell may be remooued, that the olde Teſtament, or couenant which the Lord made with his people Iſrael, was not limited within the compaſſe of earthly things, but alſo conteined the promiſe of the ſpirituall and eternall life: the expectation whereof muſt needs haue beene imprinted in all their minds that truely conſented to the couenant. But let vs put farre away this mad and pernicious opinion, that either God did ſet foorth in his promiſe to the Iewes nothing elſe, or that the Iewes ſought nothing elſe but filling of their belly, delights of the fleſh, flouriſhing wealth, outward power, fruitfulneſſe of children, & whatſoeuer a naturall man eſteemeth. For at this day Chriſt promiſeth no other kingdome of heauen to his, but where they ſhall reſt with Abraham, Iſaac and Iacob. And Peter affirmed, that the Iewes of his time were heires of the grace of the Goſpell, for that they were the children of the Prophets, cõprehended in the couenant, which the Lord had in the olde time made with his people. And, that the ſame ſhould not be witneſſed with words onely, the Lord alſo approoued it by deed. For in the very moment that he roſe againe, he vouchſafed to haue many of the holy men to riſe againe in company with him, and made them to be ſeene in the Citie: ſo giuing an aſſured token, that whatſoeuer he did and ſuffered for the purchaſing of eternall ſaluation, pertaineth no leſſe to the faithfull of the olde Teſtament, than vnto vs. For as Peter teſtifieth, they were alſo endued with the ſame ſpirit of faith, whereby we are regenerate into life. Now when we heare that the ſame ſpirit which is in vs a certaine ſparkle of immortalitie, whereupon it is alſo in another place called the earneſt of our inheritance, did likewiſe dwell in them, how dare we take from them the inheritance of life? Whereby it is ſo much the more maruell, that in the olde time the Sadduces fell to ſuch groſſeneſſe of error, that they denied both the reſurrection and alſo the ſubſtance of ſoules, both which points they ſaw ſealed with ſo cleare teſtimonies of Scripture. And no leſſe to be marueiled at, euen at this day, were the folly of all that nation in looking for the earthly kingdome of Chriſt, if the Scriptures had not long before declared, that they ſhould haue that puniſhment for refuſing the Goſpell. For ſo it behooued, by the iuſt iudgement of God, to ſtrike thoſe mindes with blindneſſe, which in refuſing the light of heauen being offered them, did wilfully bring themſelues into darkeneſſe. Therefore they read and continually turne ouer Moſes, but they are ſtopped with a veile ſet betweene them and him, that they cannot ſee the light that ſhineth in his countenance. And ſo ſhall it remaine couered and hidden from them, till he be turned to Chriſt, from whom now they trauaile to lead and draw him away ſo much as in them lieth.

2.Cor.3.14.

THE ELEVENTH CHAPTER.

Of the difference of the one Teſtament from the other.

The firſt difference of the old and new Teſtament. God did in that by the ſhadow of earthly things, and in this doth plainly direct vnto heauen.

WHat then? wilt thou ſay: ſhall there be no difference left betweene the olde Teſtament and the New? and to what purpoſe ſerue all thoſe places of Scripture, where they are compared one againſt the other, as things moſt contrarie? I doe willingly allow thoſe differences that are rehearſed in the Scripture: but ſo that they nothing hinder the vnitie alreadie ſtabliſhed, as it ſhall be plaine to ſee when we ſhall haue intreated of them in order. Thoſe differences are (as farre as euer I could marke or can remember) chiefly foure in number, to the which if you liſt to adioyne the fifth, I am not againſt it. I ſay and truſt to prooue that they are all ſuch as rather belong to the maner of miniſtration, than to the ſubſtance of them. And by this meane they ſhall nothing hinder, but that the promiſes of both the olde and new Teſtament may remaine all one, and all one foundation of the ſame promiſes, Chriſt. Now the firſt difference is, that although, euen in the olde time alſo, the Lords will was to direct the mindes of his people, and to haue them raiſed vp to the heauenly inheritance: yet, that they might be the better nouriſhed in hope thereof, he gaue it to be ſeene or rather to be taſted of, vnder earthly benefites: but now hauing reuealed the grace of the life to come, by the Goſpell, he more clearely and plainly directeth our mindes the ſtraighte way to the meditation thereof, leauing the inferior maner of exerciſing which he vſed with the Iſraelites. They that marke not this purpoſe of God, doe not thinke that the olde people climbed any higher than to the good things promiſed to the body. They ſo often heare the land of Chanaan named, as the excellent, or rather onely reward for the keepers of Gods law. They heare that God threatneth nothing more ſeuerely to the tranſgreſſors of the ſame law, than that they ſhall be driuen out of the poſſeſſion of the ſame land, and ſcattered abroad into ſtrange regions. They ſee that in a maner to this effect come all the bleſſings and curſes that are pronounced by Moſes. Hereby they do vndoubtedly determine, that the Iewes not for their owne ſakes, but for others, were ſeuered from other nations, that is, that the Church of Chriſt might haue an image, in whoſe outward forme ſhe might ſee examples of ſpirituall things. But ſith the Scripture doth ſometimes ſhew, that God himſelfe directed all the earthly benefits that he did for them to this end, that ſo he might lead them by the hand to the hope of heauenly benefites: it was too much vnskilfulneſſe, I will not ſay blockiſhneſſe, not to conſider this order of diſpoſition. The iſſue or point of our controuerſie with this ſort of men is this, that they teach that the poſſeſſion of the land of Chanaan was to the Iſraelites their chiefe and laſt bleſſedneſſe, and that to vs after the reuealing of Chriſt, it doth but figuratiuely ſignifie the heauenly inheritance. On the other ſide we affirme, that they did in the earthly poſſeſſion which they enioyed, as in a looking glaſſe behold the inheritance to come which they beleeued to be prepared for them in heauen.

2 That ſhall better appeare by the ſimilitude that Paul vſed to the Galathians. He compareth the nation of the Iewes to an heire, within age, which being not yet able to gouerne himſelfe followeth the guiding of the Tutor or Schoolemaſter, to whoſe cuſtodie he is committed. And whereas he applieth that ſimilitude to the ceremonies, that nothing hindreth but that it may alſo very fitly ſerue to this purpoſe. The ſame inheritance was appointed for them, that was appointed for vs: but ſuch as yet for want of age, they were not of capacity to enter vpon & vſe. The ſame Church was among them, but whereof the age was yet but childiſh. Therefore the Lord kept them vnder this ſchooling, that he gaue them not the ſpirituall promiſes ſo naked and openly, but as it were ſhadowed with earthly promiſes. Therefore, where he called Abraham, Iſaac and Iacob, and their poſteritie vnto hope of immortalitie, he promiſed them the land of Chanaan to be their inheritance: not to determine their hopes vpon it, but that in beholding of it, they ſhould exerciſe and confirme themſelues in the hope of that true inheritance that did not yet appeare. And that they might not be deceiued, there was giuen them a higher promiſe to teſtifie that that land was not the higheſt benefit of God. So Abraham was not ſuffred to lie ſlothfull in the promiſe receiued of the land, but his mind was with a greater promiſe raiſed vp vnto the Lord. For Abraham heard this ſaid vnto him: I am thy protector, and thy reward exceeding great. Here we ſee, that Abraham hath the end of his reward ſet foorth in the Lord, that he ſhould not account vpon a tranſitorie and ſlipperie reward in the elements of this world, but rather thinke it to be ſuch as can not wither away. Afterward he adioyneth the promiſe of the land to no other intent, but that it ſhould be a token of the good will of God, and a figure of the heauenly inheritance. And that the holy men had this meaning, their owne ſayings doe declare. So Dauid riſeth vpward from temporall bleſſings, to that ſame higheſt and laſt bleſſing, My hart (ſaith he) and my fleſh faint for deſire of thee. God is my portion for euer. Againe, the Lord is the part of my inheritance, and of my cup: thou art he that ſaueſt mine heritage for me. Againe, I haue cried vnto thee, O Lord, I haue ſaid, Thou art my hope, my portion in the land of the liuing. Truely they that dare ſo ſpeake, doe without doubt profeſſe that with their hope they climbe aboue the world, and all the good things here preſent. But the Prophets doe oft deſcribe this bleſſedneſſe

Gal. 4. 1. The fathers and we are one heire vnto whom one and the ſame inheritance doth belong. But they being that heire in a yonger which we are in an elder age, had a training though not to another thing, yet after another ſort than we.

Gen. 15. 1.

of the world to come, vnder the figure that they had receiued of the Lord. And so are these sayings to be vnderstood. That the godly shall possesse the land by inheritance, and the wicked shal be destroyed out of it. That Hierusalem shal abound with all kinde of riches, and Sion ouerflow with plentie of all things. All which we see, cannot properly be spoken of the land of our wayfaring, or the earthly Hierusalem, but of the true countrey of the faithfull, and that heauenly Citie wherein the Lord hath commanded blessing and life for euer.

Iob. 18. 17
Psal 133. 3.

Gods figuring of heauenly by earthly blessednes in the old law is the cause, why then bu temporall benefits doe seeme to haue beene more sweete to the righteous & his punishments more grieuous then now.

3 This is the reason why it is read that the holy men in time of the olde Testament did esteeme the mortall life and the blessings thereof more than is now meete to doe. For although they knew well that they should not rest in it, as in the end of their race, yet when they called to minde, what markes of his grace the Lord had pointed therein, to exercise them according to the small rate of their tendernes, they felt a greater sweetnes of it, than if they had considered it by it selfe. But as the Lord in testifying his good-will toward the faithfull, by present good things, did as in a shadow expresse the spirituall felicitie, by such figures and signes: so on the other side he did in corporall paines shew examples of his iudgement against the reprobate. Therefore as the benefits of God were to be seene in earthly things, so were also his punishments. While the vnskilfull do not wey this comparison or agreement, as I may call it betweene the punishmẽts and the rewards, they maruell at so much alteration in God, that in old time was so sodenly ready to take vengeance on euery offence of man with sterne & horrible punishments, and now as if he had laid away the affection of his old angrinesse, he punisheth both much more gently & seldomer, yea, and for the same cause they do almost imagine seuerall gods of the old and new Testament: which the Manichees did in deed. But we shall easily be deliuered from such doubts, if we lay our mindes to consider this orderly disposition of God that I haue spoken of, whose will was for the time to signifie and set foorth in figure both the grace of the eternall felicitie to come, by temporall benefits, and the grieuousnes of the spirituall death, by corporall paines. Whereby he deliuered his Testament to the Israelites, as yet after a certaine maner folded vp.

The second difference betwen the two testaments is, that the new doth exhibite that foundation of the couenant which the old did teach them to expect.
Psal. 110. 4.
Heb. 7. 11. & 19. & 99. & 10. 1.

4 Another difference of the old and new Testament is said to be in the figures: for that the old Testament did shew onely an image in absence of the trueth, and a shadow in steed of the bodie. But the new Testament giueth the trueth present, and the sound bodie it selfe. And this difference is mentioned commonly wheresoeuer the new Testament is in comparison set against the old: but it is more largely intreated of in the Epistle to the Hebrues than any where else. There the Apostle disputeth against thē, which thought that the obseruation of Moses law might not be taken away, but that they should also draw with them the ruine of religion. To confute this errour, he vseth that which had bene forespoken by the Prophet concerning the priesthood of Christ. For whereas there is giuen him an eternall priesthood, it is certaine, that that priesthood is taken away, wherein new successors were daily put in, one after another. But he prooueth that the institution of this new priesthood is to be preferred, because it is stablished with an oath. He after addeth further, that in the same change of the priesthood, is also contained the change of the testament. And that it was necessarie so to be, he prooueth by this reason: for that the weakenesse of the law was such that it could helpe nothing to perfection. Then he proceedeth in declaring what was that weakenesse, euen this, that it had a certaine outward righteousnesse of the flesh, which could not make the obseruers of them perfect, according to conscience: that by sacrifices of beasts, it could neither wipe away sinnes, nor purchase true holinesse. He concludeth therefore that there was in it a shadow of good things to come, but not the liuely image of the things themselues: and that therefore it had no other office, but to be as an introduction into a better hope, which is deliuered in the Gospell. Here is to be seene, in what point the couenant of the law is compared with the couenant of the Gospell, and the ministerie of Christ, with the ministerie of Moses. For if the comparison concerned the substance of the promises, then were there great difference betweene the two Testaments: but sith the point of our case leadeth vs another way, we must tend to this end, to finde out the trueth. Let vs then set foorth here the couenant which he hath stablished to be eternall, and neuer to perish. The accomplishment thereof, whereby it attaineth to be stablished

and continuing in force, is Christ. While such establishment was in expectation, the Lord did by Moses appoint ceremonies, to be as it were solemne signes of the confirmation. Now this came there in question, whether the ceremonies that were ordained in the law ought to giue place to Christ or no. Although these ceremonies were indeed onely accidents, or verily additions and things adioyned, or (as the people call them) accessarie things to the couenant, yet because they were instruments or meanes of the administration thereof, they beare the name of the couenant it selfe, as the like is wont to be attributed to other Sacraments. Therefore in summe: the old Testament is in this place called the solemne forme of confirming the couenant, conteined in ceremonies & sacrifices. The Apostle saith, that because in it is nothing perfect, vnlesse we passe further, therefore it behooued that they should be discontinued and abrogate that place might be giuen to Christ the assurer and mediatour of a better Testament, by whom eternall sanctification is once purchased to the elect, and the transgressions blotted out that remained vnder the law. Or if you like it better, thus: That the old Testament of the Lord was that which was deliuered, wrapped vp in the shadowish and effectuall obseruations of ceremonies: and that therefore it was but for a time, because it did but (as it were) hang in suspense vntill it might stay vpon a more stedfast and substantiall confirmation: and that then onely it was made new and eternall, after that it was consecrate and stablished by the bloud of Christ. Whereupon Christ calleth the cup that he gaue at his supper to his Disciples, The cup of the new Testament in his bloud: to signifie that then the Testament of God attaineth his trueth: by which it becommeth new and eternall, when it is sealed with his bloud. Mat.26.28.

5 Hereby appeereth in what sense the Apostle said: that in the schooling of the law, the Iewes were brought vnto Christ, before that he was shewed in the flesh. And he confesseth, that they were the children and heires of God, but yet such, as for their yoong age were to be kept vnder the custodie of a schoolemaster. For it behooued that ere the sonne of righteousnesse was yet risen, there should neither be so great brightnes of reuelation, nor so great deepe sight of vnderstanding. Therefore God so gaue them in measure the light of his worde, that they saw it as yet far off and darkely. Therefore Paul expresseth this slendernesse of vnderstanding by the tearme of yoong age, which the Lords will was to haue to be exercised with the elements of this world and with outward obseruations, as rules of instruction for children vntill Christ should shine abroad, by whom it behooued that the knowledge of the faithfull people should grow to full age. This distinction Christ himselfe ment of, when he said, that the law and the prophets were vntill Iohn, & that from thence forth the kingdome of God is preached. What did the law and the Prophets open to men of their time? euen this, they gaue a taste of that wisedome which in time to come should be plainly disclosed: and they shewed it before as it were twinklingly shining a far off. But when it came to passe that Christ might be pointed too with the finger, then was the kingdome of God set open. For in him are laid abroad the treasures of all wisedome and vnderstanding, whereby we attaine, euen in a maner, into the secret closets of heauen.

The kingdome is now manifested which in former times was darkelie beheld. Gal.3.24.& 4.2. Mat.11.13. Col.2.9.

6 And it maketh not against vs, that there can scarcely any one be found in the christian Church, that in excellencie of faith may be compared with Abraham, or that the prophets excelled in such force of spirit, that euen at this day they lighten the whole world withall. For our question is not here, what grace the Lord hath bestowed vpon a few, but what ordinarie disposition he vsed in teaching his people: such as is declared in the Prophets themselues, which were endued with peculiar knowledge aboue the rest. For euen their preaching is darke and enclosed in figures, as of things a far off. Moreouer how maruellous knowledge soeuer appeared in them aboue other, yet forasmuch as they were driuen of necessitie to submit them to the common childish instruction of the people, they themselues also were reckoned in number of children. Finally, there neuer chaunced any such cleare sight to any at that time, but that it did in some part sauour of the darknesse of the time. Whereupon Christ said, Many Kings & Prophets haue desired to see the things that ye see, and haue not seene them: and to heare the things that yee heare, and haue nor heard them. Therefore blessed are your eies, because they see, and your eares because they heare. And truly it is meet that the presence of of Christ should haue this excellencie of prerogatiue, that from it should arise the cleare reuealing of the heauenly mysteries. And for this purpose also maketh that, which euen we now alleaged out of the first Epistle of Peter, that it was opened to them, that their trauell was profitable, principally for our age.

1. Pet. 1. 12.

Iere. 31. 31. The third difference betweene the old couenant and the new, mentioned by the Apostle out of Ieremy.

7 Now I come to the third difference, which is taken out of Ieremie, whose words are these: Behold the day shall come, saith the Lord, and I will make a new couenant with the house of Israell, and the house of Iuda, not according to the couenant that I made with your Fathers, in the day when I tooke them by the hand, to leade them out of the land of Ægypt, the couenant that they made void although I ruled ouer them: But this shall be the couenant that I will make with the house of Israel: I will put my law in their bowels, and I will write it in their hearts, and I will be mercifull to their iniquitie. And no man shall teach his neighbour, and no man his brother. For they shall all know me from the least vnto the most. Of which words the Apostle tooke occasion to make this comparison betweene the law and the Gospell, that he called the law a literall, and the Gospell a spirituall doctrine: the law, he said, was fashioned out in Tables of stone, the Gospell written in harts: that the lawe was the preaching of death, the Gospell the preaching of life: the lawe the preaching of damnation, the Gospell the preaching of righteousnesse: that the lawe is made voide, that the Gospell abideth. Sith the Apostles purpose was but to declare the meaning of the Prophet, it shall be sufficient that we weigh the words of one of them, to attaine the meaning of them both. Albeit, there is some vnlikenesse betweene them. For the Apostle speaketh more odiously of the law than the Prophet doth: and that not in simple respect of the lawe, but because there were certaine naughtie men, hauing a wrong zeale to the lawe, which did with peruerse loue of the ceremonies, obscure the brightnesse of the Gospell. He disputeth of the nature of the lawe, according to their error and fooliſh affection. Therefore it shall be good to note that peculiarly in Paul. But both of them, because they doe by comparison set the olde and the new Testament, the one against the other: doe consider nothing in the lawe, but that which properly belongeth vnto it. As for example: The lawe doth commonly in euerie place conteine promises of mercie, but because they are borrowed from elsewhere, therefore they are not reckoned as part of the lawe, when the meere nature of the lawe is spoken of. The onely thing they ascribe vnto it, to command things that are right, and to forbid wicked doings: to promise reward to the followers of righteousnesse, and to threaten punishment to the transgressors: but in the meane time neither to change nor amend the peruersenesse of heart that is naturally in all men.

1. Cor. 2. 6.

The seuerall branches of the third difference betweene the two Testamẽts.

8 Now let vs expound the Apostles comparison, one piece after another. The old Testament is literall, because it was published without the effectuall working of the spirit: The new is spirituall which the Lord hath spiritually grauen in the harts of men: Therefore the second diuersitie is as it were a declaration of the first. The old is deadly, because it can doe nothing but wrap all mankinde within the curse: The new is the instrument of life, because it deliuereth from curse, and restoreth into fauour with God. The old is the ministerie of damnation, because it condemneth all Adams children of vnrighteousnesse: The new is the ministerie of righteousnesse, because it reuealeth the mercie of God, by which we are made righteous. The last diuersitie is to be referred to the ceremonies. Because the old testament had an image of things absent, it behoued that it should in time decay and vanish away: but the Gospell, because it giueth the true bodie in deede, keepeth still a firme and perpetuall stedfastnesse. Ieremy indeed calleth euen the morall law a weake and fraile couenant: but that is for another reason, because by the sudden falling away of the vnthankfull people, it was by and by broken, but forasmuch as such breaking of it was the fault of the people, it cannot properly be laid vpon the testament. But the ceremonies, forasmuch as by their owne weakenesse were dissolued by the comming of Christ, had the cause of their weakenesse within themselues. Now, that difference of the letter and spirit is not so to be taken, as though the Lord had giuen his lawes to the Iewes without any fruit at all, hauing none of them conuerted vnto him. But it is spoken by way of comparison, to aduance the abundance of grace, wherewith the same lawmaker as it were putting on a new personage, did honorably norably ſet foorth the preaching of the Goſpell. For if we reckon vp the multitude of theſe whom the Lord out of all peoples hath by the preaching of the Goſpell regenerate with his ſpirit, and gathered into the communion of his Church, we ſhall ſay, that there were very few, or in a maner none in the old time in Iſrael, that with affection of minde and entirely from their heart imbraced the couenant of the Lord: who yet were very many, if they be reckoned in their owne number without compariſon.

9 Out of the third difference riſeth the fourth. For the Scripture calleth the old Teſtament, the teſtament of bondage, for that it ingendreth feare in mens mindes: but the new Teſtament, the teſtament of libertie, becauſe it raiſeth them vp to confidence and aſſuredneſſe. So ſaith Paul in the eight to the Romaines: Yee haue not receiued the ſpirit of bondage againe to feare, but the ſpirit of adoption, by which we crie Abba father. Hereunto ſerueth that in the Epiſtle to the Hebrues, that the faithfull are not now come to the bodily mount, and to kindled fire, and whirlewind, darkeneſſe, and tempeſt, where nothing can be heard or ſeene but that ſtriketh mens mindes with terrour, in ſo much as Moſes himſelfe quaked for feare, when the terrible voice ſounded, which they all beſought, that they might not heare: But that we are come to the Mount Sion, and the citie of the liuing God, the heauenly Hieruſalem. But that which Paul ſhortly toucheth in the ſentence that we haue alleaged out of the Epiſtle to the Romaines, he ſetteth out more largely in the Epiſtle to the Galathians, when he maketh an allegorie of the two ſonnes of Abraham, after this maner, that Agar the bondwoman is a figure of the Mount Sinai, where the people of Iſrael receiued the lawe: Sara the freewoman is a figure of the heauenly Hieruſalem, from whence proceedeth the Goſpell. That, as the ſeede of Agar is borne bond, which may neuer come to the inheritance, and the ſeed of Sara is borne free, to whom the inheritance is due: ſo by the law we are made ſubiect to bondage, by the Goſpell onely we are regenerate into freedome. But the ſumme commeth to this effect that the old Teſtament did ſtrike into conſciences feare and trembling: but by the benefit of the new Teſtament it commeth to paſſe, that they are made ioyfull. The old did hold conſciences bound vnto the yoke of bondage, by the libertie of the new they are diſcharged of bondage, and brought into freedome. But if out of the people of Iſrael they obiect againſt vs the holy Fathers, who ſith it is euident that they were endued with the ſame ſpirit that we are, it followeth that they were alſo partakers both of the ſelfeſame freedome and ioy. We anſwere, that neither of both came of the lawe. But that when they felt themſelues by the law to be both oppreſſed with the eſtate of bondage, and wearied with vnquietneſſe of conſcience, they fled to the ſuccour of the Goſpell, and that therefore it was a peculiar fruite of the new Teſtament, that beſide the common law of the old teſtament they were exempted from theſe euils. Moreouer, we will denie that they were ſo endued with the ſpirit of freedome and aſſuredneſſe, that they did not in ſome part feele both feare and bondage by the law. For howſoeuer they enioyed that prerogatiue which they had obtained by grace of the Goſpell, yet were they ſubiect to the ſame bonds and burdens of obſeruation that the common people were. Sith therefore they were compelled to the careſull keeping of thoſe ceremonies, which were the ſignes of a ſchooling much like vnto bondage, and the handwritings whereby they confeſſed themſelues guiltie of ſinne, did not diſcharge them from being bond: it may rightfullly be ſaid, that in compariſon of vs they were vnder the teſtament of bondage and feare, while we haue reſpect to that common order of diſtribution that the Lord then vſed with the people of Iſrael.

10 *The three laſt compariſons that we haue recited, are of the lawe and the Goſpell. Wherefore in them by the name of the Old Teſtament is meant the Lawe, and by the name of the New Teſtament is meant the Goſpell. The firſt ſtretched further, for it comprehendeth vnder it the promiſes alſo that were publiſhed before the lawe, but whereas Auguſtine denieth that they ought to be reckoned vnder the name of the olde teſtament, therein he thought very well, and meant euen the ſame thing that we doe now teach, for he had regard to thoſe ſayings of Hieremie and Paul, where the old teſtament is ſeuered from the word of mercie and grace. And this alſo he very aptly adioyneth in the ſame place, that the children of promiſe regenerate of God, which by faith working through loue haue obeyed the commandements, doe from the beginning ning of the world belong to the New Testament, and that in hope not of fleshly, earthly and temporall, but spirituall, heauenly, and eternall good things, principally beleeuing in the Mediator, by whom they doubted not that the spirit was not ministred vnto them, both to doe good, and to haue pardon so oft as they sinned. For the same thing it is that I minded to affirme, that all the Saints whome the Scripture rehearseth to haue beene from the beginning of the world chosen by God, were partakers of the selfe same blessing with vs vnto eternall saluation. This difference therefore is betweene our deuision and Augustines: that ours (according to that saying of Christ: The law and the Prophets were vnto Iohn: from thence foorth the kingdome of God is preached) doth make distinction betweene the cleerenesse of the Gospell, and the darker distribution of the word that went before: and Augustine doth onely seuer the weaknesse of the Law from the strength of the Gospell. And here also is to be noted concerning the holie Fathers, that they so liued vnder the olde Testament, that they stayed not there, but alway aspired to the new, yea and embraced the assured partaking thereof. For the Apostle condemneth them of blindnesse and accursednesse: which being contented with present shadowes, did not stretch vp their minde vnto Christ. For (to speake nothing of the rest) what greater blindnesse can be imagined, than to hope for the purging of sinne by the killing of a beast? than to seeke for the cleansing of the soule in outward sprinkeling of water? than to seeke to appease God with colde ceremonies, as though he were much delighted therewith? For to all these absurdities doe they fall, that sticke fast in the obseruations of the law without respect of Christ.

Mat.11.13.

The fifth & last difference betwixt the two Testaments: the old was giuen onely to the Iew, the new to all nations.

11 The fifth difference that we may adde, lieth in this: that vntill the comming of Christ the Lord had chosen out one nation, within which he would keepe seuerall the couenant of his grace. When the highest did distribute the nations, when he deuided the sonnes of Adam (saith Moses) his people fell to his possession: Iacob the cord of his inheritance. In another place he thus speaketh to the people: Behold the heauen and earth and all that is in it, are the Lord thy Gods. He cleaued onely to thy Fathers, he loued them to choose their seede after them, euen your selues out of all nations. Therefore he vouchsafed to graunt the knowledge of his name to that people onely, as if they onely of all men belonged vnto him: he laid his couenant as it were in their bosome: to them he openly shewed the presence of his Godhead: them he honored with all prerogatiues. But (to omit the rest of his benefits, and speake that which onely here is to our purpose) he bound them to him by the communicating of his word, that he might be called and counted their God. In the meane season he suffred other nations to walke in vanitie, as though they had not any entercourse or any thing to doe with him: neither did he to helpe their destruction, giue them that which was onely the remedie, namely the preaching of his worde. Therefore Israel was then the Lords sonne that was his darling, other were strangers: Israel was knowen to him and receiued into his charge and protection, other were left to their owne darknesse: Israel was sanctified by God, other were prophane: Israel was honored with the presence of God, other were excluded from comming nigh vnto him. But when the fulnesse of time was come, appointed for the restoring of all men, and that same reconciler of God and men was deliuered indeed, the partition was plucked downe, which had so long holden the mercie of God enclosed within the boundes of Israel, and peace was preached to them that were far off, euen as to them that were neere adioyned, that being together reconciled to God, they might grow into one people. Wherfore, now there is no respect of Greeke or Iew, circumcision or vncircumcision, but Christ is all in all, to whom the nations are giuen for his inheritance, and the ends of the earth for his peculiar possession, that vniuersally without difference he might haue dominion from sea to sea, and from the riuers to the vttermost ends of the world.

The calling of the Gentiles vnder the new Testament, spoken of by the Prophets, not 12 Therefore the calling of the Gentiles is a notable token, whereby is cleerely shewed the excellencie of the new Testament aboue the old. It had indeed beene before testified by many, and most plaine oracles of the Prophets, but so as the performance thereof was still deferred vnto the kingdome of Messias. And Christ himselfe did not proceede vnto it at the first beginning of his preaching, but deferred it so long

vntill that all the parts of our redemption being performed, and the time of his abasement ended, he receiued of his father a name that is aboue all names: before whom all knees should bow. For which cause when this conuenience of time was not yet fulfilled, he said to the woman of Chanaan, that he was not sent but to the lost sheepe of the house of Israel. And he suffred not his Apostles at the first sending to passe these bounds. Go not ye (saith he) into the way of the Gentiles, nor enter into the cities of the Samaritans, but rather goe ye to the lost sheepe of the house of Israel. But how soeuer it was before vttered by so many testimonies, yet when the Apostles were first to begin it, it seemed so new and strange a thing vnto them, that they were afraid of it, as of some monster. Truely very fearefully and not without sticking at it they first did set vpon it. And no maruell, for it seemed against reason, that the Lord which by so many ages had chosen out Israel from all other nations, should now vndoe that choise, as it were suddenly changing his purpose. It was indeede spoken of afore by prophecies: but they could not giue so great heede to the prophecies, as to be nothing mooued with the newnesse of the thing that they saw. And these examples which the Lord had shewed of the calling of the Gentiles that should one day come to passe, were not sufficient to mooue them. For besides this that he had called very few, he did after a certaine maner ingraffe them into the houshold of Abraham, to adde them vnto his people as parcell of them: but by this generall calling, the Gentiles were not onely made equall with the Iewes, but also it appeered that they came into the place of the Iewes, that were become dead. And yet all those strangers whom God hath before that time brought into the bodie of the Church, were neuer made equall with the Iewes. And therefore not without a cause doth Paul so extoll his mysterie hidden from ages and generations, and which he also saith to be maruellous to the very Angels.

suddenly proceeded vnto by Christ, by the Apostles scarce admitted, wondred at by the very Angels themselues. Phil. 2. 9. Mat. 15. 24.

Col. 1. 26.

13 In these foure or fiue points, I thinke I haue well and faithfully set foorth the whole difference of the old and new Testament, so much as sufficeth to the simple order of teaching. But because many report this varietie in gouerning the Church, this diuerse maner in teaching, so great alteration of vsages and ceremonies, to be a great absurditie: they are also to be answered before that we passe foorth to other things. And that may be done shortly, because the obiections are not so strong that they neede a curious confutation. It hangeth not together (say they) that God which doeth alway stedfastly agree with himselfe, should suffer so great an alteration, as afterward to disallow the same thing, which he had before both commanded and commended. I answere that God ought not therefore to be counted mutable, for that he applied diuerse formes to diuerse ages, as he knew to be expedient for euery one. If the husbandman appoint to his household one sort of businesse in winter, and an other in sommer, shall we therefore accuse him of inconstancie, or thinke that he swarueth from the right rule of husbandrie which agreeth with the continuall order of nature? Likewise if a father of a household doe instruct, rule and order his children of one sort in childhood, of another in youth, and of another in mans state, we cannot therefore say that he is fickle, and forsaketh his owne purpose. Why therefore doe we charge God with reproch of inconstancie, for that he hath seuered the diuersitie of times with fit and agreeable marks? The last similitude ought fully to satisfie vs. Paul maketh the Iewes like vnto children, and Christians to yong men. What disorder is there in this gouernement of God that he held them in their childish lessons, which according to the capacitie of their age were fit for them, and instructed vs with stronger and as it were more manly discipline. Therefore herein appeareth the constancie of God, that he taught one selfesame doctrine in all ages, and continueth in requiring the same worship of his name, which he commanded from the beginning. But whereas he changed the outward forme and maner thereof, in that he shewed not himselfe subiect to change: but so farre he tempered himselfe to the capacitie of man, which is diuers and changeable.

These alterations not vnmeete but expedient for the Church.

14 But whence (say they) commeth this diuersitie, but because God willed it to be such? Could he not as well from the beginning as since the comming of Christ, reueale the eternall life in plaine words without any figures, instruct those that are his with a few sacraments and easie to perceiue, giue his holie spirit, and powre abroad his grace throughout the whole world? This is euen like as if they should quarell with God for that selfe, neither may we without intollerable presumption carpe and quarell at his maner of dealing.

that he hath created the world so late, sith he might haue created it from the beginning: or for that his will was to haue enterchanged courses betweene winter and sommer, betweene day and night. But as for vs, euen as all godly men ought to thinke, let vs not doubt that whatsoeuer God hath done, is wisely and righteously done, although oftentimes we know not the cause why it ought so to haue beene done. For that were to take presumptuously too much vpon vs, not to giue God leaue to haue the causes of his owne purpose secret to himselfe from vs. But it is maruellous (say they) that he now refuseth and abhorreth the sacrificing of beasts, and all that furniture of the Leuiticall priesthood, wherewith in the old time he was delighted: As though these outward and transitorie things did delite God, or any way moue affection in him. We haue alreadie said that he did none of these for his owne cause, but disposed them all for the saluation of man. If a Phisition doe heale a yong man after one very good meane from his disease, and afterward doe vse another maner of healing with the same man being olde: shall we therefore say, that he hath refused the maner of healing which before pleased him, but rather continuing still in the same, he hath consideration of ages? So behooued it, that Christ being absent, should be expressed in figure by one sort of signes, and by another sort be before shewed that he was to come: and it is meete that now being alreadie deliuered, he be represented by other signes. But concerning Gods calling, now at the comming of Christ more largely spread abroad among all people than it was before, and the graces of the holy Ghost more plenteously powred out: who, I pray you, can denie it to be right, that God haue in his owne hand and will the disposing of his owne graces, to giue light to what nations it pleaseth him? to raise vp the preaching of his word in what places it pleaseth him? to giue what doctrine and how great profiting and successe of doctrine it pleaseth him? and in what ages he will, to take away the knowledge of his name out of the world for their vnthankfulnesse? and againe when he will to restore it for his owne mercie? We see therfore, that the cauillations are too much vnmeete, wherewith wicked men doe in this point disquiet the mindes of the simple, to make thē call either the righteousnesse of God, or the faith of the scripture into doubt.

THE TVVELFTH CHAPTER.

That it behooued, that Christ to performe the office of the Mediator, should be made man.

It was necessarie that he which should vnfeinedly ioyne man to God should himselfe be both.

NOw it much behooued vs that he should be both God and Man, which should be our Mediator. If a man aske of the necessitie, it was not indeede a simple or absolute necessitie, as they commonly call it, but it proceedeth from the heauenly decree, whereupon hanged all the saluation of men. But the most mercifull father appointed that which should be best for vs. For whereas our owne iniquities had, as it were cast a cloud betweene him and vs, and vtterly excluded vs from the kingdome of heauen, no man could be the interpreter for restoring of our peace, but he that could attaine vnto God. But who could haue attained vnto him? could any of the sonnes of Adam? But all they did with their fathers shun the sight of God for feare. Could any of the Angels? but they also had neede of a head, by whose knitting together they might perfectly and vnfeinedly cleaue vnto God. What then? It was past all hope, vnlesse the very Maiestie of God would descend vnto vs, for we could not ascend vnto it. So it behooued that the Sonne of God should become for vs Immanuel, that is, God with vs: and that in this sort, that by mutuall ioyning, his Godhead and the nature of man might grow into one together. Otherwise neither could the neerenesse be neere enough, nor the alliance strong enough for vs to hope by, that God dwelleth with vs. So great was the disagreement betweene our filthinesse, and the most pure cleannesse of God. Although man had stood vndefiled without any spot, yet was his estate too base to attaine to God without a Mediator. What could he then doe being plunged downe into death and hell, with deadly fall, defiled with so many spots, stinking with his owne corruption, and ouerwhelmed with all accursednesse? Therefore not without cause, Paul meaning to set forth Christ for the Mediator, doth expressly recite that he is Man. 1. Tim. 2. 3. One Mediator (saith he) of God and man, the man Iesus Christ. He might haue said, God:

God: or at the leaſt he might haue left the name of Man as well as of God. But becauſe the holy Ghoſt ſpeaking by his mouth, knew our weakeneſſe: therefore to prouide for it in time, he vſed a moſt fit remedie, ſetting among vs the Sonne of God familiarly as one of vs. Therefore leaſt any man ſhould trouble himſelfe to knowe where the Mediator is to be ſought, or which way to come vnto him, in naming Man, he putteth vs in minde that he is neere vnto vs, yea ſo neere that he toucheth vs, for as much as he is our owne fleſh. Truly he meaneth there euen the ſame thing that in another place is ſet out with moe words: that we haue not a biſhop that cannot haue compaſſion of our infirmities, for as much as he was in all things tempted as we are, onely ſinne excepted. Heb. 4. 15.

2 That ſhall alſo appeare more plainely, if we conſider how it was no meane thing that the Mediator had to doe: that is, ſo to reſtore vs into the fauour of God, as to make vs of the children of men, the children of God: of the heires of hell, the heires of the kingdome of heauen. Who could doe that, vnleſſe the ſonne of God were made alſo the ſonne of man, and ſo take ours vpon him to conuey his vnto vs, and to make that ours by grace, which was his by nature? Therefore by this earneſt we truſt, that we are the children of God, becauſe the naturall Sonne of God hath ſhapen for himſelfe a bodie of our bodie, fleſh of our fleſh, bones of our bones, that he might be all one with vs. He diſdained not to take that vpon him which was proper vnto vs, to make againe that to belong to vs which he had proper to himſelfe, and that ſo in common together with vs, he might be both the ſonne of God and the ſonne of man. Hereupon commeth that holy brotherhood which he commendeth with his owne mouth, when he ſaith: I go vp to my Father and your Father, my God and your God. By this meane is the inheritance of the kingdome of heauen aſſured vnto vs: for that the onely ſonne of God, to whom it wholly did properly belong, hath adopted vs into his brethren: becauſe if we be brethren, then are we partakers of the inheritance. Moreouer it was for the ſame cauſe very profitable, that he which ſhould be our redeemer, ſhould be both very God and very man. It was his office to ſwallow vp death: who could doe that but life it ſelfe? It was his office to ouercome ſinne: who could doe that but righteouſneſſe it ſelfe? It was his office to vanquiſh the powers of the world and of the aire: who could doe that but a power aboue both world and aire? Now in whoſe poſſeſſion is life, or righteouſneſſe, or the empire and power of heauen, but in Gods alone? Therefore the moſt mercifull God, in the perſon of his onely begotten Sonne, made himſelfe our redeemer, when his will was to haue vs redeemed.

The Sonne of God becomming man, hath confirmed vs in the ſtate of being ſonnes to the ſame father, and hauing right to the ſame inheritance with him: and being God, hath ſwallowed death, conquered ſinne, ſubdued powers, and beſtowed life, which elſe he could not haue done. Iohn 20. 17. Rom. 8. 17.

3 Another principal point of our reconciliation with God was this, that man which had loſt himſelf by his diſobedience, ſhould for remedy ſet obedience againſt it, ſhould ſatisfie the iudgement of God, and pay the penaltie of ſinne. Therfore there came forth the true man, our Lord, he put on the perſon of Adam, and tooke vpon him his name to enter into his ſteed in obeying his Father, to yeeld our fleſh the price of the ſatisfaction to the iuſt iudgemēt of God, and in the ſame fleſh ſuffer the paine that we had deſerued. For as much as therfore neither being onely God, he could feele death, nor being onely man he could ouercome death, he coupled the nature of man with the nature of God, that he might yeeld the one ſubiect to death to ſatisfie for ſinnes, and by the power of the other he might wraſtle with death, and get victory for vs. They therfore that ſpoile Chriſt either for his godhead or for his manhood, doe indeed either diminiſh his maieſtie and glorie, or obſcure his goodnes: but on the other ſide they doe no leſſe wrong vnto men whoſe faith they doe therby weaken and ouerthrow, which cannot ſtand, but reſting vpon this foundation. Beſide that, it was to be hoped, that the Redeemer ſhould be the ſonne of Abraham and Dauid, which God had promiſed in the law and the Prophets. Whereby the godly minds doe gather this other fruite, that being by the very courſe of his pedigree brought to Dauid and Abraham, they doe the more certainely know that this is the ſame Chriſt that was ſpoken of by ſo many oracles. But this which I euē now declared, is principally to be holden in mind, that the cōmon nature between him & vs is a pledge of our fellowſhip with the ſonne of God: that he cloathed with our fleſh vanquiſhed death & ſin together, that the victory ſo might be ours & the triumph ours: that he offred vp for ſacrifice the fleſh that he receiued of vs, that hauing made ſatisfactiō, he might wipe away our guiltineſſe, & appeaſe the iuſt wrath of his Father.

The manhood of Chriſt is a warrant vnto vs that man hath ſatisfied God, that he is the promiſed ſeed, and that we haue fellowſhip with him, and intereſt in the fruit of all his actions.

Sith Christ from the beginning was promised to no other end, but the restauration of the world, no other wise set foorth in sacrifices taught by Prophets, spoken of by his Apostles & by himselfe: sith no other end can stand with his priesthood, his titles, that which the scripture speaketh euery where of him, it were too much rashnes to affirme that the sonne of God had taken flesh although this cause had neuer been.

4 He that shall be diligently heedfull in considering these things as he ought, will easily neglect these wandring speculations that rauish vnto them light spirits and desirous of nouelties: of which sort is, that Christ should haue beene man, although there had beene no neede of remedie to redeeme mankinde. I graunt that in the first degree of creation, and in the state of nature vncorrupted, he was set as head ouer Angels and men. For which cause Paul calleth him the first begotten of all creatures. But sith all the Scripture crieth out that he was clothed with flesh, that he might be the Redeemer: it is too much rash presumption to imagine any other cause or end. To what end Christ was promised from the beginning, it is well enough knowen: euen to restore the world fallen into ruine, and to succour men being lost. Therefore vnder the law, the image of him was set foorth in sacrifices, to make the faithfull to hope that God would be mercifull to them, when after satisfaction made for sinne, he should be reconciled. But whereas in all ages, euen when the law was not yet published, the Mediator was neuer promised without bloud: we gather that he was appointed by the eternall counsell of God to purge the filthinesse of men, for that the shedding of bloud is a token of expiation. The Prophets so preached of him, that they promised that he should be the reconciler of God and men. That one specially notable testimonie of Esay shall suffice vs for all, where he foretelleth, that he shall be stricken with the hand of God for the sinnes of the people, that the chastisement of peace should be vpon him: and that he should be a Priest that should offer vp himselfe for sacrifice: that of his wounds should come health to other: and that, because all haue strayed and beene scattered abroad like sheepe, therefore it pleased God to punish him, that he might beare the iniquities of all. Sith we heare that Christ is properly appointed by God to helpe wretched sinners, whosoeuer passeth beyond these bounds, he doth too much follow foolish curiositie. Now when himselfe was once come, he affirmed this to be the cause of his comming to appease God, and gather vs vp from death into life. The same thing did the Apostles testifie of him. So Iohn before that he teacheth that the Word was made flesh, declareth of the falling away of man. But he himselfe is to be heard before all, when he speaketh thus of his owne office: So God loued the world, that he gaue his onely begotten Sonne, that whosoeuer beleeueth in him should not perish, but haue euerlasting life. Againe: The houre is come that the dead shall heare the voice of the sonne of God, and they that heare it, shall liue. I am the resurrection and life: he that beleeueth in me, although he be dead, shall liue. Againe, The sonne of man commeth to saue that which was lost. Againe: The whole neede not a Phisition. I should neuer make an end, if I should rehearse all. The Apostles doe all with one consent call vs to this fountaine. And truely if he had not come to reconcile God, the honour of the Priesthood should haue come to nought. For as much as the Priest appointed meane betweene God and man to make intercession: and he should not be our righteousnesse, because he was made a sacrifice for vs, that God should not impute sinnes vnto vs. Finally, he should be spoiled of all the honorable titles, wherewith the Scripture doth set him out. And also that saying of Paul should proue vaine, that that which was impossible to the law, God hath sent his owne soone, that in likenesse of the flesh of sinne he should satisfie for vs. Neither will this stand that he teacheth in another place, that in this glasse appeared the goodnesse of God and his infinite goodnesse toward men, when Christ was giuen to be the Redeemer. Finally, the Scripture euery where assigneth no other end why the sonne of God would take vpon him our flesh, and also receiued this commandement of his father, but to be made a sacrifice to appease his Father towards vs. So it is written, and so it behooued that Christ should suffer, and repentance be preached in his name. Therefore my Father loueth me, because I giue my life for the sheepe, this commandement he gaue me. As Moses lifted vp the Serpent in the desert, so must the sonne of man be lifted vp. In another place, Father, saue me from this houre. But I am therefore come euen to this houre. Father, glorifie thy Sonne. Where he plainly speaketh of the end why he tooke flesh, that he might be a sacrifice and satisfaction to do away sinne. After the same sort doth Zacharie pronounce, that he came according to the promise giuen to the fathers, to giue light to them that sate in the shadow of death. Let vs remember that al these things are spoken of the sonne of God: in whom Paul in another place testifieth that that all the treasures of knowledge and wisedome are hidden, and beside whom he glorieth that he knoweth nothing. Col. 2. 3. 1. Cor. 2. 2.

5 If any man take exception and say, that none of all these things prooue the contrarie, but that the same Christ that redeemed men being damned, might also in putting on their flesh testifie his loue toward them, being preserued and safe. The answere is short, that forasmuch as the holie Ghost pronounceth, that by the eternall decree of God these two things were ioyned together, that Christ should be our redeemer, and also partaker of all one nature with vs, therefore it is not lawfull for vs to search any further. For whosoeuer is tickled with desire to know any more, he being not contented with the vnchangeable ordinance of God, doth shew also that he is not contented with the same Christ that was giuen vs to be the price of our redemption. But Paul not onely rehearseth to what end he was sent, but also climbing to the high mysterie of predestination, he very fitly represseth all wantonnesse, and itching desire of mans wit. The father chose vs in Christ before the creation of the world, to make vs his sonnes by adoption, according to the purpose of his will: and he accepted vs in his beloued Sonne, in whom we haue redemption by his bloud. Truely heere is not the fall of Adam set before as though it were foremost in time, but is shewed what God determined before all ages, when his wil was to help the miserie of mankinde. If the aduersarie obiect againe, that this purpose of God did hang vpon the fall of man which he did foresee: it is enough and more for me, to say that they with wicked boldnesse breake foorth to faigne them a new Christ, whosoeuer suffer themselues to search for more, or hope to know more of Christ then God hath foreappointed them by his secret decree. And for good cause did Paul, after he had so discoursed of the proper office of Christ, wish to the Ephesians the spirit of vnderstanding, to comprehend what is the length, height, bredth, and depth, euen the loue of Christ, that surmounteth all knowledge: euen as if of purpose he would set barres about our mindes, that when mention is made of Christ, they should not, be it neuer so little, swarue from the grace of reconciliation. Wherefore, sith this is a faithfull saying (as Paul testifieth) that Christ is come to saue sinners, I doe gladly rest in the same. And whereas in another place the same Apostle teacheth, that the grace which is now disclosed by the Gospell, was giuen vs in Christ before the times of the world: I determine that I ought constantly to abide therein to the end. Against this modesty Osiander carpeth vniustly, which hath again in this time vnhappily stirred this question before lightly moued by a few. He accuseth thē of presumption that say, that the Sonne of God should not haue appeered in the flesh, if Adam had not fallen, because this inuention is confuted by no testimonie of Scripture. As though Paul did not bridle froward curiositie, when after he had spoken of redemption purchased by Christ, he by and by commandeth to auoid foolish questions. The madnesse of some did burst out so farre, that while they disorderly couered to seeme wittie, they mooued this question, whether the sonne of God might haue taken vpon him the nature of an Asse. This monstrousnesse which all the godly doe worthilie abhorre as detestable, let Osiander confute with this pretense, that it is neuer expresse confuted in the Scripture. As though when Paul accounteth nothing precious or woorthie to be knowen, but Christ crucified, he doth therefore admit an Asse to be the authour of saluation. Therefore he that in another place reporteth that Christ by the eternall counsell of his father was ordeined to be a head to gather all things together, will neuer the more acknowledge another that hath no office of redeeming appointed him. Ephe. 4. 9. Ephe. 3. 16. 1. Tim. 1. 15. 1. Tim. 3. 9. Ephe. 4. 22.

6 But as for the principle that he braggeth of, it is very trifling. He would haue it that man was created after the image of God, because he was fashioned after the paterne of Christ to come, that he might resemble him, whom the father had already decreed to clothe with our flesh. Whereupon he gathereth, that if Adam had neuer fallen from his first and vncorrupted originall state, yet Christ should haue beene man. How trifling this is & wrested, all men that haue sound iudgment do easily perceiue of themselues. In the meane time first he thinketh that he hath seene what was the image of God, that forsooth the glory of God did not only shine in those excellent gifts wherewith he was garnished, but also that God himselfe essētially dwelt in him. But as for me, although I grant that Adam did beare the image of God, in so much as he was ioyned

It is not for vs to examine curiously whether Christ might haue beene without this cause, when God hath set downe, that for this cause he purposed before al worlds Christ should be, and commanded to auoid foolish questions.

A vaine principle whereupon Osiander gathereth, that although Adam had neuer sinned, Christ nuertheless had beene made man.

to God, (which is the true and higheſt perfection of dignitie) yet I ſay, that the likeneſſe of God is no where elſe to be ſought, but in thoſe marks of excellencie wherewith he had garniſhed Adam aboue other liuing creatures. And that Chriſt was then the image of God, all men doe graunt with one conſent, and therefore that whatſoeuer excellencie was grauen in Adam, it proceeded from this, that by the onely begotten ſonne he approched to the glory of his creator. Therefore man was created after the image of God, in whom the creators will was to haue his glory ſeene as in a looking glaſſe. To this degree of honor was he aduanced by the benefit of the onely begotten ſonne: But I ſay further, that the ſame ſonne was a common head as well to Angels as to men, ſo that the ſame dignitie that was beſtowed vpon man, did alſo belong vnto Angels. For when we heare them called the children of God, it were inconuenient to deny, that there is ſomething in them wherein they reſemble their father. Now if his will was to haue his glory to be repreſented as well in Angels as in men, and to be ſeene in both natures, Oſiander doth fondly triſle in ſaying, that the Angels were then ſet behinde men, becauſe they did not beare the image of Chriſt. For they could not continually enioy the preſent beholding of God, vnleſſe they were like him. And Paul teacheth, that men are no otherwiſe renewed after the image of God, but if they be coupled with Angels, that they may cleaue together vnder one head. Finally, if we beleeue Chriſt, this ſhall be our laſt felicitie, to be made of like fourme to the Angels, when we ſhall be receiued vp into heauen. But if Oſiander will conclude, that the originall paterne of the image of God was in Chriſt as he is man, by the ſame reaſon a man may ſay, that Chriſt muſt needes haue beene partaker of the nature of Angels, becauſe the image of God pertaineth alſo to them.

Gen.1.27.

Gal.3.10.

The reſt of Oſianders reaſons anſwered.

7 Therefore, Oſiander hath no cauſe to feare, that God ſhould be found a liar, vnleſſe it had beene firſt ſtedfaſtly and vnchangeablie decreed in his minde, to haue his ſonne incarnate: becauſe if the integritie of Adam had not fallen, he ſhould with the Angels haue beene like vnto God, and yet it ſhould not therefore haue beene neceſſary, that the ſonne of God ſhould be made either man or Angell. And in vaine he feareth that abſurditie, leaſt vnleſſe the vnchangeable counſell of God had beene before the creation of man that Chriſt ſhould be borne, not as the redeemer, but as the firſt man, he ſhould haue loſt his prerogatiue: foraſmuch as now he ſhould be borne man onely by an accident cauſe, that is, to reſtore mankinde being loſt, and ſo it might be gathered thereupon, that Chriſt was created after the image of Adam. For why ſhould he ſo much abhor that which the Scripture ſo openly teacheth, that he was made like vnto vs in all things, except ſinne? Whereupon Luke doubteth not to recken him the ſonne of Adam in his Genealogie. And I would faine know why Paul calleth Chriſt the ſecond Adam, but becauſe the eſtate of man was appointed for him, that he might raiſe vp the poſteritie of Adam out of their ruine. For if he were in order before that creation, he ſhould haue been called the firſt Adam. Oſiander boldly affirmeth, that becauſe Chriſt was alreadie before knowen man in the mind of God, men were formed after the ſame paterne. But Paul in naming him the ſecond Adam, ſetteth a meane betweene the firſt beginning of man, and the reſtitution which we obtaine by Chriſt, the fall of man whereby grew the neceſſitie to haue nature reſtored to her firſt degree. Whereupon it followeth, that this ſame was the cauſe why the Sonne of God was borne to become man. In the meane time, Oſiander reaſoneth ill and vnſauourily, that Adam, ſo long as he had ſtood without falling, ſhould haue beene the image of himſelfe and not of Chriſt. I anſwere by the contrary, becauſe though the Sonne of God had neuer put on fleſh, neuertheleſſe both in the body and in the ſoule of man ſhould haue ſhined the image of God, in the bright beames whereof it alway appeared, that Chriſt is verily the head, and hath the ſoueraigne ſupremacie in all. And ſo is that fooliſh ſubtletie aſſoiled, which Oſiander bloweth abroad, that the Angels ſhould haue lacked this head, vnleſſe it had beene purpoſed by God to cloth his Sonne with fleſh, yea, though there had beene no fault of Adam. For he doth too raſhly ſnatch hold of that which no man in his right wit wil graunt, that Chriſt hath no ſupremacie ouer Angels, that they ſhould haue him for their Prince, but inſomuch as he is man. But it is eaſily gathered by the words of Paul, that in as much as he is the eternall word of God, he is the firſt begotten of all creatures, not that he is create, or ought to be reckoned among creatures: but becauſe the ſtate of the world in integritie, ſuch as it was at the beginning garniſhed with excellent beautie, had no other originall: and then, that in as much as he was made man, he was the firſt begotten of the dead. For the Apoſtle in one ſhort clauſe ſetteth foorth in both theſe points to be conſidered: that all things were create by the Sonne, that he might beare rule ouer Angels: and that he was made man, that he might begin to be the Redeemer. Of like ignorance is it that he ſaith, that men ſhould not haue had Chriſt to their King, if he had not beene man. As though the kingdome of God could not ſtand, if the eternall Sonne of God, although not clothed with the fleſh of man, gathering together both Angels and men into the fellowſhip of his heauenly glory and life, ſhould himſelfe beare the ſoueraignetie. But in this falſe principle he is alway deceiued, or rather deceiueth himſelfe, that the Church ſhould haue beene without a head, vnleſſe Chriſt had appeared in the fleſh. As though, euen as the Angels enioyed him their head he could not likewiſe by his diuine power rule ouer men, and by the ſecret force of his ſpirit quicken and nouriſh them like his owne body, till being gathered vp into heauen, they might enioy all one life with the Angels. Theſe trifles that I haue hitherto confuted, Oſiander accounteth for moſt ſtrong oracles: euen ſo as being drunke with the ſweeteneſſe of his owne ſpeculations, he vſeth to blow out fond Bacchus cries of matters of nothing: But this one that he bringeth after, he ſaith is much more ſtrong, that is the prophecie of Adam, which ſeeing his wife ſaid, this now is a bone of my bones, and fleſh of my fleſh. But how prooueth he that to be a prophecie? Becauſe in Mathew Chriſt giueth the ſame ſaying to God. As though that whatſoeuer God hath ſpoken by men, conteineth ſome prophecie. Let Oſiander ſeeke prophecies in euery Commandement of the Law, which, it is certaine to haue come from GOD the Author of them. Beſide that, Chriſt ſhould haue beene groſſe and earthly, if he had reſted vpon the literall ſenſe. Becauſe he ſpeaketh not of the myſticall vnion whereunto he hath vouchſafed to receiue his Church, but onely of faithfulneſſe betweene man and wife: for this cauſe he teacheth, that God pronounced that man and wife ſhall be one fleſh, that no man ſhould attempt to breake that inſoluble knot by diuorce. If Oſiander loath this ſimplicitie, let him blame Chriſt, for that he led not his Diſciples further to a myſterie, in more ſubtelly expounding the ſaying of his Father. Neither yet doth Paul maintaine his errour, which after he had ſaid that we are fleſh of the fleſh of Chriſt, by and by addeth, that this is a great myſterie, for his purpoſe was not to tell in what meaning Adam ſpake it, but vnder the figure and ſimilitude of mariage to ſet forth the holy coupling together, that maketh vs one with Chriſt. And ſo doe the words ſound. Becauſe when he giueth warning that he ſpeaketh this of Chriſt and his Church, he doth as it were by way of correction, ſeuer the ſpirituall ioyning of Chriſt & his Church from the law of mariage. Wherefore this fickle reaſon eaſily vaniſheth away. And I thinke I neede no more to ſhake vp any more of that ſort of chaffe, becauſe the vanitie of them all is ſoone found out by this ſhort confutation. But this ſobrietie ſhall abundantly ſuffice to feede ſoundly the children of God: that when the fulneſſe of times was come, the ſoone of God was ſent, made of woman, made vnder the law, to redeeme them that were vnder the law.

Gen. 1. 18.

THE THIRTENTH CHAPTER.

That Chriſt tooke vpon him the true ſubſtance of the fleſh of man.

The trueth of Chriſts humane nature proued againſt the Manichees and Marcionites.

NOw, vnleſſe I be deceiued, it were ſuperfluous to intreat againe of the Godhead of Chriſt, which hath already in another place beene prooued with plaine and ſtrong teſtimonies. It remaineth therefore to be ſeene, how he being clothed with our fleſh, hath fulfilled the office of Mediator. The trueth of his humane nature hath in the old time beene impugned both by the Manichees and the Marcionites: of whom, the Marcionites fained a Ghoſt in ſteede of the body of Chriſt, and the Manichees dreamed that he had a heauenly fleſh. But both many and ſtrong teſtimonies of the Scripture doe ſtand againſt them both. For the bleſſing is promiſed neither in a heauenly ſeede, Gen. 17. 2. & 18. 18. & 26. 4. Pſal. 45 7. Mat. 1. 1. Rom. 1. 3. Rom. 9. 5.

nor in the counterfait ſhape of man, but in the ſeede of Abraham and Iacob. Neither is the eternall throne promiſed to a man made of aire, but to the ſonne of Dauid, and to the fruite of his wombe. Therefore being deliuered in the fleſh, he is called the ſonne of Dauid and Abraham: not becauſe he is onely borne of the wombe of the Virgin, and create in the aire, but becauſe (as Paul expoundeth it) he is according to the fleſh made of the ſeede of Dauid: as in another place the Apoſtle teacheth, that he deſcended of the Iewes. For which cauſe the Lord himſelfe not contented with the bare name of man, doth oftentimes call himſelfe the ſonne of man, meaning to expreſſe more plainely that he was man truely iſſued of the ſeede of mankinde. Sith the holy Ghoſt hath ſo oft, by ſo many meanes, with ſo great diligence and ſimplicitie declared a thing not obſcure of it ſelfe, who would haue thought any men to be ſo ſhameleſſe as to preſume yet to ſpread miſts to darken it? And yet we haue other teſtimonies at hand, if we liſted to heape vp more of them. As is that ſaying of Paul: that God ſent his ſonne made of woman. And innumerable other places, whereby appeareth that he was ſubiect to hunger, thirſt, cold, and other infirmities of our nature. But out of many theſe are chiefly to be choſen, that may moſt auaile to edifie our mindes in true confidence. As, where it is ſaid, that he gaue not ſo great honour to the Angels, as to take their nature that had the power of death. Againe, that by benefit of that communicating we are reckoned his brethren. Againe, that he ought to haue bin made like vnto his brethren, that he might be made a merciſull and faithfull interceſſor: that we haue not a biſhop that cannot be compatient of our infirmities, and ſuch like. And for the ſame purpoſe ſerueth that which we touched a little before, that it behooued that the ſinnes of the world ſhould be cleanſed in our fleſh, which Paul plainely affirmeth. And truely, whatſoeuer the Father hath giuen to Chriſt, it doth therefore belong to vs, becauſe he is the head, from which the whole bodie being knit together, groweth into one. Yea, and otherwiſe that will not agree together, which is ſaid: that the Spirit was giuen him without meaſure, that all we ſhould draw of the fulneſſe thereof. Foraſmuch as there is no greater abſurditie than to ſay, that God is enriched in his eſſence by any accidentall gift. And for this cauſe Chriſt ſaith in another place: I doe ſanctifie my ſelfe for them.

Rom. 8. 3.

The grounds whereupon the Marcionites and Manichees founded their error.

2 As for the places that they bring foorth to confirme their errour, they doe too vnaptly wreſt them, and they nothing preuaile by their trifling ſubtleties, when they goe about to wipe away thoſe things that I haue alleaged for our part. Marcion imagineth that Chriſt did put on a fantaſticall body in ſtead of a true bodie: becauſe in ſome places it is ſaid, that he was made after the likeneſſe of a man, and that he was found in

Phil. 2. 7.

ſhape as a man. But ſo he nothing weigheth what is Pauls purpoſe in that place. For his meaning is not to teach what maner of body Chriſt tooke vpon him, but that whereas he might haue ſhewed foorth his Godhead, he made no other ſhew of himſelfe, but as of an abiect and vnregarded man. For, to exhort vs by his example to ſubmiſſion, he ſheweth, that foraſmuch as he was God, he might haue by and by ſet forth his glory to be ſeene to the world: but yet that he gaue ouer ſome of his owne right, and of his owne accord abaſed himſelfe, becauſe he did put on the image of a ſeruant, and contented with that humilitie, ſuffred his Godhead to be hidden with the veile of the fleſh. He doth not heere teach what Chriſt was, but how he behaued himſelfe. And alſo by the whole proceſſe of the text it is eaſilie gathered, that Chriſt was abaſed in the true nature of man. For what meaneth this, that in ſhape he was found as man, but that for a time the glorie of his godhead did not ſhine foorth, but onely the ſhape of man appeared in baſe and abiect eſtate? For otherwiſe that place of Peter could not ſtand together, that he was dead in the fleſh, but quickened in the ſpirit, if the Sonne of God had not beene weake in the nature of man: which Paul expreſſeth more plainely in ſaying,

1. Pet. 3. 18.

2. Cor. 13. 4. 1. Cor. 15. 47.

that he ſuffered by reaſon of the weakeneſſe of the fleſh. And hereunto ſerueth the exaltation: becauſe it is expreſſely ſaid, that Chriſt attained a new glory after that he abaſed himſelfe, which could not well agree to be ſpoken of any, but of a man hauing fleſh and Soule. Manicheus framed Chriſt a bodie of aire, becauſe Chriſt is called the ſecond Adam, heauenly of heauen. But neither in that place doth the

Apoſtle

Apoſtle bring in a heauenly eſſence of the body, but a ſpiritual force which being powred abroad by Chriſt, doth quicken vs. Now, as we haue alreadie ſeene, Peter and Paul doe ſeuer the ſame from the fleſh. But rather that doctrine which is receiued among the true teachers, concerning the fleſh of Chriſt, is very well prooued by that place. For if Chriſt had not all one nature of body with vs, it were a very vaine argument, that Paul with ſuch vehemencie followeth: that if Chriſt be riſen againe, we ſhall alſo riſe againe: and if we doe not riſe, then that Chriſt alſo is not riſen. By what cauillations ſo euer either the olde Manichees or their new Diſciples goe about to eſcape, they ſhall not winde themſelues away. It is a foule ſhifte, that they fondly ſay, that Chriſt is called the ſonne of man, inſomuch as he is promiſed of men. For it is plaine, that after the Hebrew phraſe, very man indeede is called the ſonne of man. And Chriſt without doubt kept the phraſe of his owne tongue. Alſo it ought to make no queſtion, what ought to be vnderſtood by the children of Adam. And (not to goe farre off) the place of the eight Pſalme, which the Apoſtles apply to Chriſt, ſhall be ſufficient enough: What is man that thou art mindfull of him, or the ſonne of man that thou viſiteſt him? In this figure is expreſſed the true manhood of Chriſt. For though he were not immediatly begotten of a morrall father, yet his race came from Adam. For elſe that place could not ſtand which we haue alreadie alleaged that Chriſt is made partaker of fleſh and blood, that he might gather to him yoong children to the ſeruice of God. In which words it is plainly determined, that Chriſt is made fellow and partaker of all one nature with vs. In which meaning alſo he ſaith, that both the Author of holineſſe and they that are made holy, are all of one. For it is prooued by the proceſſe of the text, that the ſame is referred to the fellowſhip of nature: becauſe he by and by addeth. Therefore he is not aſhamed to call them brethren. For if he had ſaid before, that the faithfull are of God in ſo great dignitie, what cauſe ſhould there be to be aſhamed? But becauſe Chriſt of his infinite grace doth ioyne himſelfe to the baſe and vnnoble, therefore it is ſaid, that he is not aſhamed. But in vaine they obiect, that by this meane the wicked ſhall become the brethren of Chriſt: becauſe we know that the children of God are not borne of fleſh and blood, but of the holy Ghoſt by faith. Therefore onely fleſh maketh not a brotherly ioyning. But although the Apoſtle giue this honour to the faithfull onely, to be of one with Chriſt, yet it followeth not, but that the wicked may be borne of the ſame originall. As when we ſay that Chriſt was made man, to make vs the ſonnes of God: this ſaying extendeth not to all men, becauſe Faith is the meane which ſpiritually graffeth vs into the body of Chriſt. Alſo they fooliſhly mooue a brawle about the name of Firſt begotten. They ſay that Chriſt ſhould haue beene borne of Adam ſtraight at the beginning, that he might be the firſt begotten among brethren. For the title of Firſt begotten, is not referred to age, but to the degree of honour, and excellencie of power. And more colour hath that which they babble, that Chriſt tooke to him man and not Angels, becauſe he receiued mankinde into fauour. For to ſet out more largely the honor which God vouchſafed to giue vs, he compared the Angels with vs, which were in this behalfe ſet behind vs. And if the teſtimonie of Moſes be well weied, where he ſaith that the ſeede of the woman ſhall breake the ſerpents head, it ſhall vtterly ende the controuerſie. For onely Chriſt is not there ſpoken of, but all mankind. Becauſe the victorie was to be gotten by Chriſt for vs, he generally pronounceth that the poſteritie of the woman ſhould get the vpper hand of the diuell. Whereunto followeth, that Chriſt iſſued of mankind, becauſe it was Gods purpoſe there to raiſe vp Eue, whom he ſpake vnto with good hope, that ſhe ſhould not faint with ſorrow.

3 They do no leſſe wickedly than fooliſhly entangle with allegories theſe teſtimonies where Chriſt is called the ſeede of Abraham, and the fruit of the wombe of Dauid. For if the name of Seede had beene ſpoken in an allegorie, truely Paul would not haue left it vntold, where he plainely and without figure affirmeth, that there are not many ſonnes of Abraham redeemers, but one Chriſt. Of like ſort is it that they alleadge, that he is no otherwiſe called the ſonne of Dauid, but becauſe he was promiſed and at length in his due time deliuered. For after that Paul had once named him the ſonne of God: in that he by and by addeth, According to the fleſh, he truely meaneth of nature. And ſo in the ninth Chapter calling him the bleſſed God, he ſaith ſeuerally beſide, that that according to the flesh he descended of the Iewes. Now if he were not truely begotten of the seede of Dauid, to what purpose shall be this saying, that he is the fruit of his wombe? What meaneth this promise? Out of thy loines shall he descend, that shall abide in thy seate. Now in the Genealogie of Christ, as it is rehearsed of Mathew, they doe Sophistically mocke. For though he doe not rehearse the parents of Mary but of Ioseph, yet because he speaketh of a thing sufficiently knowen abroad among the people, he reckeneth it enough to shew that Ioseph came of the seede of Dauid, when it was well knowen that Mary was of the same stocke. But Luke more expresseth them in teaching that saluation brought by Christ, is common to all mankinde: because Christ the author of saluation proceeded from Adam the common parent of all. I graunt indeed, that by the Genealogie it can none otherwise be gathered that Christ was the sonne of Dauid, but in so much as he was begotten of the Virgin. But the new Marcionites to colour their error do too proudly, in this that to proove Christ tooke his body of nothing, they affirme that women are seedeles, and so they ouerthrow the principles of nature. But because that is no question of diuinitie, and the reasons that they bring are so fickle that they may very easily be confuted: therefore I will not touch those things that belong to Philosophie and Phisicke, and will hold me contented to wipe away those things they alleadge out of Scripture: that is, that Aaron and Ioiadah tooke wiues of the tribe of Iehudah, & so the difference of Tribes had then bene cõfounded, if woman had engendring seede in her. But it is well enough knowen that as touching ciuill order, the kindreds are reckoned by the seede of the man, and yet the excellencie of the kinde of man aboue woman prooueth not the contrarie, but that in generation the seede of woman must meete. And this solution extendeth to all the Genealogies. Oftentimes when the Scripture reckoneth vp a Genealogie, it nameth the men onely: shall we therefore say, that the women are nothing? But very children doe know, that women are comprehended vnder the name of men. And after this sort is said, that women bring foorth to their husbands, because the name of the household alway remaineth with the males. Now as this is graunted to the excellencie of the male kinde, that the children are counted noble or vnnoble, according to the estate of their fathers: so also in the state of bondage, the issue followeth the wombe, according to the iudgement of the Ciuill Lawyers. Whereby we may gather, that the issue is ingendred of the seede of the woman. And it hath of long time beene receiued in common vse of all nations, that the mothers are called Genetrices, that is engendrers. Wherewith Gods law also agreeth, which else should wrongfully forbid the marriage of the vncle with his sisters daughter, because there were no consanguinitie betweene them: and also it were lawfull for a man to marrie his sister by the mothers side, so that she were begotten of another father. But as I graunt that there is a passiue power ascribed to women, so doe I answere that the same thing is indifferently spoken of them that is of men. And Christ himselfe is not said to be made by the woman, but of the woman. But some of their companie shaking off all shame doe too lewdly aske, whether we will say that Christ was engendred of the menstruall seede of the Virgin, for I will likewise aske of them, whether he did not congeale in the bloud of his mother, which they shall be constrained to confesse. Therefore it is fitly gathered of Mathewes words, that because Christ was begotten of Mary, he was engendred of her seede: as a like engendring is ment when it is said, that Boaz was begotten of Rahab. Neither doth Mathew here describe the Virgin as a conduit pipe through which Christ passed: but he seuereth this maruellous maner of generation from the common maner, for that by her was Christ begotten of the seede of Dauid. For euen in the same sort, that Isaac was begotten of Abraham, Salomon of Dauid, and Ioseph of Iacob, likewise it is said that Christ was begotten of his mother. For the Euangelist so frameth the order of his speech, and willing to proue that Christ came of Dauid, is contented with this one reason, that he was begotten of Mary. Whereby it followeth, that he tooke it for a matter confessed, that Mary was of kinne to Ioseph.

It is no dishonor vnto Christ to haue taken his original of man.

4 The absurdities wherewith they would charge vs, are stuffed full of childish cauillations. They thinke it a shame and dishonour to Christ, if he should haue taken his originall of men: because he so could not be exempt from the vniuersall law that encloseth all the ofspring of Adam without exception vnder sinne. But the comparison that that we reade in Paul doth eaſily aſſoile this doubt: that as by one man came ſinne, and by ſinne death, ſo by the righteouſneſſe of one man grace hath abounded. Wherewith alſo agreeth another compariſon of his: the firſt Adam of earth earthly, and naturall, the ſecond of heauen heauenly. Therefore in another place, the ſame Apoſtle, where he teacheth that Chriſt was ſent in the likeneſſe of ſinfull fleſh to ſatisfie the law, doth ſo expreſſely ſeuer him from the common eſtate of men, that he be very man without fault and corruption. But very childiſhly they trifle in reaſoning thus: If Chriſt be free from all ſpot, and was by the ſecret working of the holy Ghoſt begotten of the ſeede of Marie, then is not the womans ſeede, but onely the mans ſeede vncleane. For we doe not make Chriſt free from all ſpot, for this cauſe that he is onely engendred of his mother without copulation of man, but becauſe he is ſanctified by the holy Ghoſt, that the generation might be pure and vncorrupted, ſuch as ſhould haue beene before the fall of Adam. And this alway remained ſtedfaſtly determined with vs, that ſo oft as the Scripture putteth vs in minde of the cleanneſſe of Chriſt, it is meant of his true nature of manhood: becauſe it were ſuperfluous to ſay that God is cleane. Alſo the ſanctification that he ſpeaketh of in the ſeuenteenth of Iohn, could haue no place in the nature of God. Neither are there fained two ſeedes of Adam, although there came no infection to Chriſt: becauſe the generation of man is not vncleane or vitious of it ſelfe, but accidentall by his falling. Therefore it is no maruell, if Chriſt, by whom the eſtate of innocencie was to be reſtored, were exempted from common corruption. And whereas alſo they thruſt this vpon vs for an abſurditie, that if the Word of God did put on fleſh, then was it incloſed in a narrow priſon of an earthly body: this is but meere waiwardneſſe: becauſe although the infinite eſſence of the Word did grow togither into one perſon with the nature of man: yet doe we faigne no incloſing of it. For the Sonne of God deſcended maruellouſly from heauen, ſo as yet he left not heauen, it was his will to be maruellouſly borne in the Virgins wombe, to be conuerſant in earth, and hang vpon the croſſe, yet that he alway filled the world euen as at the beginning.

Rom. 5. 12.

THE FOVRTEENTH CHAPTER.

How the two natures of the Mediator doe make one perſon.

NOw where it is ſaid that the Word was made fleſh: that is not ſo to be vnderſtanded, as though it were either turned into fleſh, or confuſedly mingled with fleſh, but becauſe he choſe him a temple of the Virgins wombe to dwell in, he that was the ſonne of God, became alſo the ſonne of man, not by confuſion of ſubſtance, but by vnitie of perſon. For we ſo affirme the Godhead ioyned and vnited to the manhood, that either of them haue their whole propertie remaining, and yet of them both is made one Chriſt. If any thing in all worldly things may be found like to ſo great a myſterie, the ſimilitude of man is moſt fit, whom we ſee to conſiſt of two ſubſtances, whereof yet neither is ſo mingled with other, but that either keepeth the propertie of his owne nature. For neither is the ſoule the body, nor the body the ſoule. Wherefore both that thing may be ſeuerally ſpoken of the ſoule, which can no way agree with the body: and likewiſe of the body that thing may be ſaid, which can by no meane agree with the ſoule: and that may be ſaid of the whole man, which can be but vnfitly taken neither of the ſoule nor of the body ſeuerally. Finally, the properties of the ſoule are ſometime attributed to the body, and the properties of the body ſometime to the ſoule: and and yet he that conſiſteth of them is but one man and not many. But ſuch formes of ſpeech doe ſignifie both that there is one perſon in man compounded of two natures knit together, aud that there are two diuerſe natures which doe make the ſame perſon. And ſo doe the Scriptures ſpeake of Chriſt: ſometime they giue vnto him thoſe things that ought ſingularly to be referred to his manhood, and ſometime thoſe things that doe peculiarly belong to his Godhead, and ſometime thoſe things that doe comprehend both natures, and doe agree with neither of them ſeuerally. And this conioyning of the two natures that are in Chriſt, they doe with ſuch religiouſneſſe expreſſe, that ſometime they doe put them in common together: which figure is among the old Authors called Communicating of properties.

The diuine and humane natures of Chriſt vnited in his perſon, yet in their properties diſtinguiſhed, as the body and the ſoule in one and the ſame man.

2 Theſe

Things in ſcripture ſometimes ſpoken of the perſon of Chriſt and agreeing in reſpect of the one nature onely, ſometimes of one nature and agreeing in reſpect of the other.
Ioh 8.58.
Col.1.15.

2 Theſe things were but weake, vnleſſe many phraſes of Scripture, and ſuch as be eachwhere readie to finde, did prooue that nothing hereof hath beene deuiſed by man. That ſame thing which Chriſt ſpake of himſelfe, ſaying: Before that Abraham was, I am, was farre diſagreeing from his manhood. Neither am I ignorant with what cauillation the erroneous ſpirits doe deprane this place: For they ſay that he was before all ages, becauſe he was already foreknowen the Redeemer, as well in the counſell of the Father, as in the mindes of the godly. But whereas he openly diſtinguiſheth the day of his manifeſtation from his eternall eſſence, and of purpoſe pronounceth vnto himſelfe an authoritie by antiquitie wherein he excelleth aboue Abraham, he doth vndoubtedly challenge to himſelfe that which is proper to the Godhead. Whereas Paul affirmeth that he is the firſt begotten of all creatures, which was before all things, and by whom all things keepe their being: and whereas he himſelfe reporteth that he was in glory with the Father before the creation of the world, and that he worketh togither with the Father, theſe things doe nothing more agree with the nature of men. It is therefore certaine, that theſe and ſuch like are peculiarly aſcribed to the Godhead. But whereas he is called the ſeruant of the Father: and whereas it is ſaid, that he grew in age, wiſedome and fauour with God and men: that he ſeeketh not his owne glorie: that he knoweth not the laſt day: that he ſpeaketh not of himſelfe: that he doth not his owne will: where it is ſaid, that he was ſeene and felt: this wholly belongeth to his owne manhood. For in reſpect that he is God, neither can he encreaſe in any thing, and he worketh all things for his owne ſake, neither is any thing hidden from him, he doth all things according to the free choiſe of his owne will, and can neither be ſeene nor felt. And yet he doth not ſeuerally aſcribe theſe things to his nature of man onely, but taketh them vpon himſelfe, as if they did agree with the perſon of the mediatour. But the communicating of properties is in this that Paul ſaith, that God did by his owne bloud purchaſe vnto him a Church: and the Lord of glorie crucified. Againe, where Iohn ſaith, that the Word of life was felt. Truely God neither hath bloud, nor ſuffereth, nor can be touched with hands. But becauſe he which was both very God and man, Chriſt being crucified, did ſhed his bloud for vs: thoſe things that were done in his nature of man, are vnproperly, and yet not without reaſon giuen to his Godhead. A like example is, where Iohn teacheth that God gaue his ſoule for vs: therefore there alſo the propertie of the manhood is communicate with the other nature. Againe, when Chriſt ſaid being yet conuerſant in earth, that no man hath aſcended into heauen, but the ſonne of man that was in heauen: truely according to his manhood, and in the fleſh that he had put on, he was not then in heauen: but becauſe himſelfe was both God and man, by reaſon of the vnitie of both natures, he gaue to the one that, which belonged to the other.

3 But moſt plainly of all doe theſe places ſet foorth the true ſubſtance of Chriſt, which doe comprehend both natures togither: of which ſort there are very many in the Goſpell of him. For that which is there read is ſingularly belonging neither to his Godhead nor to his manhood, but to both togither, that he hath receiued of his Father power to forgiue ſinnes, to raiſe vp whom he will, to giue righteouſneſſe, holineſſe, and ſaluation, to be made iudge ouer the quicke and the dead, to be honoured euen as the Father is: Finally, that he is called the light of the world, the good ſhepheard, the only dore, the true Vine. For ſuch prerogatiues had the ſonne of God, when he was ſhewed in the fleſh, which although he enioyed with his Father before the world was made, yet he had them not in the ſame maner or the ſame reſpect, and which could not be giuen to ſuch a man as was nothing but man. In the ſame meaning ought we to take that which is in Paul: that Chriſt after the iudgement ended, ſhall yeeld vp the kingdome to God and the Father: Euen the kingdome of the ſonne of God, which had no beginning, nor ſhall haue any ending: but euen as he lay hid vnder the baſeneſſe of the fleſh, and abaſed himſelfe, taking vpon him the forme of a ſeruant, and laying aſide the port of Maieſtie, he ſhewed himſelfe obedient to his Father: and hauing performed all ſuch ſubiection, at length is crowned with honor and glory, and aduanced to the higheſt dominion, that all knees ſhall bow before him: ſo ſhall he then yeelde vp to his Father both that name and crowne of glorie, and whatſoeuer he hath receiued of his father, father, that God may be all in all. For to what purpose is power and dominion giuen him, but that the father should gouerne vs by his hand? In which sense it is also said, that he sitteth at the right hand of the father. But this is but for a time, till we may enioy the present beholding of the godhead. And here the error of the old fathers cannot be excused, which while they tooke no heede to the person of the Mediator, haue obscured the naturall meaning of almost all the doctrine that is read in the Gospell of Iohn, and haue entangled themselues in many snares. Let this therefore be vnto vs the key of right vnderstanding, that such things as belong to the office of the Mediator, are not spoken simply of the nature of God, nor of the nature of man. Therefore Christ shall reigne till he come foorth to iudge the world, in so much as he ioyneth vs to his father, according to the small measure of our weakenesse. But when we being made partakers of the heauenly glory, shall see God such as he is, then he hauing performed the office of Mediator, shall cease to be the Embassadour of his father, and shall be contented with that glory which he enioyed before the making of the world: and the name of Lord doth in no other respect peculiarly agree with the person of Christ, but in this, that it signifieth the meane degree betweene God and vs. For which purpose maketh that saying of Paul: One God, of whom are all things, and one Lord, by whom are all things, euen he to whom the dominion for a time is committed by the father, vntill his diuine maiestie be to be seene face to face. From whom so far is it off that any thing shall decay, by yeelding vp the dominion to his father, that he shall become so much the more glorious. For then shal God also cease to be the head of Christ because Christs godhead shall then shine of it selfe, whereas yet it is couered with a certaine veile.

Heb. 2.6. Phil. 2.10. 1.Cor. 15.28.

1.Cor. 8.

4 And this obseruation shall doe no small seruice to assoile many doubts if the readers doe fitly apply it. For it is maruellous how much the vnskilfull, yea some not vtterly vnlearned, are cumbred with such formes of speech, which they see spoken by Christ, which doe well agree neither with his godhead nor with his manhood, because they consider not that they doe agree with his person wherein he is shewed both God and man, and with the office of a Mediator. And it is alway easie to see, how well all things hang together, if they haue a sober expositor, to examine so great mysteries with such deuout reuerence as they ought to be. But there is nothing that these furious and franticke spirits trouble not. They catch hold of those things that are spoken of his manhood, to take away the godhead: and likewise of those things that are spoken of his godhead to take away his manhood: and of the se things that are so ioyntly spoken of both natures, that they seuerally agree with neither, to take away both. But what is that else but to say, that Christ is not man, because he is God: and that he is not God, because he is man: and that he is neither man nor God, because he is both man & God? We therefore doe determine that Christ, as he is both God and man, consisting of both natures, vnited, though not confounded, is our Lord and the true sonne of God, euen according to this manhood, though not by reason of his manhood. For the error of Nestorius is to be driuen far away from vs, which when he went about rather to draw in sunder, then to distinguish the nature, did by the meane imagine a double Christ. Whereas we see that the Scripture crieth out with loud voice against it, where both the name of the sonne of God is giuen to him that was borne of the Virgin, and the Virgin herselfe is called the mother of our Lord. We must also beware of the madnesse of Eutiches, least while we goe about to shew the vnitie of person, we destroy either nature. For we haue already alleaged so many testimonies, and there are euery where so many other to be alleaged, where his godhead is distinguished from his manhood: as may stop the mouthes euen of the most contentious. And a little hereafter I will adioyne some testimonies to confute better that faigned deuise, but at this present one place shall content vs. Christ would not haue called his body a Temple, vnlesse the godhead did distinctly dwell therein. Wherefore as Nestorius was worthily condemned in the Synod at Ephesus, so also was Eutiches afterward condemned in the Synode of Constantinople and Chalcedon: forasmuch as it is no more lawfull to confound the two natures in Christ, than it is to draw them in sunder.

Things spoken of Christ doe needs wise and sober expositors for the auoiding as of other errors, so of those wherein Nestorius and Eutiches are condemned.

5 But in our age also there hath risen vp no lesse pestilent a monster, Michael Seruetus, which did thrust in place of the sonne of God, a fained thing made of the essence of

The monstrous impietie of Seruettus, denying Christ to haue beene actually the Sonne of God, before he was borne of the Virgin Marie.

of God, of spirit, flesh and three elements vncreate. And first he denieth that Christ is by any other way the sonne of God, but in this that he was begotten of the holy Ghost in the wombe of the Virgin. But to this end tendeth his subtletie, that the distinction of the two natures being once ouerthrowne, Christ might be thought to be a certaine thing mingled of God and man, and yet neither God nor man. For in his whole processe he trauaileth toward this point, that before Christ was openly shewed in the flesh, there were onely certaine shadowish figures in God, whereof the truth or effect then at length was in being, when that word which was ordained to that honor, began truely to be the sonne of God. And we in deede doe confesse that the Mediator which is borne of the Virgin, is properly the sonne of God. For Christ in that he is man, could not be the mirror of the inestimable fauour of God, vnlesse this dignitie were giuen him to be, and be called the onely begotten sonne of God. But in the meane season the definition of the Church standeth stedfastly grounded, that he is counted the sonne of God, because he being the Word begotten of the Father before all worlds, did by hypostaticall vnion take vpon him the nature of man. Now the hypostaticall vnion is called with the olde Fathers, that which maketh one person of two natures, which phrase of speech was deuised to ouerthrowe the doting error of Nestorius, because he faigned that the sonne of God did so dwell in flesh, that yet he the same was not man. Seruettus slandereth vs, that we make two sonnes of God when we say that the eternall Word was alreadie the sonne of God before that it was clothed with flesh, as if we did say any thing else, but that he was manifested in the flesh. Neither doth it follow, that if he were God before that he was man, he began to be a new God. And no more absurditie it is to say, that the sonne of God appeared in the flesh, which yet had this alway from eternall begetting to be the sonne, which the Angels words to Marie doe secretly shew. That holy thing that shall be borne of thee, shall be called the sonne of God: as if he should haue said, that the name of the Sonne which was obscure in time of the law, should now become famous and euery where knowen abroad. Wherewith agreeth that saying of Paul, that now by Christ we are the children of God, freely and with boldnesse to crie Abba, Father. But were not the holy fathers in olde time also accounted among the children of God? Yea, and bearing them bold vpon that interest, they called vpon God by name of their Father. But because since the onely begotten Sonne of God was brought foorth into the world, the heauenly fatherhood is become more plainely knowen: therefore Paul assigneth this, as it were a priuiledge to the kingdome of Christ. But yet this is stedfastly to be holden, that God neuer was Father either to Angels or men, but in respect of the onely begotten sonne: and that men specially, whom their owne wickednesse maketh hatefull to God, are his children by free adoption because he is the sonne of God by nature. And there is no cause why Seruettus should cauill, that this hangeth vpon filiation or becomming a sonne, which God had determined with himselfe, because our purpose is not here to speake of the figures how the expiation was shewed in the bloud of beasts: but because they could not in deede be the children of God, vnlesse their adoption were grounded vpon the head, it is without reason to take that from the head which is common to all the members. I go yet further: Whereas the Scripture calleth the Angels the sonnes of God, whose so great dignitie did not hang vpon the redemption to come: yet must it needes be, that the sonne is in order before them, which maketh the Father to be their Father. I will repeate it againe shortly, and adde the same of mankind. Sith from at their first beginning both Angels and men were created with this condition, that God should be common Father to them both, if that saying of Paul be true, that Christ was alway the head and the first begotten of all creatures, to haue the first degree in all: I thinke I doe rightly gather that he was also the sonne of God before the creation of the world.

Rom. 8. 15.

Psal. 82. 6.

Col. 1. 15.

Christ truly & properly the Sonne of God in the flesh, but not in respect of the flesh which before he tooke

6 But if his Filiation (if I may so terme it) began since he was manifested in the flesh, it shall follow, that he was also sonne in respect of his nature of man. Seruettus and other such frantike men would haue it, that Christ which appeared in the flesh, is the sonne of God, because out of the flesh he could not be called by that name. Now let them answer me whether he be the Sonne according to both natures, and in respect of both. So in deede they prate, but Paul teacheth farre otherwise. We grant in deede, that that Christ is in the flesh of man called the Sonne, but not as the faithfull are, that is by adoption onely and grace, but the true and naturall, and therefore onely Sonne, that by this marke he may be discerned from all other. For God vouchsafeth to giue the name of his sonnes to vs, that are regenerate into a new life: but the name of the true and onely begotten Sonne, he giueth to Christ onely. How can he be the onely sonne in so great a number of brethren, but because he possesseth that by nature, which we haue receiued by gift? And the honor we extend to the whole person of the Mediator, that he be truely and properly the Sonne of God, which was also borne of the Virgin, and offered himselfe for sacrifice to his Father vpon the crosse: but yet in respect of his Godhead, as Paul teacheth, when he saith, he was seuered out to preach the Gospell of God, which he had before promised of his sonne, which was begotten of the seede of Dauid according to his flesh, and declared the sonne of God in power. But why, when he nameth him distinctly the sonne of Dauid according to the flesh, should he seuerally say, that he was declared the sonne of God, vnlesse he meant to shew that this did hang vpon some other thing, than vpon the very flesh? For in the same sense in another place he saith, that he suffered by the weakenesse of the flesh, and rose againe by the power of the spirit, euen so in this place he maketh a difference of both natures. Truly they must needs graunt, that as he hath that of his Mother for which he is called the sonne of Dauid, so he hath that of his Father for which he is called the Sonne of God: and the same is another thing and seuerall from the nature of man. The Scripture giueth him two names, calling him here and there sometimes the Sonne of God, and sometimes the sonne of Man. Of the second there can be no contention mooued: but according to the common vse of the Hebrue tongue he is called the sonne of man, because he is of the offspring of Adam. By the contrarie I affirme, that he is called the Sonne of God in respect of the Godhead and eternall essence: because it is no lesse meete that it be referred to the nature of God, that he is called the Sonne of God, than to the nature of man, that he is called the sonne of man. Againe, in the same place that I alleaged, Paul doth meane that he which was according to the flesh begotten of the seede of Dauid, was no otherwise declared the sonne of God in power, than he teacheth in another place, that Christ which according to the flesh descended of the Iewes, is God blessed for euer. Now if in both places the distinction of the double nature be touched, by what right will they say, that he which according to the flesh is the sonne of man, is not also the sonne of God, in respect of the nature of God.

7 They doe in deede disorderly enforce for the maintenance of their error, the place where it is said, that God spared not his owne Sonne, and where the Angel commanded, that the very same he that should be borne of the Virgin, should be called the Sonne of the Highest. But, least they should glorie in so fickle an obiection, let them wey with vs a little, how strongly they reason. For if it be rightly concluded, that from his conception he began to be the Sonne of God, because he that is conceiued is called the Sonne of God, then shall it follow, that he began to be the Word at his manifesting in the flesh, because Iohn saith, that he bringeth them tidings of the Word of life, which his hands haue handled. Likewise that, which is read in the Prophet: Thou Bethleem in the land of Iuda, art a little one in the thousands of Iuda: Out of thee shall be borne to me a guide to rule my people Israell, and his comming forth frō the beginning, from the daies of eternitie. How will they be compelled to expound this, if they will be content to follow such maner of reasoning? For I haue protested, that we doe not agree with Nestorius, which imagined a double Christ: whereas by our doctrine, Christ hath made vs the sonnes of God with him, by right of brotherly conioyning, because he is the onely begotten sonne of God in the flesh which he tooke of vs. And Augustine doeth wisely admonish vs, that this is a bright glasse, wherein to behold the marueilous and singular fauour of God, that he attained honor in respect that he is man which he could not deserue. Therefore Christ was adorned with this excellencie, euen according to the flesh from the wombe of his Mother, to be the Sonne of God. Yet is there not in the vnitie of person to be faigned such a mixture, as may take away that which is proper to the Godhead. For it is no more absurditie, that the eternall word of God and Christ, by reason of the two natures vnited into one person, be diuers wayes called the Sonne of God, then that he be according to diuers respects, called sometime the Sonne of God, and sometime the sonne of Man. And no more doeth that other cauillation of Seruettus accomber vs: that before that Christ appeared in the flesh, he is no where called the Sonne of God, but vnder a figure, because although the describing of him then was somewhat darke: yet where as it is already cleerely proued that he was no otherwise eternall God, but because he was the word begotten of the eternall father, and that this name doth no otherwise belong to the person of the Mediator which he hath taken vpon him, but because he is God openly shewed in the flesh: and that God the Father had not beene called Father from the beginning, if there had not beene a mutuall relation to the Sonne, by whom all kinred or fatherhood is reckoned in heauen and in earth: hereby it is easie to gather, that euen in the time of the law and the Prophets, he was the Sonne of God, before that this name was commonly knowen in the Church. But if they striue onely about the onely word, Salomon discoursing of the infinite highnesse of God, affirmeth as well his Sonne as himselfe to be incomprehensible. Tell his name if thou canst (saith he) or the name of his sonne. Yet I am not ignorant, that with the contentious this testimonie wil not be of sufficient force: neither doe I much ground vpon it, sauing that it sheweth that they doe maliciously cauill, that deny Christ to be the Sonne of God, but in this respect that he was made man. Beside that, all the oldest writers with one mouth and consent haue openly testified the same: so that their shamelesnesse is no lesse worthie to be scorned than to be abhorred which dare obiect Ireneus and Tertullian against vs, both which doe confesse that the Sonne of God was inuisible, which afterward appeared visible.

8 But although Seruettus hath heaped vp horrible monstrous deuises, which peraduenture the other would not allow: yet if ye presse them hard, ye shall perceiue that all they that doe not acknowledge Christ to be the sonne of God but in the flesh, doe grant it onely in this respect, that he was conceiued in the wombe of the Virgin by the holy Ghost, like as the Manichees in olde time did foolishly affirme, that man hath his soule (as it were) by deriuation from God, because they reade that God breathed into Adam the breath of life. For they take so fast hold of the name of Sonne, that they leaue no difference betweene the natures, but babble disorderly that Christ being man, is the Sonne of God, because according to his nature of man, he is begotten of God. So the eternall begetting of Wisedome that Salomon speaketh of, is destroyed, and there is no account made of the godhead in the Mediator, or a fantasied Ghost is thrust in place of the Manhoode. It were indeede profitable to confute the grosser deceits of Seruettus, wherewith he hath bewitched himselfe and some other, to the end that the godly readers admonished by this example, may hold themselues within the compasse of soberneſse and modestie: sauing that I thinke it should be superfluous, because I haue alreadie done it in a booke by it selfe. The summe of them commeth to this effect, that the Sonne of God was a forme in minde from the beginning, and euen then he was before appointed to be man that should be the essentiall image of God. And he doth acknowledge no other word of God but in outward shew. This he expoundeth to be the begetting of him, that there was begotten in God from the beginning a will to beget a Sonne, which also in act extended to the nature it selfe. In the meane time he confoundeth the Spirit with the Word, for that God distributed the inuisible Word and the Spirit into flesh and soule. Finally the figuration of Christ, hath with them the place of begetting, but he saith, that he which then was but a shadowish sonne in forme, was at length begotten by the word, to which he assigneth the office of seed. Whereby it shall follow that hogs and dogs are as well the children of God, because they were create of the originall seede of the word of God. For although he compound Christ of three vncreate elements to make him begotten of the essence of God, yet he faigneth that he is so the first begotten among creatures, that the same essentiall Godhead is in stones, according to their degree. And least he should seeme to strip Christ out of his godhead, he affirmeth that his flesh is consubstantiall with God, and that the Word was made man by turning the flesh into God. So while he cannot cõceiue Christ to be the Sonne of God, vnlesse his flesh came from the essence of God, and were turned into godhead, he bringeth the eternall person of the Word to nothing, and taketh from from vs the ſonne of Danid, that was promiſed to be the Redeemer. He oft repeateth this, that the Sonne was begotten of God by knowledge and predeſtination, and that at length he was made man of that matter which at the beginning ſhined with God in the three elements, which afterward appeered in the firſt light of the world, in the cloud and in the pillar of fire. Now how ſhamefully he ſometime diſagreeth with himſelfe, it were too tedious to rehearſe. By this ſhort recitall the readers that haue their ſound wit may gather, that with the circumſtances of this vncleane dog the hope of ſaluation is vtterly extinguiſhed. For if the fleſh were the godhead it ſelfe, it ſhould ceaſe to be the temple thereof. And none can be our Redeemer, but he that begotten of the ſeede of Abraham and Danid, is according to the fleſh truely made man. And he wrongfully ſtandeth vpon the words of Iohn, that the Word was made fleſh. For as they reſiſt the error of Neſtorius, ſo they nothing further this wicked inuention, whereof Eutiches was author, for as much as the onely purpoſe of the Euangeliſt was to defend the vnitie of perſons in the two natures.

THE FIFTEENTH CHAPTER.

That we may know, to what end Chriſt was ſent of his Father, and what he brought vs: three things are principally to be conſidered in him, his Propheticall office, his Kingdome, and his Prieſthood.

Chriſt a Prophet, a King, and Prieſt, ſo to be acknowledged, not with a cold mentioning of thoſe titles, but with a right vnderſtanding of the end and vſe of them. The people of God before his comming looked for more light of knowledge at his hands when he ſhould come, then they receiued by their other Prophets.

AVguſtine ſaith rightly, that although the Heretikes doe bragge of the name of Chriſt, yet they haue not all one foundation with the godly, but that it remaineth onely proper to the Church. For if theſe things be diligently conſidered, that belong to Chriſt, Chriſt ſhall be found among them onely in name, and not in very deede. So at this day the Papiſts, although the name of the Sonne of God redeemer of the world, ſound in their mouth, yet becauſe being contented with vaine pretenſe of the name, they ſpoile him of his power and dignitie: this ſaying of Paul may be well ſpoken of them, that they haue not the head. Therefore, that faith may finde ſound matter of ſaluation in Chriſt, and ſo reſt in him, this principle is to be eſtabliſhed, that the office which is committed to him by his Father, conſiſteth of three parts. For he is giuen both a Prophet, a King, and a Prieſt. Albeit, it were but ſmall profit to know thoſe names, without knowledge of the end and vſe of them. For they are alſo named among the Papiſts but coldly and to no great profit, where it is not knowne what each of theſe titles containeth in it. We haue ſaid before, how though God ſending Prophets by continuall courſe one after another, did neuer leaue his people deſtitute of profitable doctrine, and ſuch as was ſufficient to ſaluation: that yet the mindes of the godly had alway this perſwaſion, that full light of vnderſtanding was to be hoped for onely at the comming of Meſſias: yea and the opinion thereof was come, euen to the Samaritans, who yet neuer knew the true religion, as appeereth by the ſaying of the woman: When Meſſias commeth, he ſhall teach vs all things. And the Iewes had not raſhly gathered this vpon preſumptions in their mindes: But as they were taught by aſſured oracles, ſo they beleeued. Notable among the other is that ſaying of Eſay: Behold, I haue made him a witneſſe to peoples, I haue giuen him to be a guide and Schoolemaſter to peoples: euen as in another place he had called him the Angel or interpreter of the great counſell. After this maner the Apoſtle commending the perfection of the doctrine of the Goſpell, after that he had ſaid, that God in the old time ſpake to the Fathers by the Prophets diuerſly, and vnder manifold figures, addeth that laſt of all he ſpake vnto vs by his beloued Sonne. But becauſe it was the common office of the Prophets to keepe the Church in ſuſpenſe, and to vphold it vntill the comming of the Mediator, therefore we reade that in their ſcattering abroad, the faithfull complained that they were depriued of that ordinarie benefit, ſaying: We ſee not our tokens: there is not a prophet among vs: there is no more any that hath knowledge. But when Chriſt was now not farre off, there was a time appointed to Daniel to ſeale vp the viſion and the Prophet, not onely that the Prophecie which is there ſpokē of, ſhould be ſtabliſhed in aſſured credit, but alſo that the faithful ſhould learne with cōtented mind to want the Prophets for a time, becauſe the fulneſſe and cloſing vp of all reuelations was at hand.

Christ more then a common instructor, as the blessing ioyned with his doctrine, and the excellencie of that hee taught do plainly shew.

2 Now it is to be noted, that the title of commendation of Christ belongeth to these three offices. For we know that in the time of the lawe, as well the Prophets as Priests and Kings were annointed with holy oyle. For which cause the renowmed name of Messias was giuen to the promised Mediator. But though in deede I confesse (as I haue also declared in another place,) that he was called Messias, by peculiar consideration and respect of his kingdome: yet the annointings in respect of the office of Prophet and of Priest, haue their place, and are not to be neglected of vs. Of the first of these two is expresse mention made in Esay, in these words: The spirit of the Lord Iehoua vpon me. Therefore the Lord hath annointed me, that I should preach to the meeke, should bring health to the contrite in heart, should declare deliuerance to captiues, should publish the yeere of good will, &c. We see that he was annointed with the Spirit, to be the publisher and witnesse of the grace of the Father. And that not after the common maner: for he is seuered from other teachers that had the like office. And here againe is to be noted, that he tooke not the annointing for himselfe alone, that he might execute the office of teaching, but for his whole bodie, that in his continuall preaching of the Gospell, the vertue of the Spirit should ioyne withall. But in the meane time this remaineth certaine, that by this perfection of doctrine which he hath brought, an end is made of all prophecies, so that they doe diminish his authoritie, that being not content with the Gospell, doe patch any forraine thing vnto it. For that voice which thundred from heauen, saying: This is my beloued Sonne, heare him, hath aduanced him by singular priuiledge aboue the degrees of all other. Then this ointment is powred abroade from the head vnto all the members, as it was foretspoken by Ioel: Your children shall prophecie, and your daughters shall see visions, &c. But where Paul saith, that he was giuen vs vnto wisedom: and in another place, that in him are hidden all the treasures of knowledge and vnderstanding: this hath somewhat another meaning: that is, that out of him there is nothing profitable to know, and that they which by faith perceiue what he is, haue comprehended the whole infinitenesse of heauenly good things. For which cause he writeth in another place, I haue counted it precious to know nothing, but Iesus Christ, and him crucified: which is most true, because it is not lawfull to passe beyond the simplicitie of the Gospell. And hereunto tendeth the dignitie of a Prophets office in Christ, that we might know that in the summe of the doctrine which he hath taught, are contained all points of perfect wisedome.

1. Cor. 1. 30. Col. 2. 3.

1. Cor. 2. 2.

The eternall continuance of Christs kingdome prooueth the perpetuitie of his Church.

3 Now come I to his kingdome, of which were vaine to speake, if the readers were not first warned, that the nature thereof is spirituall. For thereby is gathered, both to what purpose it serueth, and what it auaileth vs, and the whole force and eternitie thereof, and also the eternitie which in Daniel the Angell doth attribute to the person of Christ: and againe the Angell in Luke doth worthily apply to the saluation of the people. But that is also double or of two sorts, for the one belongeth to the whole bodie of the Church, the other is proper to euery member. To the first is to be referred that which is said in the Psalme: I haue once sworne by my holinesse to Dauid, I will not lie. his seede shall abide for euer, his seate shall be as the Sunne in my sight, it shall be stablished as the Moone for euer, and a faithfull witnesse in heauen. Neither is it doubtfull, but that God doth there promise, that he will be by the hand of his Sonne an eternall gouerner and defender of his Church. For the true performance of this prophesie can be found no where else but in Christ: forasmuch as immediately after the death of Salomon, the greater part of the dignitie of the kingdome fell away, and was to the dishonour of the house of Dauid conueied ouer to a priuate man, and afterward by little and little was diminished, till at length it came to vtter decay, with heauie and shamefull destruction. And the same meaning hath that exclamation of Esay: Who shall shew forth his generation? For he so pronounceth that Christ shal remaine aliue after death, that he ioyneth him with his members. Therefore so oft as we heare that Christ is armed with eternall power, let vs remember that the euerlasting continuance of the Church is vpholden by this support, to remaine stil safe amõg the troublesome tossings wherewith it is continually vexed, and among the grieuous and terrible motions that threaten innumerable destructions. So whẽ Dauid scorneth the boldnes of his enemies, that goe about to breake the yoke of God and of Christ, and sayeth, that the kings and and peoples raged in vaine, becauſe he that dwelleth in heauen is ſtrong enough to breake their violent aſſaults: he aſſureth the godly of the continuall preſeruation of the Church, and encourageth them to hope well ſo oft as it happeneth to be oppreſſed. So in another place, when he ſaith, in the perſon of God: ſit at my right hand, till I make thine enemies thy footeſtoole: he warneth vs, that how many and ſtrong enemies ſoeuer doe conſpire to beſiege the Church, yet they haue not ſtrength enough to preuaile againſt that vnchangeable decree of God, whereby he hath appointed his ſonne an eternall King: whereupon it followeth, that it is impoſſible that the Deuill with all the preparation of the world, may be able at any time to deſtroy the Church, which is grounded vpon the eternall ſeate of Chriſt. Now for ſo much as concerneth the ſpecial vſe of euery one, the very ſame eternall continuance ought to raiſe vs vp to hope of immortalitie. For we ſee, that whatſoeuer is earthly and of the world, endureth but for a time, yea and is very fraile. Therefore Chriſt, to lift vp our hope vnto heauen, pronounceth, that his kingdome is not of this world. Finally, when any of vs heareth, that the kingdome of Chriſt is ſpirituall, let him be raiſed vp with this ſaying, and let him pearce to the hope of a better life: and whereas he is now defended by the hand of Chriſt, let him looke for the full fruit of this grace in the world to come.

Iohn 18. 36.

4 That, as we haue ſaid, the force and profit of the kingdome of Chriſt cannot otherwiſe be perceiued by vs, but when we know it to be ſpirituall, appeareth ſufficiently though it were but by this, that while we muſt liue in warfare vnder the croſſe, during the whole courſe of our life, our eſtate is hard and miſerable: what then ſhould it profit vs to be gathered together vnder the dominion of a heauenly King, vnleſſe we were certaine to enioy the fruit thereof out of the ſtate of this earthly life? And therefore it is to be knowen, that whatſoeuer felicitie is promiſed vs in Chriſt, it conſiſteth not in outward commodities, that we ſhould lead a merry and quiet life, flouriſh in wealth, be aſſured from all harmes, and flow full of thoſe delightfull things that the fleſh is wont to deſire: but that it wholy belongeth to the heauenly life. But as in the world the proſperous and deſired ſtate of the people is partly maintained by plenty of good things and peace at home, and partly by ſtrong forceable defences, whereby it may be ſafe againſt outward violence: ſo Chriſt alſo doth enrich his with all things neceſſarie to eternall ſaluation of ſoules, and fortifieth them with ſtrength, by which they may ſtand inuincible againſt all aſſaults of principall enemies. Whereby we gather, that he reigneth more for vs then for himſelfe, and that both within and without: that being furniſhed ſo far as God knoweth to be expedient for vs, with the gifts of the ſpirit, whereof we are naturally emptie, we may by theſe firſt fruits perceiue that we are truly ioyned to God vnto perfect bleſſedneſſe. And then, that bearing vs bolde vpon the power of the ſame ſpirit, we may not doubt that we ſhall alway haue the victorie againſt the Diuell, the world, & euery kind of hurtful thing. To this purpoſe tendeth the anſwere of Chriſt to the Phariſees, that becauſe the kingdome of God is within vs, it ſhall not come with obſeruation. For it is likely that becauſe he profeſſed that he was the ſame King, vnder whom the ſoueraigne bleſſing of God was to be hoped for, they in ſcorne required him to ſhew foorth his ſignes. But he, becauſe they (who otherwiſe are too much bent to the earth) ſhould not fooliſhly reſt vpon wordly pompes, biddeth them to enter into their owne conſciences, becauſe the kingdome of God is righteouſnes, peace and ioy in the holy Ghoſt. Hereby we are briefly taught, what the kingdome of Chriſt auaileth vs. For, becauſe it is not earthly or fleſhly, ſubiect to corruption, but ſpirituall: he lifteth vs vp euen to eternal life, that we may patiently paſſe ouer this life in miſeries, hunger, cold contempt, reproches, and other griefes, contented with this one thing, that our king will neuer leaue vs deſtitute, but ſuccour vs in our neceſſities, till hauing ended our war, we be called to triumph. For ſuch is his maner of reigning, to communicate with vs all that he hath receiued of his father. Now whereas he armeth and furniſheth vs with power, and garniſheth vs with beautie and magnificence, enricheth vs with wealth? hereby is miniſtred vnto vs moſt plentifull matter to glory vpon, and alſo bolde courage to fight without feare againſt the diuell, ſinne and death. Finally, that clothed with his righteouſneſſe, we may valiantly ouercome all the reproches of the world, and as he liberally filleth vs with his gifts, ſo we againe for our part, may bring foorth fruit to his glory.

To know the eternall kingdom of Chriſt it cannot profit vs at all except we know it to be ſpirituall, and to conſiſt of two parts, the enriching of his ſubiects with good things, and the forcible defending of them againſt the aſſaults of principall enemies: out of this our comfort ſpreds.

Luk. 17. 21.

Rom. 14. 17.

Christ ſpiritually annointed a King that is to ſay royally enriched with gifts of the ſpirit which laſt for euer, that in him Chriſtians might euer be rich, neither is any thing taken from him, when it is ſaid that he ſhall yeelde vp his kingdome to his Father.

5 Therefore his kingly annointing is ſet forth vnto vs, not done with oyle or ointments made with ſpices, but he is called the annointed of God becauſe vpon him hath reſted the ſpirit of wiſedome, vnderſtanding, counſell, ſtrength and feare of God. This is the oyle of gladneſſe, wherewith the Pſalme reporteth that he was annointed aboue his fellowes, becauſe if there were not ſuch excellencie in him, we ſhould be all needie and hungry. For, as it is alreadie ſaid, he is not priuately enriched for himſelfe, but to poure his plentie vpon vs, being hungry and dry. For as it is ſaid, that the Father gaue the ſpirit to his Sonne, not by meaſure, ſo there is expreſſed a reaſon why, that all we ſhould receiue of his fulneſſe, and grace for grace. Out of which fountaine floweth that liberall giuing, whereof Paul maketh mention, whereby grace is diuerſly diſtributed to the faithfull, according to the meaſure of the gift of Chriſt. Hereby is that which I ſaid ſufficiently confirmed, that the kingdome of Chriſt conſiſteth in the ſpirit, not in earthly delights or pomps, & therefore we muſt forſake the world that we may be partakers of it. A viſible ſigne of this holy annointing was ſhewed in the baptiſme of Chriſt, when the holy Ghoſt reſted vpon him in the likeneſſe of a Doue. That the holy Ghoſt and his gifts are meant by the word Annointing, ought to ſeeme neither noueltie nor abſurditie. For we are none other way quickned, ſpecially for ſo much as concerneth the heauenly life: there is no drop of liuely force in vs, but that which the holy Ghoſt poureth into vs, which hath choſen his ſeate in Chriſt, that frō thence the heauenly riches might largely flow out vnto vs, whereof we are ſo needy. And whereas both the faithful ſtand inuincible by the ſtrength of their King, and alſo his ſpirituall riches plenteouſly flow out vnto them, they are not vnworthily called Chriſtians. But this eternitie whereof we haue ſpoken, is nothing derogate by that ſaying of Paul: Then he ſhall yeelde vp the kingdome to God and the Father. Againe: the Sonne himſelfe ſhall be made ſubiect, that God may be all in all things: for his meaning is nothing elſe, but that in that ſame perfect glorie, the adminiſtration of the kingdome ſhall not be ſuch as it is now. For the Father hath giuen all power to the Sonne, that by the Sonnes hand he may gouerne, cheriſh and ſuſtaine vs, defend vs vnder his ſafegard, and helpe vs. So while for a little time we are wauering abroad from God, Chriſt is the meane betwene God and vs, by little & little to bring vs to perfect conioyning with God. And truly, whereas he ſitteth on the right hand of the Father, that is as much in effect, as if he were called the Fathers depurie, vnder whom is the whole power of his dominion, becauſe it is Gods will to rule and defend his Church by a meane (as I may ſo call it) in the perſon of his Sonne. As alſo Paul doth expound it in the firſt Chapter to the Epheſians, that he was ſet at the right hand of the Father, to be the head of the Church, which is his body. And to no other meaning tendeth that which he teacheth in an other place, that there is giuen him a name aboue all names, that in the name of Ieſus all knees ſhall bow, and all tongues confeſſe that it is to the glory of God the Father. For euen in the ſame words alſo he ſetteth out in the kingdome of Chriſt an order neceſſarie for our preſent weakeneſſe. So Paul gathereth rightly, that God ſhall then be by himſelfe the onely head of the Church, becauſe Chriſts office in defending of the Church, ſhall be fulfilled. For the ſame reaſon the Scripture commonly calleth him Lord, becauſe his Father did ſet him ouer vs to this ende, to exerciſe his owne Lordly power by him. For though there be many Lordſhips in the world, yet is there to vs but one God the Father, of whom are all things and we in him, and one Lord Chriſt, by whom are all things and we by him ſayeth Paul. Whereupon is rightly gathered that he is the ſelfe ſame God, which by the mouth of Eſay affirmed himſelfe to be the King and the Law-maker of the Church. For though he doe euery where call all the power that he hath, the benefite and gift of the Father, yet he meaneth nothing elſe, but that he reigneth by power of God: becauſe he hath therefore put on the perſonage of the Mediator, that deſcending from the boſome and incomprehenſible glory of the Father, he might approch nigh vnto vs. And ſo much more rightfull it is, that we be with all conſent prepared to obey, and that with great cheerefulneſſe we direct our obediences to his commandement. For as he ioyneth the offices of King and Paſtor toward them that willingly yeelde themſelues obedient: ſo on the other ſide, we heare that he beareth an yron ſcepter, to breake and bruſe all the obſtinate obstinate like potters vessels: we heare also that he shall be the iudge of nations, to coner the earth with dead corpses, and to ouerthrow the height that standeth against him. Of which thing there are some examples seene at this day: but the full proofe thereof shall be at the last iudgement, which may also properly be accounted the last act of his kingdome. Psal.2.9. Psal.110.6.

6 Concerning his Priesthood, thus it is briefly to be holden, that the end and vse of it is, that he should be a Mediator pure from all spot, that should by his holinesse reconcile vs to God. But because the iust curse possesseth the entrie, and God according to his office of Iudge is bent against vs, it is necessary that some expiation be vsed, that he being a Priest may procure fauour for vs, to appease the wrath of God. Wherefore, that Christ might fulfill this office, it behooued that he should come foorth with a sacrifice. For in the Law it was not lawful for the Priest to enter into the Sanctuary without blood, that the faithfull might know, that though there were a Priest become meane for vs to make intercession, yet God could not be made fauourable to vs before that our sinnes were purged. Vpon which point the Apostle discourseth largely in the Epistle to the Hebrues, from the seuenth Chapter almost to the end of the tenth. But the summe of all commeth to this effect, that the honour of Priesthood can be applied to none but to Christ, which by the sacrifice of his death hath wiped away our guiltinesse, and satisfied for our sinnes. But how weighty a matter it is, we are enformed by that solemne oath of God, which was spoken without repentance: Thou art a Priest for euer, according to the order of Melchisedech. For without doubt his will was to establish that principall point which he knew to be the chiefe ioynt whereupon our saluation hanged. For as it is said, there is no way open for vs or for our prayers to God, vnlesse our filthinesse being purged, the Priests doe sanctifie vs, and obtaine grace for vs, from which the vncleannesse of our wicked doings and sinnes doth debarre vs. So doe we see, that we must begin at the death of Christ, that the efficacie and profit of his Priesthood may come vnto vs. Of this it followeth, that he is an eternall intercessor, by whose mediation we obtaine fauour, whereupon againe ariseth not onely affiance to pray, but also quietnesse to godly consciences, while they safely leane vpon the fatherly tendernesse of God, and are certainely perswaded that it pleaseth him whatsoeuer is dedicated to him by the Mediator. But whereas in the time of the Law, God commanded sacrifices of beasts to be offered to him: there was another and a new order in Christ, that one should be both the sacrificed host, and the Priest: because there neither could be found any other satisfaction for sinnes, nor any was worthy so great honor to offer vp to God his onely begotten sonne. Now Christ beareth the person of a Priest, not only by eternall meane of reconciliation to make the Father fauourable and mercifull vnto vs, but also to bring vs into the fellowship of so great an honor. For we that are defiled in our selues, yet being made Priests in him doe offer vp our selues, and all ours to God, and doe freely enter into the heauenly Sanctuary, that all the sacrifice of prayer and praise that come from vs, may be acceptable & sweet smelling in the sight of God. And thus far doth that saying of Christ extend: For their sakes I sanctifie my selfe: because, hauing his holinesse powred vpō vs, in as much as he hath offered vs with himselfe to his Father, we that otherwise doe stinke before him, doe please him as pure and cleane, yea, and holy. Hereunto serueth the annointing of the Sanctuary, whereof mention is made in Daniel. For the comparison of contrarietie is to be noted betweene this annointing, and that shadowish annointing that then was in vse: as if the Angell should haue said, that the shadowes being driuen away, there should be a cleare Priesthood in the person of Christ. And so much more detestable is their inuention, which not contented with the sacrifice of Christ, haue presumed to thrust in themselues to kill him: which is daily enterprised amōg the Papists, where the Masse is reckoned a sacrificing of Christ. The office and vse of Christes Priesthood.

THE SIXTEENTH CHAPTER.

How Christ hath fulfilled the office of Redeemer, to purchase saluation for vs, Wherein is intreated of his death, and Resurrection, and his Ascending into Heauen.

ALL that we haue hitherto said of Christ, is to be directed to this marke, that being damned, dead, and lost in our selues, we may seeke for righteousnesse, deliuerance, life

The summe of all which wee seeke for in life and saluation in him: as we be taught by that notable saying of Peter, that there is none other name vnder heauen giuen to men wherein they must be saued. Neither was the name of Iesus giuen him vnaduisedly, or at chaunceable aduenture, or by the will of men, but brought from heauen by the Angell the publisher of Gods decree, and with a reason also assigned: because he was sent to saue the people from their sinnes. In which words that is to be noted, which we haue touched in another place, that the office of Redeemer was appointed him, that he should be our Sauiour: but in the meanetime our redemption should be but vnperfect, vnlesse he should by continuall proceedings conuey vs forward to the vttermost marke of saluatiō. Therefore, so soone as we swarue neuer so little from him, our saluation by little and little vanisheth away, which wholy resteth in him: so that all they wilfully spoile themselues of all grace, that rest not in him. And the admonition of Bernard is worthy to be rehearsed, that the name of Iesus is not onely light, but also meat, yea and oile also, without which all the meate of the soule is drie, and that it is also salt, without the seasoning whereof all that is set before vs is vnsauourie. Finally, that it is hony in the mouth, melodie in the eare, and ioyfulnesse in the heart, and also medicine, and that whatsoeuer is spoken in disputation is vnsauourie, but where this name soundeth. But here it behooueth to weigh diligently how saluation is purchased by him for vs: that we may not onely be perswaded that he is the author of it, but also embracing such things as are sufficient to the stedfast vpholding of our faith, we may refuse all such things as might draw vs away hither or thither. For sith no man can descend into himselfe, and earnestly consider what he is, but feeling God angry and bent against him, he hath neede carefully to seeke a meane and way to appease him, which demaundeth satisfaction: there is no common assuredne sse required, because the wrath and curse of God lyeth alway vpon sinners, till they be loose from their guiltinesse: who, as he is a righteous iudge, suffreth not his law to be broken without punishment, but is ready armed to reuenge it.

How God can be said to haue beene our enemie till Christ reconciled vs, and yet giue vs his sonne, by whom we might be reconciled, seeing this worke to reconcile vs sheweth loue before reconcilement.
Rom.5.10.
Gal.3.10.
Col.1.21.

2 But before we go any further, it is to be seene by the way, how it agreed together, that God which preuented vs with his mercy, was our enemie vntil he was reconciled to vs by Christ. For how could he haue giuen vs in his onely begotten sonne a singular pledge of his loue, vnlesse he had already before that embraced vs with his free fauour? Because therefore here ariseth some seeming of contrarietie, I will first vndoe this knot. The holy Ghost commonly speaketh after this maner in the scriptures, that God was enemie to men, till they were restored into fauour by the death of Christ: that they were accursed till their iniquitie was purged by his sacrifice: that they were seuered from God, till they were receiued into a conioyning by his bodie. Such maner of phrases are applied to our capacitie, that we may the better vnderstand how miserable and wretched our estate is being out of Christ. For if it were not spoken in expresse words, that the wrath and vengeance of God, and euerlasting death did rest vpon vs, we would lesse acknowledge how miserable we should be without Gods mercie, and would lesse regard the benefit of deliuerance. As for example, If a man heare this spoken to him: If God at such time as thou wast yet a sinner, had hated thee, and cast thee away as thou hadst deserued, thou shouldest haue suffered horrible destruction: but because he hath willingly and of his owne free kindnesse kept thee in fauour, and not suffred thee to be estranged from him, he hath so deliuered thee from that perill: truely he will be moued with, and in some part feele how much he oweth to the mercy of God. But if he heare on the other side that which the scripture teacheth, that he was by sinne estranged from God, the heire of wrath, subiect to the curse of eternall death, excluded from all hope of saluation, a straunger from all blessing of God, the bondslaue of Sathan, captiue vnder the yoke of sinne: Finally, ordained vnto and already entangled with horrible destruction, that in this case Christ became an intercessor to entreat for him, that Christ tooke vpon him and suffered the punishment which by the iust iudgement of God did hang ouer all sinners, that he hath purged with his bloud those euils that made them hatefull to God, that by his expiation is sufficient satisfaction and sacrifice made to God the Father, that by this intercessor his wrath was appeased: that within this foundation resteth the peace betweene God and men: that vpon this bond is conteined his good will toward them: shall not he be so much the more mooued with these, as it is more liuely represented out of how great miserie he hath beene deliuered? In a summe, because our mynde can neither desirously enough take hold of life in the mercy of God, nor receiue it with such thankfulnesse as we ought, but when it is before stricken and throwne downe with the feare of the wrath of God and dread of eternall death, we are so taught by holy Scripture, that without Christ we may see God in maner wrathfully ben: against vs, and his hand armed to our destruction: and that we may embrace his good will and fatherly kindnesse no otherwhere, but in Christ.

3 And although this be spoken according to the weaknesse of our capacitie, yet it is not falsely said. For God which is the highest righteousnesse, cannot loue wickednesse which he seeth in vs all. Therefore we all haue in vs that, which is worthy of the hatred of God. Therefore in respect of our corrupted nature, and then of euill life added vnto it, truely we are all in displeasure of God, guiltie in his sight, and borne to damnation of hell. But because the Lord will not loose that which is his in vs, he findeth yet somewhat that he of his goodnesse may loue. For howsoeuer we be sinners by our owne fault, yet we remaine his creatures. Howsoeuer we haue purchased death to our selues, yet he made vs vnto life. So is he mooued by meere and free louing of vs to receiue vs into fauour. But sith there is a perpetuall and vnappeasable disagreement betweene righteousnesse and iniquitie, so long as we remaine sinners, he cannot receiue vs wholy. Therefore, that taking away all matter of disagreement, he might wholy reconcile vs vnto him, he doth by expiation set foorth in the death of Christ, take away whatsoeuer euill is in vs, that we, which before were vncleane and vnpure, may now appeare righteous and holy in his sight. Therefore God the Father doth with his loue preuent and goe before our reconciliation in Christ, yea because he first loued vs, therefore he afterward doth reconcile vs vnto himselfe. But because vntill Christ with his death come to succour vs, there remaineth wickednesse in vs, which deserueth Gods indignation, and is accursed and damned in his sight, therefore we are not fully and firmely ioyned to God, vntill Christ doe ioyne vs. Therefore if we will assure our selues to haue God made well pleased and fauourable vnto vs, we must fasten our eies and mindes vpon Christ onely: as indeed we obtaine by him onely, that our sinnes be not imputed to vs, the imputing whereof, draweth with it the wrath of God.

God louing vs freely as his creatures, but hating that iniquitie which is in vs, gaue his son to take away that which hindered vs from the benefits of his loue.

1. Iohn 4.19.

4 And for this reason Paul saith, that the same loue, wherewith God imbraced vs before the creation of the world, was staied and grounded vpon Christ. These things are plaine and agreeable with the Scripture, and doe make those places of Scripture to accord very well together, where it is said: that God declared his loue towards vs in this, that he gaue his onely begotten Sonne to death: and yet that he was our enemie till he was made fauourable againe to vs by the death of Christ. But that they may be more strongly prooued to them that require the Testimonie of the olde Church I will alleadge one place of Augustine, where he teacheth the very same that we doe. The loue of God (saith he) is incomprehensible and vnchangeable. For he began not to loue vs, since the time that we were reconciled to him by the bloud of his Sonne. But before the making of the world he loued vs, euen before that we were any thing at all, that we might also be his children with his onely begotten sonne. Therefore whereas we are reconciled by the death of Christ, it is not so to be taken as though the sonne did therefore reconcile vs vnto him, that he might now begin to loue vs whom he hated before: but we are reconciled to him that already loued vs, to whom we were enemies by reason of sinne. And whether this be true or no that I say, let the Apostle beare witnesse. He doth commend (saith he) his loue toward vs, because when we were yet sinners, Christ died for vs. He therefore had a loue to vs, euen then when we were enemies to him and wrought wickednesse. Therefore after a maruellous and diuine maner he loued vs, euen then when he hated vs. For he hated vs in that we were such as he had not made vs, and because our wickednes had on euery side wasted away his worke, he knew how in euery one of vs, both to hate that which we our selues had made, and to loue that which he had made. These be the words of Augustine.

5 Now where it is demaunded, how Christ hath done away our sinnes, and taken away the strife betweene vs and God, and purchased such righteousnesse as might make him fauourable and well willing towards vs: it may be generally answered, that he course of his life yet he is said to haue reconciled vs especially by death, wherein we are to note, that he died willingly, was reputed worthy, and yet pronounced vnworthy to die.

he hath brought it to passe by the whole course of his obedience. Which is prooued by the testimonie of Paul. As by one mans offence many were made sinners, so by one mans obedience we are made righteous. And in another place he extendeth the cause of the pardon that deliuereth vs from the curse of the law, to the whole life of Christ, saying: When the fulnesse of time was come, God sent his sonne made of a woman, subiect to the law, to redeeme them that were vnder the law: And so affirmed that in his very baptisme was fulfilled one part of righteousnesse, that he obediently did the commandement of his Father. Finally, from the time that he tooke vpon him the person of a seruant, he began to pay the ransome to redeeme vs. But the scripture to set out the maner of our saluation more certainely, doth ascribe this as peculiar and properly belonging to the death of Christ. He himselfe pronounced that he gaue his life to be a redemption for many. Paul teacheth that he died for our sinnes. Iohn Baptist cried out that Christ came to take away the sinnes of the world, because he was the Lambe of God. In another place Paul saith, that we are iustified freely by the redemption that is in Christ, because he is set forth the reconciler in his owne bloud. Againe, that we are iustified in his bloud and reconciled by his death. Againe, he that knew not sinne, was made sinne for vs, that we might be the righteousnesse of God in him. I will not recite all the testimonies, because the number would be infinite, and many of them must be hereafter alleaged in their order. Therefore in the summe of beliefe, which they call the Apostles creed, it is very orderly passed immediately from the birth of Christ to his death and resurrection, wherein consisteth the summe of perfect saluation. And yet is not the rest of his obedience excluded, which he performed in his life: As Paul comprehendeth it wholy from the beginning to the end in saying, that he abased himselfe, taking vpon him the forme of a seruant, and was obedient to his father to death, euen the death of the crosse. And truely euen in the same death his willing submission hath the first degree, because the sacrifice, vnlesse it had bene willingly offered, had nothing profited toward righteousnesse. Therefore, where the Lord testified, that he gaue his soule for his sheepe, he expresly addeth this, no man taketh it away from my selfe. According to the which meating, Esay saith, that he held his peace like a Lambe before the shearer. And the historie of the Gospell rehearseth, that he went foorth and met the souldiers, and before Pilate he left defending of himselfe, and stood still to yeeld himselfe to iudgement to be pronounced vpon him. But that not without some strife: for both he had taken our infirmities vpon him, and it behooued that his obedience to his Father, should be this way tried. And this was no slender shew of his incomparable loue toward vs, to wrastle with horrible feare, and in the middest of these cruell torments to cast away all care of himselfe, that he might prouide for vs. And this is to be beleeued, that there could no sacrifice be well offered to God any otherwise, but by this that Christ forsaking all his owne affection, did submit and wholy yeeld himselfe to his fathers will. For proofe whereof, the Apostle doth fitly alleadge that testimonie of the Psalme: in the booke of the law it is written of me, that I may doe thy will, O God, I will, and thy law is in the middest of my heart. Then I said: Loe I come. But because trembling consciences finde no rest but in a sacrifice and washing whereby sinnes are clensed: therefore for good cause we are directed thither, and in the death of Christ is appointed for vs the matter of life. Now forasmuch as by our owne guiltinesse, curse was due vnto vs, before the heauenly iudgement seate of God, therefore first of all is recited how he was condemned before Ponce Pilate President of Iurie: that we should know that the punishment whereunto we were subiect, was laid vpon the iust one. We could not escape the dreadfull iudgement of God: Christ, to deliuer vs from it, suffred himselfe to be condemned before a mortall man, yea a wicked and heathen man. For the name of the President is expressed not onely to procure credit to the historie, but that we should learne that which Esay teacheth, that the chastisement of our peace was vpon him, and that by his stripes we are healed. For to take away our damnation, euery kinde of death sufficed not for him to suffer, but to satisfie our redemption, one speciall kinde of death was to be chosen, wherein both drawing away our damnation to himselfe, and taking our guiltinesse vpon himselfe, he might deliuer vs from them both. If he had beene murthered by theeues, or had bene ragingly slaine in a commotion of the the common people: in such a death there should haue beene no apparance of satisfaction. But when he was brought to be arraigned before the iudgement seate, when he was accused and pressed with witnesses against him, and was by the mouth of the iudge condemned to die: by these tokens we vnderstand, that he did beare the person of a guiltie man and of an euill doer. And here are two things to be noted, which both were aforespoken by the prophecies of the Prophets, and doe bring a singular comfort and confirmation of Faith. For when we heare that Christ was sent from the iudges seate to death, and was hanged among theeues, we haue the fulfilling of that Prophecie, which is alleged by the Euangelist. He was accounted among the wicked. And why so? euen to take vpon him the steede of a sinner, not of a man righteous or innocent, because he suffred death not for cause of innocencie, but for sinne. On the other side when we heare that he was acquited by the same mouth whereby he was condemned; for Pilate was compelled openly more than once to beare witnesse of his innocencie: let that come in our minde which is in the other Prophet: that he repayed that which he had not taken away. And so we shall behold the person of a sinner and euill doer represented in Christ: and by the open appearance of his innocencie it shall become plaine to see, that he was charged rather with other offence than his owne. He suffred therefore vnder Ponce Pilate, and so by the solemne sentence of the President, was reckoned in the number of wicked dooers: but yet not so, but that he was by the same iudge at the same time pronounced righteous, when he affirmed that he found no cause of condemnation in him. This is our acquitall, that the guiltinesse which made vs subiect to punishment, is remooued vpon the head of the Sonne of God. For this setting of one against the other, we ought principally to hold fast, least we tremble and be carefull all our life long, as though the iust vengeance of God did hang ouer vs, which the sonne of God hath taken vpon himselfe.

Psal.

Ioh n18.38.

6 Beside that, the very maner of his death is not without a singular mysterie. The Crosse was accursed, not onely, by opinion of men, but also by decree of the law of God. Therefore when Christ was lifted vp to the Crosse, he made himselfe subiect to the curse. And so it behoued to be done, that when the curse was remooued from vs to him, we might be deliuered from all curse that for our sinnes was prepared for vs, or rather did already rest vpon vs. Which thing was also by shadow expressed in the law. For the sacrifices and satisfactorie oblations that were offred for sinnes, were called Asheuoth. Which worde properly signifieth sinne it selfe. By which figuratiue change of name, the holy Ghost ment to shew, that they were like vnto clensing plaisters to draw out to themselues, and beare the curse due to sinne. But that same which was figuratiuely represented in the sacrifices of Moses, is indeed deliuered in Christ the originall patterne of all the figures. Wherefore he, to performe a perfect expiation, gaue his owne soule to be an Asham, that is a satisfactorie oblation, as the Prophet calleth it, vpon the which our filth and punishment might be cast, and so cease to be imputed to vs. The Apostle testifieth the same thing more plainely, where he teacheth, that he which knew no sinne, was by his father made sinne for vs, that we might be made the righteousnesse of God in him. For the sonne of God being most cleane from all fault, did yet put vpon him the reproch & shame of our iniquities, and on the other side couered vs with his cleannesse. It seemeth that he ment the same when he speaketh of sinne, that sinne was condemned in his flesh. For the Father destroyed the force of sinne, when the curse thereof was remooued, and laid vpon the flesh of Christ. It is therefore declared by this saying, that Christ was in his death offered vp to his father for a satisfactorie sacrifice, that the whole satisfaction for sinne being ended by his sacrifice, we might cease to dread the wrath of God. Now it is plaine, what that saying of the Prophet meaneth, that the iniquities of vs all were laid vpon him, that is, that he entending to wipe away the filthinesse of our iniquities, was himselfe as it were by way of enterchanged imputation, couered with them. Of this, the Crosse whereunto he was fastened was a token, as the Apostle testifieth. Christ (saith he) redeemed vs from the curse of the law, when he was made a curse for vs. For it is written: Accursed is euery one that hangeth on a tree: that the blessing of Abraham might in Christ come to the Gentiles. And the same had Peter respect vnto, where he teacheth that Christ did beare our sinnes vpon the tree.

tree. Because by the very token of the curse we doe more plainely learne that the burden wherewith we were oppressed was laid vpon him. And yet it is not so to be vnderstanded, that he tooke vpon him such a curse, wherewith himselfe was ouerloden, but rather that in taking it vpon him, he did treade downe, breake and destroy the whole force of it. And so faith conceiueth acquitall in the condemnation of Christ, and blessing in his being accursed. Wherefore Paul doth not without a cause honourablie report the triumph that Christ obtained to himselfe on the crosse, as if the crosse which was full of shame, had beene turned into a Chariot of triumph. For he saith, that the hand-writing which was against vs, was fastened to the crosse, and the princely powers were spoiled and led openly. And no maruell: because (as the other Apostle testifieth) Christ offered vp himselfe by the eternall spirit. And thereupon proceeded that turning of the nature of things. But that these things may take stedfast roote, and be throughly setled in our hearts, let vs alway thinke vpon his sacrifice and washing. For we could not certainly beleeue that Christ was the ransome, redemption, and satisfaction, vnlesse he had beene a sacrificed hoste. And therefore there is so often mention made of bloud, where the Scripture sheweth the maner of our redeeming. Albeit the bloud of Christ, that was shed, serued not onely for sacrifice, but also in steede of washing, to clense away our filthinesse.

Heb.9.17.

Two benefits by Christes dying, our deliuerance from death and our mortification.

7 It followeth in the Creede, that he was dead and buried. Where againe it is to be seene, how he did euery where put himselfe in our steede, to pay the price of our redemption. Death held vs bound vnder his yoke. Christ in our steede did yeelde himselfe into the power of death, to deliuer vs from it. This the Apostle meaneth where he writeth that he tasted of death for all men. For he by dying brought to passe that we should not die, or (which is all one) by his death he did redeeme life for vs. But in this he differed from vs, that he gaue himselfe to death, as it were to be deuoured, nor that he should be swallowed vp with the gulfes of it, but rather that he should swallow vp it, of which we should haue beene presently swallowed: that he gaue himselfe to death to be subdued, not that he should be oppressed with the power thereof, but rather that he should ouerthrow death which approched neere vs, yea, and had already beaten vs downe and triumphed vpon vs. Finally, that by death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the Diuell, and might deliuer them that by feare of death were all their life long subiect to bondage. This is the first fruit that his death did bring vs. An other is, that by enterpartning of himselfe with vs, he mortifieth our earthly members, that they should no more hereafter vse their owne workes: and killeth our old man, that it should no more liue and beare fruit. And to the same purpose perteineth his buriall, that we being made partakers thereof, should also be buried to sinne. For when the Apostle teacheth that we are grafted into the likenesse of the death of Christ, and buried with him to the death of sinne, that by his crosse the world was crucified to vs, and we to the world, that we are dead together with him, he doth not onely exhort vs to expresse the example of Christs death, but he declareth that there is such effectualnesse in it, as ought to appeare in all Christians, vnlesse they will make his death vnprofitable and fruitlesse. Therefore in the death and buriall of Christ, there is offered vs a double benefit to be enioyed, that is deliuerance from death, whereunto we were become bond, and the mortifying of our flesh.

Gal 2.19.& 6.14.

Col.3.3.

Christes descending into hell a necessarie article of our faith, whereby to vnderstand his lying in the graue were an idle fancie.

8 But it is not meete to ouerpasse his going downe to the hells, wherein is no small importance to the effect of redemption. For although it appeareth by the writings of the old Fathers, that that part which is read in the Creede was not in old time so much vsed in the Churches: yet in entreating of the summe of our doctrine, it is necessarie that it haue a place allowed it, as a thing that containeth a very profitable and not to be despised mysterie of a right weightie matter. And there are also some of the olde writers that doe not leaue it out. Whereby we may gesse, that it was after a certaine time added, and did not presently but by litle and litle grow in vse in the Churches. But this certainly is out of question, that it proceeded of the common iudgement of all the godly: Forasmuch as there is none of the Fathers that doth not in his writings make mention of Christes going downe to the hels, although after diuers maner of exposition. But by whom, or at what time it was first added, maketh litle to the purpose. But rather ther in the Creede this is to be taken heede vnto, that we therein certainely haue a full and in all points perfect ſumme of our faith, whereinto nothing may be thruſt, but that which is taken out of the moſt pure word of God. Now, if any wil not for preciſe curioſitie admit it into the Creede, yet ſhall it ſtraight way be made to appeare plainly, that it is of great importance to the ſum of our redemption, that if it be left out, there is loſt a great part of the fruit of the death of Chriſt. There are againe ſome that thinke, that there is no new thing ſpoken in this article, but that in other wordes the ſame thing is repeated which was ſpoken before of his buriall: for as much as the word Infernum, Hell, is in the Scripture often times vſed for the graue. I graunt that to be true, which they alleadge of the ſignification of the word, that Hell is oftentimes taken for the graue, but there are againſt their opinion two reaſons, by which I am eaſily perſwaded to diſſent from them. For what an idleneſſe were it, when a thing not hard to vnderſtand, hath once beene ſet out in plaine and eaſie wordes, afterward with darker implication of wordes, rather to point toward it than to declare it. For when two maners of ſpeaking that expreſſe one thing be ioyned together, it behooueth that the later be an expoſition of the former. But what an expoſition were this, if a man ſhould ſay thus: Whereas it is ſaid that Chriſt was buried, thereby is meant that he went downe to hell? Againe it is not likely that ſuch a ſuperfluous vaine reptition could haue crept into this abridgement, wherein the chiefe points of our faith are ſummarily noted in as few words as was poſſible. And I doubt not that ſo many as ſhall haue ſomewhat diligently weyed the matter it ſelfe will eaſily agree with me.

9 Some expound it otherwiſe, and ſay that Chriſt went downe to the ſoules of the fathers that died in the time of the law, to carry them tidings that the redemption was performed, and to deliuer them out of priſon wherein they were kept incloſed: and to the proofe hereof they doe wrongfully draw teſtimonies out of the Pſalme, that he brake the braſen gates and yron bars. Againe, out of Zacharie, that he redeemed them that were bound, out of the pit wherein was no water. But whereas the Pſalme ſpeaketh of their deliuerances that in farre countries are caſt captiue into bonds, and Zacharie compareth the Babyloniſh ouerthrow, wherein the people was oppreſſed, to a dry pit or bottomleſſe depth, and therewithal teacheth that the ſaluation of the whole Church is as it were a comming out of the deep hels: I wot not how it is come to paſſe, that they which came after, thought that there was a certaine place vnder the earth whereunto they haue faigned the name of Limbus. But this fable, although they were great authors, and at this day many doe earneſtly defend it for a truth: is yet nothing elſe but a fable. For, to incloſe the ſoules of dead men as in a priſon, is very childiſh. And what neede was it that Chriſts Soule ſhould goe downe thither to ſet them at libertie? I do in deede willingly confeſſe, that Chriſt ſhined to them by the power of his ſpirit, that they might know that the grace which they had onely taſted of by hope, was then deliuered to the world. And to this purpoſe may the place of Peter be probably applied, where he ſaith, that Chriſt came and preached to the ſpirits that were in a dungeon or priſon, as it is commonly tranſlated. For the very proceſſe of the text leadeth vs to this, that the faithfull which were dead before that time, were partakers of the ſame grace that we were: becauſe he doth thereby amplifie the force of Chriſts death, for that it pearced euen to the dead, when the godly ſoules enioyed the preſent ſight of that viſitation which they had carefully looked for: on the other ſide it did more plainly appeare to the reprobate that they were excluded from all ſaluation. But whereas Peter in his ſaying maketh no diſtinction between them, that is not ſo to be taken, as though he mingled together the godly and vngodly without difference: but onely he meant to teach that generally they both had one common feeling of the death of Chriſt.

To take hell for a lake where the ſoules of the fathers were: which died before Chriſt, is a fabulous vanitie

10 But concerning Chriſts going downe to the hels, beſide the conſideration of the Creede, we muſt ſeeke for a more certaine expoſition, and we aſſuredly haue ſuch a one out of the word of God, as is not onely holy and godly, but alſo full of ſingular comfort. Chriſts death had beene to no effect, if he had ſuffered onely a corporall death: but it behooued alſo that he ſhould feele the rigour of Gods vengeance: that might both appeaſe his wrath and ſatisfie his iuſt iudgement. For which cauſe alſo it behooued that he ſhould as it were hand to hand wraſtle with the armies of the hels & the

By his deſcending into hell, his feeling the the rigor of Gods vengeance and his wraſtling in ſoule with infernall horror muſt be vnderſtood.

Esai.53.5. horror of eternall death. We haue euen now alleaged out of the Prophet that the chastisement of our peace was laid vpon him: that he was striken of his father for our sinnes, and bruised for our infirmities. Whereby is meant, that he was put in the steed of wicked doers as suretie and pledge, yea, and as the very guiltie person himselfe, to abide and suffer all the punishments that should haue beene laid vpon them: this one thing excepted, that he could not be holden still of the sorrowes of death. Therefore it Act.2.24. is no maruell if it be said that he went downe to the hels, sith he suffred that death wherewith God in his wrath striketh wicked doers. And their exception is very fond, yea and to be scorned, which say, that by this exposition the order is peruerted, because it were an absurditie to set that after his buriall which went before it. For after the setting foorth of those things that Christ suffered in the sight of men, in very good order followeth that inuisible and incomprehensible iudgement which he suffered in the sight of God: that we should know that not only the body of Christ was giuen to be the price of our redemption, but that there was another greater & more excellent price paid in this, that in his soule he suffered the terrible torments of a damned and forsaken man.

Christ sorowed, feared, cryed, feeling the very torments which they doe whose enemie God is, although God were not his enemie. If he had not done thus, where were our comfort? Act.2.24. Heb.5.7.

11 According to this meaning doth Peter say, that Christ rose againe hauing loosed the sorowes of death, of which it was impossible that he should be holden, or ouercome. He doth not name it simply death: but he expresseth that the sonne of God was wrapped in the sorrowes of death, which proceeded from the curse and wrath of God, which is the originall of death. For how small a matter had it bin, carelesly and as it were, in sport to come forth to suffer death? But this was a true proofe of his infinite mercie, not to shun that death which he so sore trembled at. And it is no doubt that the same is the Apostles meaning to teach, in the Epistle to the Hebrues, where he writeth: that Christ was heard of his owne Feare: some translate it Reuerence or pietie, but how vnfitly, both the matter it selfe, and the very maner of speaking proueth. Christ therefore praying with teares and mightie crie, is heard of his own Feare: not to be free from death, but not to be swallowed vp of death as a sinner: because in that place he had put our person vpon him. And truly there can be imagined no more dreadfull bottomlesse depth than for a man to feele himselfe forsaken and estranged from God, and not to be heard when he calleth vpon him, euen as if God himselfe had conspired to his destruction. Euen thither we see that Christ was throwen downe, so farre, that by enforcement of distresse he was compelled to cry out: My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me? For whereas some would haue it taken, that he so spake rather according to the opinion of other, than as he felt in himselfe: that is in no case probable, forasmuch as it is euident, that this saying proceeded out of the very anguish of the bottome of his heart. Yet doe we not meane thereby, that God was at any time his enemie, or angrie with him. For how could he be angry with his beloued Sonne, vpon whom his minde rested? Or how could Christ by his intercession appease his Fathers wrath toward other, hauing him hatefully bent against himselfe? But this is our meaning: that he suffred the grieuousnesse of Gods rigor, for that he being striken and tormented with the hand of God, did feele all the tokens of God when he is angrie and punisheth. Whereupon Hillarie argueth thus, that by this going downe we haue obteined this, that death is slaine. And in other places he agreeth with our iudgement, as where he saith: The crosse, death, and hels are our life. Againe, in another place: The sonne of God is in the hels, but man is caried vp to heauen. But why doe I alleadge the testimonie of a priuate man, when the Apostle affirmeth the same, rehearsing this for a fruite of his victorie, that they were deliuered which were by feare of death all their life long subiect to bondage? It behooued therefore, that he should ouercome that feare, that naturally doth continually torment and oppresse all mortall men: which could not be done but by fighting with it. Moreouer, that his feare was no common feare, or conceiued vpon a slender cause, shall by and by more plainely appeare. So by fighting hand to hand with the power of the diuell, with the horror of death, with the paines of the hels, it came to passe, that he both had the victorie of them, and triumphed ouer them, that we now in death should no more feare those things, which our Prince hath swallowed vp.

Their reasons friuolous who cannot brooke

12 Heere some lewd men, although vnlearned, yet rather moued by malice than by ignorance, crie out that I doe a hainous wrong to Christ, because it was against conueni-

conueniencie of reaſon, that he ſhould be fearefull for the ſaluation of his ſoule. And then they more hardly enforce this cauillation, with ſaying, that I aſcribe to the ſonne of God deſperation, which is contrarie to faith. Firſt, they doe but malitiouſly moue controuerſie of Chriſts feare and trembling, which the Euangeliſts doe ſo plainely report. For a little before that the time of his death approched, he was troubled in ſpirit, and paſſionate with heauineſſe, and at his very meeting with it, he began more vehemently to tremble for feare. If they ſay that he did but counterfait, that is too foule a ſhift. We muſt therefore as Ambroſe truely teacheth, boldly confeſſe the ſorowfulneſſe of Chriſt, vnleſſe we be aſhamed of his croſſe. And truely, if his ſoule had not beene partaker of paine, he had beene onely a redeemer for bodies. But it behooued that he ſhould wraſtle, to raiſe vp them that lay throwen downe. And his heauenly glorie is ſo nothing impaired thereby, that euen herein glorioufly ſhineth his goodneſſe which is neuer ſufficiently praiſed, that he refuſed not to take our weakeneſſe vpon him. From whence is alſo that comfort of our anguiſhes and ſorrowes, which the Apoſtle ſetteth before vs: that this Mediator did feele our infirmities, that he might be the more earneſtly bent to ſuccour vs in miſerie. They ſay: that that thing which is euill of it ſelfe, is vnworthily aſcribed vnto Chriſt. As though they were wiſer than the ſpirit of God, which ioineth theſe two things together, that Chriſt was in all things tempted as we are, and yet that he was without ſinne. Therefore there is no cauſe that the weakeneſſe of Chriſt ſhould make vs afraid, whereunto he was not by violence or neceſſitie compelled, but by meere loue of vs, and by mercie was led to ſubmit himſelfe. And whatſoeuer he of his owne will ſuffered for vs, diminiſheth nothing of his power. But in this one point are theſe backbiters deceiued, that they doe not perceiue in Chriſt an infirmitie cleane and free from all fault and ſpot, becauſe he kept himſelfe within the bounds of obedience. For whereas there can be found no moderation in our corrupt nature, where all our affections doe with troubleſome violence exceede all meaſure, they doe wrong to meaſure the forme of God by that ſtandard. But when man was in his vncorrupted ſtate, then there was a moderation hauing force in all his affections, to reſtraine exceſſe. Whereby it might well be that he was like vnto vs in ſorrow, dread, and feareſulneſſe, and yet that by this marke he differed from vs. Being ſo confuted, they leape to another cauillation, that though Chriſt feared death, yet he feared not the curſe and wrath of God, from which he knew himſelfe to be ſafe. But let the godly readers wey how honorable this is for Chriſt, that he was more tender and more fearefull than the moſt part of the very raſcall ſort of men. Theeues and other euill doers doe obſtinately haſte to death, many doe with hautie courage deſpiſe it: ſome other doe mildly ſuffer it. But what conſtancie or ſtout courage were it for the ſonne of God to be aſtoniſhed and in a maner ſtriken dead with feare of it? For euen that which among the common ſort might be accounted miraculous, is reported of him, that for vehemencie of griefe, very drops of bloud did fall from his face. Neither did he this to make a ſhew to the eies of other, but when in a ſecret corner whither he was gone out of companie, he groned vnto his Father. And this putteth it out of all doubt, that it was needfull that he ſhould haue Angels to come downe from heauen to relieue him with an vnwonted maner of comforting. How ſhamefull a tenderneſſe, as I ſaid, ſhould this haue been, to be ſo far tormented for feare of common death, as to melt in bloudie ſweate, and not to be able to be comforted, but by ſight of Angels? What? doth not that praier thrice repeated, (Father if it be poſſible, let this cup depart from me) proceeding from an incredible bitterneſſe of heart, ſhew that Chriſt had a more cruell and harder battell than with common death? Whereby appeareth that thoſe triflers againſt whom I now diſpute, doe boldly babble vpon things that they know not, becauſe they neuer earneſtly conſidered what it is, or of how great importance it is that we be redeemed from the iudgement of God. But this is our wiſedome, well to vnderſtand how deere our ſaluation did coſt the Sonne of God. Now if a man ſhould aske me, if Chriſt went then downe to hell, when he praied to eſcape that death: I anſwere, that then was the beginning of it: whereby may be gathered, how grieuous and terrible torments he ſuffered, when he knew himſelfe to ſtand to be arraigned for our cauſe before the iudgement ſeate of God. But although for a moment of time, the diuine power of the ſpirit did hide it ſelfe to giue place this interpretation of Chriſts deſcending into hell, as if it were a diſgrace vnto him to be made ſubiect vnto ſuch paſſions.

Heb. 4. 15.

Mat. 26. 39.

to the weakeneſſe of the fleſh: yet muſt we know, that the tentation by feeling of ſorrow and feare was ſuch as was not againſt faith. And ſo was that fulfilled which is in the ſermon of Peter, that he could not be holden of the ſorrowes of death, becauſe when he felt himſelfe as it were forſaken of God, yet he did nothing at all ſwarue from the truſt of his goodneſſe. Which is prooued by that his notable calling vpon God, when for extremitie of paine he cried out, My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me? For though he was aboue meaſure grieued, yet he ceaſeth not to call him his God, of whom he crieth out that he was forſaken. Moreouer hereby is confuted as well the error of Apollinaris, as theirs that were called Monothelites. Apolinaris faigned that Chriſt had an eternall ſpirit in ſtead of a ſoule, ſo that he was onely but halfe a man. As though he could cleanſe our ſinnes any other way, but by obeying his father. But where is that affection or will of obedience but in the ſoule? which ſoule of his we know was troubled for this purpoſe, to driue away feare, and bring peace and quietnes to our ſoule. Againe, for confuſion of the Monothelites, we ſee how now he willed not that thing according to his nature of manhood, which he willed according to his nature of Godhead. I omit to ſpeake how he did ſubdue the aforeſaid feare with a contrarie affection. For herein is a plaine ſhew of contrarietie. Father deliuer me from this houre. But euen herefore I came euen into this houre. Father glorifie thy name. In which perplexitie yet was there no ſuch outrage in him as is ſeene in vs, euen then when we moſt of all endeuour to ſubdue our ſelues.

Act. 2. 24.

Mat. 27. 47.

Iohn 12. 27.

The fruite of Chriſtes reſurrection.

13 Now followeth his reſurrection from the dead, without which all that we haue hitherto were but vnperfect. For ſith there appeareth in the croſſe, death, and buriall of Chriſt nothing but weakeneſſe: faith muſt paſſe beyond all thoſe things, that it may be furniſhed with full ſtrength. Therefore although we haue in his death a full accompliſhment of ſaluation, becauſe by it both we are reconciled to God, and his iuſt iudgement is ſatisfied, and the curſe taken away, and the penaltie fully paid: yet we are ſaid to be regenerate into a liuing hope, not by his death, but by his riſing againe. For as he in riſing againe roſe vp the vanquiſher of death, ſo the victorie of our faith conſiſteth in the very reſurrection: but how this is, is better expreſſed in the words of Paul. For he ſayeth, that Chriſt dyed for our ſinnes, and was raiſed vp againe for our iuſtification: as if he ſhould haue ſaid, that by his death ſinne was taken away, and by his riſing againe, righteouſneſſe was renewed and reſtored. For how could he by dying deliuer vs from death, if he himſelfe had lyen ſtill ouercome by death? How could he haue gotten victorie for vs, if himſelfe had been vanquiſhed in fight: wherefore we doe ſo part the matter of our ſaluation betweene the death and reſurrection of Chriſt, that by his death we ſay ſinne was taken away and death deſtroyed, and by his reſurrection righteouſneſſe was repaired, and life raiſed vp againe: but ſo that by meane of his reſurrection, his death doeth ſhew foorth her force and effect in vs. Therefore Paul affirmeth, that in his very reſurrection he was declared the Sonne of God, becauſe then at laſt he vttered his heauenly power, which is both a cleare glaſſe of his godhead, and a ſtedfaſt ſtay of our faith. As alſo in another place he teacheth, that Chriſt ſuffered after the weakeneſſe of the fleſh, and roſe againe by the power of the ſpirit. And in the ſame meaning in an other, where he intreateth of perfection, he ſaith: that I may know him and the power of his reſurrection. Yet by and by after he adioyneth the fellowſhip with death. Wherewith moſt aptly agreeth that ſaying of Peter: that God raiſed him vp from the dead and gaue him glorie, that our faith and hope might be in God: not that our faith being vpholden by his death ſhould wauer, but that the power of God which keepeth vs vnder faith, doth principally ſhewe it ſelfe in the reſurrection. Therefore let vs remember, that ſo oft as mention is made of his death onely, there is alſo comprehended that which properly belongeth to his reſurrection: and like figure of comprehenſion is there in the word Reſurrection, as oft as it is vſed ſeuerally without ſpeaking of his death, ſo that it draweth with it that which peculiarly pertaineth to his death. But foraſmuch as by riſing againe he obtaineth the crowne of conqueſt, ſo there ſhould be both reſurrection and life: therefore Paul doth for good cauſe affirme that faith is deſtroyed, and the Goſpell is become vaine & deceitfull, if the reſurrection of Chriſt be not faſtened in our hearts. Therefore in an other place, after he

he had gloried in the death of Christ against all the terrors of damnation, to amplifie the same, he saith further: Yea, the same, He which died, is risen vp againe, and now standeth a Mediator for vs in the presence of God. Furthermore, as we haue before declared, that vpon the partaking of his crosse hangeth the mortification of our flesh: so is it to be vnderstanded, that by his resurrection we obtaine another commoditie which answereth that mortification. For (saieth the Apostle) we are therefore grafted into the likenesse of his death, that being partakers of his resurrection, we may walke in newnesse of life. Therefore in another place: as he gathereth an argument of this that we are dead together with Christ, to proue that we ought to mortifie our members vpon earth: likewise also, because we are risen vp with Christ, he gathereth thereupon that we ought to seeke for those things that are aboue, and not those that are vpon the earth. By which words we are not onely exhorted to be raised vp after the example of Christ, to follow a newnesse of life: But we are taught that it is wrought by his power, that we are regenerate into righteousnesse. We obtaine also a third fruit of his resurrection, that we are, as by an earnest deliuered vs, assured of our owne resurrection, of which we know that his resurrection is a most certaine argument. Whereof he disputeth more at large in the fifteene Chapter of his Epistle to the Corinthians. But by the way this is to be noted, that it is said, that he rose againe from the dead: in which saying is expressed the truth both of his death and of his resurrection: as if it had beene said, that he did both die the same death that other men naturally doe die, and receiued immortalitie in the same flesh which he had put on mortall.

Rom. 8. 34.

Rom. 6. 4.

Col. 3. 5.

Col. 3. 1.

14 To his resurrection is not vnfitly adioyned his ascending into heauen. For although Christ began more fully to set foorth his glorie and power by rising againe, for that he had now laid away that base and vnnoble estate of mortall life, and the shame of the crosse: yet by his ascending vp into heauen onely, he truely began his kingdome. Which the Apostle sheweth where he teacheth, that Christ ascended to fulfill all things. Where in seeming of repugnancie he sheweth that there is a goodly agreement: because he so departed from vs, that yet his presence might be more profitable to vs, which had bin penned in a base lodging of the flesh, while he was conuersant in earth. And therfore Iohn, after that he had rehearsed that notable calling, If any thirst, let him come to me, &c. By and by saith, that the holy Ghost was not yet giuen to the faithfull, because Iesus was not yet glorified. Which the Lord himselfe also did testifie to the Disciples, saying: It is expedient for you that I goe away. For if I doe not go away, the holy Ghost shall not come. But he giueth them a comfort for his corporall absence, that he will not leaue them as parentlesse, but will come againe to them after a certaine maner, in deed inuisible, but yet more to be desired, because they were then taught by more assured experience, that the authoritie which he enioineth, and the power which he vseth, is sufficient for the faithfull, not only to make thē liue blessedly, but also to die happily. And truly we see how much greater abundance of his spirit he then poured out, how much more royally he then aduanced his kingdome, how much greater power he then shewed, both in helping his, and in ouerthrowing his enemies. Being therefore taken vp into heauen, he tooke away the presence of his bodie out of our sight: not to cease to be present with the faithful that yet wādred in the earth, but with more present power to gouerne both heauen & earth. But rather the same that he had promised, that he would be with vs to the end of the world, he performed by this his ascending, by which as his body was lifted vp aboue all heauens, so his power and effectuall working was powred & spread abroad beyond all the bounds of heauen & earth. But this I had rather declare in Augustines words than mine own. Christ (saith he) was to goe by death to the right hand of the Father, from whence he is to come to iudge the quicke and the dead: and that likewise in bodily presence according to the sound doctrine and rule of faith. For in spirituall presence with them, he was to come after his ascension. And in another place more largely and plainely: According to an vnspeakeable and inuisible grace is that fulfilled which he had spoken: behold I am with you all the daies, euen to the end of the world. But according to the flesh which the word tooke vpō him, according to that that he was borne of the virgin, according to that that he was taken of the Iewes, that he was fastned on the tree, that he was taken down frō the crosse, that he was wrapped in linnen clothes, that he was laid in the graue, that he was openly ſhewed in his riſing againe: this was fulfilled, Ye ſhall not alway haue me with you. Why ſo? becauſe he was conuerſant according to the preſence of his bodie fortie daies with his diſciples, and they being in his company, ſeeing him, not following him, he aſcended into heauen and is not heere, for he ſitteth there, at the right hand of his Father: and is heere, for he is not gone away in preſence of maieſtie. Therefore according to the preſence of his maieſtie, we alway haue Chriſt: according to the preſence of his fleſh, it was truely ſaid to his diſciples: but me ye ſhall not alway haue. For the Church had him a few daies according to the preſence of his fleſh, but now ſhe holdeth him by faith, but ſeeth him not with eies.

Act. 1. 3. & 9.

Mar. 16 19. Heb. 1. 3.

His ſitting at the right hand of his Father.

15 Wherefore, it by and by followeth, that he is ſitten downe at the right hand of his Father: which is ſpoken by way of ſimilitude, taken of Princes that haue their ſitters by, to whom they commit their office to rule and gouerne in their ſteede. So it is ſaid, that Chriſt, in whom the Father will be exalted and reigne by his hand: was receiued to ſit at his right hand: as if it had been ſaid, that he was inueſted in the dominion of heauen and earth, ſolemnly entred vpon the poſſeſſion of the gouerment committed vnto him, and that he not onely entred vpon it, but alſo continueth in it till he come downe to iudgement. For ſo doth the Apoſtle expound it, when he ſaith thus: The Father hath ſet him at his right hand, aboue all principalitie and power, and ſtrength and dominion, and euery name that is named not onely in this world, but in the world to come, &c. He hath put all things vnder his feete, and hath giuen him to be head of the Church aboue all things. Now you ſee to what purpoſe belongeth that ſitting, that is, that all creatures both heauenly and earthly may with admiration looke vpon his maieſtie, be gouerned with his hand, behold his countenance, and be ſubiect to his power. And the Apoſtles meane nothing elſe when they ſo oft rehearſe it, but to teach, that all things are left to his will. Therefore they thinke not rightly, which thinke that bleſſednes is onely meant by it. And it forceth not, that in the Actes Stephen teſtifieth that he ſaw him ſtanding, becauſe we ſpeake not heere of the geſture of his bodie, but of the maieſtie of his dominion: ſo that to ſit is nothing elſe, but to be chiefe iudge in the heauenly iudgement ſeate.

Act. 7. 56.

Three collections of faith out of Chriſts aſcending and ſitting in heauen.

16 Hereupon doth faith gather manifold fruit. For it learneth, that the Lord by his aſcending into heauen, hath opened the entrie of the heauenly kingdome, which before had beene ſtopped vp by Adam. For when he entred into it in our fleſh as in our name, thereupon followeth that which the Apoſtle ſaith, that we do alreadie in him after a certaine maner ſit in heauen. For that we doe not with bare hope looke for heauen, but alreadie in our head we poſſeſſe it. Moreouer faith perceiueth that he ſitteth with his father to our great benefit. For he is entred into a ſanctuarie not made with hands, and there appeareth before the face of the father a continuall aduocate and interceſſour for vs: he ſo turneth the fathers eies to his righteouſneſſe, that he turneth them away from our ſinnes: He ſo reconcileth his minde vnto vs, that by his interceſſion he prepareth vs a way and paſſage to his throne, filling it with grace and mercifulneſſe, which otherwiſe would haue bin full of horror to wretched ſinners. Thirdly, faith conceiueth his power, wherein conſiſteth our ſtrength, might, wealth, and glorying againſt the hels. For aſcending into heauen he led captiuitie captiue, and ſpoiling his enemies he enriched his people, and daily filleth them with heapes of ſpirituall riches. He ſitteth therefore on high, that from thence pouring out his power vnto vs, he may quicken vs to a ſpirituall life, ſanctifie with his ſpirit, and garniſh his Church with the diuers gifts of his grace, preſerue it ſafe againſt all hurts by his protection, reſtraine with the ſtrength of his hand the raging enemies of his croſſe and of our ſaluation: finally, hold all power both in heauen and in earth, till he haue ouerthrowen all his enemies, which are alſo our enemies, and made perfect the building vp of his Church. And this is the true ſtate of his kingdome: this is the power that his Father hath giuen him, till he make an end of the laſt act, when he commeth to iudge the quicke and the dead.

His comming to iudge quick and dead at the laſt day.

17 Chriſt doth in deede heere ſhew to them that be his, plaine prooues of his power preſent among them: but becauſe vnder the baſeneſſe of fleſh his kingdome doth in a maner lie hidden in earth, therefore for good cauſe is faith called to thinke

vpon that visible presence, which he wil openly shew at the last day. For he shal in visible forme come down from heauen, euen such as he was seene to go vp: and he shal appeare to all men with vnspeakable maiestie of his kingdome, with bright glistering of immortalitie, with infinite power of Godhead, with a guard of Angels. From thence therefore we are bidden to looke for him to come our Redeemer at that day, when he shall seuer the lambes from the goats, the chosen from the forsaken: and there shall be none of all either the quicke or the dead, that shall escape his iudgement. For from the furthest corners of the world shall be heard the sound of the trumpet, wherewith all shall be called to his iudgement seate, both they that shall be found aliue at that day, and they whom death hath before taken out of the companie of the quicke. Some there be that in this place expound the wordes of the quicke and the dead otherwise: and we see that some of the olde writers did sticke in doubt vpon the construction of this article. But as the aforesaid meaning is plaine and easie to perceiue: so doth it better agree with the Creede which is euident that it was written according to the capacitie of the common people. And herewith nothing disagreeth that which the Apostle affirmeth, that it is appointed to all men once to die. For although they which shall remaine in mortall life at the last iudgement shall not die after a naturall maner and order: yet that chaunge which they shall suffer, because it shal be like a death, is not vnproperly called death. It is indeed certaine, that not all shall sleepe, but all shall be changed. What meaneth that? In one moment their mortall life shall perish and be swallowed vp and be vtterly transformed into a new nature. This perishing of the flesh no man can denie to be a death: and yet in the meane time it remaineth true, that the quicke and the dead shall be summoned to the iudgement: because the dead that are in Christ shal first rise, & then they that shall remaine and be liuing, shall with them be sodenly taken vp into the aire to meete the Lord. And truely it is likely that this article was taken out of the sermon of Peter, which Luke reciteth, and out of the solemne protestation of Paul to Timothie.

Act 1.11. Mat.24.30. Mat.24.31. 1.Thes.4.16. Heb 9.27. 1.Cor.15.51. 1.Thes.4.16. Act 10.42. 2.Tim.4.1.

18 Herevpon ariseth a singular comfort, when we heare that he is iudge, which hath alreadie appointed vs partners with him in iudging: so far is it off, that he will goe vp into the iudgement seate to condemne vs. For how should the most mercifull prince destroy his owne people? how should the head scatter abroad his owne members? how should the patron condemne his owne clients? For if the Apostle dare cry out, that while Christ is intercessour for vs, there can none come foorth that can condemne vs: it is much true, that Christ himselfe being our intercessour, will not condemne them whom he hath receiued into his charge and tuition. It is truely no small assuredness, that we shall be brought before no other iudgement seate, but of our owne Redeemer, from whom our saluation is to be looked for: moreouer that he which now by the Gospell promiseth eternall blessedness, shall then by sitting in iudgement performe his promise. Therefore to this end the Father hath honoured the Sonne, in giuing him all iudgement, that so he hath prouided for the consciences of them that be his, trembling for feare of the iudgement. Hitherto I haue followed the order of the Apostles Creede, because whereas it shortly in few words conteineth the chiefe articles of our redemption, it may serue vs for a Table, wherein we doe distinctly and seuerally see those things that are in Christ worthy to be taken heede vnto. I call it the Apostles Creede, not carefully regarding who were the author of it. It is truely by great consent of the olde writers ascribed to the Apostles, either because they thought that it was by common trauel written and set out by the Apostles, or for that they iudged that this abridgement being faithfully gathered out of the doctrine, deliuered by the hands of the Apostles, was worthy to be confirmed with such a title. And I take it for no doubt, that whencesoeuer it proceeded at the first, it hath euen from the first beginning of the Church, and from the very time of the Apostles, beene vsed as a publike confession, and receiued by consent of all men. And it is likely that it was not priuately written by any one man, forasmuch as it is euident that euen from the farthest age it hath alway continued of sacred authoritie and credit among all the godly. But that thing which is onely to be cared for, we haue wholy out of controuersie, that the whole historie of our faith is shortly and well in distinct order rehearsed in it, and that there is nothing conteined in it that is not sealed with sound testimonies of Scripture. Which being vnderstanded, it is to no purpose pose either curiously to doubt, or to striue with any man who were the author of it: vnlesse perhap it be not enough for some man to be assured of the trueth of the holy Ghost, but if he doe also vnderstand either by whose mouth it was spoken, or by whose hand it was written.

19 But forasmuch as we doe see, that the whole summe of our saluation, and all the parts thereof, are comprehended in Christ, we must beware, that we doe not draw away from him any part thereof be it neuer so litle. If we seeke for saluation, we are taught by the very name of Iesus, that it is in him, if we seeke for any other gifts of the Spirit, they are to be found in his annointing, if we seeke for strength, it is in his dominion: if we seeke for cleanesse, it is in his conception: if we seeke for tender kindnesse, it sheweth it selfe in his birth, whereby he was made in all things like vnto vs, that he might learne to sorrow with vs: if we seeke for redemption, it is in his passion: if we seeke for absolution, it is in his condemnation: if we seeke for release of the curse, it is in his crosse: if we seeke for satisfaction, it is in his sacrifice: if we seeke for clensing, it is in his bloud: if we seeke for reconciliation, it is in his going downe to the hels: if we seeke for mortification of the flesh, it is in his buriall: if we seeke for newnesse of life, it is in his resurrection: if we seeke for immortalitie, it is in the same: if we seeke for the inheritance of the kingdome of heauen, it is in his entrance into heauen: if we seeke for defence, for assurednes, for plentie and store of all good things, it is in his kingdome: if we seek for a dreadlesse looking for the iudgement, it is in the power giuen to him to iudge. Finally, sith the treasures of all sorts of good things are in him, let vs draw thence and from no where else, euen till we be full withal. For they which being not content with him alone, are carried hither and thither into diuerse hopes, although they haue principall regard to him, yet euen in this they are out of the right way, that they turne any part of their knowledge to any other where. Albeit such distrust cannot creepe in, where the abundance of his good gifts hath once beene well knowen.

THE SEVENTENTH CHAPTER.

That it is truely and properly said, that Christ hath deserued Gods fauour and saluation for vs.

Christs meritting our saluation is not opposite to Gods free bestowing it, but both are repugnant vnto our deseruing.
Act 3.10.
Lib 1.de præ. sanctorum.

THis question is also to be assoiled for an addition. For there are some subtle men after a wrong maner, which although they confesse that we obtaine saluation by Christ, yet cannot abide to heare the name of deseruing, by which they thinke the grace of God to be obscured: and so they will haue Christ to be onely the instrument, or minister, not the Author, guide, or Prince of life, as Peter calleth him. Indeed I confesse, that if a man will set Christ simply and by himselfe against the iudgment of God, then there shall be no roome for deseruing: because there cannot be found in man any worthinesse that may deserue the fauour of God. But, as Augustine most truely writeth, the most cleare light of predestination and grace is our Sauiour himselfe, the man Christ Iesus, which hath obtained so to be, by the nature of man, which is in him, without any deseruings of works or of faith going before. I beseech you let me be answered, whereby that same Man deserued to be taken vp by the Word that is coeternall with the father into one person, and so to be the onely begotten Sonne of God. Let therefore appeare in our head the very fountaine of grace, from whom according to the measure of euery one, it floweth abroad into all his members. By that grace euery one from the beginning of his faith is made a Christian, by which that same man from his beginning was made Christ. Againe in another place: there is no plainer example of predestination than the Mediator himselfe. For he that made of the seede of Dauid a man righteous that neuer should be vnrighteous, without any deseruing of his will going before, euen the same he doth of vnrighteous make them righteous that are the members of that head: and so foorth as there followeth. Therefore when we speake of Christes deseruing, we doe not say that in him is the beginning of deseruing, but we climbe vp to the ordinance of God, which is the first cause thereof: because God of his owne meere good will appointed him Mediator, to purchase saluation for vs. And so is the deseruing of Christ vnfitly set against the mercy of God. For it is a common rule, that things orderly derly one vnder another doe not disagree. And therefore it may well stand together, that mans iustification is free by the meere mercy of God, and that there also the deseruing of Christ come betweene which is contained vnder the mercy of God. But against our works are aptly set, as directly contrarie, both the free fauour of God, and the obedience of Christ, either of them in their degree. For Christ could not deserue any thing but by the good pleasure of God, and but because he was appointed to this purpose, with his sacrifice to appease the wrath of God, and with his obedience to put away our offences. Finally in a summe: because the deseruing of Christ hangeth vpon the onely grace of God, which appointed vs this meane of saluation, therefore as well the same deseruing, as that grace, is fitly set against all the works of men.

2 This distinction is gathered out of many places of the Scripture. God so loued the world, that he gaue his onely begotten Sonne, that whosoeuer beleeueth in him shal not perish. We see how the loue of God holdeth the first place, as the soueraigne cause or originall, and then followeth faith in Christ, as the second or neerer cause. If any man take exception and say, that Christ is but the formall cause, he doth more diminish his power than the words may beare. For if we obtaine righteousnesse by faith that resteth vpon him, then is the matter of our saluation to be sought in him, which is in many places plainely prooued. Not that we first loued him, but he first loued vs, and sent his Sonne to be the appeasing for our sinnes. In these words is cleerely shewed, that God to the end that nothing should withstand his loue toward vs, appointed vs a meane to be reconciled in Christ. And this word Appeasing, is of great weight: because God after a certaine vnspekable maner, euen the same time that he loued vs, was also angry with vs, vntill he was reconciled in Christ. And to this purpose serue all those sayings: He is the satisfaction for our sinnes. Againe: It pleased God by him to reconcile all things to himselfe, appeasing himselfe through the bloud of the Crosse by him, &c. Againe, God was in Christ, reconciling the world to himselfe, not imputing to men their sinnes. Againe, he accepted vs in his beloued Sonne. Againe, That he might reconcile them both to God into one man by the Crosse. The reason of this mysterie is to be fetched out of the first Chapter to the Ephesians, where Paul, after that he had taught that we were chosen in Christ, addeth therwithall, that we haue obtained fauour in him. How did God begin to embrace with his fauour them whom he loued before the making of the world, but because he vttered his loue when he was reconciled by the bloud of Christ? For sith God is the fountaine of all righteousnesse, it must needs be, that man so long as he is a sinner, haue God his enemy and his Iudge. Wherefore the beginning of his loue is righteousnesse, such as is described by Paul: He made him that had done no sinne, to be sinne for vs, that we might be the righteousnesse of God in him. For he meaneth, that we haue obtained free righteousnesse by that sacrifice of Christ, that we should please God, which by nature are the children of wrath and by sinne estranged from him. But this distinction is also ment so oft as the grace of Christ is ioyned to the loue of God. Whereupon followeth, that he giueth vs of his owne that which he hath purchased: for otherwise it would not agree with him, that this praise is giuen him seuerally from his Father, that it is his grace and proceedeth from him.

The grace of God hath appointed the worthines of his son for a meane to make vs sonnes, who in our selues are by nature enemies.

3 But it is truely and perfectly gathered by many places of the Scripture, that Christ by his obedience hath purchased vs fauour with his Father. For this I take as a thing confessed, that if Christ hath satisfied for our sinnes, if he hath suffred the punishment due vnto vs, if by his obedience he hath appeased God, finally, if he being righteous, hath suffred for the vnrighteous, then is saluation purchased for vs by his righteousnesse: which is as much in effect as to deserue it. But, as Paul witnesseth, we are reconciled and haue receiued reconciliation by his death. But, reconciliation hath no place, but where there went offence before. Therefore the meaning is: that God, to whom we were hatefull by reason of sinne, is by the death of his sonne appeased, so that he might be fauourable vnto vs. And the comparison of contraries that followeth a little after, is diligently to be noted. As by the transgression of one man, many were made sinners: so also by the obedience of one, many are made righteous. For the meaning is thus: As by the sinne of Adam we were estranged from God and ordained to destruction, so by the obedience of Christ we are receiued into fauour as righteous.

Christ by his obedience, righteousnes and death hath purchased and merited our saluation.

And

And the future time of the Verbe doth not exclude preſent righteouſneſſe, as appeareth by the proceſſe of the text: For he had ſaid before, that the free gift was of many ſins vnto iuſtification.

What is ment by ſaying that Chriſtes deſeruing purchaſed grace.

4 But when we ſay, that grace is purchaſed vs by the deſeruing of Chriſt, we meane this, that we are clenſed by his bloud, and that his death was a ſatisfaction for our ſinnes. His bloud clenſeth vs from ſinne. This bloud is it that is ſhed for remiſſion of ſinne. If this be the effect of his bloudſhed, that ſinnes be not imputed vnto vs: it followeth, that with that price the iudgement of God is ſatisfied. To which purpoſe ſerueth that ſaying of Iohn the Baptiſt: Behold the Lambe of God that taketh away the ſinne of the world. For he ſetteth in compariſon Chriſt againſt all the ſacrifices of the Law, to teach that in him onely was fulfilled that which thoſe figures ſhewed. And we know, what Moſes each where ſaith: Iniquitie ſhall be clenſed, ſinne ſhall be put away & forgiuen. Finally we are very well taught in the old figures, what is the force & effect of the death of Chriſt: And this point the Apoſtle ſetteth out in the Epiſtle to the Hebrewes, very fitly taking this principle, that remiſſion is not wrought without ſhedding of bloud. Whereupon he gathereth, that Chriſt for the aboliſhing of ſinne, appeared once for all by his ſacrifice. Againe: that he was offered vp to take away the ſinnes of many. And he had ſaid before, that not by the bloud of goates or of calues, but by his owne bloud he once entred into the holy place, finding eternall redemption. Now when he thus reaſoneth: If the bloud of a calfe doe ſanctifie according to the cleanneſſe of the fleſh, that much more conſciences are cleanſed by the bloud of Chriſt from dead workes: it eaſily appeareth that the grace of Chriſt is too much diminiſhed, vnleſſe we graunt vnto his ſacrifice the power of cleanſing, appeaſing and ſatisfying. As a litle after he addeth: This is the Mediator of the new Teſtament, that they which are called, may receiue the promiſe of eternall inheritance by meane of death for the redemption of ſinnes going before, which remained vnder the law. But ſpecially it is conuenient to wey the relation which Paul deſcribeth, that he became a curſe for vs. &c. For it were ſuperfluous, yea and an abſurditie, that Chriſt ſhould be charged with curſe, but for this intent that he paying that which other did owe, ſhould purchaſe righteouſnes for them. Alſo the teſtimonie of Eſay is plaine, that the chaſtiſement of our peace was laid vpon Chriſt, and that we obtained health by his ſtripes. For if Chriſt had not ſatisfied for our ſinnes, it could not haue beene ſaid, that he appeaſed God by taking vpon him the paine wherunto we were ſubiect. Wherewith agreeth that which followeth in the ſame place: For the ſinne of my people I haue ſtricken him. Let vs alſo recite the expoſition of Peter, which ſhall leaue nothing doubtfull: that he did beare our ſinne vpon the tree. For he ſaith, that the burthen of damnation from which we were deliuered, was laid vpon Chriſt.

1.Pet.2.24.

That which Chriſt hath paid for, we may look for as if we our ſelues had paid.

5 And the Apoſtles doe plainely pronounce, that he paid the price of ranſome to redeeme vs from the guiltineſſe of death. Being iuſtified by his grace, through the redemption which is in Chriſt, whom God hath ſet to be the propitiatory by faith which is in his bloud. Paul commendeth the grace of God in this point, becauſe he hath giuen the price of redemption in the death of Chriſt: and then he biddeth vs to flee vnto his bloud, that hauing obteined righteouſneſſe, we may ſtand boldly before the iudgement of God. And to the ſame effect is that ſaying of Peter: that we art redeemed not by golde and ſiluer, but by the precious bloud of the vnſpotted Lambe. For the compariſon alſo would not agree, vnleſſe with that price ſatisfaction had beene made for ſins: for which reaſon Paul ſaith that we are preciouſly bought. Alſo that other ſaying of his would not ſtand together. There is one Mediator that gaue himſelfe to be a redemption, vnleſſe the paine had beene caſt vpon him which we had deſerued: Therefore the ſame Apoſtle defineth, that the redemption in the bloud of Chriſt is the forgiueneſſe of ſinnes: as if he ſhould haue ſaid, that we are iuſtified or acquited before God, becauſe that bloud anſwereth for ſatisfaction for vs. Wherewith alſo agreeth the other place, that the hand-writing which was againſt vs, was cancelled vpon the Croſſe. For therein is ment the paiment or recompence that acquiteth vs from guiltineſſe. There is alſo great weight in theſe wordes of Paul: If we be iuſtified by the workes of the law, then Chriſt died for nothing. For hereby we gather, that we muſt fetch from Chriſt

Christ that which the law would giue, if any man can fulfill it: or (which is all one) that we obtaine by the grace of Christ that, which God promised to our works in the law when he said: He that doth these things, shall liue in them. Which he no lesse plainely confirmeth in his sermon made at Antioch, affirming that by beleuing in Christ we are iustified from all those things, from which we could not be iustified in the law of Moses. For if the keeping of the law be righteousnesse, who can deny that Christ deserued fauor for vs, when taking that burdē vpon him, he so reconciled vs to God, as if we our selues had kept the law? To the same purpose serueth that which he afterward writeth to the Galathians: God sent his sonne subiect to the law, that he might redeeme those that were vnder the law. For to what end serued that submission of his, but that he purchased to vs righteousnesse, taking vpon him to make good that which we were not able to pay? Hereof commeth that imputation of righteousnesse without works, whereof Paul speaketh, because the righteousnesse is reckoned to vs which was found in Christ onely. And truely for no other cause is the flesh of Christ called our meate, but because we finde in him the substance of life. And that power proceedeth from nothing else, but because the Sonne of God was crucified, to be the price of our righteousnesse. As Paul saith, that he gaue himselfe a sacrifice of sweet sauour. And in another place: He died for our sinnes, he rose againe for our iustification. Hereupon is gathered, that not onely saluation is giuen vs by Christ, but also that for his sake his Father is now fauourable vnto vs. For there is no doubt but that is perfectly fulfilled in him, which God vnder a figure pronounceth by Esay saying: I will doe it for mine owne sake, and for Dauid my seruants sake. Whereof the Apostle is a right good witnesse, where he saith: Your sinnes are forgiuen you for his names sake. For though the name of Christ be not expressed, yet Iohn after his accustomed maner signifieth him by this pronoune He. In which sense also the Lord pronounceth. As I liue because of my Father, so shall ye also liue because of me. Wherewith agreeth that which Paul saith, It is giuen you because of Christ, not onely to beleeue in him, but also to suffer for him.

6 But to demaund, whether Christ deserued for himselfe, (as Lombard, and the other Schoolemen doe) is no lesse foolish curiositie, than it is a rash determination when they affirme it. For what needed the Sonne of God to come downe to purchase any new thing for himselfe? And the Lord declaring his owne counsell, doth put it wholy out of doubt. For it is not said, that the Father prouided for the commoditie of his Sonne in his deseruings, but that he deliuered him to death, and spared him not because he loued the world. And the Prophets maners of speaking are to be noted, as, A Child is borne to vs. Againe: Reioyce thou daughter of Sion: behold thy King commeth to thee. Also that confirmation of loue should be very cold, which Paul setteth out, that Christ suffred death for his enemies. For thereupon we gather, that he had no respect of himselfe: and that same he plainely affirmeth in saying, I sanctifie my selfe for them. For he that giueth away the fruit of his holines vnto other, doth thereby testifie that he purchaseth nothing for himselfe. And truely this is most worthily to be noted, that Christ, to giue himselfe wholy to saue vs, did after a certaine maner forget himselfe. But to this purpose they doe wrongfully draw this testimonie of Paul: Therefore the Father hath exalted him, & giuen him a name, &c. For by what deseruings could man obtaine to be Iudge of the world, and the head of the Angels, and to enioy the soueraigne dominion of God, and that in him should rest that same maiestie, the thousand part whereof all the powers of men and Angels can not reach vnto? But the solution thereof is easie and plaine, that Paul doth not there intreat of the cause of exalting of Christ, but only to shew the effect ensuing therof, that it might be for an example to vs. And no other thing is meant by that which is spoken in another place, that it behooued that Christ should suffer, and so enter into the glory of his Father.

Whether Christ did merit for himselfe, is both curiositie to demand and rashnesse to answere. Sentent. li. 3. dist. 18. Rom. 8. Esa. 9. 6. Rom. 5. 10. Ioh. 17.

THE

THE THIRD BOOKE OF THE INSTITVTION OF Christian Religion, which intreateth of the maner how to receiue the grace of Christ, and what profits do grow vnto vs, and what effects ensue thereof.

THE FIRST CHAPTER.

That those things which are spoken of Christ, doe profit vs by secret working of the holy Ghost.

No benefit commeth by Christ to vs, till the bond of the spirit haue vnited vs vnto him.

NOw it is to be seene how those good things do come vnto vs, which the Father hath giuen to his onely begotten Sonne, not for his owne priuate vse, but to enrich them that were without them and needed them. And first this is to be learned, that so long as Christ is out of vs, and we be seuered from him, whatsoeuer he suffered or did for the saluation of mankinde, is vnprofitable, and nothing auaileth for vs. Therefore that he may enterparten with vs those things that he hath receiued of his Father, it behooueth that he become ours, and dwell in vs. And for that cause he is called our head, and the first begotten among many brethren: and on the other side it is said, that we are grafted into him, and did put on him. For (as I haue before said) all that euer he possesseth belongeth nothing to vs, vntill we grow together into one with him. But although it be true that we obtaine this by faith: yet forasmuch as we see that not all without difference doe embrace this enterpartening of Christ, which is offered by the Gospell, therefore very reason teacheth vs to climbe vp higher, and to enquire of the secret effectuall working of the Spirit, by which is brought to passe, that we enioy Christ and all his good things. I haue before intreated of the eternall godhead and essence of the spirit, at this present let vs be content with this one speciall article, that Christ so came in water and bloud, that the spirit should testifie of him, least the saluation that he hath purchased, should slip away from vs. For as there are alleaged three witnesses in heauen, the Father, the Word, and the Spirit, so are there also three in the earth, Water, Blood, and the Spirit. And not without cause is the testimonie of the Spirit twise repeated, which we feele to be engrauen in our hearts in steed of a seale: whereby commeth to passe, that it sealeth the washing and sacrifice of Christ. After which meaning Peter also saieth, that the faithfull are chosen in sanctification of the Spirit vnto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Christ. By which words he telleth vs, that to the intent the shedding of that holy blood should not become void, our soules are cleansed with it by the secret watering of the holy holy Spirit. According whereunto Paul alſo ſpeaking of cleanſing and iuſtification, ſaith, that we are made partakers of them both in the name of Ieſus Chriſt and the Spirit of our God. Finally, this is the ſumme, that the holy ſpirit is the bond wherewith Chriſt effectually bindeth vs vnto him. For proofe whereof alſo doe ſerue all that we haue taught in the laſt booke before this, concerning his annointing.

2 But that this, being a matter eſpecially worthie to be knowen, may be made more certainly euident, we muſt hold this in mind, that Chriſt came furniſhed with the holy Spirit after a certaine peculiar maner, to the end that he might ſeuer vs from the world, and gather vs together into the hope of an eternall inheritance. For this cauſe he is called the Spirit of ſanctification, becauſe he doth not onely quicken and nouriſh vs with that generall power which appeareth as well in mankind as in all other liuing creatures, but alſo is in vs the roote and ſeed of heauenly life. Therfore the Prophets doe principally commend the kingdome of Chriſt by this title of prerogatiue, that then ſhould flouriſh more plentifull aboundance of the ſpirit. And notable aboue all the reſt is that place of Ioel: In that day I will powre of my Spirit vpō all fleſh. For though the Prophet there ſeeme to reſtraine the gifts of the Spirit to the office of a prophecying, yet vnder a figure he meaneth, that God by the inlightening of his ſpirit will make thoſe his ſchollers which before were vnskilfull & void of all heauenly doctrine. Now foraſmuch as God the Father doth for his Sonnes ſake giue vs his holy Spirit, and yet hath left with him the whole fulneſſe thereof, to the end that he ſhould be a miniſter and diſtributer of his liberalitie: he is ſometime called the Spirit of the Father, and ſometime the Spirit of the Sonne. Yeare not (ſaith Paul) in the fleſh, but in the Spirit, for the Spirit of God dwelleth in you. But if any haue not the Spirit of Chriſt, he is not his. And hereupon he putteth vs in hope of full renuing, for that he which raiſed vp Chriſt from the dead, ſhall quicken our mortall bodies, becauſe of his Spirit dwelling in vs. For it is no abſurditie, that to the Father he aſcribed the praiſe of his owne gifts, wherof he is the authour: and yet that the ſame be aſcribed to Chriſt, with whom the gifts of the ſpirit are left, that he may giue them to thoſe that be his. Therefore he calleth all them that thirſt, to come to him to drinke. And Paul teacheth that the Spirit is diſtributed to euery one, according to the meaſure of the gift of Chriſt. And it is to be knowen, that he is called the Spirit of Chriſt, not onely in reſpect that the eternall Word of God is with the ſame Spirit ioyned with the Father, but alſo according to his perſon of Mediator, becauſe if he had not had that power, he had come to vs in vaine. After which meaning he is called the ſecond Adam giuen from heauen to be a quickning Spirit: wherby Paul compareth the ſingular life that the Sonne of God breatheth into them that be his that they may be all one with him, with the naturall life that is alſo common to the reprobate. Likewiſe where he wiſheth to the faithfull the fauour of Chriſt and the loue of God, he ioyned withall the common partaking of the Spirit, without which no man can taſte neither of the fatherly fauour of God, nor of the bountifulneſſe of Chriſt. As alſo he ſaith in another place: The loue of God is powred out into our harts by the holy Spirit that is giuen vs.

The ſpirit being Chriſtes after a peculiar maner both to haue and to beſtowe, is by proprietie his in fulneſſe, and in meaſure ours by gift.

Rom.5.5.

3 And heere it ſhall be profitable to note, with what titles the Scripture ſetteth out the holy Spirit, where it intreateth of beginning and whole reſtoring of our ſaluation. Firſt, he is called the Spirit of adoption, becauſe he is a witneſſe vnto vs of the free good will of God, wherewith God the Father hath embraced vs in his beloued onely begotten Sonne, that he might be a Father vnto vs, and doth encourage vs to pray boldly, yea and doth miniſter vs words to cry without feare, Abba, Father: by the ſame reaſon he is called the earneſt pledge, and ſeale of our inheritance, becauſe he ſo giueth life from heauen to vs wandring in the world, and being like to dead men, that we may be aſſured that our ſoule is in ſafegard vnder the faithfull keeping of God, for which cauſe he is alſo called life, by reaſon of righteouſneſſe. And foraſmuch as by his ſecret watering he maketh vs fruitefull to bring forth the buds of righteouſneſſe, he is oftentimes called water as in Eſay: All ye that thirſt come to the waters. Againe: I will poure out my Spirit vpon the thirſtie, and floods vpon the dry land: wherewith agreeth that ſaying of Chriſt, which I did euen now alleage: If any thirſt let him come to me. Albeit ſometime he is ſo called, by reaſon of his power to purge & clenſe, as in Ezechiel, where the Lord promiſeth cleane waters wherewith he will waſh his people from filthineſſe. And foraſ-much as he restoreth and nourisheth into liuely quicknes, them vpon whom he hath powred the liquor of his grace, he is therfore called by the name of oyle & anointment.

1.Iohn 2.20. Luk.3.16. Iohn 4.14. Act.1.21. Againe, because in cõtinually seething out & burning vp the vices of our lust, he setteth our harts on fire with the loue of God & zeale of godlines, he is also for this effect worthily called fire. Finally, he is described vnto vs as a fountaine, frõ whence do flow vnto vs all heauẽly riches, or the hand of God, wherewith he vseth his power: because by the breath of his power he so breatheth diuine life into vs, that we are not now stirred by our selues, but ruled by his stirring & mooving: so that if there be any good things in vs, they be the fruits of his grace: but our own gifts without him, be darknes of minde, and peruersenes of hart. This point is set out plainly enough, that till our minds be bent vpõ the holy Ghost, Christ lieth in a maner idle, because we coldly espie him without vs, yea and farre away frõ vs. But we know that he profiteth none other but them whose Ephe.4.15. Rom 8.29. Gal.3.27. Ephe.5.30. head he is, & the first begotten among brethren, & thẽ which haue put on Him. This conioyning onely maketh that, as concerning vs, he is come not vnprofitably with the name of Sauiour. And for proofe hereof serueth that holie mariage, whereby we are made flesh of his flesh and bones of his bones, yea & all one with him. But by the Spirit onely he maketh himselfe one with vs: by the grace and power of the same spirit we are made his members, so that he conteineth vs vnder him, and we againe possesse him.

It is the spirit which worketh faith in our hearts. Iohn 1.13. 4 But forasmuch as faith is his principall worke, to it are for the most part referred all those things that we commonly finde spoken to expresse his force and working: because he bringeth vs into the gospell by nothing but by faith: as Iohn Baptist teacheth, that this prerogatiue is giuen to them that beleeue in Christ, that they be the children of God which are borne not of flesh and bloud, but of God: where setting God against flesh and bloud, he affirmeth it to be a supernaturall gift that they receiue Christ by faith, who otherwise should remaine subiect to their owne infidelitie. Like whereunto
Mat.16.17. is that answere of Christ: Flesh and bloud hath not reuealed it to thee, but my Father which is in heauen. These things I do now but shortly touch, because I haue alreadie intreated of them at large. And like also is that saying of Paul, that the Ephesians were sealed vp with the holy spirit of promise. For Paul sheweth that he is an inward teacher, Ephe.1.13. by whose working the promise of saluation pearceth into our minds, which otherwise should but beate the aire or our eares. Likewise, when he saith, that the Thessalonians
2.Thes.2.13. were chosen of God in the sanctification of the Spirit and beleeuing of the truth: by which ioining of them together, he briefely admonisheth that faith it selfe proceedeth
1.Iohn 13.24. & 4. Iohn 14.17. from nothing else but from the holie Spirit: which thing Iohn setteth out more plainely, saying: We know that there abideth in vs of the spirit which he hath giuen vs. Againe, by this we know that we dwell in him, and he in vs, because he hath giuen vs of his spirit. Therefore Christ promised to his Disciples the spirit of truth which the world cannot receiue, that they might be able to receiue the heauenly wisedome. And he assigneth to the same spirit this proper office, to put them in minde of those things that he had taught them by mouth. Because in vaine should the light shew it selfe to the blinde, vnlesse the same spirit of vnderstanding should open the eies of their minde: so as a man may rightly call the holy spirit the key by which the treasures of the heauenly kingdome are opened vnto vs: and may call his enlightening the eyesight of our minde to
2.Cor.3.6. see. Therefore doth S. Paul so much commend the ministerie of the spirit: because teachers should crie without profiting, vnlesse Christ himselfe the inward master should Luk.3.16. draw them with his spirit that are giuen him by his Father. Therefore as we haue said, that perfect saluation is found in the person of Christ: so that we may be made partakers thereof, he doth baptize vs in the holy spirit and fire, lightning vs into the faith of his Gospell, and so new begetting vs, that we may be new creatures: and purging vs from vnholie filthinesse, doth dedicate vs to be holy temples to God.

THE SECOND CHAPTER.

Of faith, wherein both is set the definition of it, and the properties that it hath, are declared.

The obiect of faith is not barely God, as the schoole-

BVt all these things shal be easie to vnderstand, when there is shewed a plaine definition of faith, that the Readers may know the force and nature thereof. But first it is conuenient to call to minde againe these things that haue been alreadie spoken, that sith God

God doth appoint vs by his law what we ought to doe, if we fall in any point thereof, the ſame terrible iudgement of eternall death that he pronounceth doth reſt vpon vs. Againe, that foraſmuch as it is not onely hard but altogether aboue our ſtrength and beyond all our power to fulfill the law if we only behold our ſelues, and weigh what eſtate is worthie for our deſeruings, there is no good hope left, but we lie caſt away from God vnder eternall deſtruction. Thirdly, this hath been declared, that there is but one meane of deliuerance to draw vs out of ſo wretched calamitie: wherein appeareth Chriſt the Redeemer, by whoſe hand it pleaſed the heauenly Father, hauing mercy vpon vs of his infinite goodneſſe and clemencie, to ſuccour vs, ſo that we with ſound faith embrace this mercie, and with conſtant hope reſt vpon it. But now it is conuenient for vs to weigh this, what maner of faith this ought to be, by which all they that are adopted by God to be his children, doe enter vpon the poſſeſſion of the heauenly kingdome, foraſmuch as it is certaine that not euery opinion nor yet euery perſwaſion is ſufficient to bring to paſſe ſo great a thing. And with ſo much the more care and ſtudy muſt we looke about for, and ſearch out the naturall propertie of faith, by how much the more hurtfull at this day is the errour of many in this behalfe. For a great part of the world, hearing the name of faith, conceiueth no higher thing, but a certaine common aſſent to the hiſtorie of the Goſpell. Yea, when they diſpute of Faith in the Schooles, in barely calling God the obiect of faith, they doe nothing but (as we haue ſaid in another place) by vaine ſpeculation rather draw wretched ſoules out of the right way, than direct them to the true marke. For whereas God dwelleth in a light that none can attaine to, it behoooueth of neceſſitie that Chriſt become meane betweene vs and it. For which cauſe he calleth himſelfe the light of the world: and in another place, The way, the truth, and the life, becauſe no man commeth to the Father (which is the fountaine of life) but by him: becauſe he onely knoweth the Father, and by him the faithfull to whom it pleaſeth him to diſcloſe him. According to this reaſon Paul affirmeth, that he accounteth nothing excellent to be knowen, but Chriſt: and in the xx. Chapter of the Acts he ſaith, that he preached faith in Chriſt, &c. And in another place he bringeth in Chriſt ſpeaking after this maner, I will ſend thee among the Gentiles that they may receiue forgiueneſſe of ſinnes, and portion among holy ones, by the faith which is in me. And Paul teſtifieth, that the glory of God is in his perſon viſible vnto vs: or (which is all one in effect) that the enlightening of the knowledge of Gods glory ſhineth in his face. It is true indeede that faith hath reſpect onely to the one God, but this alſo is to be added, that it acknowledge him whō he hath ſent, euen Ieſus Chriſt. Becauſe God himſelfe ſhould haue lien ſecret & hidden far from vs, vnleſſe the brightneſſe of Chriſt did caſt his beames vpon vs. For this entent the Father left all that he had with his onely begotten ſonne, euen by the communicating of good things with him to expreſſe the true image of his glory. For as it is ſaid, that we muſt be drawen to the ſpirit that we may be ſtirred to ſeeke Chriſt, ſo againe we ought to be admoniſhed, that the inuiſible Father is nowhere elſe to be ſought but in this image. Of which matter Auguſtine ſpeaketh excellently well, which entreating of the marke that faith ſhould ſhoote at, ſaith that we muſt know whether we muſt goe and which way: and then by and by after he gathereth that the ſafeſt way againſt all errors is that he is both God and man. For it is God to whom we goe, and man by whom we goe: and both theſe are found no where but in Chriſt. Neither doth Paul when he ſpeaketh of faith in God, meane to ouerthrow that which he ſo oft repeateth of faith that hath her whole ſtay vpon Chriſt. And Peter doth moſt fitly ioyne them both together, ſaying that by him we beleeue in God.

2 Therefore this euill, euen as innumerable other, is to be imputed to the Schoolemen, which haue hidden Chriſt as it were with a veile drawen before him, to the beholding of whom vnleſſe we be directly bent, we ſhall alway wander in many vncertaine mazes. But beſide this that with their darke definition they doe deface and in a maner bring to naught the whole force of faith, they haue forged a deuiſe of vnexpreſſed Faith, with which name they garniſhing their moſt groſſe ignorance doe with great hurt deceiue the ſilly people, yea (to ſay truely and plainly as the thing is in deede) this deuiſe doth not onely bury but vtterly deſtroy the true Faith. Is this to beleeue, to vnderſtand nothing, ſo that thou obediently ſubmit the ſenſe to the Church?

Faith is no infolded or vnexpreſſed knowledge.

Faith ſtandeth not in ignorance but in knowledge, and that not onely of God, but of the will of God. For neither doe we obtaine ſaluation by this that we either are readie to embrace for true whatſoeuer the Church appointeth, or that we doe commit to it all the office of ſearching and knowing: but when we acknowledge God merciful be a to father to vs by the reconciliation made by Chriſt, and that Chriſt is giuen vs vnto righteouſneſſe, ſanctification, and life. By this knowledge, I ſay, not by ſubmitting of our ſenſe, we attaine an entry into the kingdome of heauen. For when the Apoſtle ſaith, that with the hart we beleeue to righteouſneſſe, and with the mouth confeſſion is made to ſaluation, hee ſheweth that it is not enough, if a man vnexpreſſedly beleeue that which hee vnderſtandeth not, nor ſeeketh to learne: but he requireth an expreſſed acknowledging of Gods goodneſſe, in which conſiſteth our righteouſneſſe.

Rom. 10. 10.

3 In deede I denie not (ſuch is the ignorance wherewith we are compaſſed) that there now be and hereafter ſhall be many things wrapped and hidden from vs, till hauing put off the burden of our fleſh we come neerer to the preſence of God: in which very things that be hidden from vs, nothing is more profitable than to ſuſpend our iudgement, but to ſtay our minde in determined purpoſe to keepe vnitie with the Church. But vnder this colour to intitle ignorance tempered with humilitie by the name of faith, is a great abſurditie. For faith lieth in the knowledge of God and of Chriſt, not in reuerence of the Church. And we ſee what a maze they haue framed with this their hidden implication, that any thing whatſoeuer it be without any choiſe, ſo that it be thruſt in vnder title of the Church, is greedily receiued of the ignorant as it were an oracle, yea ſometime alſo moſt monſtrous errors. Which vnaduiſed lightneſſe of beliefe, whereas it is a moſt certaine downefall to ruine, is yet excuſed by them, for that it beleeueth nothing determinately, but with this condition adioyned, If the faith of the Church be ſuch. So doe they faigne, that trueth is holden in error, light in blindneſſe, true knowledge in ignorance. But becauſe we will not tary long in confuting them, we doe onely warne the Readers to compare their doctrine with ours. For the very plainneſſe of the trueth it ſelfe will of it ſelfe miniſter a confutation ready enough. For this is not the queſtion among them, whether faith be yet wrapped with many remnants of ignorance, but they definitiuely ſay that they beleeue aright, which ſtand amazed in their ignorance, yea and doe flatter themſelues therein, ſo that they do agree to the authoritie and iudgement of the Church, concerning things vnknowen. As though the Scripture did not euery where teach, that with faith is ioyned knowledge.

Simple men abuſed when they are made beleeue it is faith indeterminately to hold what the Church holdeth, without further ſeking what we haue by Chriſt at the hands of God and how.
Iohn 17. 3.

4 But we doe grant, that ſo long as we wander from home in this world, our faith is not fully expreſſed, not onely becauſe many things are yet hidden from vs, but becauſe being compaſſed with many miſts of errors, we attaine not all things. For the higheſt wiſedome of the moſt perfect is this, to profit more and proceed on further forward with gentle willingneſſe to learne. Therefore Paul exhorteth the faithfull, if vpon any thing they differ one from another, to abide for reuelation. And truely experience teacheth, that till we be vnclothed of our fleſh, we attaine to know leſſe than were to be wiſhed, and daily in reading we light vpon many darke places which doe conuince vs of ignorance. And with this bridle God holdeth vs in modeſtie, aſſigning to euery one a meaſure of faith, that euen the very beſt teacher may be ready to learne. And notable examples of this vnexpreſſed faith, we may marke in the Diſciples of Chriſt, before that they had obtained to be fully enlightned. We ſee, how they hardly taſted the very firſt introductions, how they did ſticke euen in the ſmalleſt points, how they hanging at the mouth of their maſter did not yet much proceede, yea when at the womens information they ran to the graue, the reſurrection of their maſter was like a dreame vnto them. Sith Chriſt did before beare witneſſe of their faith, we may not ſay that they were vtterly without faith: but rather if they had not beene perſwaded that Chriſt ſhould riſe againe, all care of him would haue periſhed in them. For it was not ſuperſtition that did draw the women to embalme with ſpices the corpes of a dead man of whom there was no hope of life: but although they beleeued his words whom they knew to be a ſpeaker of trueth, yet the groſneſſe of that ſtill poſſeſſed their mindes ſo wrapped their faith in darkneſſe, that they were in a maner amaſed at it. Whereupon it is ſaid, that they then at the laſt beleued when they had by triall of the thing

Our Faith as long as we liue is vnexpreſſed, if vnexpreſſed faith be taken for faith mingled with ignorance, of that which ſhould expreſly be knowen and beleeued.
Phil. 3. 15.

thing it selfe prooued the truth of the words of Christ, not that they then began to beleeue, but because the seede of hidden faith which was as it were dead in their heartes, then receiuing liuelinesse, did spring vp. There was therefore a true Faith in them, but an vnexpressed faith, because they reuerently embraced Christ for their onely teacher, and then being taught of him, they determined that he was the Author of their saluation: Finally, they beleeued that he came from heauen, by the grace of his Father to gather his Disciples to heauen. And we neede not to seeke any more familiar proofe hereof than this, that in all things alway vnbeleefe is mingled with Faith.

5 We may also call it an vnexpressed Faith, which yet indeed is nothing but a preparation of Faith. The Euangelists doe rehearse that many beleeued, which onely being rauished to admiration with miracles, proceeded no further but that Christ was the Messias which had beene promised, albeit they tasted not so much as any slender learning of the Gospell. Such obedience which brought them in subiection willingly to submit themselues to Christ, bearing the name of Faith where it was in deede but the beginning of Faith. So the courtier that beleeued Christs promise, concerning the healing of his sonne when he came home, as the Euangelist testifieth beleeued againe: because he receiued as an oracle that which he heard of the mouth of Christ, and then submitted himself to his authoritie to receiue his doctrine. Albeit it is to be knowen, that he was so tractable and ready to learne, that yet in the first place the word of the beleeuing signifieth a particular beleefe: and in the second place maketh him of the number of the Disciples, that professed to be the schollers of Christ. A like example doth Iohn set forth in the Samaritans, which so beleeued the womans report, that they ranne earnestly to Christ, which yet when they had heard him, said thus: Now we beleeue not because of thy report but we haue heard him, and we know that he is the Sauiour of the world. Hereby appeareth that they which are not yet instructed in the first introductions, so that they be disposed to obedience, are called faithful, in deede not properly, but in this respect, that God of his tender kindnesse vouchsafeth to graunt so great honour to that godly affection. But this willingnesse to learne, with a desire to proceede further, differeth far from that grosse ignorance, wherein they lie dull that are content with the vnexpressed faith, such as the Papists haue imagined. For if Paul seuerely condemneth them which alway learning, yet neuer come to the knowledge of truth, how much more grieuous reproch doe they deserue that of purpose studie to know nothing?

When we begin by Faith to know somewhat, & haue a desire to learne more, this may be termed an vnexpressed Faith.

Iohn 4.3.

Iohn 4.

2. Tim. 3.7.

6 This therefore is the true knowledge of Christ, if we receiue him such as he is offered of his father, that is to say, clothed with his Gospell. For as he is appointed to be the marke of our faith, so we cannot goe the right way to him, but by the Gospell, going before to guide vs. And truly there are opened to vs the treasures of grace, which being shut vp, Christ should litle profit vs. So Paul ioyneth faith an vnseparable companion to doctrine, where he saith: Ye haue not so learned Christ, for ye haue beene taught what is the trueth in Christ. Yet doe I not so restraine faith to the Gospell, but that I confesse that there hath beene so much taught by Moses and the Prophets, as sufficed to the edification of faith, but because there hath beene deliuered in the Gospell a fuller opening of faith, therefore it is worthily called of Paul, the doctrine of faith. For which cause also he saith in another place, that by the comming of faith the law is taken away, meaning by this word faith, the new and vnaccustomed maner of teaching, whereby Christ since he appeared our Schoolemaster, hath more plainely set foorth the mercie of his Father, and more certeinly testified of our saluation. Albeit it shall be the more easie and more conuenient order, if we descend by degrees from the generalitie to the specialtie. First we must be put in mind that there is a generall relation of faith to the Worde, and that faith can no more be seuered from the Worde, than the Sunne beames from the Sunne from whome they proceede. Therefore in Esay God crieth out: Heare me and your soule shall liue. And that the same is the fountaine of Faith, Iohn sheweth in these wordes: These things are written that ye may beleeue: And the Prophet meaning to exhort the people to beliefe, saith: This day if ye shall heare his voice. And to heare is commonly taken for to Beliue. Moreouer God doth not without cause in Esay set this marke of difference betweene the children of the Church and strangers, that he will instruct them all, that they may be taught of him.

Faith beholdeth Christ but in no other glasse than the Gospell.

Iohn 10.13.

Psal. 95.8.

For it it were a benefite vniuerſall to all, why ſhould he direct his words to a fewe? Wherewith agreeth this that the Euangeliſts doe commonly vſe the wordes Faithfull and Diſciples, as ſeuerall words expreſſing one thing, and ſpecially Luke very oft in the Actes of the Apoſtles. Yea and he ſtretcheth that name euen to a woman in the ninth Chapter of the Actes. Wherefore if faith doe ſwarue neuer ſo little from this marke, to which it ought to be directly leuelled, it keepeth not her owne nature, but becommeth an vncertaine lightneſſe of beleefe and wandring errour of minde. The ſame Word is the foundation wherewith faith is vpholden and ſuſtained, from which if it ſwarue, it falleth downe. Therefore take away the Word, and then there ſhall remaine no faith. We doe not here diſpute whether the miniſtery of man be neceſſarie to ſowe the Word of God that faith may be conceiued thereby, which queſtion we will elſewhere intreat of: but we ſay that the Word it ſelfe, howſoeuer it be conueyed to vs, is like a mirrour when faith may behold God. Whether God doth therin vſe the ſeruice of man, or work it by his own only power, yet he doth alway ſhew himſelfe by his Word to thoſe, whō his will is to draw vnto him: Whereupon Paul defineth faith to be an obedience that is giuen to the Goſpell Rom. 1. And in another place he praiſeth the obedience of faith in the Philippians. For this is not the onely purpoſe in the vnderſtanding of faith, that we know that there is a God, but this alſo, yea this chiefly, that we vnderſtand what will he beareth vs. For it not ſo much behoueth vs to know what he is in himſelfe, but what a one he will be to vs. Now therefore we are come to this point, that faith is a knowledge of the will of God, perceiued by the Word. And the foundation hereof is a fore-conceiued perſwaſion of the truth of God. Of the aſſuredneſſe whereof ſo long as thy minde ſhall diſpute with it ſelfe, the Word ſhall be but of doubtfull and weake credite, yea rather no credite at all. But alſo it ſufficeth not to beleeue that God is a true ſpeaker, which can neither deceiue nor lie, vnleſſe thou further hold this for vndoubtedly determined, that whatſoeuer proceedeth from him, is the ſacred and inuiolable truth.

Rom. 1. 5. Phil. 2. 17.

The true and full definition of Faith.

7 But becauſe not at euery word of God mans heart is raiſed vp to faith, we muſt yet further ſearch what this faith in the word hath properly reſpect vnto. It was the ſaying of God to Adam: Thou ſhalt die the death. It was the ſaying of God to Cain: The blood of thy brother crieth to me out of the earth. Yet theſe are ſuch ſayings as of them ſelues can doe nothing but ſhake faith, ſo much leſſe are they able to ſtabliſh faith. We denie not in the meane ſeaſon that it is the office of faith to agree to the truth of God, how oft ſoeuer, whatſoeuer, and in what ſort ſoeuer it ſpeaketh: but now our queſtion is onely, what faith findeth in the word of the Lord to leane and reſt vpon. When our conſcience beholdeth onely indignation and vengeance, how can it but tremble and quake for feare? And how ſhould it but flee God, of whom it is afraide? But faith ought to ſeeke God, and not to flee from him. It is plaine therefore, that we haue not yet a full definition of faith, becauſe it is not to be accounted for faith to know the will of God, of what ſort ſoeuer it be: But what if in the place of will, whereof many times the meſſage is ſorrowfull and the declaration dreadfull, we put kindneſſe or mercie? Truely ſo we ſhall come neerer to the nature of faith. For we are then allured to ſeeke God, after that we haue learned that ſaluation is laid vp in ſtore with him for vs: Which thing is confirmed vnto vs, when he declareth that he hath care and loue of vs. Therefore there needeth a promiſe of grace, whereby he may teſtifie that he is our mercifull Father, for that otherwiſe we cannot approch vnto him, and vpon that alone the heart of man may ſafely reſt. For this reaſon commonly in the Pſalmes theſe two things Mercie and Truth doe cleaue together, becauſe neither ſhould it any thing profit vs to know that God is true, vnleſſe he did mercifully allure vs vnto him: neither were it in our power to embrace his mercie, vnleſſe he did with his owne mouth offer it. I haue reported thy truth and thy ſaluation, I haue not hidden thy goodneſſe and thy truth. Thy goodneſſe and thy truth keepe me. In another place: Thy mercie to the heauens, thy truth euen to the cloudes. Againe: All the waies of the Lord are mercie and truth, to them that keepe his couenant. Againe, His mercie is multiplied vpon vs, and the truth of the Lord abideth for euer. Againe: I will ſing to thy name vpon thy mercie and truth. I omit that which is in the Prophets to the ſame same meaning, that God is mercifull and faithfull in his promises. For we shall rashly determine that God is mercifull vnto vs, vnlesse himselfe doe testifie of himselfe, and preuent vs with his calling, least his will should be doubtfull and vnknowen. But we haue alreadie seene, that Christ is the onely pledge of his loue, without whom on euery side appeare the tokens of hatred and wrath. Now for asmuch as the knowledge of Gods goodnesse shall not much preuaile, vnlesse he make vs to rest in it, therefore such an vnderstanding is to be banished as is mingled with doubting, and doth not soundly agree in it selfe, but as it were, disputeth with it selfe. But mans wit, as it is blind and darkned, is farre from atteining and climbing vp to perceiue the very will of God: and also the hart of man, as it wauereth with perpetuall doubting, is far from resting assured in that perswasion. Therefore it behoooueth both that our wit be lightned, and our heart strengthened by some other meane, that the word of God may be of full credite with vs. Now we shall haue a perfect definition of faith, if we say, that it is a stedfast and assured knowledge of Gods kindnes toward vs, which being grounded vpon the truth of the free promise in Christ, is both reuealed to our minds, and sealed in our hearts by the holy Ghost.

8 But before I proceede any further, it shall be necessarie that I make some preambles to dissolue certaine doubts that otherwise might make some stop to the Readers. And first I must confute that distinction that flyeth about in the Schooles, betweene faith formed and vnformed. For they imagine that such as are touched with no feare of God, with no feeling of godlinesse, doe beleeue all that is necessary to saluation. As though the holy Ghost in lightning our harts vnto faith, were not a witnesse to vs of our adoption. And yet presumptuously, when all the Scripture crieth out against it, they giue the name of faith to such perswasion voide of the feare of God. We neede to striue no further with their definition, but simply to rehearse the nature of faith, such as it is declared by the word of God. Whereby shall plainly appeare how vnskilfully and foolishly they rather make a noise than speake of it. I haue already touched part, the rest I will adde hereafter as place shall serue. At this present I say that there cannot be imagined a greater absurditie, than this inuention of theirs. They will haue faith to be an assent, whereby euery despiser of God may receiue that which is vttered out of the Scripture. But first they should haue seene whether euery man of his own power doe bring faith to himselfe, or whether the holy Ghost be by it a witnesse of adoption. Therefore they doe childishly play the fooles, in demaunding whether faith which a qualitie added doth forme, be the same faith or an other and a new faith. Whereby appeareth certainely, that in so babbling they neuer thought of the singular gift of the holy Ghost. For the beginning of beleeuing doth alreadie containe in it the reconciliation, whereby man approcheth to God. But if they did weigh that saying of Paul. With the hart is beleeued to righteousnesse, they would cease to faigne that same cold qualitie. If we had but this one reason, it should be sufficient to ende this contention: that the very same assent (as I haue alreadie touched, and will againe more largely repeate) is rather of the hart than of the braine, rather of affection than of vnderstanding. For which cause it is called the obedience of Faith, which is such as the Lord preferreth no kind of obedience aboue it: and that woorthily, for as much as nothing is more precious to him than his truth, which as Iohn the Baptist witnesseth, the beleeuers doe as it were subscribe and seale vnto. Sith the matter is not doubtfull we doe in one word determinately say, that they speake fondly when they say that Faith is formed by adding of godly affection vnto assent: whereas assent it selfe, at least such assent as is declared in the Scriptures, consisteth of godly affection. But yet there is another plainer argument that offereth it selfe to be alleaged. For whereas Faith imbraceth Christ as he is offered vs of the Father: and Christ is offered not onely for righteousnesse, forgiuenesse of sinnes and peace, but also for sanctification, and a fountaine of liuing water: without doubt no man can euer truely know him, vnlesse he doe therewithall receiue the sanctification of the Spirit. Or, if any man desire to haue it more plainly spoken, Faith consisteth in the knowledge of Christ. And Christ cannot be knowen but with sanctification of his Spirit: therefore it followeth, that faith can by no meane be seuered from godly affection.

S. Paules words abused for the maintenance of vnformed faith. 1. Cor. 12. 10.

9 Whereas they are woont to lay this against vs, that Paul saith: If a man haue all Faith, so that he remooue mountaines, if he haue not charitie, he is nothing: whereby they would deforme Faith, in spoyling it of Charitie: they consider not what the Apostle in that place meaneth by Faith. For when in the Chapter next before, it he had spoken of the diuers gifts of the holy Ghost, among the which he had reckoned the diuers kindes of languages, power and prophecie, and had exhorted the Corinthians to follow the best of these gifts, that is to say, such gifts whereby more profite and commoditie might come to the whole body of the Church: he straightway said further, that he would shew them yet a more excellent way. That all such giftes, how excellent soeuer they be of themselues, yet are they nothing to be esteemed, vnlesse they serue Charitie. For they were giuen to the edifying of the Church, and vnlesse they be applied thereunto, they loose their grace. For proofe of this he particularly rehearseth them repeating the selfe same gifts that he had spoken of before, but in other names. And he vseth the words Powers and Faith, for all one thing, that is for the power to doe miracles. Sith therefore this, whether yee call it Power or faith, is a particular gift of God, which euery vngodly man may both haue and abuse, as the gift of tongues, as prophecie and other gifts of grace: it is no maruell if it be seuered from Charitie. But all the errour of these men standeth in this, that where this word Faith, hath diuers significations, they not considering the diuersitie of the thing signified, dispute as though it were taken for one thing in all places alike. The place of Iames which they alleage for maintenance of the same errour, shall be elsewhere discussed. But although for teachings sake, when we meane to shew what maner of knowledge of God there is in the wicked, we grant that there are diuers sorts of Faith: yet we acknowledge and speake of but one Faith of the godly, as the Scripture teacheth. Many in deede doe beleeue that there is a God, they thinke that the historie of the Gospell and other parts of the Scripture are true (as commonly we are woont to iudge of such things, as either are reported being done long agoe, or such as we our selues haue beene present at and seene.) There be also some that goe further, for both they beleeue the word of God to be a most assured oracle, and they doe not altogither despise his Commandements, and they somewhat after a sort are mooued with his threatnings and promises. It is indeede testified that such haue Faith: but that is spoken out by abuse, because they doe not with open vngodlinesse fight against the word of God, or refuse or despise it: but rather pretend a certaine shew of obedience.

A kind of faith said to be in the who notwithstanding are no true beleeuers. Act. 8. 13. & 18.

10 But this image or shadow of Faith, as it is of no value, so it is not worthie of the name of faith. From the sound truth whereof how farre it differeth, although it shall be hereafter more largely entreated, yet there is no cause to the contrarie, why it should not now be touched by the way. It is said, that Simon Magus beleeued, which yet within a little after bewrayed his owne vnbeliefe. And whereas it is said that he beleeued, we doe not vnderstand it as some doe, that he faigned a beleefe when he had none in his heart: but we rather thinke that being ouercome with the maiestie of the Gospell, he had a certaine faith such as it was, and so acknowledged Christ to be the Author of life and saluation, that he willingly professed himselfe to be one of his. After the same maner it is said in the Gospell of Luke, that they beleeue for a time, in whom the seede of the word is choaked vp before it bring foorth fruite, or before it take any roote at all, it by and by withereth away and perisheth: we doubt not that such delited with a certaine taste of the word doe greedily receiue it, and begin to feele the diuine force of it: so farre that with deceitfull counterfaiting of faith, they beguile not only other mens eies, but also their own minds. For they perswade themselues, that that reuerence which they shew to the word of God, is most true godlinesse, because they thinke that there is no vngodlinesse but manifest and confessed reproch or contempt of his word. But what maner of assent soeuer that be, it pearceth no to the very heart to remaine there stablished: and though sometime it seemeth to haue taken rootes, yet those are not liuely rootes. The heart of man hath so many secret corners of vanitie, is full of so many hiding holes of lying, is couered with so guilefull hypocrisie, that it oft deceiueth himselfe. But let them that glory in such shadowes of faith vnderstand, that therein they are no better than the Diuell. But that first sort of men are farre woorse than the Diuell, which which doe ſenſeleſly heare and vnderſtand thoſe things, for knowledge whereof the Diuels do tremble. And the other are in this point equall with the diuel that the feeling ſuch as it is wherewith they are touched, turneth onely to terrour and diſcouragement. Iac.2.19.

11 I know that ſome thinke it hard, that we aſſigne faith to the reprobate, whereas Paul affirmeth faith to be the fruit of election. Which doubt yet is eaſily diſſolued: for though none receiue the light of faith, nor doe truely feele the effectuall working of the Goſpell, but they that are foreordained to ſaluation: yet experience ſheweth that the reprobate are ſometime mooued with the ſame feeling that the elect are, ſo that in their owne iudgement they nothing differ from the elect. Wherefore it is no abſurditie, that the Apoſtle aſcribeth to them the taſte of the heauenly gifts, that Chriſt aſcribeth to them a faith for a time: not that they ſoundly perceiue the ſpirituall force of grace and aſſured light of faith: but becauſe the Lord, the more to condemne them and make them inexcuſable, conueyeth himſelfe into their mindes ſo farre foorth, as his goodneſſe may be taſted without the ſpirit of adoption. If any obiect, that then there remaineth nothing more to the faithfull whereby to proue certainely their adoption: I anſwere that though there be a great likeneſſe and affinitie betweene the elect of God and them that are endued with a falling faith for a time, yet there liueth in the elect onely that affiance which Paul ſpeaketh of, that they cry with full mouth, Abba, Father. Therefore as God doth regenerate onely the elect with incorruptible ſeede for euer, ſo that the ſeede of life planted in their hearts neuer periſheth: ſo ſoundly doth he ſeale in them the grace of his adoption, that it may be ſtable and ſure. But this withſtandeth not but that that other inferiour working of the Spirit may haue his courſe, euen in the reprobate. In the meane ſeaſon the faithfull are taught, carefully and humbly to examine themſelues, leaſt in ſteede of aſſuredneſſe of faith, doe creepe in careleſſe confidence of the fleſh. Beſide that, the reprobate doe neuer conceiue but a confuſed feeling of grace, ſo that they rather take hold of the ſhadow than of the ſound bodie, becauſe the holy ſpirit doth properly ſeale the remiſſion of ſinnes in the elect onely, ſo that they apply it by ſpeciall faith to their vſe. But yet it is truely ſaid, that the reprobate beleeue God to be merciſull vnto them, becauſe they receiue the gift of reconciliation, although confuſedly & not plainely enough: not that they are partakers of the ſelfe ſame faith or regeneration with the children of God, but becauſe they ſeeme to haue as well as they, the ſame beginning of Faith, vnder a cloke of hypocriſie. And I deny not, that God doth ſo farre giue light vnto their mindes, that they acknowledge his grace, but he maketh that ſame feeling ſo different from the peculiar teſtimonie which he giueth to his elect, that they neuer come to the ſound effect and fruition thereof. For he doth not therefore ſhew himſelfe merciſull vnto them, for that he hauing truely deliuered them from death, doth receiue them to his ſafegard, but onely he diſcloſeth to them a preſent mercy. But he vouchſafeth to graunt to the onely elect the liuely roote of Faith, ſo that they continue to the ende. So is that obiection anſwered, if God doe truely ſhew his grace, that the ſame remaineth perpetually ſtabliſhed, for that there is no cauſe to the contrary, but that God may enlighten ſome with a preſent feeling of his grace, which afterward vaniſheth away.

2.Theſſ.1.4.
Heb.6.

12 Alſo though Faith be a knowledge of Gods kindneſſe toward vs, and an aſſured perſwaſion of the truth thereof: yet it is no maruell that the feeling of Gods loue in temporall things doth vaniſh away: which although it haue an affinitie with faith, yet doth it much differ from Faith. I graunt, the will of God is vnchangeable, and the truth thereof doth alway ſtedfaſtly agree with it ſelfe, but I deny that the reprobate doe proceede ſo farre as to attaine vnto that ſecret reuelation, which the Scripture ſaith to belong to the elect onely. Therefore I deny that they doe either conceiue the will of GOD as it is vnchaungeable, or doe ſtedfaſtly embrace the truth thereof, becauſe they abide in a feeling that vaniſheth away: Like as a tree that is not planted deepe ynough to take liuely rootes, in proceſſe of time waxeth drie, although for a fewe yeeres it bringeth foorth not onely bloſſomes and leaues but alſo fruite. Finally, as by the fall of the firſt man, the image of God might haue beene blotted out of his minde, and ſoule, ſo it is no maruell, if God doe ſhine vpon the reprobate with certaine beames of his grace, which afterward he ſuffereth to be quenched. And there

Wicked men who by reaſon of a vaniſhing ſweetenes which they feele in the grace of God towards them for a time, are ſaid to beleeue, yet indeede doe neither embrace what they ſhould nor as they ſhould.

is no cause to the contrarie, but that he may lightly ouerwash some, and throughly soke other some with the knowledge of his Gospell. This is in the meane time to be holden for truth, that how small and weake soeuer faith be in the elect, yet becausse it is to them a sure pledge of the spirit of God, and a seale of their adoption, the print thereof can neuer be blotted out of their hearts: as for the reprobate, that they are ouerspred with such a light as afterward commeth to nought, and yet the spirit is not deceitfull, because he giueth not life to the seede that he casteth in their hearts, to make it abide alwaies incorruptible, as he doth in the elect. I goe yet further, for whereas it is euident by the teaching of the Scripture and by daily experience, that the reprobate are sometime touched with the feeling of Gods grace, it must needes be that there is raised in their harts a certaine desire of mutuall loue. So for a time there liued in Saul a godly affection to loue God, by whom he knew himselfe to be fatherly handled, and therefore was delighted with a certaine sweetenesse of his goodnesse. But as the perswasion of the fatherly loue of God is not fast rooted in the reprobate, so do they not soundly loue him againe as his children, but are led with a certaine affection like hired seruants. For to Christ onely was the spirit of loue giuen, to this end, that he should poure it into his members.

Rom.5.5. And truely that saying of Paul extendeth no further, but to the elect onely. The loue of God is powred abroad into our hearts by the holy Spirit that is giuen vs, euen the same loue that engendreth the same confidence of calling vpon him, which I haue before touched. As on the contrarie side we see God to be maruelously angry with his children, whom yet he ceaseth not to loue: not that in himselfe he hateth them, but because his will is to make them afraid with the feeling of his wrath, to the intent to abate their pride of flesh, to shake off their drowsinesse, and to moue them to repentance. And therefore all at one time they conceiue him to be both angry with them or with their sinnes, and also mercifull vnto them: because they not faignedly doe pray to appease his wrath, to whom yet they flee with quiet assured trust. Hereby it appeareth that it is not true that some doe counterfeit a shew of faith, which yet doe lacke the true faith, but while they are carried with a sodaine violent motion of Zeale, they deceiue themselues with false opinion. And it is no doubt that sluggishnesse so possesseth them, that they doe not well examine their heart as they ought to haue done. It is likely that Iohn 2.24. they were such to whom (as Iohn witnesseth) Christ did not commit himselfe when yet they beleeued in him, because he knew them all, and knew what was in man. If many did not fall from the common faith (I call it common, because the faith that lasteth but a time hath a great likenesse and affinitie with the liuely aud continuing Ioh.8.31. faith) Christ would not haue said to his Disciples: If ye abide in my worde, then are ye truely my Disciples, and ye shall know the trueth, and the trueth shall make you free. For he speaketh to them that had embraced his doctrine, and exhorteth them to the increase of faith, that they should not by their owne sluggishnesse quench the light that is giuen them. Therefore doth Paul affirme, that faith peculiarly be-

Tit 1.1. longeth to the elect, declaring that many vanish away, because they haue not taken

Mat.15.13. liuely roote. Like as Christ also saith in Mathew: euery tree that my father hath not planted, shall be rooted vp. In other there is a grosser kinde of lying, that are not ashamed to mocke both God and men. Iames inueyeth against that kinde of men, that Iac.2. with deceitfull pretence doe wickedly abuse faith. Neither would Paul require of the

1.Tim.1.5. children of God a faith vnfaigned, but in respect that many doe presumptuously challenge vnto themselues that which they haue not, and with vaine coloured deceit do beguile other or sometime themselues. Therefore he compareth a good conscience to a

1.Tim.1.19. chest wherein faith is kept, because many in falling from good conscience, haue suffered shipwrack of their faith.

The name of faith diuersly taken. 1.Tim.3.9. 1.Tim.4.1.& 6. 2.Tim.2.16.& 3.8. 13 We must also remember the doubtfull signification of the worde faith. For oftentimes faith signifieth the sound doctrine of religion, as in the place that we now alleadge, and in the same Epistle where Paul will haue Deacons to hold fast the mysterie of faith in a pure conscience. Againe, where he publisheth the falling away of certaine from the faith. But on the other side he saith that Timothie was nourished vp with the words of faith. Againe where he saith that prophane vanities and oppositions, falsely named sciences, are the cause that many depart from the faith: whom in another place he he calleth reprobate touching Faith. As againe he chargeth Titus, ſaying, Warne them that they be ſound in the Faith. By ſoundneſſe he meaneth nothing elſe but pureneſſe of doctrine, which is eaſily corrupted and brought out of kinde by the lightneſſe of men. Euen becauſe in Chriſt, whom Faith poſſeſſeth, are hidden all the treaſures of wiſedome and knowledge: therefore Faith is worthily extended to ſignifie the whole ſumme of heauenly doctrine, from which it cannot be ſeuered. Contrariwiſe ſometime it is reſtrained to ſignifie ſome particular obiect, as when Mathew ſaith, that Chriſt ſaw the Faith of them that did let downe the Man ſicke of the Palſie through the Tiles: and Chriſt himſelfe crieth out that he found not in Iſrael ſo great Faith as the Centurion brought. But it is likely that the Centurion was earneſtly bent to the healing of his daughter, the care whereof occupied all his minde: yet becauſe being contented with the onely aſſent and anſwere of Chriſt, he required not Chriſts bodily preſence, therefore in reſpect of this circumſtance his Faith was ſo much commended. And a little here before we haue ſhewed, that Paul taketh Faith for the gift of working miracles, which gift they haue that neither are regenerate by the Spirit of God, nor doe hartily worſhip him. Alſo in an other place he ſetteth Faith for the doctrine whereby we are inſtructed in Faith. For where he writeth that faith ſhall be aboliſhed, it is out of queſtion that that is meant by the miniſterie of the Church, which at this time is profitable for our weakeneſſe. In theſe formes of ſpeech ſtandeth a proportional relation. But when the name of Faith is vnproperly remooued, to ſignifie a falſe profeſſion, or a lying title of faith, that ſhould ſeeme to be as hard a figuratiue abuſe, as when the feare of God is ſet for a corrupt & wrongfull maner of worſhipping, as whē it is oftentimes ſaid in the holy Hiſtory, that the forrain nations which had been tranſplanted into Samaria & the places bordering thereabout, feared the fained Gods & the God of Iſrael, which is as much, as to mingle heauen & earth together. But now our queſtion is, What is that Faith which maketh the children of God differente from the vnbeleeuers, by which we call vpon God by the name of our Father, by which we paſſe from death to life, and by which Chriſt the eternall ſaluation and life dwelleth in vs. The force and nature thereof I thinke I haue ſhortly & plainly declared.

Tit. 1. 13. & 2. 2.

Col. 2. 3.

Mat. 9. 2. Mat. 8. 10.

1. Cor. 13. 10.

14 Now let vs againe goe through all the parts of it, euen from the beginning, which being diligently examined, (as I thinke) there ſhall remaine nothing doubtfull. When in defining Faith we call it a knowledge, we meane not thereby a comprehending, ſuch as men vſe to haue of thoſe things that are ſubiect to mans vnderſtanding. For it is ſo farre aboue it, that mans wit muſt goe beyond and ſurmount it ſelfe to come vnto it, yea, and when it is come vnto it, yet doth it not attaine that which it feeleth, but while it is perſwaded of that which it conceiueth not, it vnderſtandeth more by the very aſſuredneſſe of perſwaſion, than if it did with mans owne capacitie throughly perceiue any thing familiar to man. Therefore Paul ſaith very well, where he calleth it to comprehend what is the length, bredth, depth, and height, and to know the loue of Chriſt that farre ſurmounteth knowledge. For his meaning was to ſignifie, that the thing which our minde conceiueth by Faith, is euery way infinite, and that this kinde of knowledge is farre higher than all vnderſtanding. But yet becauſe the Lord hath diſcloſed to his Saintes the ſecret of his will which was hidden from ages and generations, therefore by good reaſon Faith is in Scripture ſometime called an acknowledging: and Iohn calleth it a certaine knowledge, where he teſtifieth, that the Faithfull do certainly know that they are the children of God. And vndoubtedly they know it aſſuredly, but rather by being conformed by perſwaſiō of Gods truth, than by being informed by naturall demonſtration. And this alſo the words of Paul doe declare ſaying, that while we dwell in the bodie, we are wandering abroad from the Lord, becauſe we walke by Faith and not by ſight: whereby he ſheweth that thoſe things which we vnderſtand by Faith, are yet abſent from vs and are hidden from our ſight. And hereupon we determine, that the knowledge of Faith ſtandeth rather in certaintie than in comprehending.

Faith a knowledge.

Ephe. 3. 18. Col. 1. 28.

1. Ioh. 3. 2.

2. Cor. 5. 6

15 We further call it a ſure and ſtedfaſt knowledge, to expreſſe thereby a more ſound conſtancie of perſwaſion. For as Faith is not contented with a doubtfull and rowling opinion, ſo is it alſo not contented with a darke and entangled vnderſtanding: but but requireth a full and fixed aſſuredne, ſuch as men are wont to haue of things found by experience and prooued. For vnbeleefe ſticketh ſo faſt and is ſo deepe rooted in our harts, and we are ſo bent vnto it, that this which all men confeſſe with their mouth to be true, that God is Faithfull, no man is without great contention perſwaded in his hart. Specially when he commeth to the proofe, then the wauering of all men diſcloſeth the fault that before was hidden. And not without cauſe the Scripture with ſo notable titles of commendation maintaineth the authoritie of the word of God, but endeuoreth to giue remedie for the aforeſaid diſeaſe, that God may obtaine to be fully beleeued of vs in his promiſes: The words of the Lord (ſaith Dauid) are pure words, as the Siluer tried in a fornace of earth, fined ſeuen times. Againe, The word of the Lord fined is a ſhield to all that truſt in him. And Salomon confirming the ſame, and in a maner in the ſame words, ſaith: Euery word of God is pure. But ſith the whole 119. Pſalme entreateth onely in a maner vpon the ſame, it were ſuperfluous to alleadge any moe places. Truely ſo oft as God doth ſo commend his word vnto vs, he doth therein by the way reproch vs with our vnbeleeuingneſſe: becauſe that commendation tendeth to no other end, but to roote vp all peruerſe doubtings out of our harts. There be alſo many which ſo conceiue the mercie of God, that they take little comfort thereof. For they be euen therewithall pinched with a miſerable carefulneſſe, while they doubt whether he will be mercifull to them or no, becauſe they encloſe within too narrow boundes the very ſame mercifulneſſe, of which they thinke themſelues moſt aſſuredly perſwaded. For thus they thinke with themſelues, that his mercie is in deede great and plentifull poured out vpon many, offering it ſelfe and ready for all men: but that it is not certaine whether it will extend vnto them or no, or rather whether they ſhall attaine vnto it or no. This thought when it ſtayeth in the mid race, is but an halfe. Therefore it doth not ſo confirme the Spirit with aſſured quietneſſe, as it doth trouble it with vnquiet doubtfulneſſe. But there is a farre other feeling of full aſſuredneſſe, which in the Scriptures is alway aſſigned to Faith, euen ſuch a one as plainly ſetting before vs the goodneſſe of God, doth clearely put it out of doubt. And that cannot be, but that we muſt needs truely feele and prooue in our ſelues the ſweeteneſſe thereof. And therefore the Apoſtle out of Faith deriueth aſſured confidence, and out of it againe boldneſſe. For thus he ſaith, that by Chriſt we haue boldneſſe, and an entrance with confidence, which is through Faith in him. By which words truely he ſheweth, that it is no right Faith, but when we are bolde with quiet mindes to ſhew our ſelues in the preſence of God. Which boldneſſe proceedeth not but of aſſured confidence of Gods good will and our ſaluation. Which is ſo true, that many times this word Faith, is vſed for Confidence.

Pſal. 19. 31.

Pro. 30. 5.

Ephe. 3. 12.

Faith ſuch an aſſurance as maketh the promiſes of mercy our owne.

16 But hereupon hangeth the chiefe ſtay of our Faith, that we doe not thinke the promiſes of mercy which the Lord offereth to be true onely in other beſide vs, and not at all in our ſelues: but rather that in inwardly embracing them, we make them our owne. From hence proceedeth that Confidence which the ſame Paul in another place calleth peace, vnleſſe ſome had rather ſay, that Peace is deriued of it. It is an aſſuredneſſe that maketh the Conſcience quiet and chearefull before God, without which the Conſcience muſt of neceſſitie be vexed, and in a maner torne in pieces with troubleſome trembling, vnleſſe perhaps it doe forget God and it ſelfe, and ſo ſlumber a little while. And I may truely ſay, For a little while, for it doth not long enioy that miſerable forgetfulneſſe, but is with often recourſe of the remembrance of Gods iudgement ſharply tormented. Briefely, there is none truely faithfull, but he that being perſwaded with a ſound aſſuredneſſe that God is his mercifull and louing Father, doth promiſe him ſelfe all things vpon truſt of Gods goodneſſe: and none but he that truſting vpon the promiſes of Gods good will toward him, conceiueth an vndoubted looking for of ſaluation: as the Apoſtle ſheweth in theſe words: if we keepe ſure to the end our Confidence and glorying of hope. For hereby he meaneth that none hopeth well in the Lord, but he that with Confidence glorieth that he is heire of the kingdome of heauen. There is none (I ſay) faithfull, but he that leaning vpon the aſſuredneſſe of his owne ſaluation, doth confidently triumph vpon the Deuill & death, as we are taught by that notable concluding ſentence of Paul: I am perſwaded (ſaith he) that neither death, nor life,

Heb. 3. 13.

Rom 8. 38.

life, nor Angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, shall be able to separate vs from the loue of God, wherewith he embraceth vs in Christ Iesu. And in like maner, the same Apostle thinketh, that the eies of our minde are by no other meane well lightened, vnlesse we see what is the hope of the eternall inheritance to which we are called. And each where his common maner of teaching is such, that he declareth that no otherwise we doe not well comprehend the goodnesse of God, vnlesse we gather of it the fruit of great assuredenesse. Ephe.1.18.

17 But (some man will say) the faithfull doe find by experience a farre other thing within themselues, which in recording the grace of God toward them, are not onely tempted with vnquietnes, which oftentimes chanceth vnto them, but also are sometime shaken with most grieuous terrors: so great is the vehemencie of temptations to throw downe their mindes: which thing seemeth not sufficiently well to agree with that assuredenesse of faith. Therefore this doubt must be answered, if we will haue our aforesaid doctrine to stand. But truly, when we teach that faith ought to be certaine and assured, we doe not imagine such a certaintie as is touched with no doubting, nor such an assuredenesse as is assailed with no carefulnesse: but rather we say, that the faithfull haue a perpetuall strife with their owne distrustfulnesse. So farre be we from setling their consciences in such a peaceable quietnesse, as may be interrupted with no troubles at all. Yet on the other side we say, that in what sort soeuer they be afflicted, they doe neuer fall and depart from that assured confidence which they haue conceiued of the mercie of God. The Scripture setteth foorth no example of faith more plaine, or more notable than in Dauid, especially if a man behold the whole continuall course of his life. But yet how he was not alway of quiet minde himselfe declareth by innumerable complaints, of which at this time it shall be sufficient to choose out a few. When he reprocheth his owne soule with troublesome motions, what is it else but that he is angrie with his owne vnbeleeuingnesse? Why trembleſt thou my soule (saith he) and why art thou disquieted within me? trust in God. And truely that same discouragement was a plaine token of destruction, euen as if he thought himselfe to be forsaken of God. And in another place we reade a larger confession thereof, where he saith: I said in my ouerthrow, I am cast out from the sight of thy eyes. Also in another place he disputeth with himselfe in carefull and miserable perplexitie yea and quarelleth of the very nature of God, saying: Hath God forgotten to haue mercie? will he cast off for euer? And yet harder is that which followeth: But I haue said, To die is mine: charges are of the right hand of the highest. For, as in despaire he condemneth himselfe to destruction, and not onely confesseth himselfe to be tossed with doubting, but as if he were vanquished in battell, he leaueth nothing to himselfe, because God hath forsaken him, and hath turned to destroy him, the same hand that was wont to be his helper. Wherefore not without cause he exhorteth his Soule to returne to her quietnesse, because he had found by experience, that he was tossed among troublesome waues. And yet (which is marueilous) in all these assaultes, Faith vpholdeth the harts of the godly, and is truely like vnto a Date tree to endeuor and rise vpward against all burdens, how great soeuer they be: as Dauid when he might seeme to be vtterly ouerwhelmed, yet in rebuking himselfe, ceaseth not to rise vp to God. And truely he that striuing with his owne weaknes, resorteth to Faith in his troubles, is alreadie in a maner conqueror. Which may be gathered by this sentence and other like: Waite for the Lord, be strong, he shall strengthen thy hart: waite for the Lord. He reprocheth himselfe of fearefulnesse, and in repeating that same twise, confesseth himselfe to be sometimes subiect to many troublesome motions. And in the meane time he doth not onely become displeased with himselfe in these faultes, but earnestly endeuoureth to amendment. Truly if we will more neerely by good examination compare him with Achaz, there shall be found great difference, Esay was sent to bring remedie to the carefull griefe of the wicked king and hypocrite, and spake vnto him in these words: Be in safegard and be quiet: feare not &c. But what did Achaz? As it was before said, that his hart was mooued as the trees of the wood are shaken with wind, though he heard the promise, yet he ceased not to quake for feare. This therefore is the proper reward and punishment of vnbeleefe, so to tremble for feare, that in temptation he turneth himselfe away from God, that doth not open to himselfe the gate by Faith. Contrariwise the faithfull whom the weighty burden of temptations maketh to stoupe, and in a maner oppresseth, do constantly rise vp, although not without trouble and hardnes. And because they know their owne weakenesse, they pray with the Prophet: Take not the word of trueth away from my mouth continually. By which words we are taught, that sometime they become dumme as though their Faith were vtterly ouerthrowen, yet they faint not, nor turne their backes, but proceede in their battell, and with prayer doe encourage their slouthfulnesse, least by fauouring themselues they should grow to vnsensible dulnesse.

Faith wrastling with distrustfulnesse doth alwaies conquer.

18 For the vnderstanding thereof, it is needfull to returne to that diuision of the flesh and the spirit, whereof we made mention in another place, which doth in this behalfe most clearely appeare. The godly heart therefore feeleth a deuision in it selfe, which is partly delighted with sweetnesse by acknowledging the goodnesse of God, and partly grieued with bitternesse by feeling of his owne miserie, partly resteth vpon the promise of the Gospel, and partly trembleth by reason of the testimonie of his owne wickednesse: partly reioyceth with conceiuing of life, and partly quaketh for feare of death. Which variation commeth by imperfection of Faith, forasmuch as we neuer be in so good case in the course of this present life, as being healed from all disease of distrustfulnesse to be altogether filled and possessed with faith. Hereupon proceede those battels, when the distrustfulnesse that abideth in the remnants of the flesh, riseth vp to assaile the faith that is inwardly conceiued. But if in a faithfull minde assuredneſse be mixed with doubtfulueſse, come we not alway to this point, that Faith standeth not in a certaine and cleare knowledge, but in a darke and doubtfully entangled knowledge of Gods will toward vs? No, not so. For though we be diuersly drawne with sundry thoughts, yet are we not therfore by & by seuered frō faith, though we be vexed with tossing vp & down of distrustfulnes, yet are we not therefore drowned in the bottomles depth therof: & though we be shaken, yet be we not thrust down out of our place. For this is alway the end of this battell, that faith doth at length with wrastling ouercome those hard troubles wherwith when she is so besieged, she seemeth to be in danger.

The imbecilitie of our knowledge excludeth not the certainetie of that we know by Faith.

19 Let this be the summe of all. So soone as any drop of Faith, be it neuer so small, is poured into our hearts, we by and by begin to behold the face of God milde and pleasant, and louing toward vs: yet the same we see from a far off, and far distant from vs, but with so sure sight, that we know we are not deceiued. From thence forward, how much we profit (as we ought continually to profit) as it were by proceeding further, we come vnto so much the neerer, and therefore certainer beholding of him, and by very continuance he is made more familiar vnto vs. So we see, that the minde enlightned with the knowledge of God, is first holden wrapped in much ignorance, which by litle and litle is wiped away. Yet the same minde is not so hindered by being ignorant of some things, or by darkly seeing that which she seeth, but that she enioyeth a cleare knowledge of Gods will toward her, which is the first and principall point in faith. For as if a man being shut vp in prison, haue beames of the sunne shining in sideloog at a narrow window, or as it were but halfe glimmering, he wanteth indeed the free beholding of the sunne, yet he seeth with his eies an vndoubted brightnesse thereof, and receiueth the vse of it: so we being bound with the fetters of an earthly bodie, howsoeuer we be on each side shadowed with much darknesse, yet are we sufficiently enlightned vnto perfect assuredneſse, by the light of God, extending his beames of light vpon vs, though it be but a litle, to shew forth his mercy.

Our faith vnperfect but stedfast, though our hearts be both naturally inclined, and also partly by outward tentatiōs, partly by inward guiltines of conscience prouoked to distrustfulnesse. 1.Cor.13.9. 1.Cor.3.18.

20 Both these points the Apostle very well teacheth in diuerse places. For when he saith, that we know vnperfectly, & prophecie vnperfectly, and see by a darke speaking as by a glasse, he sheweth how slender a little portion of the true godly wisedome is giuen vs in this present life. For though those wordes do not expressly shew that our faith is vnperfect so long as we grone vnder this burden of the flesh, but that it happeneth vnto vs by our owne imperfection that we haue neede to be continually exercised in learning, yet he secretly declareth that that thing which is infinite, cannot be comprehended by our small capacitie, and narrow compasse. And this Paul reporteth of the whole church, but vnto euery one of vs, his owne dulnes is an hinderance and stay that he cannot come so neere as were to be wished. But how sure and vndeceiuable a taste of it ſelfe, euen a ſmall drop of faith doth make vs feele, the ſame Apoſtle ſheweth in another place, where he affirmeth, that by the Goſpel we behold the glory of God with vncouered face, hauing no veile betweene vs and it, ſo effectually that we be transformed into the ſame image. In ſuch entanglements of ignorance there muſt needs be wrapped together both much doubting and fearefull trembling, ſpecially foraſmuch as our heart, by a certaine naturall inſtinct of it ſelfe, is enclined to vnbeleeuingneſſe. Beſide that, there be tentations both infinite in number, and diuers in kinde, doe oftentimes with great ſodaine violence aſſaile vs. But ſpecially our owne conſcience oppreſſed with heauie burden of ſinnes lying vpon it, doth ſometime lament and grone with it ſelfe, and ſometime accuſeth it ſelfe: ſometime ſecretly murmureth, and ſometime is openly troubled. Whether therefore aduerſities doe ſhew an apparance of the wrath of God, or the conſcience doth finde in it ſelfe any proofe or matter of his wrath, from thence vnbeliefe doth take weapons and engines to vanquiſh faith withall: which are alway directed to this end, that we thinking God to be our aduerſarie and hatefully bent againſt vs, ſhould both not hope for any helpe at his hand, and alſo be afraid of him as of our deadly enemie.

21 To beare theſe aſſaults, faith doth arme and fortifie her ſelfe with the word of God. And when ſuch a tentation aſſaileth, that God is our enemie, becauſe he is ſharpe againſt vs: faith on the other ſide anſwereth, that euen when he puniſheth he is alſo mercifull, becauſe his chaſtiſement commeth rather of loue than of wrath. When faith is ſtricken with this thought, that God is a reuenger of iniquities, againſt that ſtroke he ſetteth his pardon ready for all offences, ſo oft as the ſinner reſorteth to the mercifulneſſe of the Lord. So a godly minde howſoeuer it be in maruellous wiſe toſſed and vexed, yet at length riſeth vp aboue all dangers, and neuer ſuffereth the confidence of Gods mercy to be plucked away from it: But rather whatſoeuer contentions doe trouble & weary it, in the end they turne to the aſſuredneſs of this confidence. And hereof this is a proofe: that the holy ones, when they thinke themſelues moſt of all preſſed with the vengeance of God, yet euen then do make their complaints to the ſame God: & when it ſeemeth that they ſhal not be heard at al, euen then neuertheles they cal vpon him. For to what purpoſe were it, to make their mone to him from whom they hoped for no comfort? truely they would neuer finde in their hearts to call vpon him, vnleſſe they beleeued that there were ſome helpe at his hand prepared for them. So the Diſciples, in whom Chriſt blameth their ſmalneſſe of faith, complained indeede that they periſhed, but yet they called to him for help. And when he rebuked them for their ſmall faith, yet he doth not reiect them from the number of his, nor maketh them of the number of the vnbeleeuers, but ſtirreth them to ſhake off that fault. Therefore we affirme againe that which we haue aboue ſpoken, that the roote of faith is neuer plucked out of a godly heart, but ſticketh ſo faſt in the bottome, that howſoeuer it be ſhaken and ſeeme to bend this way or that way, the light therof is ſo neuer quenched or choked vp, but that it lieth at leaſt hidden vnder ſome embers: and by this token is plainly ſhewed that the word which is an vncorruptible ſeede, bringeth foorth fruite like to it ſelfe, the ſpring wherof doth neuer wither and vtterly periſh. For whereas this is the extremeſt matter of deſpaire to the holy ones, to feele according to the conſideration of preſent things, the hand of God bent to their diſtruction: yet Iob affirmeth that his hope ſhall proceed ſo far, that though God doe kill him, yet he will not therefore ceaſe to truſt in him. This is the truth therefore. Vnbeleefe reigneth not within the hearts of the godly, but outwardly aſſaileth them: neither doth ſhe deadly wound them with her weapons, but onely troubleth them, or ſo hurteth them, that yet the wound is curable. For faith, as Paul teacheth, ſerueth vs for a ſhield that being holden vp againſt weapons, doth ſo receiue the force of them, that it either vtterly driueth them backe, or at leaſt ſo breaketh their violence, that they cannot pearce them to danger of life. Therefore when faith is ſhaken, it is like as if a ſtrong ſouldier with the violent ſtroake of a dart be compelled to remooue his foot, and giue ground a little: and when faith it ſelfe is wounded, that is like as if his buckler by ſome ſtroake be in ſome part broken, but yet ſo that it is not ſtrucken through. For alway the godly minde will attaine to riſe thus hie as to ſay with Dauid, if I walke in the middeſt of the ſhadow of death. I will feare none euill, becauſe thou art with me. It is indeed terrible to walke in the darkneſſe of death, and it cannot be but that the faithfull how much ſtrength ſoeuer they haue, muſt be afraid of it. Yet becauſe this thought ſurmounteth it, that they haue God preſent with them, & prouiding for their ſafety, that feare is ouercome with aſſurednes. For (as Auguſtine ſaith) how great engines ſoeuer the deuill raiſeth vp againſt vs, ſo long as he poſſeſſeth not the place of the hart, where faith dwelleth, he is caſt out of the dores. And ſo if we may iudge by the ſucceſſe, the faithfull not onely eſcape ſafe from euery battle, ſo that by and by receiuing freſh courage they are ready to come againe into the field: but alſo that is fulfilled which Iohn ſaith in his canonical Epiſtle: This is the victory that ouercommeth the world, euen your faith. For he affirmeth that it ſhall not onely winne the victorie in one or few battels, or againſt ſome one aſſault, but alſo that it ſhall get the ouer hand of the whole world, although it be a thouſand times aſſailed.

1.Iohn 5.4.

All feare is not repugnant vnto faith.

22 There is another kind of feare and trembling, but ſuch a one as by it the aſſuredneſſe of faith is ſo nothing at all diminiſhed, that thereby it is the more ſoundly ſtabliſhed. That is, when the faithfull either in thinking that the examples of Gods vengeance againſt the wicked are ſhewed for leſſons for them to learne by, do carefully beware that they happen not to prouoke Gods wrath againſt themſelues with the ſame offences: or recording with themſelues their owne miſerie, doe learne to hang altogether vpon the Lord without whom they ſee themſelues to be more fickle and ſooner vaniſhing than any blaſt of winde. For when the Apoſtle, in ſetting foorth the ſcourges wherewith the Lord in old time had puniſhed the people of Iſraell, putteth the Corinthians in feare that they intangle not themſelues with like euils: he doth not thereby abate their affiance, but onely ſhaketh away the dulneſſe of the fleſh by which faith is wont more to be oppreſſed than ſtrengthened. And when he taketh occaſion of the Iewes fall to exhort him that ſtandeth, to take heed that he fall not, he doth not thereby bid vs to wauer, as though we were not fully aſſured of our ſtedfaſtneſſe, but onely he taketh away arrogant preſumption and raſh truſting too much in our owne ſtrength, that after the thruſting out of the Iewes, the Gentiles being receiued into their place, ſhould not too much outragiouſly triumph againſt them. Albeit he ſpeaketh there not onely to the faithfull, but alſo in the ſame ſaying comprehendeth the hypocrites that gloried onely in outward ſhew. For neither doth he admoniſh euery man particularly, but making a compariſon betweene the Iewes & the Gentiles, after that he had ſhewed that the Iewes in this that they were reiected, did ſuffer iuſt iudgement for their vnbeleefe and vnthankfulneſſe, he alſo exhorted the Gentiles that they ſhould not, by being proud and extolling themſelues, looſe the grace of adoption lately conueied into them. But as in that generall reiecting of the Iewes, there remained yet ſome that were not fallen from the couenant of adoption, ſo out of the Gentiles there might ariſe ſome, which without true faith, ſhould be puffed vp onely with fooliſh confidence of the fleſh, and ſo abuſe Gods louing kindneſſe to their owne deſtruction. But although you take this as ſpoken to the elect and faithfull, yet thereupon ſhall follow no inconuenience. For it is one thing to hold downe the raſh preſumption which out of the remnants of the fleſh creepeth ſometime euen into the holy ones, that with vaine confidence it waxe not outragiouſly wanton: and another thing to ſtrike the conſcience with feare, that it reſt not with full aſſuredneſſe in the mercy of God.

1.Cor.10.11.

We may feare at the conſideration of our owne frailtie & corruption, and yet in his mercy reſt with ſure and certaine confidence.

23 Then, when he teacheth, that with feare & trembling we ſhould worke our own ſaluation, he requireth nothing elſe, but that we ſhould accuſtome vs with much abaſing of our ſelues, reuerently to looke vp into the mightineſſe of God. For truely nothing doth ſo much awake vs to caſt all our confidence and aſſurance of mind vpon the Lord as doth the diſtruſt of our ſelues and carefulneſſe conceiued by knowledge in conſcience of our owne wretchednesſe. And according to this meaning is that ſaying in the Prophet to be taken: In the multitude of thy goodnes I will enter into thy temple: I will worſhip in feare. Where he comely conioyneth the boldneſſe of Faith that leaneth vpon Gods mercy with a reuerent feare, which we muſt needs feele ſo oft as comming into the ſight of Gods maieſtie, we perceiue by the glorious brightneſſe thereof, how great is our own filthines. And Salomon ſaith truely, where he pronounceth the man bleſſed, that continually maketh his owne hart afraid, for by hardning thereof

men fall headlong into euill. But ſuch feare he meaneth as may make vs more heedfull, not ſuch whereby we ſhould be troubled and vtterly fall: euen ſuch a feare as when the minde confounded in it ſelfe, doth recouer it ſelfe againe in God: when deſpairing it ſelfe, it reuiueth by truſt in him. Therefore there is no cauſe to the contrarie, but that the faithfull may at one time both be in feare, & alſo enioy moſt aſſured comfort, in reſpect that ſometime they turne their eies to behold their owne vanitie, and ſometime they caſt the thought of their minde vpon the trueth of God. But how (will ſome man ſay) ſhall feare and faith dwell both in one minde? Euen thus, as contrarily vnſenſible dulneſſe, and careſulneſſe. For whreas the wicked trauaile to procure to themſelues a want of griefe, that no feare of God might trouble them, yet, the iudgement of God ſo preſſeth them, that they cannot attaine that which they deſire. So there is nothing to withſtand, but that God may exerciſe them that be his to humilitie, that in fighting valiantly, they may reſtraine themſelues vnder the bridle of modeſtie. And by the proceſſe of of the text it appeareth, that this was the entent of the Apoſtle, where he aſſigneth the cauſe of feare, and trembling to be the good pleaſure of God, whereby he giueth to them that be his both to will well, and valiantly to goe through with it. According to this meaning ought we to take that ſaying of the Prophet: The children of Iſraell ſhal feare God and his goodneſſe: becauſe not onely godlineſſe engendreth the reuerence of God, but the very ſweetneſſe and pleaſant taſte of grace, filleth man being diſcouraged in himſelfe with feare and admiration, to make him hang vpon God, and humbly yeeld himſelfe ſubiect to his power. Oſe. 3. 5.

24 Yet we doe not hereby make roome to that moſt peſtilent Philoſophie, which many halfe Papiſts at this day begin to coine in corners. For, becauſe they cannot defend that groſſe doubtfulneſſe which hath bene taught in Schooles, they flie to another deuiſe, to make a confidence mingled with diſtruſtfulneſſe. They confeſſe, that ſo oft as we looke vnto Chriſt, we finde in him full matter to hope well: but becauſe we are alwaies vnworthy of thoſe good things that are offered vs in Chriſt, they would haue vs to wauer and ſtagger in beholding our owne vnworthineſſe. Briefly, they place conſcience ſo betweene hope and feare, that it altreth from the one to the other, by enterchangeable times and courſes: and they ſo compare faith and hope together, that when the one ſpringeth vp, the other is preſſed downe, when the one ariſeth, the other againe falleth. So when Sathan ſeeth that thoſe open engines wherewith before time he was wont to deſtroy the aſſuredneſſe of faith, do now nothing preuaile, he endeuoureth by crooked vnderminings to ouerthrow it. But what maner of confidence ſhall that be, which ſhall now and then yeelde to deſperation? If (ſay they) thou conſider Chriſt, there is aſſured ſaluation: but if thou returne to thy ſelfe, there is aſſured damnation. Therefore of neceſſitie diſtruſt and good hope muſt by enterchangeable courſes raigne in thy minde: As though we ought to imagine Chriſt ſtanding a far off, and not rather dwelling within vs. For therefore we looke for ſaluation at his hande, not becauſe he appeareth a far off vnto vs, but becauſe he hath graffed vs into his bodie, and ſo maketh vs partakers not onely of all his good things, but alſo of himſelfe. Therefore I turne this their argument againſt themſelues: if thou conſider thy ſelfe, there is certaine damnation. But becauſe Chriſt with all his good things is by way of communicating ſo giuen vnto thee that all his things are made thine, and thou art made a member of him, yea and all one with him: his righteouſneſſe drowneth thy ſinnes, his ſaluation taketh away thy damnation: he by his worthineſſe commeth betweene thee and God, that thy vnworthineſſe come not in the ſight of God. Briefly, this is the trueth: we ought neither to ſeperate Chriſt from vs, nor vs from him, but with both hands to hold faſt that fellowſhip whereby he hath coupled himſelfe vnto vs. So the Apoſtle teacheth vs: The bodie indeed (ſaith he) is dead by reaſon of ſinne: but the ſpirit of Chriſt that dwelleth in you, is life for righteouſneſſe. According to theſe mens triſling deuiſe he ſhould haue ſaid, Chriſt indeed hath life with himſelfe: but you, as you be ſinners, remaine ſubiect to death and damnation. But he ſaith far otherwiſe. For he teacheth that that damnation which we deſerue of our ſelues, is ſwallowed vp by the ſaluation of Chriſt: & to proue it, he vſeth the ſame reaſon that I haue alleged, becauſe Chriſt is not without vs, but dwelleth within vs, & cleueth vnto vs not only with an vndiuidable

By faith we looke for aſſured ſaluation in Chriſt notwithſtanding the weakenes and vnworthines which we finde to be in our ſelues.

Rom. 8. 10.

knot of fellowship, but with a certaine maruellous communion daily more and more groweth with vs into one bodie, till he be made altogether one with vs. And yet I deny not, as I haue said a litle before, that sometime there happen certaine interruptions of faith, as the weakenesse thereof is among violent sodaine motions bowed hither or thither. So in the thicke mist of tentation the light thereof is choaked, but whatsoeuer happeneth, it ceaseth not from endeuour to seeke God.

How wretched soeuer we be in our selues, by faith we know that by Gods most gratious acceptatiõ we are blessed.

25 And no otherwise doth Bernard argue, when he purposely intreateth of this question in his fifth Homilie in the dedication of the temple. Oftentimes (I say) by the benefit of God studying vpon the soule, me thinke I finde in it two things as it were contrarie. If I behold the soule it selfe, as it is in it selfe and of it selfe, I can say nothing more truely of it, than that it is vtterly brought to naught. What neede I now to reckon vp particularly all the miseries of the soule, how it is loaden with sinnes, couered with darknesse, entangled with deceitfull entisements, itching with lustes, subiect to passions, filled with illusions, alway enclined to euill, bent to all kinds of vice, finally full of shame and confusion? Now if all the very righteousnesses of it being looked vpon by the light of trueth be found like a cloth stained with flowers, then what shall the vnrighteousnesses thereof be accounted? If the light that is in vs be darknesse, how great shall the very darknesse be? What then? without doubt man is made like vnto vanitie: man is brought to naught: man is nothing. But how then? is he vtterly nothing whom God doth magnifie? How then is he nothing, toward whom Gods heart is set? Brethren, let vs take heart againe. Though we be nothing in our owne hearts, peraduenture there may somewhat of vs lie hidden in the heart of God. O father of mercies? O father of the miserable, how doest thou set thy heart toward vs? For thy heart is where thy treasure is. But how be we thy treasure, if we be nothing? All nations are so before thee as if they were not, they shall be reputed as nothing. Euen before thee, not within thee: so in the iudgement of thy truth, but not in the affection of thy pitie. Thou callest those things that are not, as though they were. Therefore both they are not, because thou callest those things that are not, and also they are because thou callest them. For though they are not, in respect of themselues, yet with thee they are, according to that saying of Paul, not of the workes of righteousnesse, but of him that calleth. And then he saith, that this coupling together of both considerations is maruellous. Truely those things that are knit together, doe not the one destroy the other. Which also in the conclusion he more plainly declareth in these words. Now if with both these considerations we diligently looke vpon our selues what we be, yea in the one consideration how we be nothing, and in the other how much we be magnified, I thinke our glorying seemeth to be tempered, but peraduenture it is more encreased. Truely it is perfectly stablished, that we glory not in our selues but in the Lord. If we thinke thus: If he hath determined to saue vs we shall by and by be deliuered: now in this we may take courage. But let vs climbe vp into a higher watch tower, and seeke for the City of God, seeke for the Temple, seeke for the house, seeke for the spouse. I haue not forgetten, but I say it with feare and reuerence, we I say be but in the heart of God. We be, but by his allowing as worthy, not by our owne worthinesse.

A feare which we ought to nourish in our selues

Pro.1.7.

Iob 8.28.

26 Now, the feare of the Lord, whereof commonly in euery place witnesse is borne to all the holy ones, and which is in some places called the beginning of wisedome, and in some places wisedome it selfe, although it be but one, yet it proceedeth from a double vnderstanding. For God hath in himselfe the reuerence both of a father and of a Lord. Therefore he that will truely worship him, will endeuour to shew himselfe both an obedient sonne and a seruiceable seruant vnto him. The obedience that is giuen to him as to a father, the Lord by the Prophet calleth honour: the seruice that is done to him as to a Lord, he calleth feare. The sonne (saith he) honoreth the father, and the seruant the Lord. If I be a father, where is my honour? If I be a Lord, where is my feare? But howsoeuer he putteth difference betweene them, thou seest how he confoundeth them both together. Therefore let the feare of the Lord be vnto vs a reuerence mingled with that same honour and feare. Neither is it any maruell if one minde receiue both those affections. For he that considereth with himselfe what a father God is vnto vs, he hath cause enough, although there were no hels at all, why he should ſhould dread his diſpleaſure more greeuouſly than any death. But alſo (ſuch is the wantonneſſe of our fleſh to run to licentiouſneſſe of ſinning) to reſtraine the ſame by all meanes, we ought therewithall to take hold of this thought, that the Lord vnder whoſe power we liue, abhorreth all iniquitie, whoſe vengeance they ſhall not eſcape, that in liuing wickedly doe prouoke his wrath againſt themſelues.

27 But that which Iohn ſaith, that feare is not in charitie, but perfect charity caſteth out feare, becauſe feare containeth puniſhment, diſagreeth not with this that we ſay. For the wicked feare not God in this reſpect that they dread to incurre his diſpleaſure, if they might doe it without puniſhment: but becauſe they know him to be armed with power to reuenge: therefore they ſhake for feare at the hearing of his wrath. And alſo they ſo feare his wrath, becauſe they thinke that it hangeth ouer them, for that they looke euery moment when it ſhall fall vpon their heads. As for the faithfull: they (as is aboue ſaid) both feare his diſpleaſure more than puniſhment, and are not troubled with feare of puniſhment as if it did hang ouer their neckes, but they are made the more warie not to procure it. So ſaith the Apoſtle when he ſpeaketh to the faithfull: Be ye not deceiued: for this commeth the wrath of God vpon the children of vnbeleefe. He threatneth not that Gods wrath will come vpon them, but putteth them in minde to thinke vpon this, that the wrath of God is prepared for ſuch wicked doings as he had recited, that they themſelues ſhould not be willing alſo to prooue it. Albeit it ſeldome happeneth, that the reprobate be awaked with onely and bare threatnings, but rather being alreadie groſſe and vnſenſibly dull with their owne hardneſſe, ſo oft as God thundreth from heauen they harden themſelues to obſtinacie, but when they are once ſtriken with his hand, then whether they will or no, they be enforced to feare. This feare they commonly call a ſeruile feare: and in compariſon ſet it for contrary to free-natured and willing feare which becommeth children. Some other doe ſubtlely thruſt in a middle kind, becauſe that ſame ſeruile and conſtrained affection ſometime ſo ſubdueth mens mindes that they come willingly to the feare of God.

What feare it is which perfect charitie caſteth out.

Ephe. 5. 16.
Col. 3. 6.

28 Now we vnderſtand, that in the good will of God, whereunto faith is ſaid to haue reſpect, the poſſeſſion of ſaluation and eternall life is obtained. For if we can want no good thing, while God is fauourable vnto vs, it aboundantly ſufficeth vs to the aſſuredneſſe of ſaluation, when he himſelfe doth aſſure vs of his loue. Let him ſhew his face (ſaith the Prophet) and we ſhall be ſafe. Whereupon the Scriptures determine this to be the ſumme of our ſaluation, that God putting away all enmities, hath receiued vs into fauour. Whereby they ſhew, that when God is reconciled vnto vs, there remaineth no perill, but that all things ſhall proſper well with vs. Therefore faith hauing taken hold of the loue of God, hath promiſes of the preſent life, and of the life to come, and perfect aſſuredneſſe of all good things: but that ſame ſuch as may be gathered out of the word of God. For faith doth not certainely promiſe to it ſelfe either the length or honor or wealth of this life, foraſmuch as God willed none of theſe things to be appointed vnto vs, but is contented with this aſſuredneſſe, that God will neuer faile how ſoeuer many things faile vs that pertaine to the maintenance of this preſent life. But the cheefe aſſuredneſſe of faith reſteth in expectation of the life to come, which is ſet out of doubt by the word of God. But whatſoeuer miſeries and calamities betide vnto them whom God loueth, they can not worke the contrarie, but that his good will is perfect felicitie. Therefore when we did meane to expreſſe the ſumme of bleſſednes, we named the fauour of God, out of which ſpring doe flow vnto vs all kinds of good things. And this we may commonly note throughout the Scriptures, that whenſoeuer mention is made not onely of eternall ſaluation, but alſo of any good thing in vs, we be alway called backe to the loue of God. For which cauſe Dauid ſaith, that the goodneſſe of God when it is felt in a godly heart, is ſweeter and more to be deſired than life it ſelfe. Finally, if all things elſe doe flow vnto vs according to our owne wiſhing, and we be vncertaine of Gods loue or hatred, our felicitie ſhall be accurſed, and therefore miſerable: But if the fauourable face of God doe ſhine vnto vs, euen our very miſeries ſhall be bleſſed, becauſe they are turned to helpes of our ſaluation. As Paul, when he heapeth vp a rehearſall of all aduerſities, yet he glorieth that he was not by them ſeuered from the loue of God: and in his prayers he alway beginneth at the fauour of God, from from whence floweth all prosperity. Likewise Dauid setteth the onely fauour of God against all the terrours that trouble vs. If (saith he) I shall walke in the middest of the shadow of death, I will feare no euils, because thou art with me. And we alway feele that our mindes doe wauer, vnlesse being contented with the fauour of God, they seeke their peace in it, and haue this inwardly fixed in them that is said in the Psalme, Blessed is the people whose God is the Lord, and the nation whom he hath chosen to him for his inheritance.

Psal. 23. 4.

Psal. 33. 12.

Though faith doe beleeue whatsoeuer God speaketh, yet it principally respecteth the promise of saluation freely offered in the Gospell.

29 We make the foundation of faith to be the free promise of God, because faith properly staieth vpon it. For though faith doe beleeue God to be true in all things, whether he command or forbid, whether he promise or threaten, and also obediently receiueth his commandements, and bewareth of things that he prohibiteth, and hath regard to his threatnings, yet properly it beginneth at the promise, and therein continueth, and thereupon endeth. For faith seeketh for life in God, which is not found in commandements or declarations of penalties, but in promise of mercy, and in no other promise, but such as is freely giuen. For the conditionall promise, by which we are sent to our owne workes, doth no otherwise promise life, but if we perceiue it to stand in our selues. Therefore if we will not haue our faith to tremble and wauer, we must stay it with that promise of saluation, which is willingly and liberally offered vs of the Lord, rather in respect of our misery, than of our owne worthinesse. Wherefore the Apostle beareth this witnesse of the Gospell, that it is the word of faith, which name he taketh both from the commandements and also from the promises of the law, because there is nothing that can stablish faith, but that liberall embassage, by which God reconcileth the world to himselfe. Therefore the same Apostle oftentimes maketh a relation of faith and the Gospell together, when he teacheth that the ministery of the Gospell was committed to him vnto the obedience of faith, that the same is the power of God, to saluation to euery one that beleeueth: that in it is reuealed the righteousnesse of God from faith to faith. And no maruell. For sith the Gospell is the ministery of reconciliation, there is no other testimony sure enough of Gods good will toward vs, the knowledge whereof faith requireth. Therefore when we say that faith must rest vpon free promise, we doe not deny but that the faithfull doe euery way imbrace and receiue the word of God, but we appoint the promise of mercy to be the proper marke of faith. Euen as the faithfull ought indeed to acknowledge God to be the iudge and punisher of wicked doings, and yet they properly haue regard vnto his mercifull kindnesse: for as much as he is discribed to them to be considered such a one as is louing and mercifull, far from wrath, of much goodnesse, gentle vnto all, powring foorth his mercy vpon all his workes.

The reasons why the promise of mercy in Christ is put not for the only, yet for the principall obiect of faith.

Heb. 11.

30 Neither yet doe I regard the barkings of Pighius, or such other dogs, when they finde fault with this restraint, as though in diuiding faith it did take hold but of one peece thereof. I grant (as I haue already said) that the generall obiect of faith (as they tearme it) is the truth of God, whether he threaten or put vs in hope of fauour. Wherefore the Apostle ascribeth this to faith, that Noe feared the distruction of the world, when it was not yet seene. If the feare of a punishment shortly to come, was the worke of faith, then ought not the threatnings to be excluded out of the definition of faith. This is indeed true. But the cauillers doe vniustly accuse vs, as though we denied that faith hath respect to all the parts of the word of God. For our meaning is onely to shew those two things, first, that faith neuer steadfastly standeth vntill it come to free promise: and then that we are no otherwise by it to be reconciled to God, but because it coupleth vs to Christ. Both those points are worthy to be noted. We seeke such a faith, which may make difference betweene the children of God and the reprobate, betweene the faithfull and the vnbeleeuing. If a man doe beleeue that God both iustly commandeth all that he commandeth, and truely threatneth, shall he be therefore called faithfull? Nothing lesse. Therefore there can be no steadfast stay of faith, vnlesse it be grounded vpon the mercy of God. But now to what end doe we dispuite of faith? Is it not that we may learne the way of saluation? But how doth faith bring saluation but in respect that it graffeth vs into the body of Christ? Therefore there is no inconuenience, if in the definition we doe enforce the principall effect thereof.

of, and doe ioine vnto the general name, instead of a difference that marke that seuereth the faithfull from the vnbeleeuing. Finally, the malicious haue nothing to finde fault withall in this doctrine, but they must wrap vp Paul with vs in the same blame, which calleth the Gospell properly the word of faith. Rom. 10. 8.

31 But heereupon againe we gather that which we haue before declared, that faith doth no lesse neede the word than the fruite doth neede the liuely roote of the tree, because no other (as Dauid testifieth) can trust in the Lord, but they that know his name. But this knowledge is not according to euery mans imagination, but so far as God himselfe is witnesse of his owne goodnesse. Which the same Prophet confirmeth in another place, saying: Thy saluation is according to thy word. Againe, I haue trusted in thy word, saue me. Where is to be noted the relation of faith to the word, and then how saluation followeth. And yet in the meane time we doe not exclude the power of God, with beholding whereof, vnlesse faith sustaine it selfe, it can neuer giue vnto God his due honour. Paul seemeth to rehearse a certaine slender and common thing of Abraham, that he beleeued that God which had promised him the blessed seede, was able to performe it. Againe in another place, speaking of himselfe: I know whom I haue beleeued, and I am sure that he is able to keepe that which I haue left with him vntill that day. But if a man waigh with himselfe how many doubtings of the power of God doe oftentimes creepe into mans minde, he shall well perceiue that they which do highly esteeme it as it is worthy, haue not a little profited in faith. We all will confesse that God is able to doe whatsoeuer he will, but when euen the least tentation throweth vs downe with feare, and amazeth vs with horror, thereby appeareth plainly, that we diminish the estimation of Gods power, when we prefer aboue it those things, that Sathan threatneth against Gods promises. This is the reason why Esay, meaning to print into the hearts of the people the assuredness of saluation, doth so honorably intreat of the infinite power of God. It seemeth oft that so soone as he hath begun to speak of the hope of pardon and reconciliation, he by and by turneth to another thing, and wandreth about in long and superfluous circumstances, rehearsing how marueilously the Lord gouerneth the frame of Heauen and earth and the whole order of nature, yet is here nothing that serueth not fitly for the circumstance of the matter that he speaketh of. For vnlesse the power of God whereby he is able to doe all things be presently set before our eyes, our eares will hardly heare the worde, or will not esteeme it so much as it is worth. Beside that, here is declared his effectuall power, because godlinesse (as we haue already shewed in another place) doth alway apply the power of God to vse and worke, specially it serueth before it selfe those workes of God, whereby he hath testified himselfe to be a father. Hereupon commeth that in the scriptures is so often mention made of the redemption, whereby the Israelites might haue learned that God which was once the author of saluation, will be an euerlasting preseruer thereof. And Dauid putteth vs in minde by his owne example, that those benefits which God hath particularly bestowed vpon euery man, doe afterward auaile to the confirmation of his faith. Yea when God seemeth to haue forsaken vs, it behoueth vs to stretch our wits further, that his auncient benefits may recomfort vs, as it is said in another Psalme, I haue bene mindfull of olde daies. I haue studied vpon all thy works, &c. Againe, I will remember the workes of the Lord, and his maruels from the beginning. But because without the worde all quickly vanisheth away that we conceiue of the power of God and of his workes, therefore we doe not without cause affirme that there is no faith, vnlesse God giue light vnto it with testimonie of his grace. But here a question might be mooued, what is to be thought of Sara and Rebecca, both which being moued as it seemeth with zeale of faith, passed beyond the bounds of the word. Sara, when she feruently desired the promised issue, gaue her bondmaide to her husband. It cannot be denied but that she many waies sinned: but now I touch onely this fault, that being carried away with her zeale, she did not restraine her selfe within the boundes of Gods worde, yet it is certaine that that desire proceeded of faith. Rebecca being certified by the Oracle of God of the election of her sonne Iacob, procured his blessing by euill crafty meanes: she deceiued her husband the witnesse and minister of the grace of God: she compelled her sonne to lie: she by diuers guiles and deceites corrupted corrupted the truth of God: Finally, in making a ſcorne of his promiſe, ſhe did as much as in her lay, deſtroy it. And yet this act, how much ſoeuer it was euill, and woorthie of blame, was not without faith, for it was neceſſarie that ſhe ſhould ouercome many offences, that ſhe might ſo earneſtly endeuour to attaine that which without hope of earthly profite was full of great troubles and dangers. As we may not ſay that the holy Patriarch Iſaac was altogether without faith, becauſe he being by the ſame oracle of God admoniſhed of the honour transferred to the yoonger ſonne, yet ceaſed not to be more fauourably bent to his firſt begotten ſonne Eſau. Truely theſe examples do teach, that oftentimes errors are mingled with faith, but yet ſo that faith if it be a true faith, hath alway the vpper hand. For as the particular errour of Rebecca did not make voide the effect of the bleſſing, ſo neither did it make voide her faith which generally raigned in her minde, and was the beginning and cauſe of that doing. Neuertheleſſe therein Rebecca vttered how readie mans minde is to fall ſo ſoone as he giueth himſelfe, neuer ſo little libertie. But though mans default and weakeneſſe doth darken faith, yet it doth not quench it: in the meane time it putteth vs in minde, how carefully we ought to hang vpon the mouth of God, and alſo confirmeth that which we haue taught, that Faith vaniſheth away, vnleſſe it be vpholden by the Word: as the minds both of Sara, and Iſaac and Rebecca had become vaine in their crooked wanderings out of the way, vnleſſe they had beene by Gods ſecret bridle holden in obedience of the word.

Faith embraceth no promiſe but in Chriſt by whom the thing promiſed is deriued from God to vs.

Rom. 1. 3.
2. Cor. 1. 20.

32 Againe, not without cauſe we include all the promiſes in Chriſt, for as much as in the knowledge of him the Apoſtle includeth all the Goſpell: and in another place he teacheth, that all the promiſes of God are in him, yea and Amen. The reaſon whereof is readie to be ſhewed. For if God promiſe any thing, he therin ſheweth his good will: ſo that there is no promiſe of his, that is not a teſtimonie of his loue. Neither maketh it any matter that the wicked when they haue great and continuall benefits of Gods liberalitie heaped vpon them, doe thereby wrap themſelues in ſo much the more greeuous iudgement. For ſith they doe neither thinke nor acknowledge that thoſe things come vnto them from the hand of God, for if they acknowledge it, they doe not with themſelues conſider his goodnes, therefore they cannot thereby be better taught of his mercie than bruit beaſtes, which according to the meaſure of their eſtate, doe receiue the ſame fruit of Gods liberalitie, and yet they perceiue it not. Neither doth it any more make againſt vs, that many times in refuſing the promiſes appointed for them, they doe by that occaſion procure to themſelues the greater vengeance. For although the effectuall working of the promiſes doe then onely appeare, when they haue found faith with vs, yet the force and naturall propertie of them is neuer extinguiſhed by our vnbeleefe or vnthankfulneſſe. Therefore when the Lord by his promiſes doth prouoke man not onely to receiue, but alſo to thinke vpon the fruites of his bountifulneſſe, he doth therewithall declare vnto him his loue. Whereupon we muſt returne to this point, that euery promiſe is a teſtifying of Gods loue toward vs. But it is out of queſtion, that no man is loued of God but in Chriſt, he is the beloued ſonne, in whom the loue of the Father abideth and reſteth, and then from him powreth it ſelfe abroad vnto vs: as Paul teacheth, that we haue obtained fauor in the beloued one. Therefore it muſt needs be deriued and come vnto vs by meane of him. For this cauſe the Apoſtle in another place calleth him our peace: in another place he ſetteth him out as a bond, whereby God is with fatherly naturall kindneſſe bound vnto vs. It followeth then that we muſt caſt our eies vpon him, ſo oft as any promiſe is offered vs. And that Paul teacheth no abſurditie, that all Gods promiſes whatſoeuer they be, are confirmed and fulfilled in him. There be certaine examples that make for the contrarie. For it is not likely that Naaman the Syrian, when he required of the Prophet the maner how to worſhip God aright, was inſtructed concerning the Mediator: yet his godlineſſe is praiſed. Cornelius a Gentile and a Romane, could ſcarcely vnderſtand that which was knowen not to all the Iewes, yea and that very darkely: yet his almes and prayers were acceptable to God, and the ſacrifice of Naaman, by the Prophets anſwere allowed. Which thing neither of thē could obtaine but by faith. Likewiſe it may be ſaid of the Eunuche to whom Philip was carried, which if he had not had ſome faith, would not haue taken vpon him the trauell and expenſes of ſo long a iourney, to worſhip. Yet we ſee, when

Philip examined him, how he bewraied his ignorance of the Mediatour. And truly I grant that their faith was partly vnexpreſſed, not onely concerning Chriſts perſon, but alſo concerning his power and the office committed vnto him of the father. Yet in the meanetime it is certaine, that they were inſtructed in ſuch principles, as gaue them ſome taſte of Chriſt, although but very ſmall. Neither ought this to ſeeme ſtrange. For neither would the Eunuch haue come in haſt to Ieruſalem from a far country to worſhip an vnknowen God, neither did Cornelius when he had once embraced the Iewiſh religion ſpend ſo much time, without being acquainted with the firſt grounds of true doctrine. As for Naaman, it had been too fond an abſurdity for Elizeus when he taught him of ſmall things, to haue ſaid nothing of the principall point. Therefore although there were among them a darke knowledge of Chriſt, yet it is not likely that there was no knowledge becauſe they did vſe themſelues in the ſacrifices of the law, which muſt haue beene diſcerned by the very end of them, that is Chriſt, from the falſe ſacrifices of the Gentiles.

33 But this bare and outward declaration of the word of God, ought to haue largely ſufficed to make it to be beleeued, if our owne blindneſſe and ſtubbornneſſe did not withſtand it. But our minde hath ſuch an inclination to vanity, that it can neuer cleaue faſt vnto the truth of God, and hath ſuch a dulneſſe, that it is alway blinde and cannot ſee the light thereof. Therefore there is nothing auailably done by the word without the inlightning of the holy Ghoſt. Whereby alſo appeareth, that faith is far aboue mans vnderſtanding. Neither ſhall it be ſufficient that the minde be lightened with the ſpirit of God, vnleſſe the heart be alſo ſtrengthened and ſtabliſhed with his power. Wherein the ſchoolemen doe altogether erre, which in conſidering of faith do onely take hold of a bare and ſimple aſſent by knowledge, leauing out the confidence and aſſuredneſſe of the heart. Therefore faith is both waies a ſingular gift of God, both that the minde of man is cleanſed to taſte the truth of God, and that his heart is ſtabliſhed therein. For the holy Ghoſt not onely is the beginner of faith, but alſo by degrees increaſeth it, vntill by it he bring vs to the heauenly kingdome. That good thing (ſaith Paul) which was committed to thy keeping, keepe in the holy Ghoſt which dwelleth in vs. But how Paul ſaith that the holy Ghoſt is giuen by the hearing of faith, we may eaſily diſſolue it. If there had beene but one onely gift of the holy Ghoſt, then it had beene an abſurdity for him to call the holy Ghoſt the effect of faith, which is the author and cauſe of faith. But when he maketh report of the gifts wherewith God garniſheth his Church, and by encreaſings of faith bringeth it to perfection, it is no marueil if he aſcribe thoſe things to faith which maketh vs fit to receiue them. This is reckoned a moſt ſtrange concluſion, when it is ſaid, that no man but he to whom it is giuen can beleeue in Chriſt. But that is partly becauſe they doe not conſider either how ſecret and high the heauenly wiſdome is, or how great mans dulneſſe is in conceiuing the myſteries of God: and partly becauſe they looke not vnto that aſſured and ſtedfaſt conſtantneſſe of heart, that is to ſay, the chiefe part of faith.

The outward declaratiõ of the word without an inward enlightening by the ſpirit doth not ſuffice either to breed or increaſe faith in vs.

2. Tim. 1. 14. Gal. 3. 2.

34 But if (as Paul preached) no man is witneſſe of the will of man, but the ſpirite of man that is within him, then how ſhould man be ſure of the will of God? And if the truth of God be vncertaine among vs, in thoſe things that we preſently behold with our eie, how ſhould it be aſſured and ſteadfaſt among vs there where the Lord promiſeth ſuch things as neither eie ſeeth, nor wit comprehendeth? But heerein mans ſharpneſſe of vnderſtanding is ſo ouerthrowen and faileth, that the firſt degree of profiting in Gods ſchoole, is to forſake his owne wit. For by it as by a veile caſt before vs, we are hindered that we cannot attaine the myſteries of God, which are not diſcloſed but to little ones. For neither doth fleſh and bloud diſcloſe nor naturall man perceiue thoſe things that are of the ſpirit, but rather to him the learning of God is fooliſhneſſe, becauſe it is ſpiritually to be iudged. Therfore heerein the helpe of the holy Ghoſt is neceſſary, or rather heerein his force onely raigneth. There is no man that knoweth the minde of God, or hath beene his counſeller: but the holy ſpirit ſearcheth out all things, euen the deepe ſecrets of God, by whom it is brought to paſſe, that we know the minde of Chriſt. No man (ſaith he) can come to me: vnleſſe my father that ſent mee, draw him. Euery one therefore that hath heard and learned of my father, commeth. Not that that any man hath seene the father, but he that is sent of God. Euen as therefore we cannot come vnto Christ, but being drawen by the spirit of God: so when we be drawen, we are lifted vp in wit and minde aboue our vnderstanding. For the soule enlightned by him, taketh as it were a new sharpnesse of vnderstanding, wherewith it may behold heauenly mysteries, with brightnesse whereof it was before dazled in it selfe. And so mans vnderstanding receiuing brightnesse by the light of the holy Ghost, doth neuer till then truly begin to tast of those things that belong to the kingdome of God, being before altogether vnsauory and without iudgement of tast to take assay of them. Therefore when Christ did notably set out vnto two of his disciples the mysteries of his kingdome, yet he nothing preuailed, vntill he opened their senses that they might vnderstand the Scriptures. When the Apostles were so taught by his godly mouth, yet the Spirit of Truth must be sent vnto them, to powre into their mindes the same doctrine which they had heard with their eares. The word of God is like vnto the Sunne that shineth vnto all them to whom it is preached, but to no profit among blinde men. But we are all in this behalfe blinde by nature, therefore it cannot pearce into our minde but by the inward master the holy Ghost, making by his enlightning an entry for it.

Luke 24. 27. & 45. Iohn 16. 13.

35 In another place, when we had to entreat of the corruption of nature, we haue more largely shewed how vnfit men are to beleeue. Therefore I will not weary the readers with repeating the same againe. Let this be sufficient that the spirit of faith is called of Paul faith it selfe, which the spirit giueth vs, but not which we haue naturally. Therefore he praieth that God fulfill in the Thessalonians all his good pleasure, and the worke of faith in power. Wherein calling faith the worke of God, and giuing it that title for a name of addition, and calling it by figure of apposition Gods good pleasure, he denieth that it is of mans owne motion: and not contented therewith he addeth further, that it is a declaration of Gods power: writing to the Corinthians, where he saith, that faith hangeth not vpon the wisdome of men, but is grounded vpon the power of the holy Ghost. He speaketh indeed of outward myracles: but because the reprobates are blinde at the beholding of them, hee comprehendeth also that inward seale, whereof he maketh mention in another place. And God the more gloriously to set foorth his liberality in so noble a gift, vouchsafeth not to grant it to all vniuersally without difference, but by singular priuiledge giueth it to whom he will. For proofe whereof we haue alleaged testimonies before. Of which Augustine being a faithfull expositour, crieth out that it would please the Sauiour to teach him, and that the very beleeuing it selfe, is of gift and not of deseruing. No man (saith he) commeth to me, vnlesse my father draw him, and to whom it is giuen of my father. It is maruellous that two doe heare, the one despiseth, the other ascendeth vp. Let him that despiseth, impute it to himselfe: let him that ascendeth, not arrogantly assigne it to himselfe. In another place. Why is it giuen to one and not to another? It grieueth me not to say it, this is the depth of the crosse. Out of I wot not what depth of the iudgements of God which we may not search proceedeth all that we can. What I can, I see: whereby I can, I see not, sauing that I see thus far, that it is of God. But why him, and not him? That is much to me. It is a bottomlesse depth, it is the depth of the crosse. I may cry out with wondering, but not shew it in disputing. Finally, the summe commeth to this, that Christ when he enlightneth vs vnto faith by the power of his spirit, doth therewithall graffe vs into his body, that we may be made partakers of all good things.

The light of faith is the gift of God not bestowed indifferently vpon all men.

2. Cor. 4. 13. 2. Thess. 1. 11.

36 Now it remaineth that that which the minde hath receiued, may be further conueied into the heart. For the word of God is not throughly receiued by faith, if it swim in the top of the braine, but when it hath taken roote in the bottome of the heart that it may be an inuincible defence to beare and repulse all the engines of tentations. Now if it be true, that the true vnderstanding of the minde is the enlightning thereof, then in such confirmation of the heart, his power much more euidently appeereth, euen by so much as the distrustfulnesse of the heart is greater than the blindnesse of the wit: and as it is harder to haue the minde furnished with assuredenesse, than the wit to be instructed with thinking. Therefore the Spirit performeth the office of a seale,

We haue not faith as soone as the truth is conceiued in our mindes, except the spirit seale it also to our hearts.

to ſeale vp in our harts thoſe ſame promiſes, the aſſurance whereof it firſt imprinted in our wits, and ſerueth for an earneſt to confirme and ſtabliſh them. Sith yee beleeued (ſaith the Apoſtle) yee are ſealed vp with the holy Spirit of promiſe, which is the earneſt of our inheritance. See you not how he teacheth that by the Spirit the harts of the faithfull are grauen as with ſeale? and how for the ſame reaſon he calleth him the Spirit of promiſe, becauſe he ratifieth the Goſpell vnto vs? Likewiſe to the Corinthians he ſaith: God which annointed vs, which hath alſo ſealed vs, and giuen the earneſt of his Spirit in our hart. And in another place when he ſpeaketh of confidence and boldneſſe of hoping well, he maketh the pledge of the Spirit the foundation thereof. Ephe.1. 2.Cor.1.21.& 5.5.

37 Neither yet haue I forgotten that which I ſaid before, the remembraunce whereof experience continually renueth, that is, that Faith is toſſed with diuerſe doubtings, ſo that the mindes of the godly are ſeldome quiet, or at leaſt doe not alway enioy a peaceable eſtate: but with whatſoeuer engine they be ſhaken, either they riſe vp of the very gulfe of temptations, or doe abide faſt in their ſtanding. Truely this aſſuredneſſe onely nouriſheth and defendeth Faith, when we hold faſt that which is ſaid in the Pſalme. The Lord is our protection, our helpe in trouble, therefore we will not feare, when the earth ſhall tremble, and the mountaines ſhall leape into the hart of the Sea. Alſo this moſt ſweete quietneſſe is ſpoken of in an other place: I lay downe and ſlept, and roſe againe, becauſe the Lord hath ſuſtained me: it is not meant thereby that Dauid was alway with one vndiſturbed courſe framed to a merry cheerfulneſſe: but in reſpect that he taſted the grace of God according to his proportion of Faith, therefore he glorieth that he without feare deſpiſeth all that euer might diſquiet the peace of his minde. Therefore the Scripture meaning to exhort vs to Faith, biddeth vs to be quiet. In Eſay it is ſaid: In hope and ſilence ſhall be your ſtrength. In the Pſalme: Hold thee ſtill in the Lord, and waite for him. Wherewith agreeth that ſaying of the Apoſtle to the Hebrues: Patience is needefull, &c. The aſſurednes of our faith is not extinguiſhed when it is diſquieted. Pſal.46.3. Pſal.36. Eſay 30.15. Pſal.37.7. Heb.10.36.

38 Hereby we may iudge how peſtilent is that doctrine of the Schoolemen, that we can no otherwiſe determine of the grace of God toward vs, than by morall coniecture as euery man thinketh himſelfe woorthy of it. Truely if we ſhall weigh by our workes how God is minded toward vs, I graunt that we can attaine it with any coniecture, be it neuer ſo ſlender: but ſith Faith ought to haue relation to a ſimple and free promiſe, there is left no cauſe of doubting. For with what confidence (I beſeech you) ſhall we be armed, if we ſay that God is fauourable vnto vs vpon this condition, ſo that the pureneſſe of our life doe deſerue it? But becauſe I haue appointed one place properly for the diſcuſſing hereof, therefore I will ſpeake no more of them at this preſent, ſpecially foraſmuch as it is plaine enough, that there is nothing more contrarie to faith, than either coniecture or any thing neere vnto doubting. And they doe very ill writhe to this purpoſe that teſtimonie of the Preacher which they haue oft in their mouthes: No man knoweth whether he be worthie of hatred or loue. For (to ſpeake nothing how this place is in the common tranſlation corruptly turned) yet very children can not be ignorant what Salomon meaneth by ſuch words: that is, that if any man will iudge by the preſent ſtate of things, whom God hateth, or whom God loueth, he laboureth in vaine, and troubleth himſelfe to no profit for his paines: ſith all thinges happen alike, both to the righteous and the wicked, to him that offereth ſacrifices and him that offereth none. Whereupon followeth, that God doth not alway witneſſe his loue to them to whom he maketh all things happen proſperouſly, nor doth alwaies vtter the hatred to them whom he puniſheth. And that he doth to condemne the vanitie of mans wit, ſith it is ſo dull in things moſt needefull to be knowen: as he had writen a little before, that it cannot be diſcerned what the Soule of man differeth from the ſoule of a beaſt, becauſe it ſeemeth to die in like maner. If any man will gather thereof, that the opinion that we hold of the immortalitie of Soules ſtandeth vpon coniecture: may he not worthily be counted a mad man? Are they then in their right wits which gather that there is no certainetie of Gods grace, becauſe we can conceiue none by the carnall beholding of preſent things? The certaintie of grace which we haue by Faith is more than morall or coniecturall. Eccle.9.1. Eccle.3.9.

39 But they alleadge that it is a point of raſh preſumption, to take vpon vs an vndoubted knowledge of Gods will. I would indeede grant it vnto them, if we did take It is no preſumption to know the

so much vpon vs, that we would make the incomprehensible secret purpose of God subiect to the slendernes of our wit: But when we simply say with Paul, that we haue receiued not the spirit of this world, but the Spirit that is of God, by whose teaching we may know those thinges that are giuen vs of God, what can they barke against it, but they must slaunderously speake against the Spirit of God? But if it be a horrible robberie of God to accuse the reuelation that commeth from him, either to be lying, or vnassured or vndoubtfull, what doe we offend in affirming that it is assured? But they say, that this also is not without great presumptuousnesse that we dare so glory of the Spirit of Christ. Who would thinke that their dulnesse were so great that would be counted masters of the world, that they so fowlly stumble in the first principles of Religion? Surely I would not thinke it credible, vnlesse their owne writings that are abroad did testifie it. Paul pronounceth that they onely are the children of God, that are mooued with his Spirit: and these men would haue them that be the children of God, to be mooued with their own spirit, and to be without the Spirit of God. Paul teacheth that we call God our Father, as the holy Ghost ministreth that word vnto vs, which onely can beare witnesse to our Spirit that we are the children of God: These men, although they forbid vs not to call vpon God, yet doe take away his spirit, by whose guiding he should haue beene rightly called vpon. Paul denieth that they are the seruants of Christ, that are not mooued with the Spirit of Christ: these men faigne a Christianitie that needeth not the Spirit of Christ. Paul maketh no hope of the blessed resurrection, vnlesse we feele the holy Ghost abiding in vs: they forge a hope without any such feeling. But peraduenture they will answer, that they doe not denie that we ought to be endued with it, but that it is a point of modestie and humilitie not to acknowledge it. What meaneth he then, when he biddeth the Corinthians to trie whether they be in the Faith, to prooue themselues whether they haue Christ, whom vnlesse a man doe acknowledge to be dwelling in him, he is a reprobate? But by the Spirit that God hath giuen vs (saith Iohn) we know that he abideth in vs. And what doe we else but call the promises of Christ in doubt, when we will be counted the seruants of God without his Spirit, which he hath openly declared, that he would poure out vpon all his? Beside that, we doe wrong to the holy Ghost, which doe separate from him Faith that is his peculiar worke. Sith these are the first lessons of godly religion, it is a token of miserable blindnesse, to haue Christians noted of arrogancie, that dare glory of the presence of the holy Ghost, without which glorying Christianitie it selfe doth not stand. But they declare by their example how truly Christ said, that his Spirit is vnknowen to the world, and is onely knowen of them with whom he abideth.

Not onely our present but our future estate by faith certaine.

40 And because they will not goe about to ouerthrow the stedfastnes of Faith with digging onely of one mine, they assaile it also otherwise. For they say, that although according to our present state of righteousnesse, we may gather a iudgement of the grace of God, yet the knowledge of perseuerance to the ende abideth in suspence. A goodly confidence of saluation forsooth is left vnto vs, if we iudge by morall coniecture, that for a present moment we be in fauour, & what shall become of vs to morrow we cannot tell. The Apostle teacheth farre otherwise: I am surely perswaded (saith he) that neither Angels, nor powers, nor principalities, neither death nor life, neither present things nor things to come, shall seuer vs from the loue wherewith the Lord embraceth vs in Christ. They seeke to escape with a trifling solutiō, prating that the Apostle had that by special reuelation. But they are holden too hard to slip away so. For there he entreateth of those good things that commonly come by Faith to the Faithfull, not those that he himselfe specially feeleth. But the same Paul in another place putteth vs in feare with mention of our weakenesse and vnstedfastnesse: Let him that standeth (saith he) beware that he fall not. It is true, but not such a feare whereby we should be ouerthrowen, but whereby we may learne to humble our selues vnder the mightie hand of God, as Peter expoundeth it. Then how against order and truth is it to limit the assurednesse of Faith to a moment of time, whose propertie is to passe beyond the spaces of this life, and extend further to immortality to come? Sith therefore the Faithfull doe impute it to the grace of God, that being lightened with his Spirit they doe by Faith enioy the beholding of the heauenly life: so far is such glorying from presumptuousnes, that if any man be ashamed to confesse it, he doth therein more bewray his extreme vnthankfulnesse, in vnkindly hiding Gods goodnesse, than he doth declare his modestie or submission.

41 Because it seemed that the nature of Faith could not otherwise better or more plainely be declared than by the substance of the promise vpon which it resteth as vpon her proper foundation, so that if the promise be taken away, Faith by and by falleth downe or rather vanisheth away: therefore we tooke our definition from thence, which yet varieth not from that definition, or rather description of the Apostle, that he applyeth to his discourse, where he saith that Faith is a substance of things to be hoped for, and a certaintie of things that are not seene. For by this worde Hypostasis substance (for that terme he vseth) he meaneth as it were, an vpholding stay, whereupon the godly minde leaneth and resteth. As if he should say that faith is a certaine and assured possession of those things that are promised vs of God, vnlesse a man had rather to take Hypostasis for affiance, which I mislike not, albeit I follow that which is more commonly receiued. Againe, to signifie that euen to the last day when the bookes shalbe opened, they are higher than those things that may be perceiued with our senses, or seene with our eies, or handled with our hands, and that the same are no otherwise possessed by vs, but if we goe beyond the capacitie of our owne wit, and bend our vnderstanding aboue all things that are in the world, yea and climbe aboue our selues, he hath therefore added that this assuredness of possession, is of things that lie in hope, and therefore are not seene. For plaine appearance (as Paul writeth) is not hope, neither hope we for those things that we see. And when he calleth it a certaintie or proofe (or as Augustine hath oft translated it) a coniunction of things not present: for in Greeke it is Elenchos, he saith as much as if he did say, that it is an euident shewing of things not appearing, a seeing of things not seene, a plainnesse of darke things: a presence of things absent, an open shewing of hidden things. For the mysteries of God, such as they be that pertaine to our saluation, cannot be seene in themselues and in their owne nature as they call it: but we behold them onely in his word, of whose trueth we ought to be so fully perswaded, that we ought to hold all that he speaketh as it were already done and fulfilled. But how can the minde lift vp it selfe to receiue such a taste of Gods goodnesse, but that it must needs be therewith wholy kindled to loue God againe? For that flowing plenty of sweetnesse which God hath laid vp in store for them that feare him, cannot be truely knowen, but that it must therewithall vehemently moue affection: and whose affection it once moueth, it vtterly rauisheth and carieth him beyond himselfe. Therefore it is no maruell, if into a peruerse and crooked heart neuer entreth this affection, by which being conueyed vp into the very heauen, we are suffered to come to the most secretly hidden treasures of God, and the most sacred priuy places of his kingdome, which may not be defiled with the entrance of an vncleane heart. For that which the Schoolemen teach, that charitie is before faith and hope, is a meere madnesse. For it is faith onely that first engendreth charitie in vs. How much more rightly doth Bernard teach: I beleeue (saith he) that the testimonie of conscience which Paul calleth the glory of the godly, consisteth in three things. For first of all it is necessarie to beleeue that thou canst not haue forgiuenesse of sinnes, but by the pardon of God: then that thou canst haue no good worke at all, vnlesse he also giue it: last of all that thou canst by no workes deserue eternall life, vnlesse it also be giuen freely. A little after he addeth that these things suffice not, but that there is a certaine beginning of faith, because in beleeuing that sinnes cannot be forgiuen but of God, we ought also to beleeue that they are not forgiuen vs, till also we be perswaded by the testimonie of the holy Ghost, that saluation is laid vp in store for vs: because God forgiueth sinnes, he himselfe giueth merits, and he himselfe also giueth rewards, that we may not stay still in this beginning. But these and other things shalbe to be entreated of in places fit for them. Now let it onely suffice to know what faith is.

42 Now whersoeuer this liuely faith shalbe, it cannot be possible but that it hath with it the hope of eternall saluation, as an vndiuidable companion: or rather that it engendreth or bringeth it foorth out of it selfe, which hope being taken away, how eloquently, & gloriously soeuer we talke of faith, yet we are conuicted to haue no faith at all. For if faith (as is aboue ſaid) be an aſſured perſwaſion of Gods trueth, that it cannot lie vnto vs nor deceiue vs, nor become voide, then they that haue conceiued this aſſuredneſſe, truely doe therewithall looke for a time to come that God ſhall performe his promiſes, which in their perſwaſion cannot be but true: ſo that briefly, hope is nothing elſe, but a looking for thoſe things which faith hath beleeued to be truely promiſed of God. So faith beleeueth that God is true, hope looketh for the performance of his trueth in conuenient time. Faith beleeueth that he is our Father, hope looketh for him to ſhew himſelfe ſuch a one toward vs. Faith beleeueth that eternall life is giuen vs, hope looketh that it be one day reuealed. Faith is the foundation whereupon hope reſteth, hope nouriſheth and ſuſtaineth faith. For as no man can looke for any thing at Gods hand, but he that hath firſt beleeued his promiſes: ſo againe the weakneſſe of our faith muſt with patient hope and expectation be ſuſtained and cheriſhed, that it fall not as fainting for wearineſſe. For which reaſon Paul doth well place our ſaluation in hope. For hope, while it in ſilence, looketh for the Lord, reſtraineth faith that it fall not headlong with too much haſt: hope ſtrengthneth faith, that it wauer not in Gods promiſes, nor begin to doubt of the trueth of them: hope refreſheth faith that it waxe not weary: Hope ſtretcheth faith to the vttermoſt bound, that it faint not in the mid courſe, nor in the very beginning. Finally, hope by continuall renuing and reſtoring, it maketh it now and then to riſe vp freſher than it ſelfe to continuance. But how many waies the helps of hope are neceſſarie to the ſtrengthning of faith ſhall better appeare, if we conſider with how many ſorts of temptations they are aſſailed and ſhaken, that haue embraced the word of God. Firſt, the Lord in deferring his promiſes doth oftentimes holde our mindes longer in ſuſpenſe than we would wiſh: here it is the office of hope to performe, that which the Prophet commandeth, that though his promiſes doe tary, ye ſhould waite ſtill for them. Sometime he ſuffereth vs not onely to faint, but alſo ſeemeth to be highly diſpleaſed: here it is much more neceſſarie to haue hope to helpe vs, that according to the ſaying of another Prophet, we may ſtill looke for the Lord that hath hidden his face from Iacob. There riſe vp all ſcorners (as Peter ſaith) that aske: where is his promiſe of his comming? for as much as ſince the fathers ſlept, all things ſo continue from the beginning of the creation. Yea the fleſh and the world doe whiſper the ſame thing in our eares. Here muſt faith ſtayed with ſufferance of hope be holden faſt fixed in beholding of eternitie that it may account a thouſand yeares like as one day.

43 For this conioyning and alliance the Scripture ſometimes confoundeth the names of Faith and Hope. For when Peter teacheth that we are by the power of God preſerued through faith, vnto the diſcloſing of ſaluation, he giueth that vnto faith which did more fitly agree with hope, and not without cauſe, foraſmuch as we haue already taught, that hope is nothing elſe but the nouriſhment and ſtrength of faith. Sometimes they are ioyned together: as in the ſame Epiſtle. That your faith and hope ſhould be in God. But Paul to the Philippians out of faith, deriueth expectation, becauſe in patiently hoping, we hold our deſires in ſuſpenſe, till Gods conuenient oportunitie be opened. All which matter we may better vnderſtand by the 10. chapter to the Hebrues, which I haue already alleaged. Paul in another place, although he ſpeake vnproperly, yet meaneth the ſame things in theſe words: We looke in the ſpirit through faith for hope of righteouſneſſe, euen becauſe we embracing the teſtimonie of the Goſpell concerning his free loue, doe looke for the time when God ſhall openly ſhew that which is now hidden vnder hope. And now it is plaine how fooliſhly Peter Lombard laieth two foundations of hope that is the grace of God, and the deſeruing of works. Hope can haue no other marke to be directed vnto, but faith: and we haue already declared that faith hath one onely marke the mercy of God, to which it ought to looke (as I may ſo ſpeake) with both eies. But it is good to heare what a liuely reaſon he bringeth. If (ſaith he) thou dareſt hope for any thing without deſeruings, that ſhall not be worthy to be called hope, but preſumption. Who (gentle reader) will not worthily abhorre ſuch beaſts, that ſay, it is a raſh and preſumptuous deede, if a man haue confidence that God is true of his word? For where the Lord willeth vs to looke for all things at his goodneſſe, they ſay it is preſumption to leane and reſt vpon it.

The coniunctiō of faith & hope cauſeth many things to be ſpoken of the one which properly agree vnto the other.

THE THIRD CHAPTER.

That we are regenerate by Faith. Wherein is entreated of Repentance.

ALbeit we haue already partly taught how Faith poſſeſſeth Chriſt, and how by it we enioy his benefits: neuertheleſſe this were yet darke, vnleſſe we did alſo make declaration of the effects that we feele thereby. Not without cauſe it is ſaid, that the ſumme of the Goſpell ſtandeth in repentance and in forgiueneſſe of ſinnes. Therefore leauing out theſe two points, whatſoeuer we ſhall ſay of Faith, ſhal be but a hungry and vnperfect, yea and in maner vnprofitable diſputation of Faith. Now foraſmuch as Chriſt doth giue both vnto vs, and we obtaine both by Faith, that is to ſay, both newneſſe of life and free reconciliation, reaſon and order of teaching requireth, that in this place I begin to ſpeake of both. Our next paſſage from Faith ſhall be to Repentance, becauſe when this article is well perceiued, it ſhall the better appeare how man is iuſtified by onely Faith and meere pardon, and yet how reall holineſſe of life (as I may ſo call it) is not ſeuered from free imputation of righteouſneſſe. Now it ought to be out of queſtion, that Repentance doth not onely immediately follow Faith, but alſo ſpring out of it. For whereas pardon and forgiueneſſe is therefore offered by the preaching of the Goſpell, that the ſinner being deliuered from the tyrannie of Satan, from the yoke of ſinne, and from miſerable bondage of vices, may paſſe into the kingdome of God, truely no man can embrace the grace of the Goſpell, but he muſt returne from the errours of his former life into the right way, and apply all his ſtudie to the meditation of Repentance. As for them that thinke that Repentance doth rather goe before Faith than flow or ſpring foorth of it, as a fruit out of a tree, they neuer knew the force thereof, and are mooued with too weake an argument to thinke ſo. Out of Faith repentance ſpringeth.

2 Chriſt (ſay they) and Iohn in their preachings do firſt exhort the people to Repentance, and then they afterward ſay that the kingdome of heauen is at hand. Such commandement to preach, the Apoſtles receiued, ſuch order Paul followed, as Luke reporteth. But while they ſuperſtitiouſly ſticke vpon the ioyning together of ſyllables, they marke not in what meaning the words hang together. For when the Lord Chriſt and Iohn do preach in this maner: Repent ye, for the kingdome of heauen is come neere at hand: doe they not fetch the cauſe of Repentance from very grace and promiſe of ſaluation? Therefore their words are as much in effect as if they had ſaid: becauſe the kingdome of heauen is come neere at hand, therefore repent yee. For Matthew when he hath ſhewed that Iohn ſo preached Faith that in him was fulfilled the prophecie of Eſay, concerning the voice crying in the wilderneſſe. Prepare the way of the Lord, make ſtraight the pathes of our God. But in the Prophet that voice is commanded to begin at comfort and glad tydings. Yet when we referre the beginning of Repentance to Faith, we doe not dreame a certaine meane ſpace of time, wherein it bringeth it out, but we meane to ſhew that a man cannot earneſtly apply himſelfe to Repentance, vnleſſe he know himſelfe to be of God. But no man is truely perſwaded that he is of God, but he that hath firſt receiued his grace. But theſe things ſhall be more plainly diſcuſſed in the proceſſe following. Peraduenture this deceiued them, that many are firſt by terrors of conſcience tamed, or framed to obedience, before that they haue throughly digeſted, yea before they haue taſted the knowledge of grace. And this is the feare at the beginning, which ſome account among vertues, becauſe they ſee that it is neere to true and iuſt obedience. But our queſtion is not here how diuerſly Chriſt draweth vs vnto him, or prepareth vs to the endeuour of godlineſſe: onely this I ſay, that there can be no vprightneſſe found where reigneth not the Spirit which Chriſt receiued to communicate the ſame to his members. Then according to that ſaying of the Pſalme: With thee is mercifulneſſe, that thou maieſt be feared, Pſal. 130. 4.

Their grounds weake who thinke that Repentance goeth before Faith. Matth. 3. 2. Matth. 4. 17. Act. 10. 21.

Eſay 40. 3.

no man ſhall euer reuerently feare God, but he that truſteth that God is mercifull vnto him: no man will willingly prepare himſelfe to the keeping of the law, but he that is perſwaded that his ſeruices pleaſe him: which tenderneſſe in pardoning and bearing with faults, is a ſigne of fatherly fauour. Which is alſo ſhewed by that exhortation of Oſee, Come let vs returne to the Lord, becauſe he hath plucked vs and he will heale vs: he hath ſtricken vs, and he will cure vs, becauſe the hope of pardon is vſed as a pricke to make them not to lie dull in their ſinnes. But their doting error is without all colour of reaſon, which to begin at repentance doe appoint certaine daies to their new conuerts, during the which they muſt exerciſe themſelues in penance: and when thoſe daies are once paſt, they admit them to the communion of the grace of the Goſpell. I ſpeake of many of the Anabaptiſtes, ſpecially thoſe that maruellouſly reioyce to be counted ſpirituall, and their companions the Ieſuites, and ſuch other dregs. Such fruits forſooth that ſpirit of giddineſſe bringeth foorth, to determine repentance within compaſſe of a few daies, which a Chriſtian man ought to extend in continuance throughout his whole life.

Oſee 6.1.

Repentance rightly ſaid to conſiſt of two parts, Mortification and Viuification: ſo that Viuification be taken not for the cheerefulnes which the ſoule receiueth when it recouereth out of feare and trouble, but for the purpoſe and deſire which it hath to lead a new life.

3 But certaine learned men, euen long before theſe times, meaning to ſpeake ſimply and ſincerely of repentance, according to the trueth of Scripture, haue ſaid that it conſiſteth of two parts, mortification, and viuification. Mortification they expound to be a ſorrow of the ſoule and feare conceiued of the acknowledging of ſinne, and of the feeling of the iudgement of God. For when a man is once brought into knowledge of ſinne, then he truely beginneth to hate and abhorre ſinne: then he heartily miſliketh himſelfe, confeſſeth himſelfe to be miſerable and loſt, and wiſheth himſelfe to be an other man. Further, when he is touched with ſome feeling of the iudgement of God (for the one immediately followeth vpon the other) then he lieth ſtriken and ouerthrowen, then he trembleth, humbled and caſt downe, then he is diſcouraged and deſpaireth. This is the firſt part of repentance, which they haue commonly called contrition. Viuification they expound to be the comfort that groweth of faith, when a man ouerthrowen with conſcience of ſinne, and ſtricken with feare of God, looking afterward vnto the goodneſſe of God, vnto the mercy, fauour and ſaluation, that is through Chriſt, raiſeth vp himſelfe, taketh breath againe, recouereth courage, and returneth as it were from death to life. And theſe words, if they haue a right expoſition, doe aptly enough expreſſe the nature of repentance. But where they take Viuification for the cheereſulneſſe, which the minde receiueth being brought into quietneſſe from trouble and feare, therein I agree not with them: foraſmuch as it rather ſignifieth a deſire to liue holily and godly which groweth of regeneration, as if it were ſaid, that man dieth to himſelfe, to begin to liue to God.

Two kindes of repentance, the one of the Law, the other of the Goſpell.

4 Some other, becauſe they ſaw this worde diuerſly taken in Scripture, haue made two ſorts of repentance: and becauſe they ſhould make them differently knowen by ſome marke, they haue called one repentance of the law, by which the ſinner wounded with the ſearing yron of ſinne, and worne away with feare of the wrath of God, ſticketh faſt in that trouble and cannot winde himſelfe out of it. The other Repentance they call of the Goſpell, by which the ſinner is indeed grieuouſly vexed with himſelfe, but he riſeth vp higher and taketh hold of Chriſt, the ſalue of his ſore, the comfort of his feare, the hauen of his miſerie. Of the repentance of the law they put thoſe examples: Cain, Saul, and Iudas. Whoſe repentance when the Scripture rehearſeth vnto vs, it meaneth that they acknowledging the grieuouſneſſe of their ſinne, were afraid of the wrath of God, but in thinking vpon God onely as a reuenger and Iudge, they fainted in that feeling. Therefore their repentance was nothing elſe but a certaine entry of hell, whereinto they being entred into this preſent life, began already to ſuffer puniſhment, from the face of the wrath of Gods Maieſtie. The repentance of the Goſpell, we ſee in all them, that being galled with the ſpurre of ſinne in themſelues, but recomforted and refreſhed with confidence of the mercy of God, are turned vnto the Lord. Ezechias was ſtricken with feare, when he receiued the meſſage of death: but he prayed weeping, and looking vnto the goodnes of God, he tooke againe good confidence vnto him. The Niniuites were troubled with the horrible threatning of deſtruction. But they clothed themſelues in ſackcloth and aſhes & prated hoping that the Lord might be turned to them and turned from the furor of his wrath. Dauid confeſſed that he had too much ſinned in numbring the people: but he ſaid further, Lord take away the wickednesse of thy ſeruant. He acknowledged his offence of adulterie, when Nathan rebuked him, and did caſt himſelfe downe before the Lord, but therewithall he alſo looked for pardon. Such was the repentance of them that at the Preaching of Peter were pricked in their hart, but truſting vpon the goodneſſe of God, they ſaid furthermore: Ye men and brethren, what ſhall we doe? And ſuch was the repentance of Peter himſelfe, which wept indeede bitterly, but he ceaſſed not to hope well.

Act.2.37.

5 Although all theſe things be true, yet the very name of repentance (ſo farre as I can learne by the Scriptures) is otherwiſe to be taken. For where they comprehend Faith vnder repentance, it diſagreeth with that which Paul ſaith in the Actes, that he teſtified to the Iewes and Gentiles repentance vnto God and faith in Ieſus Chriſt, where he reckoneth repentance and Faith as two diuers things. What then? Can true repentance ſtand without Faith? No: But though they cannot be ſeuered, yet they muſt be diſtinguiſhed. As Faith is not without hope, and yet Faith and Hope are diuerſe things: ſo repentance and Faith, although they hang together with one perpetuall bonde, yet they rather would be conioyned than confounded. And truely I am not ignorant, that vnder the name of repentance is comprehended the whole turning vnto God, whereof Faith is not the leaſt part: but in what meaning it is ſo comprehended, ſhall moſt eaſily appeare when the force and nature thereof ſhall be declared. The name of repentance in Hebrew is deriued of conuerting or returning, in Greeke of changing of the minde or purpoſe, and the thing it ſelfe doth not ill agree with either deriuations, whereof the ſumme is, that we departing from our ſelues ſhould turne vnto God, and putting off our olde minde, ſhould put on a new. Wherefore in my iudgement, repentance may thus not amiſſe be defined: that it is a true turning of our life vnto God, proceeding from a pure and earneſt feare of God, which conſiſteth in the mortifying of the fleſh and of the olde man, and in the quickening of the Spirit. In this ſenſe are to be taken all the preachings wherein either the Prophets in old time, or the Apoſtles afterward exhorted the men of their time to repentance. For this only thing they trauailed to perſwade, that confounded with their owne ſinnes, and pricked with feare of the Lords iudgement, they ſhould fall downe and be humbled before him, againſt whom they had offended, and with true amendment returne into his right way. Therefore theſe words, To be turned or returne vnto the Lord, To repent, or doe penance, are among them vſed without difference in all one ſignification. And therefore alſo the holy hiſtorie ſaith, that men repent after the Lord, when they that liued wantonly in their own luſts, not regarding him, doe begin to follow his word, and are readie at their Captaines commandement to goe whither he calleth them. And Iohn and Paul vſed theſe wordes, to bring foorth fruites worthie of repentance, for, to lead ſuch a life as may repreſent and teſtifie ſuch an amendment in all their doings.

Mat.3 2. 1.Sam.7.2.

Luc 3.8. Rom.6.4. Acts.26.20.

6 But before we goe any further, It ſhall be profitable that we doe more plainely ſet out at large the definition that we haue made. Wherein there be chiefly three points to be conſidered. Firſt when we call it a turning of life vnto God, we require a transforming, not onely in outward workes, but alſo in the Soule it ſelfe, which when it hath put off her oldneſſe, then beginneth to bring foorth the fruites of works agreeable to her renuing. Which when the prophet goeth about to expreſſe, he commandeth them whom he calleth to repentance, to make them a new heart. Therefore Moſes oftentimes meaning to ſhew how the Iſraelites might repent, and ſo be rightly turned vnto the Lord, teacheth that it be done with all their heart, and with all their Soule (which maner of ſpeaking we ſee often repeated of the Prophets) and naming it the circumciſing of the heart, he ſhaketh away all inward affections. But there is no place whereby a man may better perceiue what is the naturall proprietie of repentance, than the fourth Chapter of Ieremie. If thou returne to me, O Iſraell, (ſaith the Lord) returne to me, plow vp your arable land and ſow not vpon thornes. Be circumciſed to the Lord, and take away the vncircumciſed skines of your hearts. See how he pronounceth that they ſhall nothing preuaile in taking vpon them the following of righteouſnes, vnles wickednes be firſt plucked out of the bottome of their hearts.

The turning of our liues vnto God doth note an alteration not onely of our outward actions, but alſo and that eſpecially of our Soules. Ezec.18.13.

Iere.4.3.

And

And to mooue them throughly, he warneth them that they haue to do with God, with whom there is nothing gotten by dallying, becauſe he hateth a double heart. Therefore Eſay laugheth to ſcorne the fooliſh endeuours of hypocrites, which did indeed buſily goe about an outward repentance in ceremonies, but in the meane time they had no care to looſe the bundles of wickedneſſe wherewith they held poore men faſt tied. Where alſo he very well ſheweth in what duties vnfained repentance properly ſtandeth.

Eſa. 58. 6.

The beginning of our conuerſion vnto God is feare.

7 The ſecond point was, that we taught that repentance proceedeth of an earneſt feare of God. For, before that the minde of a ſinner be enclined to repentance, it muſt be ſtirred vp with thinking vpon the iudgement of God. But when this thought is once throughly ſetled, that God will one day goe vp into his iudgement ſeat, to require an account of all ſayings and doings: it will not ſuffer the ſilly man to reſt, nor to take breath one minute of time, but continually ſtirreth him vp to thinke vpon a new trade of life, whereby he may ſafely appeare at that iudgement. Therefore oftentimes the Scripture, when it exorteth to repentance maketh mention of the iudgement: as in Ieremy leaſt peraduenture my wrath goe out as fire, and there be none to quench it, becauſe of the naughtineſſe of your workes. In Paules ſermon to the Athenians: And whereas hitherto God hath borne with the times of this ignorance, now he giueth warning to men, that all men euery where may repent them, becauſe he hath appointed the day wherein he will iudge the world in equity. And in many other places. Sometime it declareth by the puniſhments already extended, that God is a iudge, that ſinners ſhould thinke with themſelues, that worſe things hang ouer them if they doe not repent in time. You haue an example thereof in the 29. of Exodus. But becauſe the turning beginneth at the abhorring and hatred of ſinne, therefore the Apoſtle maketh ſorrowfulneſſe, ſuch as is according to God, the cauſe of repentance. And he calleth ſorrowfulneſſe according to God, when we are not onely afraid of puniſhment, but do hate and abhor ſin it ſelfe, foraſmuch as we vnderſtand that it diſpleaſeth God. And no maruell. For vnleſſe we be ſharply pricked, the ſlothfulneſſe of our fleſh could not be corrected, yea prickings would not ſuffice for the dulneſſe and ſlothfulneſſe thereof, vnleſſe God in ſtretching out his rods ſhould pearce more deepely. This is alſo an obſtinacy which muſt be beaten downe as it were with beetles. Therefore the peruerſneſſe of our nature enforceth God to the ſeuerity that he vſeth in threatning, becauſe he ſhould in vaine call vs alluringly with faire ſpeech while we lie a ſleepe. I recite not the teſtimonies that commonly offer themſelues to be found. The feare of God is in another manner alſo the beginning of repentance. For though mans life were abſolutely furniſhed with all points of vertues, if it be not applied to the worſhiping of God it may indeed be praiſed of the world, but in heauen it ſhall be meere abhomination, foraſmuch as the chiefe part of our righteouſneſſe is to giue God his due right and honour, whereof he is wickedly robbed, when we bend not our ſelues to yeeld vs ſubiect to his gouernment.

Ier. 4. 4.
Act. 17. 30.

2. Cor. 7. 10.

Repentance conſiſteth in the mortifying of the fleſh and the quickning of the ſpirit

8 Thirdly, it remaineth that we declare what is meant by this that we ſay, that Repentance conſiſteth in two parts, that is to ſay, mortifying of the fleſh, and quickening of the ſpirit. The Prophets doe plainly expreſſe it, although ſomewhat ſimply and groſely according to the capacity of the carnall people, when they ſay: Ceaſe from euill and doe goodneſſe. Againe: Be waſhed, be cleane, take away the euill of your workes from mine eies: Ceaſe to doe peruerſly, learne to doe well, ſeeke iudgement, helpe the oppreſſed, &c. For when they call men away from wickedneſſe, they require the death of the whole fleſh, which is ſtuffed full of wickedneſſe and peruerſeneſſe. It is indeed an vneaſie and hard thing to put off our ſelues, and to depart from our naturall diſpoſition. Neither can it be thought that the fleſh is throwly dead, vnleſſe all that we haue of our ſelues be aboliſhed. But foraſmuch as all the affection of the fleſh is enimy againſt God, the firſt entry to the obeying of his law, is the forſaking of our owne nature. Afterward they expreſſe the renuing by the fruits that follow thereof, as righteouſneſſe, iudgement, and mercy. For it were not enough to doe thoſe duties rightly, vnleſſe the minde it ſelfe and the heart haue firſt put on the affection of righteouſneſſe, iudgement, and mercy. That is done when the ſpirit of God hath ſo

Rom. 8. 4.

ſo ſoked in new thoughtes and affections, our ſoules firſt waſhed with his holineſſe, that they may rightly be counted new. And truely as we are naturally turned away from God, ſo vnleſſe the forſaking of our ſelues doe goe before, we can neuer goe toward that which is right. Therefore we are ſo oft commanded to put off the olde man, to forſake the world and fleſh, to bid our luſts farewell, and to be renewed in the ſpirit of our minde. Moreouer the very name of mortification doth put vs in mind how hard it is to forget our former nature: becauſe we thereby gather that we are not otherwiſe framed to the feare of God, nor doe learne the principles of godlineſſe, but when we are violently ſlaine with the word of the ſpirit, & ſo brought to naught euen as though God ſhould pronounce, that to haue vs to be accounted among his children there needeth a death of all our common nature.

True Repentance nothing elſe but regeneration whereby Chriſt reſtoreth vs vnto the righteouſneſſe of God from whence by ſinne we were fallen.

9 Both theſe things doe happen vnto vs by the partaking of Chriſt. For if we doe truely communicate of his death, by the power thereof our old man is crucified, and the body of ſinne dieth, that the corruption of our former nature may liue no more. If we be partakers of his reſurrection by it we are raiſed vp into a newneſſe of life, that may agree with the righteouſneſſe of God. In one word I expound Repentance to be regeneratiõ, which hath no other marke whereunto it is directed, but that the image of God which was by Adams offence fowly defaced and in a maner vtterly blotted out, may be renued in vs. So the Apoſtle teacheth when he ſaith: but we repreſenting the glorie of God with vncouered face are transformed into the ſame image, out of glorie into glory, as by the ſpirit of the Lord. Againe: be ye renued in the ſpirit of your minde and put on the new man, which is created according to God in righteouſneſſe an holines of truth. Againe in another place: putting on the new man, which is renued after the knowledge and image of him that created him. Therefore by this regeneration we be by the benefite of Chriſt reſtored into the righteouſnes of God, from which we were fallen by Adam. After which maner it pleaſeth the Lord wholy to reſtore all thoſe whom he adopteth into the inheritance of life. And this reſtoring is fulfilled not in one moment, or one day, or one yeare, but by continuall, yea and ſometimes ſlow proceedings God taketh away the corruptions of the fleſh in his elect, clenſeth them from filthineſſe, and conſecrateth them for temples to himſelfe, renuing all their ſenſes to true pureneſſe, that they may exerciſe themſelues all their life in Repentance, and know that this warre hath no end but in death. And ſo much the greater is the lewdneſſe of that filthie railer and apoſtata Staphilus, which fooliſhly ſayeth that I confound the ſtate of this preſent life with the heauenly glory, when I expound by Paul the image of God to be holineſſe and true righteouſneſſe. As though when any thing is defined, we ſhould not ſeeke the whole fulneſſe and perfection of it. And yet we deny not place for increaſes: but I ſay that how neere any man approcheth to the likenes of God, ſo much the image of God ſhineth in him. That the faithfull may attaine hereunto, God aſſigneth them the race of Repentance wherein to run all their life long.

2. Cor. 4. 4.

In the regenerate there remaineth ſtill concupiſcence, which concupiſcence is ſinne and not weakneſſe onely as S. Auguſtine termeth it.

10 The children of God therefore are ſo deliuered by regeneration from the bondage of ſinne, not that hauing now obteined the full poſſeſſion of libertie, they ſhould feele no more trouble by their fleſh, but that they ſhould haue remaining a continuall matter of ſtrife, wherewith they may be exerciſed, and not onely be exerciſed, but alſo may better learne their owne weakeneſſe. And in this point all writers of ſound iudgement agree together, that there remaineth in man regenerate a feeling of euill, from whence continually ſpring deſires that allure and ſtir him to ſinne. They confeſſe alſo that the holy ones are ſtill ſo holden intangled with that diſeaſe of luſting, that they cannot withſtand but that ſometime they are tickled and ſtirred either to luſt or to couetouſneſſe, or to ambition or to other vices. Neither is it needefull to labour much in ſearching what the old writers haue thought herein, foraſmuch as onely Auguſtine may be ſufficient for it, which hath faithfully and with great diligence gathered all their iudgements. Therefore let the readers gather out of him, ſuch certaintie as they ſhall deſire to learne of the opinion of antiquitie. But there may ſeeme to be this difference betweene him and vs, that he when he granteth that the faithfull ſo long as they dwell in a mortall body are ſo holden bound with luſts, that they cannot but luſt, yet dareth not call that diſeaſe ſin, but being content to expreſſe it by the name of weaknes, he he teacheth that then onely it becommeth sinne, when either worke or consent is added to conceit or receiuing, that is, when will yeeldeth to the first desire: but we account the very same for sinne, that man is tickled with any desire at all against the law of God, yea we affirme that the very corruption that ingendreth such desires in vs, is sinne. We teach therefore that there is alway sinne in the holy ones vntill they be vnclothed of the mortal body, because there remaineth in their flesh the peruersnesse of lusting that fighteth against vprightnesse. And yet he doth not alway forbeare to vse the name of Sin, as when he saith: This Paul calleth by the name of sinne, from whence spring all sins vnto a fleshly concupiscence. This asmuch as pertaineth to the holy ones, looseth the kingdome in earth, and perisheth in heauen. By which words he confesseth, that the faithfull are guilty of sin, in asmuch as they are subiect to the lusts of the flesh.

Ser. 6. de verbis Apost.

How Christ is said to purge his Church from sin, and sinne to remaine in euery member of his Church so purged.

11 But this that is said, that God purgeth his Church from all sinne, that he promiseth that grace of deliuerance by baptisme, and fulfilleth it in his elect, we refer rather to the guiltinesse of sinne, than to the very matter of sinne. God truely performeth this by regenerating them that be his, that in them that kingdome of sinne is abolished (for the holy Ghost ministreth them strength, whereby they get the vpper hand and are conquerours in the battell) but it ceaseth only to reigne and not so to dwell in them. Therefore we so say, that the old man is crucified, and the law of sinne abolished in the children of God, that yet there remaine some leauings, not to haue dominion in them, but to humble them by knowledge in conscience of their owne weakenesse. And we confesse that the same are not imputed, as if they were not: but we affirme that this commeth to passe by the mercy of God, that the holy ones are deliuered from this guiltinesse, which otherwise should iustly be reckoned sinners and guilty before God. And this sentence it shall not be heard for vs to confirme, forasmuch as there are euident testimonies of the Scripture vpon this matter. For what could we haue more plaine, than that which Paul crieth out to the Romans Chapter 7.? First both we haue in another place shewed, and Augustine prooueth by strong reasons, that Paul there speaketh in the person of a man regenerate. I speake not of this, that he vseth these words, Euill and Sinne, that they which will speake against vs may not cauill against those words, but who can deny, that a striuing against the Law of GOD is euill, who can deny a withstanding of Iustice to be sinne? Finally, who will not grant that there is a fault where is a spirituall misery? But all these things are reported of this disease by Paul. Againe, we haue an assured demonstration by the Law, by which this whole question may easily be discussed. For we are commanded to loue God with all our hearts, with all our soule, with all our powers. Sith all the parts of our Soule ought to be so occupied with the loue of God, it is certaine, that they satisfie not the Commandement that conceiue in their heart any desire be it neuer so little, or suffer any such thought at all to enter into their minde, as may withdraw them from the loue of God into vanity? For what? are not these the powers of the Soule, to be affected with sodaine motions, to comprehend with wit, to conceiue with minde? Therefore, when these doe open away for vaine or corrupt thoughts to enter into them, doe they not shew that they are euen so much voide of the loue of God? Wherefore, who so confesseth not that all the lusts of the flesh are sinnes, and that the same disease of lusting, which they call a feeding, is the well spring of sinne, he must needes deny that the transgression of the Law is sinne.

Rom. 7. 6.

Our natural desires are corrupt not in that they are naturall but in that they are inordinate.

12 If any man thinke it an absurdity, that all the desires wherewith man is naturally mooued in affection, are vniuersally condemned, whereas they be put into man by God the Author of nature. We answer, that we doe not condemne those desires that God hath so engrauen into the minde of man at the first Creation, that they cannot be rooted out without destroying the very nature of man, but onely outragious and vnbrideled motions that fight against the ordinance of God. But now sith by reason of the peruersenesse of nature all hir powers are infected and corrupted, that in all hir doings appeareth a continuall disorder and intemperance, because the desires cannot be seuered from such intemperance: therefore we say that they are corrupt. Or (if you like to haue the whole summe in fewer words) we teach that all the desires of men are euill: and we accuse them to be guilty of sinne, not in that that they are naturall, but for that they are inordinate : and we call them inordinate, becauſe no part or cleane thing can come out of a corrupt and vncleane nature. And Auguſtine doth not ſo much vary from this doctrine as he appeareth in ſhew, while he ſomewhat too much feareth the enuy that the Pelagians laboured to bring him into, he ſometime forbeareth to vſe the name of ſinne. Yet where he writeth that the Law of ſinne ſtill remaining in the holy ones, the only guiltineſſe is taken away, he plainly ſheweth that he doth not ſo much diſagree from our meaning. Ad Bonif.

13 We will alleadge ſome other ſentences, whereby ſhall better appeare what he thought. In the ſecond booke againſt Iulian: This Law of ſinne is both releaſed by the ſpirituall regeneration, and abideth in the mortall fleſh, releaſed heerein, becauſe the guiltineſſe is taken away in the Sacrament whereby the faithfull are regenerate : and it abideth, becauſe it worketh the deſires againſt which the faithfull doe fight. Againe, Therefore the law of ſinne (which was alſo in the members of ſo great an Apoſtle) is releaſed in baptiſme, but not ended. Againe, The law of ſinne (of which yet remaining the guiltineſſe, is in baptiſme diſcharged) Ambroſe called wickedneſſe : becauſe it is wickedneſſe for the fleſh to luſt againſt the ſpirit. Againe, Sinne is dead in reſpect of the giltineſſe wherein it held vs, and euen being dead, it ſtill rebelleth till it be healed with perfection of buriall. And yet plainer in the fifth booke. As the blindneſſe of heart is both a ſinne, whereby man beleeueth not in God : and alſo a puniſhment of ſinne, whereby a proud heart is chaſtiſed with worthy correction : and the cauſe of ſinne when any thing is committed by the error of a blinde heart : ſo the luſt of fleſh againſt which a good ſpirit luſteth, is both ſinne, becauſe there is in it diſobedience againſt the gouernment of the minde : and alſo the puniſhment of ſinne, becauſe it is giuen for recompence to the deſeruings of the diſobedient : and the cauſe of ſinne in man, when he conſenteth by defection, or in man, when he is borne by infection. Heere without any doubtfull ſpeech he calleth it ſinne, becauſe when error was once ouerthrowen, and the trueth confirmed, he leſſe feared ſlanderous reports. As in the 41. Homily vpon Iohn, where doubtleſſe he ſpeaketh according to the true meaning of his minde, he ſaith. If in the fleſh thou ſerue the law of ſinne, doe that which the Apoſtle himſelfe ſaith : let not ſinne reigne in your mortall body to obey the deſires thereof. He ſaith not, let it not be, but let it not raigne. So long as thou liueſt, ſinne muſt needes be in thy members at leaſt, let raigne be taken from it. Let not that be done which it commandeth. They that defend that luſt is no ſinne, are wont to obiect that ſaying of Iames : Luſt, after that it hath conceiued, bringeth foorth ſinne. But this is eaſily confuted. For vnleſſe we thinke that he ſpeaketh of onely ill workes or actuall ſinnes, euill will it ſelfe, ſhall not be accounted ſinne. But where he calleth miſchieuous deeds and wicked offences the ofſprings of ſinne, and giueth vnto them the name of ſinne, it doth not by and by follow thereof, but that to luſt, is an euill thing and damnable before God.

Concupiſcence acknowledged by S Auguſtine and S. Ambroſe to be ſinne : whereunto S. Iames is not repugnant when he ſaith that concupiſcence after it hath conceiued doth bring forth ſinne.

Rom. 6. 12.

Iames 2.

14 Certaine Anabaptiſts in this age, deuiſe I wote not what phrantike intemperance inſteed of ſpirituall regeneration : ſaying that the children of God reſtored into the ſtate of innocency, now ought no more to be carefull for bridling of the luſt of the fleſh : that the Spirit is to be followed for their guide, vnder whoſe guiding they neuer goe out of the way. It were incredible that mans minde could fall to ſo great madneſſe, vnleſſe they did openly and proudly babble abroad this doctrine. Truely it is monſtrous. But it is meete that ſuch ſhould ſuffer the puniſhment of ſuch blaſphemous boldneſſe, that ſo haue perſwaded their minde to turne the truth of God into a lie. Shal all the choſe of honeſty and diſhoneſty, right and wrong, good and euill, vertue and vice, be taken away ? Such difference (ſay they) commeth of the curſedneſſe of old Adam, from which we are exempted by Chriſt. So now there ſhalbe no difference betweene fornication and chaſtity, plaine dealing and ſubtlety, truth and lying, iuſtice and extortion. Take away vaine feare, ſay they, the Spirit will command thee no euill thing, ſo that thou boldly and without feare yeeld thee to the guiding thereof. Who can chooſe but be aſtoniſhed at theſe monſtrous things ? Yet it is a common learning among them, which blinded with madneſſe of luſts, haue put off all common reaſon, but what Chriſt (I beſeech you) doe they frame vnto vs, and what ſpirit doe they beſch

The phrantique imagination of Anabaptiſts teaching that men regenerate ſhould take no care to bridle any diſordered deſire in themſelues, but onely follow the conduct of the ſpirit which cannot leade them into any euil ſo that whatſoeuer they doe in this their ſtate of immagened innocency it is ſpirituall and good.

belch out? For we reknowledge one Christ, and his onely Spirit whom the Prophets haue commended, whom the Gospell giuen vs doth preach, of whom we there heare no such thing. That Spirit is no patrone of man-slaughter, whoredome, drunkennesse, pride, contention, couetousnesse, and guile: but the author of loue, chastitie, sobrietie, modestie, peace, temperance and trueth. It is not a giddie spirit, and runneth headlong without consideration through right and wrong, but is full of wisedome, and vnderstanding, that discerneth rightly betweene iust and vniust. It stirreth not vnto dissolute and vnbridled licentiousnesse, but maketh difference betweene lawfull and vnlawfull, and teacheth to keepe measure and temperance: but why doe we labour any longer in confuting this beastly rage? To Christians the Spirit of the Lord is not a troublesome phantasie, which either themselues haue brought forth in a dreame, or haue receiued being forged of other: but they reuerently seeke the knowledge of him at the Scriptures, where these two things be taught of him: First that he is giuen vs vnto sanctification, that he might bring vs into the obedience of Gods will being purged from vncleannesse and defilings, which obedience cannot stand, vnlesse lusts be tamed and subdued, whereunto these men would giue the bridle at libertie. Secondly we are taught that we are so clensed by his sanctification, that we are still besieged with many vices and much weakenesse, so long as we are inclosed in the burden of our body: whereby it commeth to passe, that being farre distant from perfection, we haue neede alway to increase somewhat, and being entangled in vices, we haue neede daily to wrastle with them. Whereupon also followeth, that shaking of sloth and carelesnesse, we must watch with heedefull mindes, that we be not compassed vnware with the snares of our flesh. Vnlesse peraduenture we thinke that we haue proceeded further than the Apostle, which yet was wearied of the Angell of Satan, that his strength might be made perfect with weakenesse: and which did vnfaignedly represent in his flesh that diuision of the flesh, and of the spirit.

2. Cor. 12. 15. Rom. 7. 6.

15 But whereas the Apostle in describing of repentance reckoneth seuen either causes or effects or parts thereof, he doth that of a very good cause: and these they be: endeuour or carefulnesse, excusing, indignation, feare, desire, zeale, punishment. Neither ought it to seeme any absurditie, that I dare not certainly determine whether they ought to be counted causes or effects. For both may be defended in disputation. They may be also called affections ioyned with repentance: but because, leauing out those questions, we may vnderstand what Paul meaneth, we shalbe content with a simple declaration of them. He saith therefore, that of the heauinesse which is according to God, ariseth carefulnesse. For he that is touched with an earnest feeling of displeasure because he hath sinned against his God, is therewithall stirred vp to diligence and heedfulnesse, to winde himselfe cleerely out of the snares of the diuell, to take better heede of his snares, to fall no more from the gouernance of the holy Ghost, not to be oppressed with securitie. Next is Excusing, which in this place signifieth not the defence, whereby a sinner to escape the iudgement of God, either doth deny that he hath offended, or diminisheth the hainousnesse of his fault, but a purgation which standeth rather in craning of pardon, than in defence of his cause. Like as the children that are not reprobate when they acknowledge and confesse their faults, doe yet vse entreating, and that it may take place, they protest by all meanes that they can, that they haue not cast away the reuerence that they owe to their parents. Finally, they so excuse them, as they goe not about to prooue themselues righteous and innocent, but onely that they may obtaine pardon. Then followeth indignation thereby the sinner fretteth inwardly with himselfe, quarrelleth with himselfe, is angry with himselfe, when he recordeth his owne peruersnesse and his owne vnthankfulnesse to God. By the name of feare, he meaneth that trembling that is striken into our mindes so oft as we thinke both what we haue deserued, and how horrible is the seueritie of Gods wrath against sinners. For we must needs then be vexed with a maruellous vnquietnesse, which both instructeth vs to humilitie, and maketh vs more ware against the time to come. Now if out of feare doe spring that carefulnesse, whereof he had spoken before, then we see with what lincking they hang together. It seemeth to me that he hath vsed this worde Desire for diligence in our dutie and ready cheerefulnesse to obey, whereunto the acknowledging of

of our owne faults ought chiefely to prouoke vs. And thereunto also belongeth zeale, which he ioyneth immediately next vnto it. For it signifieth a fearfulnesse, wherewith we be kindled when we be spurred forward with these pricking thoughts: what haue I done? whether had I throwne my selfe headlong, if the mercy of God did not helpe me? The last of all his punishment, for the more rigorous that we be to our selues, and the straighter that we examine our owne sinnes, so much the more we ought to trust that God is fauourable and mercifull vnto vs. And truely it is not possible, but that the soule being stricken with horror of the iudgement of God must needes doe some execution in the punishing of it selfe. Truely the godly doe feele what punishments are shame, confusion, mourning, loathing of themselues, and other affections that spring out of earnest acknowledging of sinnes. But let vs remember that there is measure to be kept, that sorrow doe not swallow vs vp, because nothing more readily happeneth to fearefull consciences than falling to despaire. And also by that crafty meane whomsoeuer Satan findeth ouerthrowen with dread of God, he more and more drowneth them in the gulfe of sorrow, that they may neuer rise vp again. Truely the feare cannot be too great which endeth with humility, and departeth not from hope of pardon. But alway (as the Apostle teacheth) the sinner must beware, that while he mooue himselfe to the loathing of himselfe, he dispaire not, oppressed with too great feare, for so doe we flee away from God which calleth vs to him by repentance. Vpon which point this lesson of Bernard is very profitable: Sorrow for sinnes is necessary, if it be not continuall. I counsel you sometime to returne your fault from grieuous and painful remembrance of your owne waies, and to climbe vp to the plaine ground of cheerefui remembrance of benefits of God. Let vs mingle hony with wormwood, that the wholsome bitternesse may bring vs health, when it shall be drunke tempered with sweetnesse. And if ye thinke of your selues in humility, thinke also of the Lord in goodnesse.

Sermone 11. in Can.

16 Now it may be also perceiued what be the fruits of repentance, euen the dueties of godlinesse toward God, and of charity toward men, and therewithall a holinesse and pureness in all our life. Finally, the more earnestly that any man examineth his life by the rule of Gods law, so much the surer tokens he sheweth of his repentance. Therfore the holy Ghost oftentimes, when he exhorteth vs to repentance, calleth vs sometime to all the commandements of the law, sometime to the duties of the second table. Albeit in other places after that he hath condemned vncleanesse in the very fountaine of the heart, he descendeth afterward to outward testimonies that doe set out true repentance, of which thing I will heereafter set before the readers eies a table in the description of a Christian life. I will not gather testimonies out of the Prophets, wherein they partly scorne at their follies that goe about to appease God with ceremonies, and doe shew that they be meere mockeries, and partly doe teach that outward vprightnesse of life is not the principall part of repentance, because God looketh vpon the heart: whosoeuer is euen meanely exercised in the Scripture, shall perceiue of himselfe without any other mans putting in minde that when we haue to doe with God, we labour in vaine, vnlesse we beginne at the inward affection of the heart. And the place of Ioel shall not a little helpe to the vnderstanding of the rest, where he saith: Teare your heart and not your garments. Also both those points are expressed in these words of Iames: Ye wicked doers, cleanse your hands: yee double men, purge your hearts. Where indeed there is an addition ioyned to the first part, but after is shewed the very fountaine and beginning that they must wipe away their secret filthinesse, that there may be an altar set vp to God in the very heart. Beside this there are also certaine outward exercises, which we vse priuatly as remedies to humble our selues or to tame our flesh, and publickely for the declaration of repentance. And they proceed from that punishment of which Paul speaketh, for these are the properties of an afflicted minde, to be in loathsomnesse, mourning and weeping, to flee gorgeousnesse and all trimming, and to forsake all delightes. Then hee that feeleth how great an euill is the rebellion of the flesh, seeketh all remedies to bridle it. Moreouer hee that well bethinketh him how grieuous a thing it is to haue offended the iustice of God, cannot rest vntill hee haue in his owne humility giuen glory vnto God. Such exercises the old writers do oftentimes rehearse, when they speake of the fruits of repentance.

The fruits of repentance, purging of the heart, outward amendment of life and manners. Besides which there are also certaine externall exercises seruing to humble or to declare that we are humbled, wherein the old writers haue two waies gone beyond measure.

2. Cor. 7. 11.

But albeit they doe not place the whole force of repentance in them, yet the readers shall pardon me, if I speake what I thinke: it seemeth vnto me that they stand to much vpon them. And if any man will wisely weigh it, I trust he will agree with mee, that they haue two waies gone beyond measure. For when they so much enforced, and with immeasurable commendation aduanced that bodily discipline, this indeed they obtained, that the people did the more earnestly embrace it, but they in a maner darkened that, which ought to haue beene of much greater importance. Secondly, in giuing punishments they were somewhat more rigorous then ecclesiasticall mildnesse may beare, as we shall haue occasion to shew in another place.

The vse of weeping, fasting, ashes, sackcloth and such like outward things in the action of repentance. Ioel. 2. 12.

17 But because many when they heare weeping, fasting and ashes spoken of, both often in other places and specially in Ioel, they measure the chiefe part of repentance by fasting and weeping: therefore their error is to be taken away. That which is there spoken of the turning of the whole heart to the Lord, of cutting their hearts and not their garments, is properly belonging to repentance: but weeping and fasting are not ioyned as continuall or necessary effects thereof, but are spoken of in respect of a speciall circumstance. Because he had Prophecied, that there hanged ouer the Iewes a most grieuous destruction, therefore he counselleth them to preuent the wrath of God, not onely in repenting, but also in vttering tokens of their sorrow. For as a man standing to be arrained, vseth humbly to abase himselfe with a ouergrowen beard, vncombed haire and blacke apparell, to moue the iudge to pity: so it behooued them when they stood accused before the iudgement seat of God in piteous array to beseech him not to extend his rigour. But although ashes and sackcloth did peraduenture more fitly agree with those times: yet it is certaine, that weeping and fasting should be to a very conuenient good vse among vs, so oft as the Lord seemeth to threaten vs any plague or calamity. For when he maketh any danger to appeare, he doth after a certaine maner giue warning, that he is prepared or armed to reuenge. Therefore the Prophet did well, when he exhorted his countrimen to weeping and fasting, that is to the sorowfull manner of accused men, whose offences he said a little before, were had in examination. Euen as in the Pastors of the Church should not doe ill at this day, if when they see any ruine hanging ouer the neckes of their people, they would cry out vpon them to make hast to fasting and weeping: so that they would with greater and more inward care and diligence, alway enforce that which is the principall point, that they must cut their hearts and not their garments. It is out of doubt, that fasting is not alway ioyned with repentance, but is appointed peculiarly for times of miserable plagues: and therefore Christ ioyneth it with wayling, when he acquiteth the Apostles from neede thereof, vntill the time that being spoyled of his presence, they should be tormented with griefe. I speake of solemne fasting. For the priuate life of the godly ought to be tempered with honest sparing and sobriety, that in the whole course thereof there may appeare a certaine kinde of fasting. But because all this matter shall be to be declared againe in the place where we shall entreat of the discipline of the Church, therefore I doe now the more slenderly touch it.

Matth. 9. 15.

The name of repentance vnproperly giuen to the outward testification of our penitency: which testification by mouth or otherwise although God doe not alwaies require, yet he doth exact alwaies an vnfained sorrow for sinnes committed, and for more grieuous offences more than an ordinary doing of penance. Mat. 11. 21. Luk. 10. 13. 1. Cor. 11. 3.

18 But this one thing I will adde heere by the way: when the name of repentance is applied to this outward profession, then it is vnproperly turned from the naturall meaning which I haue aboue set forth of it. For it is not so much a turning vnto God as a confession of fault, with a beseeching of God not to charge them with the paine and guiltinesse. So to doe penance in ashes and sackcloth is nothing else, then to vtter a displeasednesse when God is angry with vs for grieuous offences. And this is a publicke kinde of confession, wherby we condemning our selues before the Angels and the world doe preuent the iudgement of God. For Paul rebuking their slothfulnesse that tenderly beare with their owne faults, saith: if we did iudge our selues, we should not be iudged of God. But it is not alway necessary to make men openly of counsell and witnesses of our repentance: but to confesse priuately to God is a part of true repentance which cannot be omitted. For there is nothing more vnreasonable than to looke to haue God to pardon vs the sinnes in which we flatter our selues and doe hide them by hypocrisie, least he should bring them to light. And it behoueth vs not onely to confesse those sinnes which we daily commit, but more grieuous offences ought to draw vs further further, and to call againe into our remembrance things that ſeeme long agoe buried. Which leſſon Dauid giueth vs by his example. For being touched with ſhame of his newly committed fault, he examineth himſelfe euen to the time when he was in his mothers wombe, and confeſſeth that euen then he was corrupted and infected with the filthineſſe of the fleſh. And this he doth not to diminiſh the hainouſneſſe of his fault, as many hide themſelues in the multitude, and ſeeke to eſcape puniſhment by wrapping other with them. But Dauid doth farre otherwiſe which with ſimple plainneſſe enforceth his fault in ſaying, that being corrupt from his firſt infancie, he hath not ceaſed to heape euils vpon euils. Alſo in another place he likewiſe ſo examineth his paſſed life, that he craueth the mercy of God for the ſinnes of his youth. And truely then onely ſhall we proue our drouſineſſe to be ſhaken away from vs, if groning vnder our burden and bewailing our euils, we aske reliefe of God. It is moreouer to be noted, that the repentance which we are commanded continually to apply, differeth from that repentance, that lifteth vp as it were from death, them that either haue filthily fallen, or with vnbridled licentiouſneſſe haue throwen foorth themſelues to ſinne, or after a certaine maner of rebellious reuolting, haue ſhaken off the yoke of God. For the Scripture oftentimes, when it exhorteth to repentance meaneth thereby as it were a paſſage or riſing againe from death into life: and when it rehearſeth that the people did penance, it meaneth that they were turned from their idolatrie and other groſſe offences. And in like maner Paul threatneth mourning vnto ſinners that haue not done penance for their wantonneſſe, fornication and vnchaſtitie. This difference is to be diligently marked, leaſt while we heare that few are called to penance, a more than careles aſſuredneſſe ſhould creepe vpon vs, as though the mortifiyng of the fleſh did no more belong vnto vs, the care whereof, the corrupt deſires that alway tickle vs, and the vices that commonly bud vp in vs, doe not ſuffer vs to releaſe. Therefore the ſpeciall Repentance which is required but of ſome, whom the Diuell hath violently carried away from the feare of God, and faſt bound with damnable ſnares, taketh not away the ordinary Repentance which the corruptneſſe of nature compelleth vs to apply throughout all the whole courſe of our life.

2. Cor. 12.21.

19 Now if that be true, which is moſt euidently certaine, that all the ſumme of the Goſpell is contained in theſe two principall pointes, Repentance and forgiueneſſe of ſinnes: doe wee not ſee, that the Lord doth therefore freely iuſtifie them that be his, that he may alſo by the ſanctification of his Spirit reſtore them into true righteouſneſſe? Iohn the Angell ſent before the face of Chriſt to prepare his waies, preached: Repent ye, for the kingdome of heauen is come neere at hand. In calling them to Repentance, he did put them in minde to acknowledge themſelues ſinners, and all that was theirs, to be damnable before the Lord, that they might with all their hearts deſire the mortifiyng of their fleſh and a new regeneration in the Spirit. In telling them of the kingdome of God, he calleth them to Faith. For by the kingdome of God which he taught to be at hand, he ment forgiueneſſe of ſinnes, ſaluation, and life, and all that euer we get in Chriſt. Wherefore in the other Euangeliſtes it is written, Iohn came preaching the Baptiſme of Repentance vnto forgiueneſſe of ſinnes. And what is that elſe, but that they being oppreſſed and wearied with the burden of ſins ſhould turne to the Lord, and conceiue good hope of forgiueneſſe and ſaluation? So Chriſt alſo began his preaching: The kingdome of God is come neere at hand: repent yee and beleeue the Goſpell. Firſt he declareth that the the treaſures of Gods mercy are opened in him, and then he requireth repentance, and laſt of all confidence in the promiſes of God. Therefore when he meant briefly to comprehend the whole ſumme of the Goſpell, he ſaid that we muſt ſuffer and riſe againe from the dead, and that Repentance and forgiueneſſe of ſinnes muſt be preached in his name. The Apoſtles alſo preached the ſame after his reſurrection, that he was raiſed vp by God, to giue to Iſrael repentance and forgiueneſſe of ſinnes. Repentance is preached in the name of Chriſt, when men doe heare by the doctrine of the Goſpell, that all their thoughts, their affections, and their endeuours are corrupt and faultie, and that therefore it is neceſſary that they be borne againe if they will enter into the kingdome of God. Forgiueneſſe of ſins is preached when men are taught that Chriſt is made to them redemption,

Luk. 24.26.

1 Cor. 1. 30. righteousnesse, saluation and life: in whose name they are freely accounted righteous and innocent in the sight of God. Whereas both these graces are receiued by Faith, as I haue in another place declared: yet because the goodnesse of God whereby sinnes are forgiuen is the proper obiect of Faith, therefore it shall be good that it be diligently distinguished from Repentance.

As Repentance openeth vs the doore vnto Christ, so Christianitie must lead vs on in the way of continuall repenting or amending our liues.

Esa. 61. 1. Mat. 11. 5. Luk. 4. 18. Mat. 9. 14. Act. 3. 26. & 5. 31. Esa. 56. 1. & 55. 20. & 55 6. Act. 2. 38.

20 Now as the hatred of sinne, which is the beginning of Repentance, openeth vs the first entry vnto Christ, which sheweth himselfe to none but to miserable and afflicted sinners, which grone, labour, are loden, are hungry and thirstie, and pine away with sorrow and miserie: so must we endeuour toward Repentance, throughout all our life apply it, and follow it to the end, if we will abide in Christ. For he came to call sinners, but to Repentance: he was sent to blesse the vnworthy, but so that euery one should turne himselfe from his wickednesse. The Scripture is full of such sayings. Wherefore when God offereth forgiuenesse of sinnes, he likewise vseth to require on our part Repentance, secretly declaring thereby, that his mercy ought to be to men a cause to repent them, Doe (saith he) iudgement and righteousnesse, because saluation is come neere at hand. Againe, there shall come to Sion a Redeemer, and to them that in Iacob repent from their sinnes. Againe, Seeke the Lord while he may be found: call vpon him while he is neere. Let the wicked leaue his way and the wickednesse of his thoughes, and be turned to the Lord, and he shall haue mercy on him. Againe, Turne ye and repent, that your sinnes may be done away. Where yet is to be noted, that this condition is not so annexed as though our Repentance were a foundation to deserue pardon, but rather (because the Lord hath determined to haue mercy vpon men to this end that they should repent) he teacheth men whether they shall trauell if they will obtaine grace. Therefore so long as we shall dwell in the prison of our body, we must continually wrastle with the vices of our corrupt flesh, yea with our owne naturall soule. Plato saith in certaine places, that the life of a Philosopher is a meditation of death, but we may more truely say, that the life of a Christian man is a perpetuall studie and exercise of mortifiyng the flesh, till it being vtterly slaine, the Spirit of God get the dominion in vs. Therefore I thinke that he hath much profited, that hath learned much to mislike himselfe: not that he should sticke fast in that mire and goe no further, but rather that he should hast and long toward God, that being grafted into the death and life of Christ, he should studie vpon a continuall repentance: as truely they cannot otherwise doe, that haue a naturall hatred of sinne: for no man euer hated sin, vnlesse he were first in loue with righteousnesse. This doctrine, as it was most simple of all other, so I thought it best to agree with the trueth of the Scripture.

Repentance the gift of God: which gift being denied vnto some kinde of sinners the Nouatians tooke thereby occasion to exclude all from it that sin after grace once receiued.

Act 3. 16. 2. Tim. 2. 25. Ephes. 2. 10.

21 Now that Repentance is a singular gift of God, I thinke it be so well knowen by the doctrine aboue taught, that I neede not to repeate a long discourse to proue it againe. Therefore the Church prayseth and hath in admiration the benefit of God, that he hath giuen the Gentiles Repentance vnto saluation. And Paul commaunding Timothie to be patient and milde toward the vnbeleeuers, saith: If at any time GOD giue them Repentance that they may repent from the snares of the deuill. God indeed affirmeth that he willeth the conuersion of all men, and directeth his exhortations generally to all men: but the effectuall working thereof hangeth vpon the Spirit of regeneration. Because it were more easie to create vs men, than of our owne power to put on a better nature. Therefore in the whole course of regeneration we are not without cause called, the worke of God created to good workes, which he hath prepared that we should walke in them. Whomsoeuer the Lords will is to deliuer from death, those he quickneth with the spirit of regeneration: not that repentance is properly the cause of saluation, but because it is already seene that it is vnseparable from Faith and from the mercie of God: sith (as Esay testifieth) that there is a Redeemer come to him, and to those that in Iacob are returned from their wickednesse. This truly standeth stedfastly determined, that wheresoeuer liueth the feare of God there the Spirit hath wrought vnto the saluation of man. Therefore in Esay, when the Faithfull complaine and lament that they are forsaken of God, they reckon this as a token of being reprobates, that their hearts were hardned by God. The Apostle also meaning to exclude Apostataes from hope of saluation, appointeth this reason, that it is impossible for them to be renewed vnto Repentance: because God in renewing them whom he will not haue perish, sheweth a token of his fatherly fauour, and in a maner draweth them vnto him with the beames of his cheerefull and mery countenance: on the otherside with hardening them, he thundreth against the reprobate, whose wickednesse is vnpardonable. Which kinde of vengeance the Apostle threatneth to wilfull Apostataes, which when they depart from the Faith of the Gospell, doe make a scorne of God, reprochfully despise his grace, and defile and tread vnder feet the bloud of Christ, yea as much as in them is they crucifie him againe. For he doth not (as some fondly rigorous men would haue it) cut off hope of pardon from all wilfull sinnes: but teacheth that Apostasie is vnworthy of all excuse: so that it is no maruell that God doth punish a contempt of himselfe so full of sacriledge, with vnappeasable rigor. For he saith that it is impossible, that they which haue once beene enlightened, haue tasted of the heauenly gift, haue beene made partakers of the holy Ghost, haue tasted of the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, if they fall, should be renewed to Repentance, crucifying againe of new, and making a scorne of the Sonne of God. Againe in another place: If (saith he) we willingly sinne after knowledge of the truth receiued, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sinnes, but a certaine dreadfull expectation of iudgement, &c. These also be the places, out of the wrong vnderstanding whereof, the Nouatians in old time haue gathered matter to play the mad men: with whose rigorousnesse certaine good men being offended, beleeued this to be a counterfait Epistle in the Apostles name, which yet in all parts doe truely sauour of an Apostolike Spirit. But because we contend with none but with them that allow it, it is easie to shew, how these sentences doe nothing maintaine their errour. First it is necessary that the Apostle agree with his Master, which affirmeth that all sinne and blasphemy shall be forgiuen, except the sinne against the holy Ghost, which is not forgiuen neither in this world nor in the world to come. It is certaine (I say) that the Apostle was contented with this exception, vnlesse we will make him an aduersary to the grace of Christ. Whereupon followeth, that pardon is denied to no special offences, but onely to one, which proceeding of a desperate rage, cannot be ascribed to weakenesse, and openly sheweth that a man is possessed of a deuill.

Heb. 10. 29.

Heb. 6. 4.

Heb. 10. 25.

22 But to discusse this, it behoooueth to enquire what is that same so horrible offence, that shall haue no forgiuenesse. Whereas Augustine in one place defineth it an obstinate stiffenesse euen vnto death, with despaire of pardon, that doth not well agree with the very words of Christ, that it shall not be forgiuen in this world. For either that is spoken in vaine, or it may be committed in this life. But if Augustines definition be true, then it is not committed, vnlesse it continue euen vnto death. Whereas some other say that he sinneth against the holy Ghost, that enuieth the grace bestowed vpon his brother: I see not from whence that is fetched. But let vs bring a true definition, which being once prooued with sure testimonies, shall easily by it selfe ouerthrow all the rest. I say therefore, that they sinne against the holy Ghost, which of set purpose resist the truth of God, with brightnesse whereof they are so dazeled, that they cannot pretend ignorance: which they doe onely to this end to resist. For Christ meaning to expound that which he had said, immediately addeth: He that speaketh a word against the sonne of man, it shall be forgiuen him: but he that blasphemeth against the holy Ghost, shall not be forgiuen. And Matthew for the blasphemy against the holy spirit, putteth the spirit of blasphemy. But how can a man speake a reproach against the Sonne, but it is also spoken against the holy Ghost? They that stumble vnware against the truth of God, not knowing it, which doe ignorantly speake euill of Christ, hauing yet this minde, that they would not extinguish the truth of God disclosed vnto them, or once with one word offend him, whom they had knowen to be the Lords annointed: these men sinne against the father and the sonne. So there are many at this day, that doe most hatefully detest the doctrine of the Gospel, which if they did know it to be the doctrine of the Gospel, they would be ready to worship with all their heart. But they whose conscience is conuinced, that it is the word of God which they forsake and fight against, and yet cease not to fight against it, they are said to blaspheme

The definition of sinne against the holy Ghost: which sinne proceedeth not of ignorance but of malice.

Matth. 12. 32. Mark. 3. 29. Luk. 12. 10.

the holy Ghost: for asmuch as they wrastle against the enlightning that is the worke of the holy Ghost. Such were many of the Iewes, which when they could not resist the Spirit that spake by Stephen, yet endeuoured to resist. It is no doubt but that many of them were carried vnto it with zeale of the law, but it appeareth that there were some other that of malicious wickednesse did rage against God himselfe, that is to say against the doctrine, which they were not ignorant to be of God. And such were those Pharisees, against whom the Lord enuieth, which to ouerthrow the power of the holy Ghost, defamed him with the name of Beelzebub. This therefore is the spirit of blasphemy, when mans boldnesse of set purpose, leapeth foorth to reproach the name of God. Which Paul signifieth when he saith, that he obtained mercy, because he had ignorantly committed those things through vnbeleefe, for which otherwise he had beene vnworthy of Gods fauour. If ignorance ioyned with vnbeleefe was the cause that he obtained pardon, thereupon followeth, that there is no place for pardon, where knowledge is ioyned to vnbeleefe.

Act. 6. 10.

Matth. 9 43. & 12. 24.

1. Tim. 1. 13.

23 But if thou marke it well, thou shalt perceiue that the Apostle speaketh not of one or other particular fall, but of the vniuersall departing whereby the reprobate doe forsake saluation. And it is no maruell, that they whom Iohn in his canonicall Epistle affirmeth not to haue beene of the elect, from whom they went out, doe feele God vnappeaseable. For he directeth his speech against them, that imagined, that they might returne to the Christian religion, although they had once departed from it: and calling them from this false and pestilent opinion, he saith that which is most true, that there is no way of returne open for them to the communion of Christ, that wittingly and willingly haue cast it away: but they cast it not away, that onely in dissolute licentiousnesse of life transgresse the word of the Lord, but they that of set purpose cast away his whole doctrine. Therefore the deceit is in these words of falling and sinning. Because the Nouatians expound Falling to be, if a man being taught by the law of the Lord, that he ought not to steale or to commit fornication, abstaineth not from stealing or fornication. But contrariwise I affirme, that there is a secret comparison of contraries, wherein ought to be repeated all things contrary to that which was first spoken, so that heere is expressed not any particular fault but the whole turning away from God, and (as I may so call it) the Apostasie of the whole man. Therefore when he said, they which haue fallen after that they haue once beene enlightned, and haue tasted the heauenly gift, and beene made partakers of the holy Ghost, and also tasted the good word of God and the powers of the world to come: it is to be vnderstanded of them, that with aduised vngodlinesse haue choked the light of the holy Spirit, haue spit out againe the taste of the heauenly gift, haue estranged themselues from the sanctification of the holy Ghost, haue troden vnder foote the word of God and the powers of the world to come. And the more to expresse that aduised purpose of wickednesse, in another place afterward he addeth this word by name Wilfully. For when he saith, that there is left no sacrifice for them that sinne willingly after knowledge of the truth receiued, he doth not deny, that Christ is a continuall sacrifice to purge the iniquities of the holy ones (which he expresly crieth out almost in the whole Epistle, where he declareth the priesthood of Christ) but he saith, that there remaineth no other when that is once forsaken: and it is forsaken, when the truth of the Gospell is of set purpose renounced.

Heb. 6. 4.

Heb. 10. 16.

To them that sinne against the holy Ghost pardon is not denied if they repent, but repentance because they are vnworthy of pardō. Zach. 3. 17.

24 But whereas some doe thinke it too hard and too far from the tender mercifulnesse of God, that any are put away that flee to beseeching the Lords mercy: that is easily answered. For he doth not say, that pardon is denied them if they turne to the Lord: but he vtterly denieth, that they can rise vnto Repentance, because they are by the iust iudgement of God stricken with eternall blindnesse for their vnthankfulnesse. And it maketh nothing to the contrary that afterward he applyeth to this purpose the example of Esau, which in vaine attempted with howling and weeping to recouer his right of the first begotten. And no more doth that threatning of the Prophet, when they cry, I will not heare. For in such Phrases of speech is meant neither the true conuersion, nor calling vpon God, but that carefulnesse of the wicked wherewith being bound, they are compelled in extremity to looke vnto that which before they carelesly neglected, neglected, that there is no good thing for them but in the Lords helpe. But this they do not so much call vpon, as they mourne that it is taken from them. Therefore the Prophet meaneth nothing else by crying, and the Apostle nothing else by weeping, but that horrible torment which by desperation fretteth and vexeth the wicked. This it is good to marke diligently, for else God should disagree with himselfe, which crieth by the Prophet that he will be mercifull so soone as the sinner turneth. And as I haue already said, it is certaine that the minde of man is not turned to better, but by Gods grace preuenting it. Also his promise concerning calling vpon him, will neuer deceiue. But that blinde torment wherewith the reprobate are diuersly drawen, when they see that they must needes seeke God, that they may finde remedie for their euils, and yet doe flee from his presence, is vnproperly called Conuersion and Prayer. Ezec. 18. 21.

25 But a question is mooued, whereas the Apostle denieth that God is appeased with faigned Repentance, how Achab obteined pardon and turned away the punishment pronounced vpon him, whom yet it appeareth by the rest of the course of his life to haue beene only striken amased with sodaine feare. He did indeed put on sackcloth, scattered ashes vpon him, lay vpon the ground, and (as it is testified of him) he was humbled before God: but it was not enough to cut his garments when his heart remained thicke and swolne with malice. Yet we see how God is turned to mercy. I answere that so sometimes hypocrites are spared for a time, but yet so that euer the wrath of God lyeth vpon them, and that is done not so much for their sakes, as for common example. For whereas Achab had his punishment mitigated vnto him, what profit got he thereby, but that he should not feele it aliue in earth? Therefore the curse of GOD although it were hidden, yet had a fast abiding place in his house, and he himselfe went into eternall destruction. This same is to be seene in Esau. For though he had a repulse, yet a temporall blessing was granted him at his weeping. But beeause the spirituall inheritance, by the Oracle of God could not rest but with one of the brethren, when Iacob was chosē & Esau refused, that putting away did exclude the mercy of God: this comfort was left him as to a beastly man, that he should be fat with the fat of the earth and the deawe of Heauen. And this is it that I said euen now, that it ought to be referred to the example of the other, that we should learne the more chearefully to apply our mindes and endeuours to repentance, because it is not to be doubted that when we are truely and heartily turned, God will be ready to forgiue vs, whose mercifulnesse extendeth it selfe euen to the vnworthy, so long as they shew any griefe at all. And therewithall we be also taught, how terrible iudgement is prepared for all the obstinate, which now make it a sport with no lesse shamelesse face than yron heart to despise and set nought by the threatnings of God. After this maner he oftentimes reached out his hand to the children of Israell, to releeue their miseries, although their crimes were counterfeit, and their hearts double and false, as himselfe in the Psalme complaineth, that they by and by returned to their nature, and so minded with so friendly gentle dealing to bring them to earnest conuersion, or to make them vnexcusable. Yet in releasing punishments for a time, he doth not binde himselfe to a perpetuall law thereby, but rather riseth sometimes more rigorously against Hypocrites, and doubleth their paines, that thereby may appeare how much fainting displeaseth him. But (as I haue said) he sheweth some examples of his readinesse to giue pardon, by which the godly may be encouraged to amendment of life, and their pride may be the more grieuously condemned, that stubbornely kicke against the pricke.

Although God for common examples sake doe sometimes remit temporall punishments vpon a counterfeit repentance as in Achab, yet his wrath without hearty conuersion is not turned away.

so many volumes, being a matter otherwise not very hard, that a man shall hardly finde how to get out, if he once fall into their degrees. First, in defining it, they shew that they neuer vnderstoode what Repentance was. For they take holde of certaine sayings of the old writers, which doe nothing at all expresse that nature of Repentance, as that to repent is to weepe for sinnes passed, and not to commit sinnes to be wept for: Againe, that it is to lament euils passed, and not to commit againe other euils to be lamented.

The first is out of Gregorie, and is rehearsed lib. 4. Sent. dist. 14. cap. 1.

The second out of Amb. & refer. allic. & in Decr. Dist. 3. de pœnitent c. Pœnit. priore.

The third out of August. retert. ca. Dist. ca. Pœn. post.

The fourth out of Amb. retert. Dist. 1. Pœn c. Vera Pœnit.

Againe: that it is a certaine sorrowfull reuenge, punishing in himselfe that which he is sorrie to haue committed. Againe: that it is a sorrow of heart, and bitternesse of soule, for the euils that a man hath committed or to which he hath consented. But, to graunt these things well said of the Fathers (which a contentious man might easily enough denie) yet they were not spoken to this entent to describe Repentance, but onely to exhort them to whom they wrote, that they should not fall againe into the same offences, out of which they had beene drawen. But if we list to turne all such titles of commendation into definitions, then other may also be adioyned as rightfully as they. As this of Chrysostome, Repentance is a medicine that destroyeth sinne, a gift giuen from heauen, a maruellous vertue, a grace surmounting the force of the law. Yea and the doctrine which they afterward teach, is somewhat worse then these definitions. For they sticke so earnestly in outward exercises, that a man can gather nothing else out of infinite volumes, but that Repentance is a discipline and rigorousnesse that serueth partly to tame the flesh, and partly to chastice and punish vices: but they keepe maruellous silence of the inward renewing of the minde that draweth with it correction of life. There is indeede much talke among them of Contrition and Attrition: they torment soules with many doubts, and doe thrust into them much trouble and carefulnesse: but when they seeme to haue throughly wounded the harts, they heale the bitternesse with a light sprinkling of ceremonies. And when they haue thus curiously defined repentance, they diuide it into contrition of hart, confession of mouth, and satisfaction of worke, no more logically then they defined it, although they would seeme to haue wasted all their age in framing of syllogismes. But if a man will goe about to prooue by the definition (which kinde of argument is of force among logicians) that a man may weepe for his sinnes passed, and commit no more to be wept for, that he may bewaile his euils passed, and commit no more to be bewailed, & that he may punish himselfe for that which he was sorrie to haue committed, &c. although he doe not confesse with his mouth: how will they maintaine their diuision? For if that true penitent man doe not confesse, then Repentance may be without confession. But if they answer, that this diuision is refered to repentance, in respect that it is a Sacrament, or is meant of the whole perfection of Repentance, which they comprehend not in their definitions, then is there no cause to blame me, but let them lay the fault in themselues that make not a purer and plainer definition, I truely (according to my grosseneſſe) when any thing is disputed of, do referre all things to the very definition, which is the stay and ground of the whole disputation. But admit that to be their masterlike licence. Now let vs particularly consider all the parts in order. Where as I doe negligently leape ouer as trifles those things that they with great grauitie of countenance doe publish for mysteries, I doe it not vnwittingly, (neither were it very painefull for me to confute all that they thinke themselues to haue deepely and subtlely disputed) but I would thinke it against conscience to wearie the Readers with such trifles without any profit. Truely it is easie to know by the questions which they moone and tosse, & wherewith they miserably encomber themselues, that they prate of things that they know not. As for example: whether the repentance of our sinne pleaseth God, when obstinacie endureth in other. Againe: whether the punishments laid vpon man by God, doe auaile to satisfaction. Againe: whether repentance may be oftentimes reiterate for deadly sinnes: where they fouly and wickedly define, that penance is daily done but for veniall sinnes. Likewise they very much torment themselues with a grosse errour, vpon the saying of Hierome, that repentance is a second bourde after shipwracke. Wherein they shew that they neuer waked from their brutish dulnesse, to feele so much as a farre off the thousandth part of their faults.

neſſe of ſins. For whereas they require three things to repentance, contrition of heart, confeſſion of mouth, and ſatisfaction of worke: they doe therewithall teach that thoſe three things are neceſſary to the obtaining of forgiueneſſe of ſinnes. But if it behoue vs to know any thing at all in all our religion, this truely behoueth vs moſt of all I meane to vnderſtand and know well by what meane, with what law, vpon what condition, with what eaſineſſe or hardneſſe the forgiueneſſe of ſinnes is obtained. If this knowledge ſtand not plaine and certaine, the conſcience ſhall haue no reſt at all, no peace with God, no confidence or aſſuredneſſe, but continually trembleth, wauereth, is troubled, is tormented, is vexed, horribly dreadeth, hateth and fleeth the ſight of God. But if the forgiueneſſe of ſinnes hange vpon thoſe conditions to which they doe binde it, then nothing is more miſerable, nothing in more lamentable caſe than we. They make Contrition the firſt part of obtayning pardon, and they require that to be a true Contrition, that is to ſay perfect and full: but in the meane time they doe not determine when a man may be aſſured, that he hath to the full meaſure perfectly performed this contrition. Truely I grant that euery man ought diligently and earneſtly to enforce himſelfe, with bitterly weeping for his ſinnes, to whet himſelfe more and more to a lothing and hatred of them. For this is a ſorrow not to be repented, that breedeth repentance vnto ſaluation. But when there is ſuch a bitterneſſe of ſorrow required as may proportionally anſwere the greatneſſe of the fault, and ſuch as may in balance counterpoiſe with the truſt of pardon, here the poore conſciences are maruellouſly tormented and troubled, when they ſee themſelues charged with a due contrition of ſinnes, and doe not ſo attaine the meaſure of that due, that they can determine with themſelues, that they haue duely performed ſo much as they duely ought. If they ſay that we muſt doe as much as lyeth in vs, then come we ſtill to the ſame point that we are at before: for how dare any man aſſure himſelfe that he hath imployed all his force to bewaile his ſinnes? So when the conſciences hauing long wraſtled with themſelues, and long beene exerciſed with battels, doe at length find no hauen to reſt in, yet ſomewhat to eaſe themſelues, they enforce themſelues to a ſorrow, and wring out teares to make perfect their contrition.

any quietneſſe of mind of that which the Schoolemen haue taught concerning contrition were true.

3 But if they ſay that I ſlaunder them: Let them come forth & ſhew any one man, that by ſuch doctrine of contrition hath not either beene driuen to diſpaire, or hath not ſet for his defence a counterfaiting of ſorrow inſteede of true ſorrow, againſt the iudgement of God. We haue alſo our ſelues ſaid in one place, that forgiueneſſe of ſinnes neuer commeth without repentance, becauſe none but the afflicted and wounded with conſcience of ſinnes, can ſincerely call vpon the mercie of God: but we haue therewithall further ſaid, that repentance is not the cauſe of the forgiueneſſe of ſinnes. As for thoſe tormens of ſoules, which they ſay muſt be performed of duety, we haue taken them away: we haue taught the ſinner not to looke vpon his owne contrition nor his owne teares, but to faſten both his eies vpon the onely mercy of God. We haue onely put him in minde that Chriſt called the laboring and loden, when he was ſent to publiſh glad tidings to the poore, to heale the contrite in hart, to preach remiſſion to captiues, to deliuer priſoners, and to comfort them that mourne. From which ſhould be excluded both the Phariſees, that filled with their owne righteouſneſſe, doe not acknowledge their owne pouertie, and alſo the deſpiſers that careleſſe of Gods wrath doe ſeeke no remedie for their euils. For ſuch doe not labour, nor are loaden, nor contrite in hart, nor bond, nor captiue. But there is great difference betweene teaching a man to deſerue forgiueneſſe of ſinnes with due and full contrition, which the ſinner can neuer performe: and inſtructing him to hunger and thirſt for the mercie of God, that by the acknowledging of his owne miſerie, by his owne vnquietneſſe, wearineſſe and captiuitie, it may be ſhewed him, where he ought to ſeeke for reliefe, reſt and libertie: and finally, he may be taught in the humbling of himſelfe, to giue glory to God.

The pardon of our ſinnes doth not depend vpon the meaſure of our contrition.

Matt. 11. 28. Eſay 61. Luk. 4. 18.

4 Concerning confeſſion, there hath beene alwaies great ſtrife betweene the Canoniſtes and the Schoole diuines: while the one ſort affirme, that confeſſion is commaunded by the ſpeciall commandement of God, and the other ſort deny it and ſay, that it is commaunded onely by the Eccleſiaſticall conſtitutions. But in this contention hath appeared the notable ſhameleſneſſe of the diuines, that haue corrupted and and violently wrested as many places of Scripture, as they alledged for their purpose. And when they saw that they could not so obtaine that which they required, they which would be thought more subtile than the rest escaped away with this shift, that confession came from the law of God, in respect of the substance of it, but afterward receiued forme of the law Positiue. Euen as the foolishest sort among the Lawyers doe say, that Citations came from the law of God, because it is said: Adam where art thou? And likewise Exceptions, because Adam answered as it were by way of exception saying: The wife that thou gauest me, &c. But that both citations and exceptions receiued from giuen them by the Ciuill law. But let vs see by what arguments they prooue this confession, either Formed or Vnformed to be the commandements of God. The Lord (say they) sent the leprous men to the Priests. But what? Sent he them to confession? Who euer heard it spoken, that the Leuiticall priests were appointed to heare confessions? Therefore they flie to Allegories, And say. It was commanded by the Law of Moses, that the priests should discerne betweene leprosie and leprosie: sin is a spirituall leprosie therefore it is the priests office to pronounce vpon it. Before that I answer them, I aske this by the way, If this place make them iudges of the spirituall leprosie? why doe they draw to them the knowledge of naturall and fleshly leprosie? This forsooth is not to mocke with the Scriptures. The law giueth to the Leuiticall Priests the knowledge of the Leprosie, therefore let vs take it vpon vs. Sinne is a spirituall leprosie, therefore let vs also be examiners of sinne. Now I answer: sith the priesthood is remooued, it is necessary that the Lawe be remooued also. All priesthoods are remoued to Christ, and fulfilled and ended in him, therefore to him onely all the right and honour of priesthood is also remoued. If they loue so well to follow allegories, let him set Christ before them for the onely priest, and heape vpon his iudgement seat the free iurisdiction of all things: this we can easily be contented to suffer. Moreouer their allegory is very vnfit, that setteth among the ceremonies that law which is meerely politike. Why then did Christ send the leprous men to the Priests? That the Priests should not cauill that he did breake the law that commanded the man healed of the leprosie, to be shewed before the Priests and purged with offering of sacrifice: therefore he commanded the leprous men being cleansed, to doe that which belonged to the law. Goe (saith he) and shew your selues to the Priest, and offer the gift that Moses hath commanded in the Law that it should be for a witnesse vnto them. And truely this miracle should haue beene a witnesse vnto them, for they had pronounced them leprous, and now they pronounce them healed. Are they not whether they will or no compelled to become witnesses of Christs miracles? Christ leaueth to them his miracle to be examined, they cannot deny it. But because they still dally with it, therefore this worke is for a witnesse vnto them. So in another place: This Gospell shall be preached in all the world, for a witnesse to all nations. Againe: Ye shall be led before kings and gouernours, for a witnesse to them, that is: that in the iudgement of God they may be more strongly conuinced. But if they had rather follow Chrysostome: he also teacheth that Christ did this for the Iewes sake that he should not be accounted a breaker of the Law. Albeit in so cleare a matter I am ashamed to alleage the witnesse of any man: whereas Christ pronounceth that he leaueth the right of the law whole to the priests as to the professed enemies of the Gospell, which were alway bent to carpe against it, if their mouth had not beene stopped. Wherefore that the popish sacrificing priests may still keepe this profession, let them openly take parts with them which must of necessity be restrained by force, that they speake not ill against Christ. For this nothing belongeth to his true ministers.

5 They bring their second argument out of the same fountaine, that is from an allegorie, as though allegories were of great force to confirme any doctrine. But let them be of force, if I doe not prooue that I can make a fairer shew of them for my side, then they can for theirs. They say, The Lord commanded his Disciples, that when Lazarus was raised vp, they should vnbinde and loose him from his bonds. Here first they lie: for it is no where read that the Lord said this to the Disciples: and it is much more likely that he said to the Iewes that stoode by him, that the miracle might be made the more euident without suspition of fraud, and his power appeare the greater, that without without any touching, with his onely word he raiſed vp dead men. For thus I expound it: that the Lord, to take away all wrongfull opinion from the Iewes, willed them to role away the ſtone, to feele the ſtinke, to behold aſſured tokens of death, to ſee him riſing by the onely power of his word, and them firſt to feele him liuing. And this is the iudgement of Chryſoſtome. But let vs graunt that this was ſpoken to the Diſciples: what will they get thereby? That the Lord gaue his Apoſtles power to looſe. But how much more fitly and more handſomely might theſe things be applied by way of allegorie, to ſay that by this ſigne the Lord meant to inſtruct his faithfull, to looſe them that he had raiſed vp: that is, that they ſhould not call into remembrance thoſe ſinnes that he had forgotten: that they ſhould not condemne them for ſinners whom he had acquited: that they ſhould not reproch men with thoſe things that he had forgiuen: that they ſhould not be rigorous to puniſh, and lightly offended, where he is mercifull and eaſily entreated to ſpare? Truely, nothing ought to mooue vs more to readineſſe to forgiue, than the example of the Iudge that threatneth that he will be vnappeaſable to them that be too rigorous, and vngentle. Now let them goe and boaſt of their allegories.

Ser. contra Iudæos, Gentiles & hæretic.

6 But now they ioyne more neere hand with vs, when they fight (as they thinke) with open ſentences. They that came to Iohns baptiſme, did confeſſe their ſinnes, and Iames willeth that we confeſſe our ſins one to an other. No marueile if they that would be baptiſed did confeſſe their ſinnes, for it was ſaid before that Iohn preached the baptiſme of Repentance, and baptiſed in water vnto Repentance. Whom ſhould he then haue baptized, but them that had confeſſed themſelues ſinners? Baptiſme is a token of the forgiuenеſſe of ſinnes: and who ſhould be admitted to this token but ſinners, and they that acknowledge themſelues to be ſuch? Therefore they confeſſed their ſinnes, they might be baptized. And not without a cauſe doth Iames bid vs confeſſe one to another. But if they did marke what followeth next after, they would vnderſtand, that this alſo maketh little for them. Confeſſe (ſaith he) one to another your ſinnes, and pray one for another. He ioyneth together mutuall confeſſion and mutuall prayer. If we muſt confeſſe to Prieſts onely, then muſt we alſo pray for Prieſts onely. Yea, What and if it might follow of the words of Iames that onely Prieſts might confeſſe? for when he willeth that we ſhould confeſſe one to another, he ſpeaketh onely to them that may heare the confeſſions of other: his word is in Greeke Allelous, mutually, interchangeably, by turnes, or (if they ſo like beſt to terme it) by way of reciprocation one to another. But ſo interchangeably none can confeſſe, but they that are meete to heare confeſſions. Which prerogatiue ſith they vouchſafe to graunt onely to Prieſts, we do alſo put ouer the office of confeſſing to them onely. Therefore away with ſuch triflings, and let vs take the very meaning of the Apoſtle which is ſimple and plaine: that is, that we ſhould lay our weakeneſſe one in anothers boſome to receiue mutuall counſell, mutuall compaſſion, and mutuall comfort one of another: then that we being naturally priuy to the weakneſſe of our brethren, ſhould pray for them to the Lord. Why doe they then alleadge Iames againſt vs: which doe ſo earneſtly require the confeſſion of the mercie of God? but no man can confeſſe Gods mercie, vnleſſe he haue firſt confeſſed his owne miſerie. Yea we rather pronounce him accurſed that doth not before God, before his Angels, before the Church, yea and before all men confeſſe himſelfe a ſinner. For the Lord hath concluded all vnder ſinnes, that all mouthes might be ſtopped, and all fleſh humbled before God, and he onely iuſtified and exalted.

Auricular confeſſion weakely proued either by their acknowledging of their ſins whom Iohn did baptize, or by S. Iames his willing men to make their mutuall confeſſions.

Gal 3.22. Rom.3 9.

7 But I marueile with what face they dare affirme, that the confeſſion whereof they ſpeake, is of the law of God: the vſe whereof we grant indeede to be very auncient, but ſuch as we are able to prooue in old time to haue beene at libertie. Truly euen their owne Chronicles declare, that there was no certaine Law or conſtitution of it before the times of Innocent the third. Surely, if they had had a more auncient law they would rather haue taken hold thereof, than haue been contented with the decree of the councell of Laterane & ſo made themſelues to be laughed at, euen of children. In other things they ſticke not to make forged decrees, which they father vpon the moſt auncient Councels, that they may with very reuerence of antiquitie dazle the eyes of the ſimple. In this point, it came not in their minde to thruſt in ſuch a falſe packe. Therefore by their owne witneſſe, there are not yet paſſed three hundred yeeres ſince Innocent Auricular confeſſion a meere humane conſtitution not grounded vpon any diuine law. This was the 183. Pope.

Innocent the third laid that snare vpon men, and charged them with necessitie of Confession. But, to speake nothing of the time: the very barbarousnesse of the wordes minisheth the credite of that law. For where these good fathers command euery one of both kindes, male and female, once euery yeare to confesse all his sinnes to his owne priest, pleasant men doe merrily take exception, that in this commandement are contained only Hermaphrodites, and say that it belongeth not to such a one as is either male or female onely. Since that time, a more grosse beastlinesse hath bewraied it selfe in their schollers, that cannot expound what is meant by his owne priest. Whatsoeuer all the Popes hyred bablers doe prate, we hold both that Christ was neuer the author of this law that compelleth men to reckon vp their sins, and also that there passed a thousand and two hundred yeeres from the resurrection of Christ before that any such law was made. And so, that this tyrannie was then first brought in, when all godlinesse and learning being destroyed, the visiors of Pastors had without choise taken all licentiousnesse vpon them. Moreouer there are euident testimonies both in histories and other ancient writers, which teacheth that this confession was a politicke discipline redeemed by the Bishops, not a law made by Christ or his Apostles. I will alleadge but one out of many, which shall be a plaine proofe thereof. Sozomenus reporteth that this constitution of Bishops was diligently kept in all the West churches, but specially at Rome. Whereby he sheweth that it was no vniuersall ordinance of all churches. But he saith that there was one of the Priests peculiarly appointed to serue for this office. Whereby he doth sufficiently confute that which these men doe faisly say of the keies giuen for this vse vniuersally to the whole order of priesthood. For it was not the common office of all priests, but the speciall dutie of some one that was chosen thereunto by the Bishop. The same is he, whom at this day in all cathedrall churches they call Penitentiarie, the examiner of hainous offences, and such whereof the punishment pertaineth to good example. Then he saith immediately after, that this was also the maner at Constantinople, till a certaine woman faigning that she came to confession, was found so to haue coloured vnder that pretence the vnhoneſt company that she vsed with a certaine Deacon. For this act, Nectarius a man notable in holinesse and learning, bishop of that Church, tooke away that custome of confessing. Heere, heere let these asses lift vp their eares. If auricular confession were the law of God, how durst Nectarius repell and destroy it? Will they accuse for an heretike and schismatike Nectarius a holy man of God, allowed by the consenting voices of all the olde fathers? But by the same sentence they must condemne the Church of Constantinople, in which Sozomenus affirmeth that the maner of confessing was not onely let slip for a time, but also discontinued euen till within time of his remembrance. Yea let them condemne of Apostasie not onely the Church of Constantinople, but also all the East Churches which haue neglected that law, which (if they say true) is inuiolable and commanded to all Christians.

Tripart. hist. lib. 9.

8 This abrogation Chrysostome, which was also bishop of Constantinople doth in so many places euidently testifie, that it is maruell that these dare mutter to the contrary. Tell (saith he thy sinnes that thou mayest doe them away, if thou be ashamed to tell any man the sinnes that thou hast done, tell them daily in thy soule. I doe not say, Confesse them to thy fellow seruant, that may reproch thee: tell them to God that taketh care of them. Confesse thy sins vpon thy bed, that there thy conscience may daily recognise her euils. Again: but now it is not necessarie to confesse when witnesses be present: let the examination of thy sinnes be done with thy thought: let this iudgement be without witnesse: let onely God see thee confessing. Againe: I doe not lead thee into a stage of thy fellow seruants, I doe not compell thee to disclose thy sinnes to men, rehearse and vtter thy conscience before God. Shew thy wounds to the Lord the best surgion, and aske salue of him. Shew to him that will reproch thee with nothing, but will most gently heale thee. Againe: Tell not man, least he reproch thee, for neither is it to be confessed to thy fellow seruant, that may vtter it abroad, but to the Lord. To the Lord shew thy wounds which hath care of thee, that is both gentle and a Phisition. Afterward he bringeth in God speaking thus: I compell thee not to come into the mids of a stage, and call many witnesses, tell thy sinne to me alone priuately uately that I may heale thy sore. Shall we say that Chrysostome did so rashly, when he wrote this & other like things, that he would deliuer mens consciences frō these bonds wherewith they be bound by the law of God? not so. But he dare not require that as of necessitie, which he doth not vnderstand to be commanded by the word of God.

9 But that the matter may be made the plainer and easier, first we will faithfully rehearse, what kinde of confession is taught by the word of God: and then we will also declare their inuentions, but not all (for who could draw drie such an infinite sea?) but onely those wherein they comprehend the summe of their secret confession. Here I am loth to rehearse how oft the old translator hath giuen in translation this word Confesse in steede of Praise: which the grossest vnlearned men commonly know: sauing that it is good to haue their presumptuousnesse bewraied, that doe giue away that which was written of the praises of God, to their owne tyrannicall commandement. To proove that confession auaileth to cheere the mindes they thrust in that place of the Psalme: In the voice of reioycing and confession. But if such change may serue, then we shall haue what we list, prooued by what we list. But seeing they are so become past shame, let the godly readers remember that by the iust vengeance of God they haue beene cast into a reprobate minde, that their presumption should be the more detestable. But if we will rest in the simple doctrine of the Scripture, we shall not be in danger of any such deceits to beguile vs. For there is appointed one order of confessing that forasmuch as it is the Lord that forgiueth, forgetteth, and putteth away sins, therefore we should confesse our sinnes to him for to obtaine pardon, he is the Physition, therefore let vs shew our diseases vnto him. It is he that is greeued and offended, therefore let vs seeke peace at his hand. He is the knower of harts, and priuie to all thoughes, therefore let vs make haste to powre out our harts before him. Finally it is he that calleth sinners, therefore let not vs delay to come to him. I haue (saith Dauid) made my sinne knowen vnto thee, and haue not hidden my vnrighteousnesse. I haue said, I will confesse against me my vnrighteousnesse to the Lord, and thou hast forgiuen the wickednesse of my hart. Such is the other confession of Dauid. Haue mercy vpon me O God, according to thy great mercy. And such is the confession of Daniel: We haue sinned, Lord we haue done peruersly, we haue committed iniquities, and haue beene rebellious in swaruing from thy Commandement. And such are other confessions that are commonly found in Scripture, the rehearsall whereof would almost fill a great volume. If we confesse our sinnes (saith Iohn) the Lord is faithfull to forgiue vs our sinnes. To whom should we confesse? euen to him: that is, if we fall downe with a troubled and humbled hart before him, if hartily accusing and condemning our selues before him we pray to be acquited by his goodnesse and mercy.

The Scripture requireth confession of sinnes, but vnto God.

Psal. 13.5.

Psal. 51.5.

1. Ioh. 1.9.

10 He that hartily and before God shall embrace this confession, shall vndoubtedly haue both a tongue readie to confesse, so oft as it shall be needfull for him to publish the mercy of God before men, and not onely to whisper the secret of his hart to one man, and once and in his eare: but oft and openly, and in the hearing of all the world simply to rehearse both his owne shame and the magnificence and glory of God. After this maner when Dauid was rebuked of Nathan, he was pricked with the sting of conscience, and confessed his sinne before both God and man. I haue (saith he) sinned to the Lord, that is to say, now I alleadge nothing for my excuse, I vse no shiftes, but that all men may iudge me a sinner, and that the same thing which I would haue had secret from the Lord, may be also open to men. Therefore a willing confession before men alway followeth the secret confession that is made to God, so oft as it is profitable for the glory of God or for the humbling of our selues. For this reason the Lord in old time ordained in the people of Israel, that the Priest should first speake the words, and the people saying after him should openly confesse their iniquitie in the Church. For he foresaw that this helpe was necessarie for them, that euery man might be the better brought to a iust reknowledging of himselfe. And meere it is that with the confession of our owne misery we should among our selues, and before all the world glorifie the goodnesse and mercy of our God.

A confession of our sinnes openly as occasion shall require euen vnto men also allowable.

people to be guiltie of any generall fault. Of this second kinde we haue an example in that solemne confession which all the people vsed by the meanes and guiding of Esdras and of Nehemias. For whereas that long banishment, the destruction of the City and Temple, the dissoluing of religion, was the punishment of the common reuolting of them all: they could not acknowledge the benefit of deliuerance in such sort as was meete, vnlesse they did first condemne themselues. Neither maketh it matter, if in a whole Congregation some few sometime be innocent. For sith they be the members of a feeble and diseased body, they ought not to boast of healthfulnesse. Yea it is not possible but they must also themselues gather some infection and beare part of the blame. Therefore so oft as we be afflicted, either with pestilence or war, or barrennesse or any other plague: if it be our duety to flie to mourning, to fasting, and to other signes of guiltinesse: then confession it selfe, whereupon all these things doe hang, is not to be neglected. As for the ordinarie confession, beside that it is commended by the Lords owne mouth, there is no wise man that considering the profit thereof, dare disallow it. For whereas in all holy assemblies we make our apparance in the sight of God and the Angels: what other beginning may there be of our pleading, but our reknowledging of vnworthinesse? But that (some man will say) is done by euery prayer. For so oft as we pray for pardon, we thereby confesse our sinnes. I grant. But if you consider how great is our carelesnes, or drousinesse, or sluggishnesse, you will grant me that it should be a profitable ordinance, if by some solemne vse of confession, the Christian common people should be exercised to humbling themselues. For though the ceremony that the Lord commanded the Israelites, was parcell of the nurture of the law, yet in some maner it also belongeth to vs. And truely we see that this vse is in well ordered Churches profitably obserued, that euery Sunday the minister should rehearse a forme of confession in the name of himselfe and of all the people, wherein he accuseth all of wickednes, and craueth pardon of the Lord. Finally, with this keie the gate to prayer is opened as well priuately to euery man, as vniuersally to all men.

Priuate confession of sinnes for some men in some cases requisite to be made vnto their pastors. Iac. 5. 16.

12 Moreouer the Scripture alloweth two formes of priuate confession; one that is made for our owne sake, whereof that saying of Iames is spoken, that we should confesse our sinnes one to another, for his meaning is, that disclosing our wickednesses one to another, we should one helpe another with mutuall counsell and comfort. The other forme that is to be vsed for our neighbours sake, to appease him and reconcile him vnto vs, if he haue in any thing beene offended by vs. Now in the first kinde of confession, although Iames in this hath assigned no man by name, into whose bosome we should vnlode our selues, leaueth vs a free choise to confesse to him that shal seeme meetest vnto vs of all the flocke of the Church: yet we ought principally to choose the Pastors, because they are for the most part in comparison of the other to be iudged meetest. I say that they are meetest in comparison of the rest, because the Lord appointeth them by the very calling of their ministerie, at whose mouth we should be instructed to subdue and correct our sinnes, and also may receiue comfort: by trust of pardon. For as the office of mutuall admonishment and reproouing is committed to all men, yet it is specially enioyned to the ministers. So when as we all ought to comfort and confirme one another in confidence of Gods mercie: yet we see that the ministers to assure our consciences of the forgiuenesse of sinnes, are ordained as it were witnesses and pledges therefore, in so much that they be said to forgiue sinnes and loose soules. When thou heares this to be ascribed vnto them, thinke that it is for thy profit. Therefore let euery one of the faithfull remember this to be his duetie, if he be priuately so vexed and troubled with the feeling of sinnes that he cannot winde out himselfe without helpe of another, not to neglect the remedie that the Lord hath offered him: that is, for his relieue to vse the priuate confession to his owne Pastor: and for his comfort to craue the priuate helpe of him, whose duetie it is both publiquely and priuately to comfort the people of God with the doctrine of the Gospell. But alway this moderation is to be vsed, where God appointeth no certaintie, not to binde consciences with a certaine yoke. Hereupon followeth that such Confession ought to be free: not to be required of all men, but to be commended to those onely that shall vderstand themselues to haue neede of it. Then that euen they that vse it for their neede, should not be compelled by any commandement, or trained by any deceit, to reckon vp all their sins, but so farre, as they shall thinke it behouefull for them, that they may receiue sound fruit of comfort. Faithfull Pastors ought not only to leaue this libertie to the Churches, but also to maintaine it, and stoutly stand in defence of it, if they will haue tyrannie absent from their ministerie and superstition from the people.

Particular men bound to confesse their faults vnto men against whom they haue offended.

13 Of the other sort of confession Christ speaketh in Matthew. If thou offer thy gift at the altar, and there remembrest that thy brother hath any thing against thee, leaue thy gift there, and goe, and first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift. For so charitie that hath beene appaired by our fault, is to be repaired by acknowledging and crauing pardon of the offence that we haue committed. Vnder this kinde is contained their confession that haue sinned euen the offending of the whole Church. For if Christ maketh so great a matter of the priuate offence of one man, to forbid from holy mysteries all them that haue sinned against their brother, till they be with iust amends reconciled: how much greater reason is it, that he that hath offended the Church with any euill example, should recouer the fauour of the Church with acknowledging his fault? So was the Corinthian receiued againe to the communion, when he had yeelded himselfe obedient to correction. Also this forme of confession was vsed in the old Church, as Cyprian maketh mention. They doe penance (saith he) in due time, and then they come to confession, and by laying on of the hands of the Bishop and the Cleargy, they receiue leaue to come to the communion. Any other order or forme of confessing, the Scripture vtterly knoweth not, and it is not our duetie to binde consciences with new bonds, whom Christ most sharply forbiddeth vs to bring in bondage. In the meane time I doe so much not speake against it that the sheepe should present themselues to their shepheard when they meane to be partakers of the holy Supper, that I would most gladly haue it euery where obserued. For both they that haue an encombred conscience, may from thence receiue singular profit, and they that are to be admonished doe by that meane prepare place for admonishment, but so alway that tyrannie and superstition be away.

Mat. 5. 23.

2. Cor. 2. 6.

A commendable kinde of absolution correspondent to the former kinds of confession.

14 In these three kindes of confession, the power of the keies hath place: that is, either when the whole Church with solemne reknowledging of their faults craueth pardon: or when a priuate man, that by any notable fault hath bred common offence, doth declare his repentance: or when he that for the vnquietnesse of his conscience, doth neede helpe of the minister discloseth his weaknesse vnto him. But there are diuerse waies of taking away offence, because although thereby also the peace of conscience is prouided for, yet the principall end is, that hatred should be taken away, and mens mindes knit together with a bond of peace. But this vse that I haue spoken of, is not to be despised, that we may the more willingly confesse our sinnes. For when the whole Church standeth as it were before the iudgement seate of God, confesseth it selfe guiltie, and hath one onely refuge vnto the mercy of God: it is no slender or light comfort to haue there present Christs embassador, hauing commandement of reconciliation, of whom it may heare absolution pronounced vnto it. Here the profitablenesse of the keies is worthily commended, when this embassage is performed rightly, and with such order and religiousnesse as beseemeth it. Likewise when he that had in a maner estranged himselfe from the Church, receiueth pardon and is restored into brotherly vnitie: how great a benefit is it that he vnderstandeth himselfe to be forgiuen by them, to whom Christ hath said: To whomsoeuer ye forgiue sinnes in earth, they shall be forgiuen in heauen. And of no lesse effectualnesse and profit is priuate absolution, when it is asked by them that haue neede of speciall remedie to relieue their weakenes. For it happeneth oftentimes, that he which heareth the generall promises that are directed to the whole congregation of the faithfull, remaineth neuertheles in some doubt, and hath still an vnquiet minde, as though he had not yet obtained pardon: and the same man, if he haue disclosed to his parson the secret sore of his minde, and heareth peculiarly directed to himselfe that saying of the Gospell, Thy sins are forgiuen thee, be of good hope, stablisheth his mind vnto assuredne sse & is deliuered frō that trembling, wherewith he was before tormented. But when we speake of the keies, we must take heed that we dreame not of a certaine power seuered frō the preaching of the Gospell.

Mat. 18. 19. Iohn 20. 23.

Matth. 9. 2.

In another place we shall haue occasion more fully to declare this matter againe, where we shall intreat of the gouernment of the Church: and there shall we see that all the power to binde and to loose, which Christ hath giuen to his Church, is bound to the word. But this is most true in the mystery of the keies, the whole force whereof standeth in this, that the grace of the Gospell be publikely and priuately sealed vp in the hearts of the faithfull, by them whom the Lord hath ordained: which cannot be done but by onely preaching.

The keies wherwith the Church of Rome supposeth her priests authorized to binde and loose after confession made.

Mat. 18. 19.

Esa. 43. 11. & 25.

15 But what say the Romish Diuines? They decree that euery one of either kind, so soone as they come to the yeeres of discreasion, must yeerely once at the least confesse all their sinnes to their owne Priest: and that there sinne is not forgiuen, vnlesse they haue firmly conceiued an intent to confesse it: which intent if they performe not when occasion is offered that they may doe it, there is now no more entrie open for them into Paradise. And that the Priest hath the power of the keies, wherwith he may loose and binde a sinner: because the word of Christ is not in vaine. Whatsoeuer yea binde, &c. About this power they stoutly fight among themselues. Some say that there is but one keie in substance, that is the power to binde and loose, and as for knowledge, that it is indeed requisite for a good vse, but that it is onely as an accessary and is not essently ioyned with the other. Some other, because they saw this to be too much an vnbridled licence, haue reckened vp two keies, discreation and power. Other again, when they saw the leaud boldnesse of Priests to be restrained by this moderation, haue forged other keies, that is to say, authority, of discerning which they should vse in giuing determinate sentence: and power, which they should practise in executing of their sentence: and that knowledge standeth by as a Counseller. But they dare not simply expound this binding and loosing to be to forgiue and put away sinnes: because they heare the Lord crying out in the Prophet: It is I, and none other but I: it is I, it is I that put away thy sinnes, O Israell. But they say it is the priests office to pronounce who be bound or loosed, and to declare whose sinnes are forgiuen or retained. and that he doth declare it, either by confession when he absolueth and retaineth sinnes, or by sentence when he excommunicateth and receiueth againe to partaking of the Sacraments. Finally, when they vnderstand that they be not yet out of this doubt, but that it still may be obiected against them, that oftentimes their priests doe binde and loose men vnworthy, which are not therfore bound or loosed in heauen: then (which is their last refuge) they answer that the giuing of the keies must be construed with a limitation, that is to say, that Christ hath promised, that before his iudgement seat such sentence as the Priest shall be allowed as hath beene iustly pronounced, according as the deseruings of him that is bound or loosed, did require. Moreouer, they say, that these keies are giuen by Christ to all Priests, and are deliuered to them by their Bishops, at the time of their promoting to Priesthood: but the free vse of them remaineth onely with such as doe exercise Ecclesiasticall offices: and that the excommunicate and suspended priests haue indeed the keies, but rustie and bound vp. And they that say these things may well seeme modest and sober in comparison of the rest, which vpon a new anuill haue forged new keies with which they say the treasure of the Church is locked vp. These keies we shall heereafter trie in place fit for it.

A tyranny to impose vpon men a law binding them to reckon vp all their sinnes.

Psal. 19. 13.

Psal. 38. 5.

16 Now I wil in few words answer to euery one of these particularly. But at this present I speake not by what right or what wrong they binde the soules of the faithful with their laws, for asmuch as we wil cõsider that when place serueth. But where they charge men with a law of reckoning vp all their sinnes: where they say that sinne is not forgiuen but vpon condition, if there be an intent conceiued to confesse it: where they babble that there remaineth no entrie into Paradise, if occasion of confessing be neglected: this is in no wise to be suffered. Must all sinnes be reckoned vp? But Dauid, (who as I thinke) had well studied vpon the confession of his sinnes, yet cried out: who shall vnderstand his errours? Lord cleanse me from my secret sinnes. And in another place. My iniquities haue passed aboue my head, and like a waighty burden haue waxed heauie aboue my strength. Truelie he vnderstood how great was the bottomlesse depth of our sinnes: how many were the sorts of our mischieuous doings, how many heads this monster Hydra did beare, and how long a taile she drew after her. Therefore he went

went not about to reckon vp a regiſter of them, but out of the depth of euils, he cried vnto the Lord : I am ouer whelmed, I am buried and choaked, the gates of hell haue compaſſed me, let thy hand draw me out, which am drowned in the great pit, and am fainting and redy to die. Who now may thinke vpon the numbring of his ſinnes, when he ſeeth that Dauid can make no number of his ?

17 With this butchery, the ſoules that haue beene touched with any feeling of God, haue been more cruelly vexed. Firſt they called themſelues to account : then they diuided ſinnes into armes, into bowes, into branches, and into twigges, according to theſe mens rules : then they weighed the qualities, quantities, and circumſtances. And ſo the matter went a little forward. But when they had proceeded a little further, than was on each ſide skie, and on each ſea, no hauen, no ſafe roade : the moe that they had paſſed ouer, the greater heape alway did thruſt it ſelfe into their ſight, yea they roſe vp as high mountaines, and there appeared no hope, not ſo much as after long compaſſings, any way to eſcape. And ſo they did ſticke faſt betweene the ſacrifice and the ſtone, and at laſt was found no other iſſue but deſperation. Then theſe cruell butchers, to eaſe the wounds that themſelues had made, laid certaine gentle plaiſters, that euery man ſhould do as much as he could. But new cares againe roſe vp, yea new torments did flea the ſilly ſoules, as to thinke : I haue not employed time enough, I haue not indeuoured my ſelfe with ſuch dilligence as I ought, I haue paſſed ouer many things by negligence, and the forgetfulneſſe that commeth by negligence is not excuſable. Then were there miniſtred other plaiſters to aſſwage ſuch paines, as, Repent thee of thy negligence : if it be not altogether careleſſe, it ſhall be pardoned. But all theſe things cannot cloſe vp the wound, and are not ſo much eaſement of the euil, as poyſon couered with hony, that they ſhould not with their bitterneſſe offend the firſt taſte but enter into the bowels before that they be perceiued. Therefore this tirrible ſaying alway calleth vpon them and ſoundeth in their eares : Confeſſe all thy ſinnes. And this horrour can not be appeaſed but by aſſured comfort. Heere let the readers conſider, how poſſible it is to bring into account all the doings of a whole yeere, and to gather together what ſinnes they haue done euery day : foraſmuch as experience proueth to euery man, that when at euening he ſhall reckon vp the faults but of one day, his memory is confounded therewith, ſo great a multitude and diuerſity preſenteth it ſelfe. For I ſpeake not of groſſe and blockiſh hypocrites that thinke they haue done ſufficiently, if they haue noted three or foure of the greateſt ſinnes : but I ſpeake of the true worſhippers of God, which when they ſee themſelues oppreſſed with the examination that they haue made, doe adde alſo this ſaying of Iohn : If our owne heart doe accuſe vs, God is greater then our heart : and ſo they quake for feare at the ſight of the Iudge, whoſe knowledge far ſurmounteth our vnderſtanding.

The miſery wherewith their ſoules were vexed which had a care and did make a conſcience of confeſſing in ſuch ſort as the Church of Rome required.

1. Iohn 3. 20.

18 But where as a great part of the world reſted them vpon ſuch flatteries, wherewith ſo deadly a poyſon was tempered, this came not ſo to paſſe, becauſe they beleeued that God was ſatisfied, or becauſe they themſelues were fully ſatisfied : but that the anchor caſt as it were in the mid ſea, ſhould reſt a little from ſailing, or as away faring man weary and fainting, ſhould lie downe in the way. I labour not much in prouing this. For euery man may be witneſſe to himſelfe, I will in a ſhort ſum ſhew, what manner of Law this was. Firſt ſimply it is impoſſible, and therefore it can doe nothing but deſtroy, damne, confound, and caſt in ruine and deſperation. And then when it hath led ſinners from the true feeling of their ſinnes, it maketh them hypocrites and ignorant of God and themſelues. For while they are wholy buſied in reckoning vp of their ſins, in the meane time they forget the ſecret ſinke of vices, their hidden Iniquities, and inward filthineſſe, by knowledge wherof they ſhould chiefely haue weighed their miſery. But this was a moſt certain rule of confeſſion, to acknowledge and confeſſe the bottomleſſe depth of our euill to be ſo great as paſſeth our vnderſtanding. After this rule we ſee that the Publicanes confeſſion was made, Lord be mercifull to mee a ſinner : as if he ſhould ſay : All that euer I am, I am altogether a ſinner, and I cannot attaine with wit or expreſſe with tongue the greatneſſe of my ſinnes : let the bottomleſſe depth of thy mercy ſwallow vp the bottomleſſe depth of my ſinne. But when thou wilt ſay, what ? are not all our ſinnes to be confeſſed ? is no confeſſion acceptable to God, but that which

The confeſſing of all our ſinnes a thing impoſſible, neither is the confeſſing of them if it were poſſible ſo neceſſary that without it all men are excluded heauen.

Luc. 18. 13.

is knit vp in these two words, I am a sinner? No, but rather we must endeuor our selues as much as in vs lyeth, to poure out our hart before the Lord, and not onely in one word confesse our selues sinners, but also truely and hartily acknowledge our selues to be such: and with all our thought record, how great and diuerse is our filth of sinnes, not onely that we be vncleane, but what, how great, and in how many parts is our vncleanesse: not onely that we be debters, but with how great debtes we be loden, and how many waies charged: not onely that we be wounded, but also with how many and deadly strokes we be wounded. With this reknowledging when the sinner hath wholly powred out himselfe before God, let him earnestly and sincerely thinke, that yet there remaine moe sinnes, and that the secret corners of their euils are so deepe, that they cannot be throughly disclosed. And he crieth out with Dauid: Who vnderstandeth his errors? Lord cleanse me from my hidden sinnes. Now where they affirme that sinnes are not forgiuen but with an intent of confessing firmely conceiued, and that the gate of Paradise is shut against him that neglecteth occasion offered when he may be confessed, God forbid that we should graunt them that. For there is no other forgiuenesse of sinne, than alwaies hath beene. It is not read that all they haue confessed their sinnes in the eare of some Priest, That we read to haue obtained forgiuenesse of sinnes at Christs hand. And truely they could not confesse, where there were neither any Priestes confessors, nor any confessing at all. And in many ages after, this confession was vnheard of, at which time sinnes were forgiuen without this condition. But that we may not neede to dispute longer about this, as about a doubtfull matter, the word of God is plaine, which abideth for euer: Whensoeuer the sinner repenteth, I will no more remember all his iniquities. He that dare adde any thing to this word, bindeth not sinnes, but the mercy of God. For whereas they say, that iudgement cannot be giuen but when the cause is heard, we haue a solution in readinesse, that they doe presumptuously take that vpon them selues, which haue made themselues Iudges. And it is a maruell that they doe so boldly frame to themselues such principles, as no man in his right wit will grant. They boast that the office of Binding and Loosing is committed to them, as though it were a certaine iurisdiction ioyned with Inquisition. Moreouer their whole doctrine crieth out, that this authoritie was vnknowne to the Apostles. Neither doth it belong to the Priest, but to him which desireth absolution, to know certainly whether the sinner be loosed or no: forasmuch as he that heareth can neuer know whether the reckoning be iust and perfect. So should there be no absolution but such as is restrained to his words that is to be iudged. Moreouer the whole order of Loosing standeth of Faith and Repentance, which two things are hidden from the knowledge of man, when sentence must be giuen vpon another man. It followeth therfore that the assurance of Binding and Loosing is not subiect to the iudgement of an earthly Iudge: because the minister of the word, when he doth his office, can not giue absolution but conditionally: but that this is spoken for the sinnes sake, Whose sinnes ye forgiue, &c, that they should not doubt that the pardon which is promised by the Commandement and word of God, shall be ratified in Heauen.

Psal. 19. 31.

Eze. 18. 20.

Auricular confession a meane to make men not ashamed of sinning but bold to sinne.

19 Therefore it is no maruell, if we condemne and desire to haue vtterly taken away this Auricular confession, a thing so pestilent and so many waies hurtfull to the Church: but if it were a thing by it selfe indifferent, yet forasmuch as it is to no vse nor profit, and hath giuen cause to so many wickednesses, sacrileges and errors, who will not thinke that it ought to be presently abolished? They doe indeede reckon vp some good vses, which they boast vpon as very profitable, but these either false or of no value at all. One onely they commend with a singular prerogatiue, that shame is a great punishment of him that confesseth, whereby the sinner both is for a time to come made warer, and preuenteth the punishment of God in punishing himselfe. As though we did not humble a man with shamefastnesse enough when we cal him to that high iudgemēt seate of heauen. I meane to the hearing of God. It is forsooth very well profited, if for shame of one mans knowledge we cease to sinne, and be not ashamed to haue God witnesse of our euill conscience. Although the very same is also most false, for it is to be seene that by nothing groweth greater confidence or licentiousnesse to sinne, than when when men hauing made confeſſion to a Prieſt, thinke that they may wipe their mouth and ſay, I did it not. And not onely they are made all the yeere long the bolder to ſin? but all the reſt of the yeere bearing themſelues bold vpon confeſſion, they neuer ſigh vnto God, they neuer returne to themſelues, but heape ſinnes vpon ſinnes, till they vomit vp all at once as they thinke And when they haue once vomited them vp, they thinke themſelues diſcharged of their burden, and that they haue taken away from God the iudgement that they haue giuen to the Prieſt, and that they haue brought God in forgetfulneſſe when they haue made the Prieſt priuie. Moreouer who doth merilie ſee the day of confeſſion at hand? Who goeth to confeſſion with a cheerefull heart, and commeth not to it rather againſt his will, and as it were drawing backward, like as if he were taken by the necke and drawen to priſon? vnleſſe peraduenture it be the very Prieſts, that vſe ioyfully to delight themſelues with mutuall rehearſals of their dooings, as it were with merie tales? I will not defile much paper with monſtrous abhominations whereof auricular confeſſion ſwarmeth full. Onely this I ſay, if that holy man did not vnwiſely, that for one rumor of fornication tooke away confeſſion out of the Church, yea out of the remembrance of his flocke: then we be thereby put in minde what is needfull to be done at this day vpon infinite whoredomes, adulteries, inceſts, and bawderies.

20 Where the Confeſſioners alleadge for this purpoſe the power of the Keies and doe thereupon ſet the poupe and prore of their kingdome, as the prouerbe is: it is to be ſeene how much they ought to auaile. Then (ſay they) are the Keies giuen without cauſe? Is it ſaid without cauſe: Whatſoeuer you looſe vpon earth, ſhall be alſo looſed in Heauen? Doe we then make the word of Chriſt voide? I anſwere there was a weighty cauſe why the Keies ſhould be giuen, as both I haue euen now already declared, and ſhall more plainly ſhew againe when I come to entreat of excommunication. But what if I doe with one ſword cut off the holde of all that they require, that is, with ſaying, that ſacrificing Prieſts are not the vicars nor ſucceſſors of the Apoſtles? But this ſhall alſo be to be intreated of in another place: but now they raiſe vp an engine whereby they would moſt of all defend themſelues, and thereby may all their buildings be ouerthrowen. For Chriſt did not giue his Apoſtles the power to binde and looſe, before that he gaue them the holy Ghoſt. Therefore I ſay, that none haue the power of the Keies that haue not firſt receiued the holy Ghoſt. I deny that any man can vſe the Keies but hauing the holy Ghoſt going before, and teaching him and informing him what is to be done. They trifling ſay, that they haue the holy Ghoſt. But indeed they deny it, vnleſſe peraduenture they faigne (as they doe faigne indeed) the holy Ghoſt to be a vaine thing and a thing of nothing, but therein they ſhall not be beleeued. And by this engine they are vtterly ouerthrowen, that of whatſoeuer doore they boaſt that they haue the Key, a man may alway aske them whether they haue the holie Ghoſt which is the Iudge and gouernour of the Keies. If they anſwere that they haue, then they may be asked againe, whether the holie Ghoſt may erre. This they will not be glad to ſpeake expreſſly, although they crookedly vtter the ſame by their doctrine. It is therefore to be gathered, that no Prieſts haue power of the Keyes which do commonly without conſideration looſe thoſe things that the Lord would haue to be bound, and bind thoſe things that the Lord commanded to be looſed.

Authoritie granted to bind and looſe is no authorizing of Popiſh prieſts to abſolue in ſuch ſort as they doe. Math. 18. 18.

21 Whereas they ſee themſelues conuinced by moſt cleare experiments, that they doe without choiſe looſe and binde the worthie and vnworthie, they vſurpe a power without knowledge. And though they dare not denie that knowledge is requiſite for a good vſe, yet they write that the very power is giuen to euill diſpoſers of it. But this is the power, whatſoeuer thou bindeſt or looſeſt in earth, ſhall be bound or looſed in heauen. Either the promiſe of Chriſt muſt lie, or they that haue this power doe well binde and looſe. Neither may they dally and ſay, that the ſaying of Chriſt is limited according to the deſeruings of him that is bound or looſed. And we alſo confeſſe, that none can be bound or looſed, but they that are worthie to be bound or looſed. But the Meſſengers of the Goſpell and the Church haue the worde, by which they meaſure this worthineſſe, in this worde the meſſengers of the Goſpell, may promiſe to all men forgiueneſſe of ſinnes in Chriſt by Faith, they may proclaime damnation vnto all and

The abuſe of binding & looſing without knowledge.

1.Cor.6.9. and vpon all that embrace not Christ. In this worde the Church pronounceth that fornicators, adulterers, theeues, manslayers, couetous men, vniust men, haue no part in the kingdome of God, and bindeth such with most sure bonds. With the same word the Church looseth them whom it comforteth being repentant. But what power shall this be, not to know what is to be bound or looséd, and not to be able to binde or loose without knowledge? Why then doe they say that they loose by authoritie giuen vnto them, when the loosing is vncertaine? What haue we to doe with this imaginatiue power, if there be no vse of it? But I haue it alreadie prooued that either there is no vse of it, or so vncertaine an vse as may be accounted for none at all. For whereas they confesse that there is a great part of Priestes that doe not rightly vse the keies, and that the power without lawfull vse is of no effect. Who shal assure me that he of whom I am looséd is a good vser of the keies? If he be an euill vser of it, what hath he else but such a voide disposing of them, as to say, what is to be bound or looséd in thee I know not, for as much as I lacke the right vse of the keies, but if thou deserue I loose thee. But so much might doe, I will not say a laie man (for they could not beare that with patient eares) but a Turke or a Diuell. For it is as much as to say, I haue not the word of God the sure rule of loosing, but there is power giuen me to loose thee, if thy deseruings be so. We see therefore what they meant, when they defined the keies to be the authoritie of discerning, and power of executing? and that knowledge is adioyned for a counseller, and like a counseller serueth for a good vse: vndoubtedly euen they desired to raigne at their owne will, licentiously without God and his word.

The vncertainties and absurdities of popish absolution.

22 If any man take exception and say, that the lawfull ministers of Christ shall be no lesse doubtfull in their office, because the absolution that hangeth vpon Faith shall alway remaine doubtfull: and then that sinners shall haue either none or a colde comfort, because the minister himselfe which is no competent iudge of their faith, cannot be assured of their absolution: we haue answer thereunto in readinesse. For they say that no sinnes are forgiuen by the Priest, but such whereof himselfe hath beene the hearer: so by their opinion, the forgiuenesse hangeth vpon the iudgement of the Priest, and if he doe not wisely discerne who be worthy of pardon, the whole doing is voide and of no effect. Finally the power whereof they speake, is a iurisdiction adioyned to examination, whereunto pardon and absolution is restrained. In this point is found no sure ground, but rather it is a bottomlesse depth. For where the confession is not sound, the hope of pardon is also lame, and then the Priest himselfe must needs sticke in suspence while he cannot tell, whether the sinner doe faithfully reckon vp all the euill deeds. Finally (such is the ignorance and rudenesse of Priestes) the most part are no fitter to doe this office, than a shoomaker to plowe the ground, and the rest in a maner all ought worthily to suspect themselues. Hereupon therefore riseth the perplexitie and doubtfulnesse of the Popes absolution, because they will haue it grounded vpon the person of the Priest, and not onely that, but also vpon knowledge, that he may iudge onely of things informed, examined and prooued. Now if a man should aske of these good doctors, whether a sinner be reconciled to God, when some sinnes are forgiuen: I see not what they haue to answer, but that they shall be compelled to confesse that all is vnprofitable, that the Priest pronounceth of the forgiuenesse of those sinnes that he hath heard rehearsed, so long as the other sinnes are not deliuered from condemnation. On the behalfe of him that confesseth how hurtfull carefulnesse holdeth his conscience bound, appeareth hereby that when he resteth vpon the Priests discretion, as they call it, he can determine nothing certainely by the word of God. The doctrine that we teach is free and cleere from all these absurdities. For the absolution is conditionall, that the sinner should trust that God is mercifull vnto him, so that he syncerely seeke the cleansing of his sinnes in the sacrifice of Christ, and obey the grace offered him. So he cannot erre, which according to the office of a Preacher, proclaimeth that which is giuen him in instructions by the word of God. And the sinner may embrace a sure and cleare absolution, when that simple condition is annexed of the embracing the grace of Christ, according to that generall doctrine of the master himselfe. Be it done to thee according to thy Faith. Which hath beene wickedly despised in the Papacie.

Mat 9.29.

23 How fooliſhly they confound thoſe things that the Scripture teacheth of the power of the keies, I haue promiſed that I will ſpeake in another place, and there ſhall be a more conuenient place for it, when I come to intreat of the gouernment of the Church. But let the readers remember that thoſe things are wrongfully wreſted to Auricular and ſecret confeſſion, which are ſpoken by Chriſt partly of the preaching of the Goſpell, and partly of excommunication. Wherefore when they obiect that the power of looſing is giuen to the Apoſtles, which Prieſts may vſe in forgiuing ſinnes acknowledged vnto them, it is plaine that they take a falſe and fond principle, becauſe the abſolution that ſerueth Faith, is nothing elſe but a witneſſe of pardon taken out of the free promiſe of the Goſpell. As for the other confeſſion, that hangeth vpon the diſcipline of the Church, it pertaineth nothing to ſecret ſinnes but rather to example, that common offence of the Church may be taken away. But whereas they ſcrape together here and there teſtimonies, to prooue that it ſufficeth not to confeſſe ſinnes either to God onely or to laie men, vnleſſe a Prieſt be the hearer of them, their trauell therein is but lewd, and ſuch as they may be aſhamed of. For when the Auncient Fathers counſell ſinners to vnburden themſelues to their owne Paſtour, it cannot be expounded of particular rehearſall which then was not in vſe. Then Lombard and ſuch like (ſuch was their ſiniſter dealing) ſeeme of ſet purpoſe to haue giuen themſelues to faigned bookes, by pretence whereof they might deceiue the ſimple. They doe indeed truely confeſſe, that becauſe abſolution alway accompanieth Repentance, therefore there properly remaineth no bond when a man is touched with Repentance, although he haue not yet confeſſed, and therefore that then the Prieſt doth not ſo much forgiue ſins as pronounce & declare them forgiuen. Albeit in the word of declaring they ſlily bring in a groſſe error, thruſting a ceremonie in ſteede of doctrine. But whereas they patch vnto it, that he is abſolued in the face of the Church that had alreadie obtained pardon before God: they doe inconueniently draw to the peculiar vſe of euery particular man, that which we haue alreadie ſaid to be appointed for the common diſcipline, where the offence of a hainous and notorious fault is to be taken away. But by and by after, they depraue and corrupt moderation, adding an other maner of forgiuing with an enioying of penaltie and ſatisfaction, wherein they preſumptuouſlie claime to their owne ſacrifices a power to part that in halfes, which God hath in all places promiſed vs whole together. For when he ſimply requireth Repentance and Faith, this partition or exception is a verie robberie of God. For it is in effect aſmuch as if the Prieſt taking vpon him the perſon of a Tribune, ſhould become interceſſor to God and would not ſuffer God of his meere liberalitie to receiue him into fauour, that hath lien proſtrate before the Tribunes ſeates and there hath beene puniſhed.

Things ſpoken of the Goſpell & of excommunication wreſted to the maintenance of auricular confeſſion, vaine deuiſes concerning the abſolution of them that confeſſe, corrupt inuentions of penalties & ſatisfactions laid vpon them that are abſolued.

24 The whole ſumme commeth to this point, that if they will make God the Author of this counterfeit confeſſion, therein is there falſehood condemned, as I haue prooued them falſe forgers in the few places that they alleadge. But ſith it is euident that it is a Law made by men, I ſay that it is both tyrannicall and made iniuriouſlie againſt God, who binding mens conſciences to his word, will haue them free from the bondage of men. Now when for the obtaining of pardon, there is a neceſſitie preſcribed of that thing which the Lord would to be free, I ſay that this is a ſacriledge not to be ſuffered, becauſe there is nothing more properly belonging to God, than to forgiue ſinnes, wherein conſiſteth ſaluation for vs. Moreouer I haue ſhewed that this tyrannie was firſt brought in, when the world was oppreſſed with filthie barbarouſneſſe. I haue alſo taught that it is a peſtilent law, that either throweth downe headlong into deſperation the poore ſoules in whomſoeuer abideth a feare of God: or where there raigneth careleſneſſe, delighteth them with vaine flatteries, and ſo maketh them duller. Laſt of all I haue declared, that whatſoeuer mitigations they bring, tend to no other end, but to entangle, darken and depraue pure doctrine, and hide vngodlineſſe with deceitfull colours.

Auricular confeſſion an humane conſtitution, eſtabliſhed in moſt corrupt times of the Church, bringing ſome to deſpaire and ſome to be careleſſe, impoſſible to be defended or coloured by any ſhift in the world.

25 The third place in Repentance they aſſigne to ſatisfaction, whereof all that euer they babble may be ouerthrowen with one worde. They ſay that it is not enough for him that repenteth, to abſtaine from his former euils, and change his behauiour into better, vnleſſe he make ſatisfaction to God for thoſe things that he hath done: And that that there be many helpes by which we may redeeme sins, as weepings, fastings, oblations and the workes of charitie. With these we must winne the Lord to be fauourable, with these we must pay our debts to the righteousnesse of God, with these we must make amendes for our faultes, with these we must deserue pardon. For although by the largenesse of his mercie he hath forgiuen our fault, yet by the discipline of his iustice he reraineth the paine, and that this is the paine that must be redeemed with satisfactions. But in effect all that they saie commeth to this point, that we doe indeede obtaine pardon of our sinnes at the mercifulnesse of God, but by meanes of the deseruing of our workes, by which the offence of our sinnes may be recompensed, that due satisfaction may be fully made to Gods righteousnesse. Against such lies, I set the free forgiuenesse of sinnes, than which there is nothing more euidently spoken of in the Scripture. First what is forgiuenesse, but a gift of meere liberalitie? For the creditor is not said to forgiue, that acknowledgeth by acquitance that the money is paid, but he that without any paiment willinglie of his owne liberalitie cancelleth the debters bond. Secondly, why is this word, Freely, added, but to take away all opinion of satisfaction? With what confidence therefore doe they yet set vp their satisfaction, that are striken downe with so mightie a thunderbolt? But what? when the Lord crieth out by Esay, It is I, it is I, that doe put away iniquities for mine owne sake, and will not be mindfull of thy sinnes: doth he not openly declare, that he fetcheth the cause and foundation of forgiuenesse onely from his owne goodnesse? Moreouer whereas the whole Scripture beareth this witnesse of Christ, that forgiuenesse of sinnes is to be receiued by his name, doth it not thereby exclude all other names? How then doe they teach that it is receiued by the name of satisfactions? Neither can they denie that they giue this to satisfactions, although they say that the same be vsed as helpes by way of meanes. For whereas the Scripture saith: By the name of Christ, it meaneth that we bring nothing, we alleadge nothing of our owne, but rest vpon the onely commendation of Christ. As Paul, where he affirmeth that God is reconciling the world to himselfe in Christ, for his sake not imputing to men their sinnes, he immediately sheweth the meane and maner how, because he that was wtihout sinne, was made sinne for vs.

The faith which holdeth Christ to be the propitiation for our sins cannot stād with that doctrine which teacheth satisfaction to be made by vs for sins committed after baptisme.

26 But (such is their peruersnesse) that say that both forgiuenesse of sinnes and reconciliation are performed both at one time, when we are in Baptisme receiued into the fauour of God by Christ: that after Baptisme we must rise againe by satisfactions, and that the bloud of Christ profiteth nothing, but so farre as it is distributed by the keies of the Church. Neither doe I speake of a doubtfull matter, forasmuch as they haue in most euident writings bewraied their owne filthinesse, and not one or two of them, but all the Schoolemen vniuersally. For their master after that he had confessed that Christ had paied the penaltie of sinnes vpon the tree, according to the doctrine of Peter, immediately correcteth his saying with adding this exception, that in Baptisme all temporall penalties of sinnes are released, but after baptisme they are minished by the helpe of penance, that so the crosse of Christ and our penance may worke together. But Iohn saith far otherwise, if any sinne, we haue an aduocate with the father, euen Iesus Christ, which is the propitiation for our sinnes, I write vnto you children, because your sinnes are forgiuen you for his names sake. Truely, he speaketh to the faithfull, to whom when he setteth foorth Christ to be the propitiation of sinnes, he sheweth that there is no other satisfaction, by which God being displeased, may be made fauourable and appeased. He doth not say: God was once reconciled vnto you by Christ, now seeke you other meanes, but he maketh him a perpetuall aduocate, alway to restore vs by his intercession into the fauour of his father: a perpetuall propitiation, by which our sinnes may be cleansed away. For this is euer true that the other Iohn said: Behold, the Lamb of God, behold him that taketh away the sinnes of the world. He taketh them away (saith he) himselfe and none other, that is to say, forasmuch as he alone is the Lambe of God, he alone also is the oblation for sinnes, he alone the propitiation sacrifice, he alone the satisfaction. For whereas the right and power to forgiue belongeth properly to the Father, in the respect that he is distinguished from the sonne, as we haue already seene: Christ is heere set in another degree, that taking vpon vpon himselfe the paine due vnto vs, he hath taken away our guiltinesse before the iudgement of God. Whereupon followeth, that we shall no otherwise be partakers of the satisfaction made by Christ, vnlesse the same honour remaine whole with him, which they doe wrongfully take to themselues that goe about to appease God with their owne recompensings.

27 And heere it is good to consider two things: that Christ may haue his due honour kept vnto him whole and vnminished: and that the consciences being assured of the forgiuenesse of sin, may haue peace with God. Esay saith, that the father hath laide the iniquities of vs all vpon his sonne that we should be healed by his stripes. Which thing Peter rehearsing in other words saith: that Christ did in his body beare our sins vpon the tree. Paul writeth that sinne was condemned in his flesh, when he was made sinne for vs. That is to say, that the force and curse of sinne was slaine in his flesh, when he was giuen to be a sacrifice, vpon which the whole heape of our sinnes with all their malediction and curse, with the dreadfull iugement of God, and condemnation of death should be cast. Heere those triflings are in no case to be heard, that after the first purging, euery one of vs doth none otherwise feele the effectualnesse of the passion of Christ than after the measure of satisfactorie repentance: but so oft as we fall, we be called backe to the only satisfaction of Christ. Now set before thee their pestilent follies, as for example: That the grace of God worketh alone in the first forgiuenesse of sinnes: that if we afterward fall, to the obtaining of a second forgiuenesse our workes doe worke with it. If these things may haue place, doe these things that are heere before assigned to Christ remaine safe vnto him? It is a maruellous great diffence, betweene this that our iniquities are laid vpon Christ, that they should be cleansed in him, and this that they are cleansed by our owne workes: betweene this that Christ is the procuring of mercy, and this that God must be made mercifull by workes. But if we speake of pacifying the conscience: what pacification shall this be for a mans conscience, to heare that his sinnes are redeemed by satisfactions? When shall he certainly know the measure of his satisfaction? Therefore he shall alway doubt whether he haue God mercifull or no, he shall alway be vexed, and alway quake for feare. For they that rest vpon light pety satisfactions, doe too contemptuously esteeme the iudgement of God, and doe little consider how great is the greeuousnesse of sinne as we shall declare in another place. But although we grant them to redeeme some sinnes with iust satisfaction: yet what will they doe when they are oppressed with so many sins, for satisfaction whereof an hundred liues although they were wholly applied thereunto cannot suffice? Beside that, all the places wherein the forgiuenesse of sinnes is affirmed, doe not belong to yoonglings, but to the already regenerate children of God, and them that haue beene long nourished in the bosome of the Church. That embassage which Paul so honourably extolleth, I beseech you in the name of God, be yee reconciled vnto God, is not directed to strangers, but to them that had beene already regenerate. But he, bidding satisfactions farewell, sendeth them to the crosse of Christ. So when he writeth to the Colossians, that Christ by the bloud of the crosse hath pacified all things in heauen or in earth, he restraineth not this to the onely moment wherein we are receiued into the church, but extendeth it to our whole course. Which easily appeereth by the processe of the text, where he saith, that the faithfull haue a redemption by the bloud of Christ, that is forgiuenesse of sinnes. Albeit it is superfluous to heape together moe places, that readily offer themselues to be found.

They can not yeeld vnto Christ that honour which they should not finde that peace in their owne consciences which they might who rest any thing vpon the force of their owne satisfactions.

28 Heere they flee to the sanctuarie of the fooliſh distinction, that some sinnes are veniall, and some deadly: that for deadly sinnes is great satisfaction due, that veniall sins are purged with more easie remedies, as with saying of the Lords praier, with sprinkling of holy water, with absolution at the masse. So they mocke and trifle with God. But whereas they alway haue in their mouth venial and deadly sin, yet they could neuer discerne the one from the other, sauing that they make vngodlines and vncleannes of hart a veniall sin. But we (as the Scripture the rule of right and wrong teacheth vs) do pronounce, that the reward of sin is death, and that the soule that sinneth is worthy of death. But that the sinnes of the faithfull are veniall, not for that they doe not deserue death, but becausse by the mercie of God there is no condemnation to them that that are in Christ Iesus, because they are not imputed: because they are taken away by pardon. I know how vniustly they slaunder this our doctrine. For they say, that it is the Stoicks strange conclusion, concerning the equalitie of sinnes. But they shall easily be conuinced by their owne mouth. For I demaund of them, whether among the very same sinnes that they confesse to be deadly, they doe not acknowledge one to be greater than another. It doth not therefore immediately follow, that sinnes are equall, because they are altogether deadly. When the Scripture definitiuely saith, that the reward of sinne is death, that the obedience of the Law is the way of life, and that the transgression of the law is death, they cannot escape this sentence. What end of satisfying then will they finde in so great heape of sins? If the satisfaction of one day be the satisfaction of one sin, while they are about that one satisfaction, they wrap themselues in many sins, sith the iustest man passeth no one day wherein he falleth not many times. Now when they shall prepare themselues to make satisfaction for the sins, they shall heape vp great numbers, yea rather innumerable. Then the hope of satisfying being cut off, what doe they stay vpon? how dare they still thinke of satisfying?

God doth not remit our sinnes and leaue the penalties still without our owne satisfaction take them away to be endured.

29 They goe about to winde out themselues: but (as the prouerbe is) the water still cleaueth vpon them. They forge a distinction of fault and penaltie. They confesse that the fault is forgiuen by the mercie of God, but that when the fault is forgiuen, the penaltie remaineth which the righteousnesse of God requireth to be paied: and that satisfactions doe properly belong to the release of the penaltie. Good God what a skipping lightnesse is this? now they confesse that the forgiuenesse of the fault lieth freely open for men which sometime they teach men to deserue with praiers and weepings, and all other kindes of preparations. But yet still all that is taught vs in the Scripture concerning the forgiuenesse of sinnes, doth directly fight against this distinction. Which although I thinke that I haue alreadie more then sufficiently confirmed, yet I will adde some other testimonies wherewith these winding snakes may be holden so fast, that they shall not be able once to folde in the top of their taile. This is the new Testament which the Lord hath couenanted with vs in Christ, that he will not remember our iniquities. What he meant by these wordes, we learne by another Prophet, where the Lord saith: If the righteous turne away from his righteousnesse, I will not remember all his righteousnesses. If the wicked depart from his wickednesse, I will not remember all his iniquities. Whereas he saith that he will not remember their righteousnesse, that is as much to say, that he will haue no regard of them in respect toward them. Therefore not to remember sinnes, is asmuch as not to call them to punishment. The same thing is called in another place to cast it behinde his backe, to wipe it away like a cloude, to drowne it in the bottome of the sea, not to impute it and to hide it. By such maners of speech the holy Ghost doth plainly expresse his meaning vnto vs, if we would apply vnto him willing eares to learne. Truely, if God doe punish sins, he imputeth them: if he taketh vengeance, he remembreth them: if he call them to iudgement, he doth not hide them: if he examine them, he doth not cast them behinde his backe: if he looke vpon them, he hath not wiped them away like a cloud: if he sift them, he hath not cast them into the bottome of the sea. And in this maner doth Augustine expound it in plaine wordes. If God haue couered sinnes, then he would not looke vpon them: if he would not looke vpon them, then he would not marke them: if he would not marke them, then he would not punish them: he would not know them, he had rather pardon them. Why therefore did he say that sinnes were couered, that they should not be seene? What was meant by this that God did see sinnes, but that he did punish them? But let vs heare also out of another place of the Prophet, vpon what conditions the Lord forgiueth sinnes. If (saith he) your sinnes be as scarlet, they shall be made white as snow: if they be red like crimson, they shalbe as wooll. And in Ieremy we read thus: In that day the iniquitie of Iacob shalbe sought for, and shall not be found: the sinne of Iudah, and it shall not be. Because I will be fauourable to the remnants that I shall preserue. Wilt thou briefly vnderstand what is the meaning of those words? Weigh on the other side what is meant by these speeches: that the Lord doth binde vp iniquities in a sacke, doth gather them into a bundle & lay them vp, and doth graue them with an yron pointell in an adamant stone. If they signifie fie (as it is out of doubt) that vengeance ſhall be giuen for recompence, then is it alſo not to be doubted, but that by contrarie ſentences the Lord affirmeth, that he remitteth all recompenſing of vengeance. Heere I muſt beſeech the Readers not to harken to my gloſſes, but onely that they will ſuffer the word of God to take ſome place.

30 What, I pray you, had Chriſt done for vs, if we ſhould ſtill be compelled to ſuffer paine for ſinnes? For when we ſay that he did beare all our ſinnes in his bodie vpon the tree, we meane nothing elſe thereby, but that he ſuffered all the paine and puniſhment that was due vnto our ſinnes. And the ſame hath Eſay more liuely declared, where he ſaith: the chaſticement (or correction) of our peace was vpon him. What is the correction of our peace but the paine due to ſinnes: and which we ſhould haue ſuffered before that we could be reconciled to God, vnleſſe that he had entred into our ſtead? Lo, thou ſeeſt plainly, that Chriſt ſuffered the paines of ſinnes, to deliuer them that be his from them. And ſo oft as Paul maketh mention of the redemption perfourmed by Chriſt, he vſeth to call it in Greeke Apolutroſin, whereby he meaneth not redemption, as it is commonly taken, but the very price and ſatisfaction of redemption. After which manner he writeth, that Chriſt gaue himſelfe Antilutron, a price of raunſome for vs. What propitiation is there with the Lord (ſaith Auguſtine) but ſacrifice? And what ſacrifice is there, but that which is offred for vs in the death of Chriſt? But that which is appointed in the law of Moſes for cleanſing the offences of ſinnes, miniſtreth vs a ſtrong battell ramme. For the Lord doth not there appoint this or that maner of ſatisfying, but requireth the whole recompence in ſacrifices. Whereas yet in other things, he doth moſt diligently and in moſt exact order ſet out all the ceremonies of expiation. How commeth it to paſſe, that he commandeth to recompence faults committed, with no workes at all, but requireth onely ſacrifices for ſatisfaction, but becauſe his will is ſo to declare, that there is onely one kinde of ſatisfaction, whereby his iudgement is appeaſed? For the ſacrifices that the Iſraelites did then offer, were not weighed by the worke of men, but were eſteemed by their truth, that is to ſay, by the onely ſacrifice of Chriſt. But what manner of recompence the Lord receiueth of vs, Oſee hath very well expreſſed in few words. Thou ſhalt (ſaith he) take away iniquitie, O God. Loe, heere is forgiueneſſe of ſinnes. And we ſhall pay thee the calues of our lips: Loe, heere is ſatisfaction. I know that they doe ſurtly ſlip away, when they make diſtinction betweene euerlaſting paine, and temporall paines. But when they teach that temporall paine is any kind of puniſhment that God taketh as well of the bodie as of the ſoule, except onely euerlaſting death, this reſtraining of it doth little helpe them. For the places that we haue aboue recited, doe expreſſie meane this, that God receiueth vs into fauour with this condition, that in pardoning the fault, he pardoneth all the paine whatſoeuer we had thereby deſerued. And ſo oft as Dauid or the other Prophets doe craue pardon of ſinnes, they doe alſo therewithall pray to be releaſed of the paine. Yea, the very feeling of Gods iudgement doth driue them thereunto. Againe, when they promiſe mercy at the Lords hand, they doe in manner alway of purpoſe preach of the paines and the forgiueneſſe thereof. Truely, when the Lord in Ezechiel pronounceth that he will make an end of the exile in Babylon, and that for his owne ſake, not for the Iewes ſake, he doth ſufficientlie ſhew that both are of free gift. Finally, if we be deliuered by Chriſt from guiltineſſe of fault, the paines that come thereof muſt needes ceaſe.

Chriſt in bearing our ſinnes did ſuffer, and God in pardoning them doth remit the paine which we had thereby deſerued.

31 But foraſmuch as they doe alſo arme themſelues with teſtimonies of Scripture, let vs ſee what maner of arguments thoſe be that they alleadge. Dauid (ſay they) being rebuked by Nathan the Prophet of adulterie and manſlaughter, receiued pardon of his ſinne, and yet he was afterward puniſhed by the death of his ſonne that he had gotten by that adulterie. We are taught to redeeme with ſatisfactions ſuch paines as were to be extended after forgiueneſſe of the fault. For Daniel aduiſed Nebuchadnezer to redeeme his ſinnes with almes. And Salomon writeth that for equitie and godlineſſe, iniquities are forgiuen. And in another place, that with charitie the multitude of ſinnes is couered. Which ſentence Peter alſo confirmeth. marked (as they ſhould not haue ouerpaſſed it) that there are two kindes of Gods iudgement, they would haue ſeene in this rebuking of Dauid, a farre other maner of puniſhment, than ſuch as might be thought to tend to reuengement. But becauſe, it not a litle behooueth vs all to vnderſtand whereunto the chaſtiſements haue reſpect, wherewith God correcteth vs for our ſinnes, and how much they differ from thoſe examples wherewith he purſueth the wicked and reprobate with indignation: therefore I thinke it ſhall not be beſide the purpoſe to comprehend it ſhortly in a ſumme. For the order of plaine teaching, let vs call the one kinde of iudgement, the iudgement of reuenge, the other of Chaſtiſement. It is to be vnderſtanded, that God ſo puniſheth his enemies with the iudgement of reuenge, that he vſeth his wrath againſt them, confoundeth them, deſtroyeth them, and bringeth them to nought. Therefore let vs take that to be properly the vengeance of God, when his puniſhing is ioyned with his indignation: with the iudgement of chaſtiſement he dealeth not ſo cruelly, as to be angrie: nor puniſheth to deſtroy, nor ſendeth downe his lightening to kill. Therefore it is not properly puniſhment or vengeance, but correction and admoniſhment. The one is the dooing of a Iudge, the other of a Father. For the Iudge when he puniſheth an euill doer, he hath regard to the offence, and puniſheth the very fault: when the father ſomewhat rigorouſly correcteth his childe, he doth it not to be reuenged on him, or to puniſh him, but rather to teach him, and make him warier in time to come. Chryſoſtome in a certaine place vſeth a ſimilitude ſomewhat differing from this, but yet it commeth to the ſame point. The ſonne (ſaith he) is beaten, and the ſeruant alſo is beaten: but the one is puniſhed as a bond ſeruant, becauſe he hath offended, and the other is chaſteſed as a freeman and as a ſonne, needing correction. To the one his correction ſerueth for proofe and amendment, to the other for a ſcourge and puniſhment.

God puniſheth his enemies in wrath, his children in loue.

32 But that we may haue the whole matter ſhortly and in a ready ſumme, let this be the firſt of two diſtinctions. Whereſoeuer puniſhment is to reuenge, there ſheweth it ſelfe the curſe and wrath of God, which he alway withholdeth from the faithfull. Contrariwiſe, Chaſtiſement both is a bleſſing of God, and beareth a teſtimony of his loue, as the Scripture teacheth. This difference is commonly euery where ſufficiently expreſſed in the word of God. For whatſoeuer afflictions the wicked ſuffer in this preſent life, therein is painted out vnto vs as it were a certaine entry of hell, from whence they doe alredy ſee a far off their eternall damnation: and they are ſo far from being amended or taking any profit thereby, that rather by ſuch beginning they are prepared to the moſt cruell hell that at length abideth for them. But the Lord chaſticing chaſticeth his ſeruants, but he doth not put them to death. Therefore they confeſſe that to be beaten with his rodde, was good for them vnto true inſtruction. But as we read euery where that the holy ones ſuffer ſuch puniſhments with quiet minde, ſo they haue alway praied to eſcape the firſt kinde of ſcourges. Chaſtice me Lord (ſaith Ieremie) but in thy iudgement, not in thy wrath, leaſt thou deſtroy me. Poure out thy wrath vpon the nations that haue not knowen thee, and vpon the kingdomes that haue not called vpon thy name. And Dauid ſaith: Lord rebuke me not in thy wrath, nor correct me in thy anger. And it maketh nothing to the contrarie, that oftentimes it is ſaid, that the Lord is angry with them that be his, when he puniſheth their ſinnes. As in Eſay: I will confeſſe to thee O Lord, becauſe thou haſt beene angry with me: thy wrath is turned, and thou haſt comforted me. Againe Abacuc. Thou that haſt beene angry ſhall remember mercy. And Michee: I will beare the wrath of the Lord, becauſe I haue ſinned againſt him. Where he putteth vs in minde that not onely they that are iuſtly puniſhed, nothing preuaile with murmuring againſt him, but alſo that the faithfull haue aſſwagement of their ſorrow, in conſidering the purpoſe of God. For after the ſame maner it is ſaide that he doth defile his owne inheritance, which yet (as we knowe) he will neuer defile. But that is ſpoken not in reſpect of the purpoſe or meaning of God that puniſheth, but of the vehement feeling of ſorrow which they feele that ſuffer any of his ſeueritie whatſoeuer it be. But he not onely pricketh his faithfull with no ſmall rigour, but ſometimes ſo woundeth them, that they thinke themſelues not farre from the damnation of hell. So he teſtifieth that they haue deſerued ſerued his wrath, and ſo it behoueth that they ſhould loath themſelues in their euils, and bee touched with the greater care to appeaſe God, and carefully make haſte to craue pardon. But euen in the verie ſame dooing hee ſheweth a more euident teſtimonie of his fatherly kindneſſe than of his wrath. For the couenant continueth that was made with vs in our true Salomon: the trueth whereof he that cannot diſcerne, hath affirmed, that it ſhall neuer bee made voide. If (ſaith he) his children forſake my lawe, and walke not in my iudgements: if they defile my ſtatutes, and keepe not my commaundements; I will viſite their ſinnes with a rodde and with ſtripes: but I will not take away my mercie from him. Of which mercy to make vs aſſured, he ſaith, that the rodde wherewith hee will correct the poſteritie of Salomon, ſhall be of men, and ſtripes of the children of men: by which clauſes when he meaneth moderation and lenitie, hee therewithall ſecretly declareth, that they cannot but be confounded with extreame and deadly horrour, that feele the hand of God to be againſt them. How great regard he hath of this lenitie in chaſtiſing his Iſrael, hee ſheweth in the Prophet: I haue purged thee (ſaith he) in fire: But not as Siluer, for then thou ſhouldeſt haue beene all conſumed. Albeit he teacheth that chaſtiſements ſerue him for to cleanſe him, but hee further ſaith, that hee vſeth the ſame ſo temperately, that hee bé not too much conſumed by them. And that is needfull. For the more that euery man reuerently feareth God, and giueth himſelfe to follow godlineſſe, ſo much the tenderer he is to beare his wrath. For the reprobate, although they groane vnder his ſcourges, yet for that they weigh not the cauſe, but rather turne their backe both to their owne ſinnes and to the iudgement of God, by that ſlouthfulneſſe they gather a hardneſſe: or becauſe they murmure and kicke againſt him, and doe make an vprore againſt their Iudge, that furious ſudden rage aſtonieth them with madneſſe and furor. But the faithfull being admoniſhed by his correction, by and by deſcend to conſider their ſinnes, and being ſtriken with dread and horror, they flee in humble wiſe to pray to him for pardon, vnleſſe the Lord did aſſwage theſe ſorrowes wherewith the poore ſoules torment themſelues, they would faint a hundred times euen in ſmall tokens of his wrath.

Eſa. 48. 10.

33 Then let this be the ſecond diſtinction, that when the reprobate are ſtriken with the ſcourges of God, they do already after a certaine maner begin to ſuffer paines by his iudgement, and though they ſhall not eſcape vnpuniſhed, for that they haue not taken heede to ſuch tokens of the wrath of God, yet they are not puniſhed to this end, to make them come to a better minde: but onely that, to their great hurt, they ſhould proue God to be a iudge and reuenger. But children are beaten with rods, not that they ſhould thereby be puniſhed of God for their ſinnes, but that they ſhould thereby profit to amendment. Therefore we take it that they rather haue reſpect to the time to come, then to the time paſt. This I had rather expreſſe in Chryſoſtomes wordes than mine owne. For this (ſaith he) God doth lay paine vpon vs, not puniſhing our ſins paſt, but correcting vs againſt time to come. And ſo ſaith Auguſtine: That which thou ſuffereſt, that for which thou lamenteſt, is a medicine to thee and no paine, a chaſtiſement and no damnation. Put not away the ſcourge, if thou wilt not be put away from the inheritance, &c. Know ye brethren that all this miſerie of mankinde when the world groaneth is medicinall ſorrow, and not a penall ſentence, &c. Theſe ſentences I haue therefore thought good to alleadge, that the maner of ſpeech that I haue aboue written, ſhould not ſeeme to any man new and vnuſed. And hereunto ſerue all the complaints full of indignation wherein the Lord oftentimes doth expoſtulate of the vnkindneſſe of the people, for that they ſtiffely deſpiſed all puniſhments. In Eſay he ſaith: To what purpoſe ſhould I ſtrike you any more: from the ſole of the foote to the crowne of the head, there is no whole place. But becauſe the Prophets are full of ſuch ſayings, it ſhall be ſufficient to haue briefly ſhewed that God doth puniſh his Church for none other intent, but that it ſhould be tamed & amend. Therfore when he did caſt Saul out of the kingdom, he puniſhed him to reuengement: When he tooke from Dauid his yong ſonne, he corrected him to amendment. According to this meaning is that to be takē which Paul ſaith, we are iudged of the Lord, we are corrected that we ſhould not be dāned with this world: that is, when we that be the children of God are afflicted with the hand of our heauenly Father, this is no paine wherewith we ſhould be confounded, but onely a chaſtiſement wherewith we ſhould be inſtructed. In which point Auguſtine is plainly on our ſide. For he teacheth that the paines wherewith men are alike chaſtiſed by God, are diuerſly to be conſidered: becauſe to the holy ones they are battels and exerciſes after the forgiueneſſe of their ſinnes, to the reprobate they are without forgiueneſſe paines of wickedneſſe. In which place he rehearſeth how paines were laid vpon Dauid and other godly men, and ſaith, that the ſame tendeth to this ende, that their godlineſſe ſhould be ſuch humbling of them, be exerciſed and prooued. And where Eſay ſaith, that the Iewiſh people had their iniquitie forgiuen them, becauſe they had receiued full chaſtiſement at the Lords hand: this prooueth not that the pardon of ſinnes hangeth vpon the full paiment of the paine: but it is in effect as much as if he had ſaid: Becauſe ye haue alreadie ſuffered paines enough, & by the greeuouſneſſe and multitude thereof haue beene now pined away with long mourning and ſorrow, therefore it is now time that receiuing the tidings of full mercie, your hearts ſhould reioyce and feele me to be your father. For there God did take vpon him the perſon of a father, which repenteth him euen of his iuſt ſeuerity, when he was compelled ſharply to correct his ſonne.

God puniſheth the wicked to be reuenged on them for hauing ſinned, but him that he puniſheth to make them carefull not to ſinne.

Eſa. 40. 2.

34 With theſe thoughts it is neceſſary that the faithfull be furniſhed in bitterneſſe of afflictions. It is time that the iudgement began at the houſe of the Lord, in which his name is called vpon. What ſhould the children of God doe, if they did beleeue the ſeuerity of God that they feele to be his vengeance? For hee that being ſtriken by the hand of God, imagineth God a puniſhing iudge, cannot conceiue him but angry and enemy vnto him, and deteſt the very ſcourge of God as a curſe and damnation. Finally, he can neuer be perſwaded that God loueth him, that ſhall thinke him ſo minded toward him, that he is ſtill minded to puniſh him. But hee onely profiteth vnder the rod of God, that thinketh him to be angry with his ſinnes, but merciſull and louing to himſelfe. For otherwiſe that muſt needes happen, which the Propher complaineth that he felt, where he ſaith. Thy wrathes, O God haue paſſed ouer me: thy terrours haue oppreſſed me. Alſo that which Moſes writeth, becauſe we haue fainted in thy wrath: and we haue beene troubled in thy indignation thou haſt ſet our iniquities in thy ſight, and our ſecrets in the light of thy countenance: becauſe all our daies are gone away in thy wrath: our yeeres are conſumed as the word that is paſſed out of a mouth. On the otherſide Dauid ſaith thus of his fatherly chaſtiſments, to teach that the faithfull are rather holpen than oppreſſed thereby: Bleſſed is the man whom thou haſt corrected O Lord, and haſt inſtructed in thy law, to giue him quiet from euill daies, while a pit is digged for the ſinner. Truely it is a hard tentation, when God ſparing the vnbeleeuers and winking at their faults, ſeemeth more rigorous againſt them that be his. Therefore he gaue them a cauſe of comfort, the admoniſhment of the law, whereby they ſhould learne, that it is done to prouide for their ſaluation when they are called againe into the way, and the wicked are caried headlong into their errors, whoſe end is the pit. And it is no difference whether the paine be euerlaſting our during for a time. For as well warre, famine, peſtilence, and ſickneſſe, as the iudgement of eternall death are the curſes of God: when they are laid vpon men to this end, to be inſtruments of the Lords wrath and vengeance againſt the Reprobate.

The miſeries whereunto we are ſubiect would ſwallow vs vp if we did not know that he which afflicteth vs doth it as a father and not as a Iudge. 1. Pet. 4. 17. Iere. 25. 29. Pſal. 88. 17. Pſal. 90. 7.

35 *Now (as I thinke) all men doe perceiue whereupon tended that chaſtiſement of the Lord vpon Dauid: euen to be an inſtruction that God is grieuouſly diſpleaſed with manſlaughter and adultery, againſt which he had ſhewed ſo great indignation in his beloued and faithful ſeruant: that Dauid ſhould be taught to be no more ſo bold to do the like deede: and not to be a paine whereby he ſhould make a certaine recompence to God. And ſo is to be iudged of the other kinde of correction, whereby the Lord puniſhed his people with a ſore peſtilence, for Dauids diſobedience whereinto he was fallen in numbering the people. For he did indeed freely forgiue to Dauid the guiltineſſe of his ſinne: but becauſe it pertained both to the publike examples of all ages, and alſo to the humbling of Dauid, that ſuch a hainous offence ſhould not remaine vnpuniſhed: therefore he moſt ſharply chaſtiſed him with his rod. Which marke alſo we we ought to haue before our eies in the vniuerſall courſe of mankinde. For wheras after pardon obtained, we doe all yet ſuffer the miſeries that were laid vpon our firſt parent for paine of ſinne: we perceiue our ſelues by ſuch exerciſes to be admoniſhed, how grieuouſly God is diſpleaſed with the tranſgreſſion of his law: that being throwne downe and humbled with knowledge in conſcience of our owne miſerable eſtate, we may the more feruently aſpire to true bleſſedneſſe. But he ſhall be moſt fooliſh that ſhall thinke that the calamities of this preſent life are laide vpon vs for the guiltineſſe of ſinne. And that I thinke was the meaning of Chryſoſtome when he wrote thus. If God doe therfore laie paines vpon vs, that he ſhould call vs, perſeuering in euils to repentance, then when repentance is once ſhewed, the paine ſhall be ſuperfluous. Therefore as he knoweth it to be expedient for euery mans nature, ſo he handleth one man more roughly, and another with more louing tenderneſſe. Therefore where he mindeth to teach that he is not vnmeaſurable in taking puniſhments, he reprocheth to the hard harted and obſtinate people that being ſtricken yet they make not an end of ſinning. In this meaning he complaineth, that Ephraim was a cake ſcorched one the one ſide, and raw one the other, becauſe the corrections did not pierce into their mindes, that the people hauing their vices boiled out, might be made meete to receiue pardon. Truely he that ſo ſpeaketh, ſheweth, that ſo ſoone as a man hath repented, he will by and by become appeaſable: and that by our ſtifneſſe he is enforced to that rigour in chaſtiſing of faults, which ſhould haue beene preuented with willing amendment. Yet foraſmuch as we all are of ſuch hardneſſe and rudeneſſe, as vniuerſally needeth chaſtiſement: it ſeemed good to him being a moſt wiſe Father, to exerciſe all without exception with a common ſcourge, all their life long. But it is meruellous why they ſo caſt their eies vpon the onely example of David, and are not mooued with ſo many examples, in which they might haue beholden free forgiueneſſe of ſinnes. It is read that the Publican went out of the Temple iuſtified. There followed no paine. Peter obtained pardon of his offence, his teares we read (ſaith Ambroſe) his ſatisfaction we read not. And the man ſicke of the Palſie heard it ſpoken to him: Riſe: thy ſinnes are forgiuen thee. There was no paine laid vpon him. All the abſolutions that are rehearſed in the Scripture, are ſet out as giuen freely. Out of this great number of examples a rule ſhould rather haue beene gathered, than of that onely example that containeth in it a certaine ſpeciall matter.

36 Daniel in his exhortation wherein he counſelleth Nabucadnezer to redeeme his ſinnes with righteouſneſſe, and his iniquities with pittying of the poore: his meaning was not to ſay, that righteouſneſſe and mercy are ſatisfactory appeaſements of God, and redemption of paines (for God forbid that there were euer any redemption ſauing only the bloud of Chriſt) but to refer this word Redeeming rather to men than to God, as if he had ſaid: O king, thou haſt vſed an vnrighteous and violent gouernment, thou haſt oppreſſed the humble, thou haſt ſpoiled the poore, thou haſt hardly and vniuſtly handled thy people: for thy vniuſt exactions, for thy violence and oppreſſion, now render to them mercy and righteouſneſſe. Likewiſe Salomon ſaith, that with charity the multitude of ſinnes is couered: not before God, but among men themſelues. For thus is the whole verſe: Hatred raiſeth vp contentions, but charity couereth all iniquitie. In which verſe, as his manner is, he doth by way of compariſon of contraries, compare the euils that grow of hatreds, with the fruites of charity: in this meaning, they that hate together, doe one bite, barke at, reproch and raile at another, and turne all things to the worſt, but they that loue together, do diſcemble many things among themſelues, doe winke at many things, and pardon many things one to the other: not that the one alloweth the others faultes, but beareth with them, and helpeth them with admoniſhing, rather then galleth them with reproaching them. And it is not to be doubted that Peter alleageth this place in the ſame ſenſe, vnleſſe we will accuſe him of deprauing and wrongfully wreſting the Scripture. But where as he teacheth that ſinne is purged with mercifulneſſe and liberality, he doth not meane that recompence is therwith made for ſinne before the face of the Lord, ſo that God being appeaſed by ſuch ſatisfaction doth releaſe the paine that otherwiſe he would haue laid vpon them, but after the accuſtomed manner of the Scripture hee declareth that they ſhall finde him mercifull vnto them that leauing their former vices and iniquities, doe turne to him by godlineſſe and trueth: as if he ſhould ſay, that the wrath of God doth ceaſe and his iudgement reſt, when we ceaſe from our euill doings. Neither doth he there deſcribe the cauſe of pardon, but rather the maner of true conuerſion. As many times the Prophets doe declare that Hypocrites doe in vaine peſter God with forged ceremonious vſages in ſteede of repentance, whereas it is vprightneſſe of life with the duties of charitie that delighteth him. As alſo the author of the Epiſtle to the Hebrues commending liberalitie and gentleneſſe, teacheth that ſuch ſacrifices pleaſe God. And when Chriſt, taunting the Phariſees that giuing heede onely to cleaſing of diſhes, they neglected the cleanneſſe of the heart, commaunded them to giue almes that all might be cleane: he did not thereby exhort them to make ſatisfaction: but onely teacheth what maner of cleanneſſe pleaſeth God. Of which kinde of ſpeech we haue intreated in another place.

Heb.13.16. Mat.23.25. Luc.11.39.

37 As touching the place of Luke, no man that hath with ſound iudgement read the parable that the Lord did there recite, will make vs any controuerſie thereupon. The Phariſee thought with himſelfe, that the Lord did not know the woman, which he had ſo eaſily receiued into his preſence. For he thought that Chriſt would not haue receiued her, if he had knowen her ſuch a ſinner as ſhe was. And thereby he gathered, that Chriſt was not a Prophet that might in ſuch ſort be deceiued. The Lord, to ſhew that ſhe was no ſinner to whom her ſinnes was alreadie forgiuen, did put out this parable. There were two debtors to one creditor vpon vſurie: the one ought fifty, the other ought fiue hundred, both had their debts forgiuen them. Whether oweth more thanke the Phariſee anſwered: he to whom moſt is forgiuen. The Lord replied: learne hereby that this womans ſinnes are forgiuen her, becauſe ſhe hath loued much. In which words (as you ſee) he maketh not her loue the cauſe, but the proofe of the forgiueneſſe of her ſinnes. For they are deriued vpon a ſimilitude of that debtour, to whom fiue hundred was forgiuen, to whom he did not ſay that therefore it was forgiuen, becauſe he had loued much: but therefore loued much, becauſe it was forgiuen. And hereunto muſt that ſimilitude be applied in this ſort: Thou thinkeſt this woman to be a ſinner: but thou oughteſt to know that ſhe is none ſuch, for as much as her ſinnes be forgiuen her. And that her ſinnes be forgiuen her, her loue ought to proone vnto thee, whereby ſhe rendereth thanke for this benefit. It is an argument gathered of the following effect, whereby any thing is proued by ſignes enſuing. By what meane ſhe obtained forgiueneſſe of ſinnes, the Lord openly teſtifieth: Thy faith, ſaith he, hath ſaued thee. Therefore we obtaine forgiueneſſe by faith: By charitie we giue thankes, and teſtifie the bountifulneſſe of the Lord.

The ſins which the woman to whom many ſins were forgiuen did ſhew towards him which did forgiue her, was not a cauſe, but a proofe of her pardoning. Luke 7.35.

38 As for thoſe things that are commonly found in the bookes of olde writers concerning ſatisfaction, they little moue me. I ſee indeed that many of them, (I will ſpeake plainely) in a maner all whoſe bookes remaine, haue either erred in this point, or ſpoken too crabbedly and hardly: but I will not grant that they were ſo rude and vnskilfull as to haue written thoſe things in that ſenſe that the new Satisfactionars doe read them. Chryſoſtome in one place writeth thus: where mercy is required, examination ceaſeth: where mercy is asked, iudgement is not rigorous: where mercy is craued, there is no place for paine: where is mercy there is no inquiſition. Where is mercy, the anſwer is pardoned. Which words howſoeuer they be wreſted, yet they can neuer be made to agree with the ſchoolemens doctrines. In the booke of Eccleſiaſtical doctrines, which is fathered vpon Auguſtine, is read thus: Satisfaction of repentance is, to cut off the cauſes of ſinnes, and not to grant an entry to their ſuggeſtions. Whereby appeareth that the doctrine of ſatisfaction that was ſaid to be giuen in recompence of ſinnes committed, was euen in thoſe times laughed to ſcorne: forasmuch as they referre all ſatisfaction to a heedfulneſſe in abſtaining from ſinnes in time to come. I will not alleage that which the ſame Chryſoſtome ſaith, that he requireth of vs no more, but that we ſhould confeſſe our ſinnes vnto him with teares ſith ſuch ſentences are many times found in his writings and others. Auguſtine indeed in ſome places calleth the workes of mercie, remedies to obtaine forgiueneſſe of ſinnes: but becauſe no man ſhould ſtumble at that little word, he himſelfe preuenteth it in another place. The fleſh of Christ (saith he) the true and onely sacrifice for sinnes, not onely these sinnes that are wholy put away in baptisme, but also these that afterward creepe in by weakenesse: for which the whole Church crieth out at this day, For giue vs our trespasses. And they are forgiuen by that singular sacrifice.

39 They haue for the most part called satisfaction, not a recompence to be rendred to God, but an open declaration whereby they that had beene excommunicate when they would be receiued againe to the communion, did ascertaine the Church of their repentance. For there were ioyned vnto them when they did repent certaine fastings and other things, whereby they might perswade men that they were truely and harmly weary of their former life, or rather blot out the remembrance of their former doings: and so they were said to make satisfaction not to God, but to the Church. Which is also expressed of Augustine in these words in his Enchiridion to Laurence: Out of that ancient custome the confessions and satisfactions that are at this day vsed, tooke their beginning. Truely very viperous birthes, by which is brought to passe, that there remaineth not so much as a shadow of that better forme, I know that the old writers doe sometime speake somewhat hardly, and as I said euen now, I doe not deny that peraduenture they erred heerein. But those things that were besprinckled with a few spots, when they are once handled with these mens vnwashed hands, are altogether defiled. And if we must contend with the authority of old writers: good God what old writers doe they thrust vnto vs? A good part of those wherewith Peter Lombard their champion hath botcheh vp his patched Sentences, is gathered out of the vnsauory dotages of certaine Monkes that are carried about vnder the name of Ambrose, Hierome, Augustine and Chrysostome. As about this present question he taketh in a manner all out of Augustines booke of repentance, which is foolishly botched of good and bad by some scraper together. It beareth indeed the name of Augustine, but such a booke as no man being but meanely learned, would vouchsafe to acknowledge for his. But whereas I doe not so narrowly examine their follies, let the readers pardon me whom I would ease of that tediousnesse. For to me it should not be very labboursome, and yet very plausible to bewray to their great shame those things that they haue heeretofore boasted vpon as mysteries, but because my purpose is to teach fruitfully, therefore I passe them ouer.

Cap. 65. & is rehearsed in the Decrets. cap. in actionibus de pœnit. distin. 1.

THE FIFTH CHAPTER.

Of the supplyings which they adde to satisfactions, as pardons and Purgatorie.

OVt of this doctrine of satisfactions doe flow indulgences or pardons. For they say that that which our power wanteth to make satisfaction, is supplied by these pardons. And they run so farre foorth into madnesse, that they define them to be the distribution of the merits of Christ and of the Martyrs, which the Pope dealeth abroad by his Bulles. But although they haue more neede of Helleborus to purge their frentike braine, than arguments to answer them, so that it is not much woorthy the trauill to stand vpon confuting such trifling errors, which are already shaken with many battle-rammes, and of themselues grow into decaied age, and bend toward falling: yet because a short confutation of them shall be profitable for some that be ignorant, I will not altogether omit it. As for this that pardons haue so long stand safe and haue so long beene vnpunished, hauing beene vsed with so outragious and furious licentiousnesse: this may serue to teach vs in how darke a night of errours, men in certaine ages past haue beene drowned. They saw themselues to be openly and vncolourably scorned of the Pope and his Bulbearers, gainful markets to be made of the saluation of their soules, the price of saluation to be valued at a few pence, and nothing set out to be freely giuen: that by this colour they be wiped of offerings to be filthily spent vpon brothels, bawds and banketings, that the greatest blowers abroad of the pardons are the greatest despisers of them, that this monster doth daily more and more with greater licentiousnesse ouerrun the world, and grow into outrage, and that there is no end, new leade daily brought, and new money gotten. Yet with hie reuerence they receiued, they worshipped worshipped and bought pardons, and such as among the rest saw somwhat farther, yet thought them to be godly deceits, whereby men might be beguiled with some profit: At the length, since the world suffered it selfe to be somewhat wiser, pardons waxe colde, and by little and little become frosen, till they vtterly vanish away.

The ground of pardons is the merit of Saints then which vnto the merite of Christ nothing can be more opposite.

2 But forasmuch as many that see the filthie gaminges, the deceites, theftes, and robberies, wherewith the pardoners haue heretofore mocked and beguiled vs, yet see not the very fountaine of vngodlinesse from whence they spring: it is good to shew not onely of what sort pardons be, but also what they be, when they are wiped from all spots. They call the treasure of the Church, the merites of Christ and of the holy Apostles and Martyres. The principall custodie of this barne (as I haue alreadie touched) they faigne to be deliuered to the Bishop of Rome, that he should haue the distribution of so great giftes, that he might both giue them by himselfe, and also graunt iurisdiction to other to giue them. Hereupon proceede from the Pope sometime plenary pardons, sometime pardons for certaine yeares: from the Cardinals, pardons for a hundred daies: from Bishops, pardons for fortie daies. But they be (as I may naturally describe them) the profaning of the blood of Christ, Satans mockerie, to leade away the Christian people from the grace of God, from the life that is in Christ, and to turne them from the true way of saluation. For how could the blood of Christ be more filthily prophaned, than when it is denied to suffice to the remission of sinnes, to reconciliation and satisfaction, vnlesse the want thereof as being withered & wasted, should be otherwise supplied and perfited? The law and all the Prophets (saith Peter) beare witnesse of Christ, that by him forgiuenesse of sinne is to be receiued: Pardons giue remission of sinnes by Peter, Paul and the Martyrs. The blood of Christ (saith Iohn) cleanseth vs from sinne: Pardons doe make the blood of Martyrs the washing away of sinnes. Christ (saith Paul) which knew not sinne, was made sinne for vs, that is, the satisfaction of sinne, that we might be made the righteousnesse of God in him: Pardons doe set the satisfaction of sinnes in the blood of Martyrs. Paul cried out and testified to the Corinthians, that onely Christ was crucified and died for them: the Pardons pronounce, that Paul and other died for vs. In an other place he saith that Christ purchased the Church with his blood: the pardons appoint an other price of purchase in the blood of Martyrs. The Apostle saith, that Christ with one oblation made perfect for euer them that were sanctified: the pardons cry out to the contrary and say, that sanctification is made perfect by the Martyrs, which otherwise were not sufficient. Iohn saith that all the Saints washed their Gownes in the blood of the Lambe: the pardons teach men to wash their Gownes in blood of Saints.

The euident testimonies of Leo and Augustine against their owne vaine allegations for the desertes of Saints appliable vnto others.

3 Leo Bishop of Rome, writeth notably well to the Palestines against these sacrileges. Although (saith he) the death of many Saints hath beene precious in the sight of the Lord, yet the killing of no innocent hath beene the propitiation of the world. The righteous receiued, but gaue not crownes: and out of the valiantnesse of the faithfull are grauen examples of patience, not giftes of righteousnesse. For their deathes were euery one singular to themselues, and none of them did by his ende pay the debt of an other, forasmuch as there is one Lord Christ, in whom all are crucified, all are dead, buried, and raised vp againe. Which sentence (as it was worthy to be remembred) he repeated in another place. There can nothing be required more plaine to destroy this wicked doctrine. Yet Augustine speaketh no lesse fitly to the same effect, Though (saith he) we die brethren for brethren, yet the blood of no Martyrs is shed for the forgiuenesse of sinnes. Which thing Christ hath done for vs, neither hath he therein done that for vs, that we should follow him, but hath giuen vs a thing to reioyce vpon. Again in an other place, As onely the Sonne of God was made the Sonne of Man, to make vs with him the Sonnes of God: so he alone for vs hath taken vpon him punishment without euill deseruings, that we by him might without good deseruings, obtaine grace not due vnto vs. Truely whereas all their doctrine is patched together of horrible sacriledges and blasphemies, yet this is a more monstrous blasphemie than all the other. Let them remember themselues whether these be not their decrees: that the Martyrs haue by their death done more to God, and deserued more, than was needefull for themselues: and that they had remaining so great a plentie of deseruings, as did also ouerflow vnto other: and that therefore, leaſt ſo great goodneſſe ſhould be ſuperfluous, their bloud is mingled with the bloud of Chriſt, and of both theſe blouds is made the treaſure of the Church, for the remiſſion and ſatisfaction of ſinnes. And that ſo is the ſaying of Paul to be taken: I ſupply in my bodie thoſe things that want of the ſufferings of Chriſt for his bodie, which is the Church. What is this elſe but to leaue Chriſt onely his name, otherwiſe to make him but a common petie Saint, that may ſcarcely among the multitude be knowen from the reſt? He onely, onely ſhould haue beene preached, he onely ſet forth, he onely named, he onely beene looked vnto, when the obteining of forgiueneſſe of ſinne, ſatisfaction, and ſanctification are entreated of: But let vs heare their curtalled argumentes. Leaſt the bloud of the Martyrs ſhould be ſhed in vaine, therefore let it be employed to the common benefit of the Church. Is it ſo? was it no profit to glorifie God by their death? to ſubſcribe to his trueth with their bloud? by deſpiſing this preſent life, to teſtifie that they ſought for a better life? by their ſtedfaſtneſſe to ſtrengthen the faith of the Church, and ouercome the ſtubbornneſſe of the enemies? But this is the matter indeed: they acknowledge no profit of the Martyrs death, if Chriſt onely be the propitiator, if he onely died for our ſinnes, if he onely was offered vp for our redemption. So (ſay they) Peter and Paul might neuertheleſſe haue obteined the crowne of victorie, if they had died in their beds. And whereas they haue fought euen to the ſhedding of their bloud, it would not agree with the iuſtice of God to leaue the ſame barren and fruitleſſe. As though God could not tel how to encreaſe in his ſeruants their glory, according to the meaſure of his gifts. But the church receiueth in common together profit enough, when it is by their triumphes encouraged to a zealous deſire to fight.

4 But how malitiouſly doe they wreſt that place of Paul where he ſaith, that he ſupplieth in his bodie thoſe things that wanted of the ſufferings of Chriſt? for he referreth not the default of ſupplying to the worke of redemption, ſatisfaction, and expiation: but to thoſe afflictions wherewith all the members of Chriſt, that is to ſay, all the faithfull muſt be excerciſed ſo long as they ſhall be in this fleſh. He ſaith therefore, that this remaineth of the ſufferings of Chriſt, that he daily ſuffereth in his members the ſame that he once ſuffered in himſelfe. Chriſt vouchſafeth to doe vs ſo great honor, to reckon and account our afflictions his owne. Whereas Paul addeth theſe words, For the Church, he meaneth not for the redemption, for the reconciliation, for the ſatisfaction of the Church, but for the edifying and profit of the Church. As in another place he ſaith, that he ſuffereth all things for the elects ſake, that he may obtaine the ſaluation which is in Chriſt Ieſu. And he wrote to the Corinthians, that he ſuffered all the troubles that he ſuffered, for their comfort and ſaluation. And immediately in the ſame place expoundeth himſelfe, when he ſaith further, that he was made a miniſter of the Church, not for redemption, but according to the diſpenſation that was committed vnto him, to preach the Goſpell of Chriſt. If they yet require another expoſitor, let them heare Auguſtine. The ſufferings of Chriſt (ſaith he) are in Chriſt onely as in the head: and both in Chriſt and the Church, as in the whole bodie. Whereby Paul being one member ſaith, I ſupply in my bodie that which wanteth in the ſufferings of Chriſt. Therefore if thou whatſoeuer thou be that heareſt this, art one of the members of Chriſt, whatſoeuer thou ſuffereſt of them that are not the members of Chriſt, that ſame wanted in the ſufferings of Chriſt. But wherunto the ſufferings of the Apoſtles taken for the church of Chriſt do tend, he expoundeth in another place where he ſaith: Chriſt is to me the gate vnto you: becauſe ye are the ſheepe of Chriſt bought with his bloud: acknowledging your price, which is not giuen of me, but preached by me. Then he addeth, As he hath giuen his ſoule, ſo ought we to giue our ſoules for our brethren, to edifie peace, and confirme Faith. Theſe are Auguſtines words. But God forbid, that Paul ſhould haue thought that any thing wanted in the ſufferings of Chriſt, as concerning all fulneſſe of righteouſneſſe, ſaluation and life, or that he meant to adde any thing thereunto, which ſo plainely and honorably preacheth, that the aboundance of grace was ſo largely powred out by Chriſt, that it far ſurmounted all the force of ſinne. By it onely all the Saints haue beene ſaued, and not by the merit of their owne life or death as Peter expreſly teſtified: ſo that he ſhould be ſlanderous againſt against God and Christ, that should repose the worthinesse of any Saint any where else than in the onely mercy of God. But why doe I tarry hereupon any longer, as vpon a matter yet doubtfull, sith the very bewraying of such monstrous errours is a sufficient confutation of them?

Whence the gracious indulgence of Christ which should be published by preaching of the Gospell began to be folded vp in parchment and lead.

5 Now (to passe ouer such abhominations) who taught the Pope to enclose in lead and parchment the grace of Iesus Christ, which the Lord willed to be distributed by the word of the Gospell? Truely either the Gospell of God must be false, or their pardons false. For, that Christ is offered vs in the Gospell, with all abundance of heauenly benefites, with all his merites, with all his righteousnesse, wisedome and grace, without any exception, Paul witnesseth where he saith, that the word of reconciliation was deliuered to the ministers, whereby they might vse this forme of message as it were Christ giuing exhortation by them: we beseech you, be ye so reconciled to God. 2.Cor.1. He hath made him that knew no sinne, to be made sinne for vs, that we might be made the righteousnesse of God in him. And the faithfull know of what value is that common partaking of Christ, which (as the same Apostle witnesseth) is offred vs to be enioyed in the Gospell. Contrariwise the pardons doe bring out of the storehouse of the Pope, a certaine pitance of grace, and fasten it to leade parchment, yea and to a certaine place, and seuer it from the word of God. If a man should aske whence this abuse tooke beginning: it seemeth to haue proceded hereof, that when in time past penitentes were charged with more rigorous satisfactions than all could beare, they which felt themselues aboue measure oppressed with penance enioyed them, required of the Church a release. The mitigation that was granted to such, was called an indulgence or pardon. But when they turned satisfactions from the Church to God, and said that they were recompences whereby men may redeeme themselues from the iudgement of God, then they therewithall did also draw these indulgences or pardons to be propitiatorie remedies, to deliuer vs from deserued punishments. As for these blasphemers that we haue recited, they forged them so shamelesly, that they can haue no colour at all. 1.Cor.1.7.

The foresaid ground being taken away purgatorie thereupon builded falleth.

6 Now let them no more trouble vs with their purgation, because it is with this axe already broken, hewed downe, & ouerthrowen from the very foundations. For I do not agree to some men, that thinke best to dissemble in this point, & make no mention at all of Purgatorie, whereupon (as they say) great contentions do arise, but small edification is gotten. Truly I my selfe would also thinke such trifles worthy to be negligently passed ouer, if they did not account thē earnest matters. But forasmuch as Purgatory is builded of many blasphemies, & is dayly vpholden with new blasphemies, and raiseth vp many & grieuous offences, truly it is not to be winked at. This peraduenture might after a sort haue been dissembled for a time, that it was inuented by curious & bold rashnes without the word of God: that men beleeued of it by I wot not what reuelations, faigned by the craft of Sathan: that for the confirmation of it, certaine places of Scripture were fondly wrested. Albeit the Lord giueth not leaue to mans presumptuousnes so to break into the secret places of his iudgements, and hath seuerely forbidden men to enquire for truth at dead men, neglecting his word, & permitteth not his word to be so vnreuerently defiled. Deut.18.21. But let vs grant, that all those things might for a while haue been borne with, as things of no great importance. But when the cleansing of sinnes is sought else where than in the blood of Christ, when satisfaction is giuen away to any other thing, then it is most perillous not to speake of it. Therefore we must cry out not onely with vehement stretching of our voice, but also of our throate & sides: that Purgatory is the damnable deuise of Sathan, that it maketh voide the Crosse of Christ, that it layeth an intollerable slander vpon the mercie of God, that it feebleth and ouerthroweth our faith. For what else is Purgatorie among them, but the satisfaction that the Soules of men departed do pay after their death? So that ouerthrowing the opinion of satisfaction, Purgatorie is immediately ouerthrowen by the very rootes. But if in our former discourse it is more than euident that the blood of Christ is the only satisfaction, propitiatorie sacrifice, and cleansing for the sinnes of the faithfull: what remaineth but that Purgatorie is ameere and horrible blasphemie against Christ? I passe ouer the robberies of God wherewith it is dayly defended, the offences that it breedeth in religion, and other things innumerable, which we see to haue come out of the same spring of vngodlinesse.

7 But

7 But it is good to wring out of their hands ſuch places as they haue falſly and wrongfullly taken out of the Scripture. When (ſay they) the Lord affirmeth that the ſinne againſt the holy Ghoſt ſhould not be forgiuen in this world, nor in the world to come, thereby he ſheweth that there is a forgiueneſſe of ſome ſinnes in the world to come. But who ſeeth not that the Lord there ſpeaketh of the fault of ſinne? Now if it be ſo, what is that to their purgatorie for as much as by their opinion the paine is there ſuffered of thoſe ſinnes, whereof they deny not the fault to be forgiuen in this preſent life? But that they may no more carpe againſt vs, they ſhall haue yet a plainer ſolution. When the Lord meant to cut off all hope of pardon from ſo hainous wickedneſſe, he thought it not ynough to ſay that it ſhould neuer be forgiuen, but the more to amplifie it, he vſed a diuiſion, wherein he comprehended both the iudgement that euery mans conſcience feeleth in this life, and the laſt iudgement that ſhall be openly pronounced at the reſurrection: as though he ſhould haue ſaid: Beware ye of malicious rebellion, as of moſt preſent damnation. For he that of ſet purpoſe ſhall endeuour to quench the light of the holy Ghoſt, ſhall not obtaine pardon, neither in this life which is giuen to ſinners for their conuerſion, nor in the laſt day when the Lambes ſhall be ſeuered by the Angels of God from the Goates, and the kingdome of heauen ſhall be cleanſed from all offences. Then they bring foorth that parable out of Matthew: Agree with thine aduerſarie, leaſt he deliuer thee to the Iudge, and the Iudge to the Serieant, and the Sergeant to the priſon, from whence thou ſhalt not get out, vntill thou haſt payed the vttermoſt farthing. If in this place the Iudge doe ſignifie God, and the aduerſarie plaintiſe the diuell, the Sargeant the Angell, and the priſon purgatorie, I will gladly yeeld vnto them. But if it be euident to all men, that Chriſt meant there to ſhew into how many dangers and miſchiefes they caſt themſelues, that had rather obſtinately purſue the extremitie of the law, than deale according to equitie and good right, to the end to exhort his diſciples the more earneſtly to agreement with equitie: where then I pray you ſhall Purgatorie be found?

That ſinne againſt the holy Ghoſt ſhall neither in this world, nor in the world to come be forgiuen, is a ſtender proofe for Purgatorie.

Matth.5.25.

8 They fetch an argument out of the ſaying of Paul, where he affirmeth, that the knees of things in heauen, earth, and hels, ſhall bow to Chriſt. For they take it as confeſſed, that hels cannot there be meant of thoſe that are adiudged to eternall damnation. Therefore it remaineth that it muſt be the ſoules lying in paine in Purgatory. They did not reaſon very euill, if the Apoſtle did by kneeling meane the true godly worſhipping. But ſith he teacheth only, that there is dominion giuen to Chriſt, whereby all creatures are to be ſubdued, what proofe is there to the contrary, but that we may by hels vnderſtand the Diuils, that ſhall be brought before the iudgement of God, to acknowledge him their iudge with feare and trembling? Like as Paul himſelfe expoundeth the ſame Prophecy in another place. All (ſaith he) ſhall be brought before the iudgement ſeat of Chriſt. For it is written. So truely as I liue, euery knee ſhall bow to me, &c. But we may not ſo expound that which is in the Reuelation: I haue heard all creatures, both theſe things that are in heauen, and thoſe that are vpon the earth, and theſe that are vnder the earth, & thoſe that are in the ſea, and all thoſe that are in them, I haue heard them all ſay to him that ſitteth on the throne, and to the Lambe, Bleſſing, and honor, and glorie, and power for euer and euer. That I doe in deede eaſily grant, but what creatures doe they thinke to be here rehearſed? For it is moſt certaine, that there are contained creatures both without reaſon and without ſenſe. Whereby is affirmed nothing elſe, but that all the parts of the world, from the higheſt top of the heauens to the very middle point of the earth, doe in their maner declare the glory of their Creator. As for that which they alleadge out of the hiſtory of the Machabees, I will not vouchſafe to anſwer it, leſt I ſhould ſeeme to reckon that worke in the number of the holy bookes. But Auguſtine receiued it for Canonicall, But firſt, of what ſure credit did he receiue it? The Iewes (ſaith he) eſteeme not the writing of the Machabees as they doe the law, the Prophets, and the Pſalmes, of which the Lord himſelfe hath witneſſed as of his witneſſes, ſaying: It was neceſſary that all things ſhould be fulfilled that are written in the law, and the Pſalmes, and Prophets concerning me. But it hath beene receiued of the Church not profitably, if it be ſoberly read or heard. And Hierome teacheth without any doubting that the authoritie thereof is of no force to prooving of doctrines. And it euidently appeareth by that old booke, which is entituled vnder the name of Cyprian, concerning the expoſition of the Creede, that it had no place at all in the old Church. But why doe I heere ſtriue without cauſe? As though the author himſelfe doth not ſufficientlie ſhew, how much he is to be credited, when in the end he craueth pardon, if he haue ſpoken any thing not well. Truely he that confeſſeth his writings to neede pardon, ſaith plainely that they are not the oracles of the holy Ghoſt. Beſide that, the godlineſſe of Iudas is praiſed for none other cauſe, but for that he had an aſſured hope of the laſt reſurrection, when he ſent an offring for the dead to Hieruſalem. Neither doth the writer of that hiſtorie referre that which Iudas did to be a price of redemption, but that they might be partakers of the eternall life with the other faithfull, that had died for their countrey and religion. This doing was in deed not without ſuperſtition and prepoſterous zeale, but they are more than fooles, that draw a ſacrifice of the lawe ſo farre as vnto vs: foraſmuch as we know that things doe ceaſe by the comming of Chriſt, that then were in vſe.

2.Mach.15.36.

The fire whereof S. Paul maketh mention to the Corinthians is no Purgatorie fire.

9 But they haue an inuincible bulwarke in Paul, which cannot ſo eaſily be battered. If any man (ſaith he) build vpon this foundation, gold, ſiluer, precious ſtones, timber, hey, ſtubble, the Lord ſhall ſhew euery mans worke what it is: becauſe it ſhall be reueiled in fire, and the fire ſhall trie euery mans worke what it is. If any mans worke do burne, it ſhall ſuffer loſſe, but he ſhall be ſafe, but as through the fire. What fire (ſay they) can that be, but the fire of Purgatorie? by which the filthineſſes of ſinne are cleanſed away, that we may enter pure into the kingdome of God? But the moſt part of the olde writers thought it to be another fire, that is to ſay, Trouble or the croſſe, by which the Lord trieth them that be his, that they ſhould not reſt in the filthineſſe of the fleſh: and that is much more probable, than in faining Purgatorie. Albeit I doe neither agree with theſe men, becauſe I thinke I haue attained a certaine and much plainer vnderſtanding of that place. But before that I vtter it, I would haue them anſwer me, whether the Apoſtles and all the Saints muſt haue gone through this fire of Purgatory? I know they will ſay, nay. For it were too much inconuenient that they muſt haue needed to be purged, whoſe merits they dreame to ouerflow aboue meaſure to all the members of the Church. But the Apoſtle affirmeth it. For he doth not ſay that the worke of ſome ſhall be prooued, but the worke of all. Neither is this my argument, but Auguſtines, which ſo confuteth that expoſition. And (which is more abſurditie) he doth not ſay, that they ſhall paſſe through the fire for all works: but if they haue faithfully builded the Church, they ſhal receiue reward when their worke is examined with fire. Firſt, we ſee that the Apoſtle vſed a Metaphore, when he called the doctrines inuented by mans braines, wood, hey, and ſtubble. And the Metaphore hath an apparant reſcue: that as wood ſo ſoone as it is put in the fire, conſumeth and waſteth, ſo cannot thoſe doctrines continue when they come to be examined. Now no man is ignorant that ſuch triall commeth of the holy Ghoſt. Therefore to follow the true cauſe of his Metaphore, and match the parts together with iuſt relation, he called the triall of the holy Ghoſt, fire. For euen as the neerer that gold and ſiluer are put to the fire, ſo much the ſurer proofe they haue of their goodneſſe and fineneſſe: ſo the Lords truth, the more exactly it is weyed with ſpirituall examination, ſo much the greater confirmation of credit it receiueth. As hey, wood, and ſtubble put to the fire, are brought to ſudden conſuming, ſo the inuentions of men, not ſtabliſhed by the word of God, cannot beare the triall of the holy Ghoſt, but they by and by fall away and periſh. Finally, if forged doctrines be compared to wood, hey, and ſtubble, becauſe like wood, hey, and ſtubble, they are burned with fire, and deſtroied: but they are not deſtroied or driuen away but by the ſpirit of the Lord: it followeth that the holy Ghoſt is the fire wherewith they ſhall be prooued, whoſe proofe Paul, according to the common vſe of the Scripture, calleth, The day of the Lord. For it is called, the day of the Lord, whenſoeuer he doth any way ſhew his preſence to men. But then his face principally ſhineth, when his truth ſhineth vpon vs. Now haue we prooued, that Paul meaneth no other fire, but the trial of the holy Ghoſt. But how are they ſaued by the fire, that ſuffer loſſe of their worke? That ſhall not be hard to vnderſtand, if we conſider of what kinde of men he ſpeaketh. For he toucheth thoſe builders of the Church, that keeping the true foundation, doe build diſagreeing matter vpon it, that is to say, they that not swaruing from the chiefe and necessarie articles of faith, doe erre in points that be smaller and lesse perillous, mingling their own deuises with the word of God. Such I say, must suffer losse of their worke, hauing their deuises destroyed. But themselues are saued, but as by the fire: that is to say, not that their ignorance and errour is allowable before the Lord, but because they are clensed from it by the grace and power of the holy Ghost. Therefore whosoeuer haue defiled the golden fineneſſe of Gods word with this dung of purgatorie, they must needs suffer losse of their worke.

10 But they will say, it hath beene an ancient vsage of the Church. Paul answered this obiection when he comprehendeth his owne time in that sentence, where he saith, that all they must suffer losse of their worke, that in the building of the Church, doe lay any thing vpon the foundation that agreeth not with it. Therefore when the aduersaries obiect against me, that it hath beene vsed aboue a thousand and three hundreth yeares, to haue prayers made for the dead: I aske them againe, by what word of God, by what reuelation, by what example it was done. For here they doe not onely want testimonies of Scripture but also all the examples of holy men that there are read, do shew no such thing. Of the mourning and order of funerals there are sometimes found many and long tales: but of prayers you cannot see one title. But of the greater weight that the matter is, the more it ought to haue beene expresly spoken. But the very olde Fathers themselues that prayed for the dead, did see that herein they wanted both commandement of God, & lawfull example. Why then durst they do so? In this I say, they did suffer somewhat as men: and therefore I affirme that that which they did, ought not to be drawen into example. For whereas the faithfull ought to enterprise the doing of nothing, but vpon assured conscience, as Paul teacheth: this assuredneſſe is principally required in prayer. But it is likely that they were led by some reason vnto it: they sought some comfort to relieue their sorrow: and it seemed vnnatural not to shew before God some testimony of their loue toward the dead. How mans wit is enclined to this affection, all men know by experience. Also the receiued custome was like a burning brand to set many mens minds on fire. We know that with al nations and in all ages there were funerals done for the dead, & their soules yeerely purged. For though Sathan beguiled foolish men with these deceits: yet he tooke occasion so to beguile by a true principle: that death is not a destruction, but a passage out of this life into another. And it is no doubt, but that euen very superstition condemneth the Gentiles before the iudgement seate of God, for neglecting the care of the life to come, which they professed themselues to beleeue. Now Christians, becauſe they would not be worse then Heathen men, were ashamed to doe nothing for the dead, as though they were vtterly destroyed. Hereupon came that ill aduised diligence: because if they were slow in looking to the funerals, in bankettings and offerings, they thought that they had put themselues in danger of a great reproch. And that which first proceeded from a wrongfull following of the Heathens example, was so multiplied by often new encreases, that now it is the principall holineſſe of Papistrie, to helpe the dead in distresse. But the Scripture ministreth another much better and perfecter comfort, when it testifieth, that the dead are blessed that die in the Lord. And it addeth a reason: because from thenceforth they rest from their labors. And we ought not so much tenderly to follow our owne affection of loue, to set vp a wrongfull maner of praying in the Church. Truely he that hath but meane wisedome, doth soone perceiue that all that is read hereof in the old writers, was done to beare with the common vsage, and the ignorance of the people. They themselues also, I grant, were caried away into error euen as vnaduised lightneſſe of beliefe is wont to rob mens wits of iudgement. But in the meane time the very reading of them doth shew, how doubtingly they commend prayers for the dead. Augustine in his booke of confessions, reporteth that Monica his mother did earneſtly desire, that she might be remembred in celebrating the ministeries at the Altar. An old wiues request, which the sonne neuer examined by the rule of the Scripture, but according to his affection of nature, would haue it allowed of other. As for the book that he made of care for the dead, cõtaineth so many doubtings, that of right it ought with the coldnes thereof to quench the heate of a foolish zeale: if any man desire to be a proctor for dead men, truely with colde likelihoodes it will bring them out of care that were before carefull. For this is one piller of it, that this doing is not to be despised, because it is a custome growen in vse, that the dead should be praied for. But though I grant to the old writers of the Church, that it is a charitable vse to helpe the dead: yet we must still hold one rule which cannot deceiue: that it is not lawful for vs in our prayers to vse any thing of our own, but our requests must be made subiect to the word of God: because it is in his will to appoint what he will haue to be asked. Now whereas the whole law and the Gospell do not so much as in one syllable giue libertie to pray for the dead, it is a prophane abuse of the inuocation of God to attempt more than he commandeth vs. But that our aduersaries may not boast that they haue the ancient Church companion of their errour: I say there is great difference betweene them and it. They vsed a memoriall of the dead, least they should seeme to haue cast away all care of them: but they did therewithall confesse that they doubted of their state. As for Purgatorie, they so affirmed nothing that they held it for a thing vncertaine. These men require to haue that which they haue dreamed of Purgatorie, to be holden without question for an article of Faith. They slenderly and onely to passe it lightly ouer, did in the communion of the holy Supper commend their dead to God. These doe continually call vpon the care of the dead, and with importunate praising it, do make it to be preferred aboue all dutifull works of charitie. Yea, and it were not hard for vs to bring foorth some testimonies of the olde writers, that doe manifestly ouerthrow all those prayers for the dead, which then were vsed. As this of Augustine, when he teacheth that all men looke for the resurrection of the flesh and the eternall glorie, and that euery man then receiueth the rest that followeth after death, if he be woorthy when he dieth. And therefore he testifieth, that all the godly doe immediately after death enioy the blessed rest as well as the Prophets, Apostles, and Martyrs. If their estate be such, what I beseech you shall our praiers auaile them? I passe ouer the grosser superstitions, wherewith they haue bewitched the mindes of the simple: which yet are so innumerable and the most part so monstrous, that they can haue no honest colour to excuse them. Also I let passe those most filthy buyings and sellings that they haue vsed, while the world was in such grosse senseless ignorance. For both I should neuer make an end, and also the readers shall without any rehearsall of them, haue here sufficient, whereupon they may stablish their consciences.

The occasion whence prayer for the dead first rose, which notwithstanding doth not argue the soules of the dead, which were prayed for to haue beene in Purgatorie.

Hom. in Ioan. 456.

THE SIXTH CHAPTER.

Of the life of a Christian man: And first, by what arguments the Scripture exhorteth vs thereunto.

An order of framing our lines needefull to be gathered out of Scriptures.

WE haue alreadie said, that the marke whereunto regeneration tendeth is that in the life of the faithfull there should appeare an agreement & consent betweene the righteousnesse of God and their obedience: and that so they should confirme the adoption, whereby they are receiued to be children. But although his law containe in it selfe that newnesse, whereby the image of God is restored in vs, yet because our dulnes hath neede both of many prickings forward and helpes, therefore it shall be profitable to gather out of diuerse places of the Scripture an order of framing of life, that they that haue a desirous minde of amendment, may not wander out of the way in their endeuour. Now when I take vpon me the framing of a Christian mans life, I am not ignorant that I enter into a manifold and plentious argument, and such as may with the greatnesse thereof fill a long volume, if I would absolutely entreate of it in all points. For we see into what great length are stretched the exhortatorie orations of olde writers, made onely euery one of one seuerall vertue. And that is not done with too much idle babling. For whatsoeuer vertue a man purpose to set out in oration, the stile runneth of it selfe into such largenesse with plentie of matter, that a man cannot seeme to haue discoursed well of it, vnlesse he haue spoken much. But my minde is not to stretch so farre the institution of life, which I promise to teach, as peculiarly to goe through euery speciall vertue, & wander abroad into exhortations. Let such things be fetched out of other mens writings, and specially out of the Homilies of the old fathers.

It

It shall be enough for me to shew an orderly trade, whereby a godly man may be guided to a right marke of framing his life, and shortly to appoint out a certaine vniuersall rule, by which he may well try what be his dueties. There shall peraduenture at some other season be a fit time to make declamations, or I will leaue that to other, which I my selfe am not meete to doe. I doe naturally loue shortnesse, and peraduenture if I would speake more at large, it would not frame well with me. And if a longer maner of teaching were neuer so much pleasing, yet I would scarce haue minde to put in proofe. But the course of this present worke requireth to knit vp a simple doctrine with as great shortnesse as I may. As the Philosophers haue their certaine ends of right and honestie, from which they deriue particular duties and all the company of vertues: so the Scripture is not without her order in this matter: but holdeth a most goodly well ordered disposition, & much more certaine than all the Philosophers orders. This onely is the difference, that they (as they were vainglorious men) haue diligently endeuoured to attaine an exquisite plainnesse of order, to shew foorth the ready aptnesse of their wit. But the Spirit of God, because he taught without curious affection, hath not so exactly nor continually kept an orderly trade: which yet when he sometime vseth, he doth sufficiently declare, that it is not to be neglected of vs.

2 This instruction that the Scripture teacheth, whereof we now speake, standeth chiefly vpon two parts. The first, that there be powred and brought into our mindes a loue of righteousnesse, to which otherwise we are of nature nothing enclined. The second, that there be a rule set out vnto vs, that may not suffer vs to goe out of the way in following righteousnesse. In commendation of righteousnesse it hath both verie many and verie good reasons: of which we haue here before in diuerse places spoken of some, and othersome we shall in this place briefly touch. At what foundation may it better begin, than when it putteth vs in minde that we must be holy, because our God is holy? For when we were scattered abroad like straying sheepe, and dispersed abroad in the maze of the world, he gathereth vs together againe, to ioyne vs in one flocke with himselfe. When we heare mention made of our ioyning with God, let vs remember that holinesse must be the bonde thereof. Not that by the merite of holinesse we come into common with him: (whereas rather we must first cleaue vnto him, that being endued with his holinesse, we may follow whether he calleth) but because it greatly perteineth to his glorie, that he haue no fellowship with wickednesse and vncleannesse. Therefore also it teacheth, that this is the end of our calling, which we ought alway to haue respect vnto, if we will answere God that calleth vs. For to what purpose was it, that we should be drawen out of the wickednesse and filthinesse of the world, if we giue our selues leaue al our life long to wallow in them still? Moreouer it also admonisheth vs that to the end we may be reckoned among the people of God, we must dwell in the holy city Hierusalem. Which as he hath hallowed to himselfe, so is it vnlawfull that it be vnholily prophaned by the vncleannesse of the inhabitants. From hence came these sayings, that they shall haue a place in the tabernacle of God that walke without spot, and studie to follow righteousnesse, &c. Because it is not meete that the Sanctuarie whereon he dwelleth should be like a stable full of filthinesse.

The first entrance vnto newnesse of life is the loue of holinesse, wherewith to conforme vs we are taught that God is holy.

Psal. 15. 1. Psal. 15. 2. & 23.

3 And the better to awake vs, it sheweth that God the father as he hath ioyned vs to himselfe in Christ, so hath printed an image for vs in him, after which he would haue vs to be fashioned. Now let them finde me a better order among the Philosophers, that thinke that the philosophie concerning maners, is in them onely orderly framed. They when they will excellentlie well exhort vs to vertue, bring nothing els but that we should liue agreeably to nature. But the Scripture bringeth her exhortation from the true welspring, when it not onely teacheth vs to refer our life to God, the author of it, to whom it is bond: but also when she hath taught that we are swarued out of kinde from the true originall and state of our creation, she immediately addeth, that Christ by whom we came againe into fauour with God, is set before vs for an example, that we should expresse the forme thereof in our life. What may a man require more effectuall than this one thing? Yea, what may a man require more than this onely thing? For if the Lord hath by adoption made vs children with this condition, that our life should resemble Christ the bond of our adoption: if we doe not giue and auow our selues to righteousnesse, we doe not onely with most wicked breach of allegeance depart from our Creator, but also we forsweare him to be our Sauiour. Then the Scripture taketh matter of exhortation out of all the benefites of God, which she rehearseth vnto vs, and all the parts of our saluation. And sheweth that sith God hath shewed himselfe a Father vnto vs, we are worthy to be condemned of extreeme vnthankfulnesse, if we doe not likewise in our behalfe shew our selues children vnto him. Sith Christ hath cleansed vs with the washing of his blood, and hath made vs partakers of this cleansing by baptisme, it is not seemely that we should be spotted with new filthinesse. Sith he hath grafted vs into his body, we must carefully take heede that we sprinkle not any spot or blot vpon vs that are his members. Sith he himselfe that is our head, is ascended into heauen, it behoooueth vs that laying away earthly affection, we doe with all our hart aspire to heauen-ward: Sith the holy Ghost hath dedicated vs temples to God, we must endeuour that Gods glory may be honourably set out by vs, and must not doe any thing whereby we may be prophaned with filthinesse of sinne: Sith both our Soule and our body are ordained to heauenly incorruption and an vnperishing crowne, we must diligently trauell, that the same may be kept pure and vncorrupted vnto the day of the Lord. These (I say) be the best laide foundations to build a mans life, and such as the like are not to be found among the Philosophers, which in commendation of vertue doe neuer climbe aboue the naturall dignitie of man.

Mala. 1.6. Ephe 5.1. 2.Ioh. 3.1. Ephe. 1.5. Heb. 10. 1. Cor. 6. 1. Pet. 1.15. Iohn 15.3. Ephe. 5. Col 3. 2. Cor. 6. 1. Thes. 5.15.

4 And here is a fit place to speake vnto them, that hauing nothing but the title and badge of Christ, yet would be named Christians. But with what face doe they boast of his holy name: sith none haue any fellowship with Christ, but they that haue receiued a true knowledge of him out of the word of the Gospell? But the Apostle saith, that all they haue not rightly learned Christ, that are not taught that they must cast away the olde man which is corrupted according to the desire of errour, and haue not put on Christ. Therefore it is prooued that they falsely, yea and wrongfully pretend the knowledge of Christ, although they can eloquently & roundly talke of the Gospel. For it is not a doctrine of tongue, but of life: and is not conceiued as other learnings be, with onely vnderstanding and memorie, but is then onely receiued when it possesseth the whole soule, and findeth a seate and place to hold it in the most inward affection of the hart. Therefore either let them cease, to the slaunder of God, to boast of that which they are not, or let them shew themselues not vnworthie schollers for Christ their master. We haue giuen the first place to the doctrine wherein our religion is contained, because our saluation beginneth at it: but the same must be powred into our hart, and passe into our maners, yea and transforme vs vnto it, that it be not vnfruitfull vnto vs. If the Philosophers doe iustly chase against them, and doe with shamefull reproch driue them from their company, that professing an arte that ought to be schoolmasters of life, doe turne it into a Sophisticall babling: with how much better reason shall we detest these trifling Sophisters, that are contented to role the Gospell vpon the top of their tongues, the effectuall working whereof ought to pearce into the innermost affections of the hart, to rest in the soule, and to alter the whole man a hundred times more, than the cold exhortation of Philosophers.

Ephe 4.

Though Christians be farre from attaining vnto, yet they ought to be earnest in following after the perfect righteousnesse which is set before them in the Gospell.

5 Yet doe I not require that the maners of a christian man sauour of nothing but the absolute Gospell: which neuertheless both were to be wished and we must indeuour vs toward it. But I do not so seuerely require a gospel-like perfection, that I would not acknowledge him for a christian that hath not yet attained vnto it. For so should all men be excluded from the Church, sith there is no man found that is not by a great space distant from it, and many haue hitherto but a litle way proceeded toward it, who yet should vniustly be cast away. What then? let that be set for the marke before our eies, to which alone all our endeuour may be directed. Let that be appointed the gole for vs to run and trauell vnto. For it is not lawful for thee so to make partitiō with God, to take vpon thee part of these things that are commanded thee in his word, and to leaue part at thine owne choise. For first of all he euery where commendeth integritie as the chiefe part of worshipping him: by which word he meaneth a pure simplicitie of minde that is without all deceitfull colour and faigning: against which a double heart is set as contrarie: as if it should be said, that the beginning of liuing vprightly is ſpirituall, when the inward affection of the minde is without faining dedicate to God to obſerue holineſſe and righteouſneſſe. But becauſe no man in this earthly priſon of the body hath ſo great ſtrength to haſt with ſuch freſhneſſe of running, as he perfectly ought to doe, and the greater number are ſo feeble, that with ſtaggering and halting, yea and creeping vpon the ground, they auaunce but ſlowly forward. Let vs euery one goe according to the meaſure of his little power, and proceede on our iourney begun. No man ſhall goe ſo vntowardly, but he ſhall euery day get ſome ground, though it be but little. Therefore let vs not ceaſe to trauell ſo, that we may continually proceede ſomewhat in the way of the Lord. And let vs not deſpaire vpon the ſlenderneſſe of our going forward, for howſoeuer the ſucceſſe anſwer not our deſire, yet we haue not loſt our labour when this day paſſeth yeſterday: ſo that with pure ſimplicitie we looke vnto our marke, and long toward the ende of our courſe, not ſoothingly flattering our ſelues, nor tenderly bearing with our owne euils, but with continuall endeuour trauelling to this, that we may ſtill become better than our ſelues, till we attaine to goodneſſe it ſelfe: which in deede we ſeeke for and follow all our life long: but we ſhall then onely attaine it, when being vnclothed of the weakeneſſe of the fleſh, we ſhall be receiued into the full fellowſhip thereof.

THE SEVENTH CHAPTER.

ALbeit that the law of the Lord haue a moſt aptly well diſpoſed order to frame a mans life, yet it ſeemed good to the heauenly Schoolemaſter to inſtruct men yet with a more exact trade to the ſame rule that he had ſet foorth in his law. And the beginning of that trade, is this: that it is the duety of the faithfull to yeeld their bodies to God a liuing, holy and accepeable ſacrifice vnto him: and that therein ſtandeth the true worſhipping of him. Hereupon is gathered occaſion to exhort men, that they doe not apply themſelues to the faſhion of this world, but be transformed in renewing of their minde, that they may prooue what the will of God is. Now this is a great thing, that we be conſecrate & dedicate to God: that we ſhould from thence foorth thinke, ſpeak, imagine, or doe nothing but to his glorie. For the thing that is conſecrate, cannot be applied to vnholy vſes, without great wrong done vnto him. If we be not our owne, but the Lords, it appeareth what errour is to be auoyded, and whereunto all the doings of our life are to be directed. We are not our owne: therefore let neither our owne reaſon nor our owne will beare rule in our counſels and doings. We are not our owne: therefore let vs not make this the ende for vs to tend vnto, to ſeeke that which may be expedient for vs according to the fleſh. We are not our own: therefore ſo much as we may, let vs forget our ſelues and all things that are our owne. On the other ſide, we are Gods: therefore let vs liue and die to him. We are Gods: therefore let his wiſedome and will gouerne all our doings. We are Gods: therefore let all the parts of our life tend toward him as their onely lawfull end. Oh how much hath he profited, that hauing learned that himſelfe is not his owne, hath taken from himſelfe the rule and gouernment of himſelfe to giue it to God? For as this is the moſt ſtrong working peſtilence to deſtroy men, that they obey themſelues: ſo it is the onely hauen of ſafetie, neither to know nor will any thing by himſelfe, but onely to follow God going before him. Let this therefore be the firſt ſtep, that man depart from himſelfe, that he may apply all the force of his wit to the obeying of the Lord. Obeying I call not onely that which ſtandeth in obedience of the word, but that whereby the mind of man, void from his owne ſenſualitie of fleſh, bendeth it ſelfe wholy to the will of Gods ſpirit. Of this transformation (which Paul calleth renewing of the mind) whereas it is the firſt entry into life, all the Philoſophers were ignorant. For they make only reaſon the gouerneſſe of man: they thinke ſhe only ought to be heard: finally to her onely they giue and aſſigne the rule of maners. But the Chriſtian Philoſophie biddeth her to giue place, and to yeeld and be ſubiect to the holy Ghoſt: ſo that man now may not liue himſelf, but beare Chriſt liuing & reigning in him.

Rom. 14. 8.

Ephe. 4. 23.

Gal. 1. 20.

The next degree of righteousnes to seeke those things that are of God sincerely for themselues not in any side respect of our owne.

2 Hereupon followeth also this other point, that we seeke not the things to be our owne, but those things that be according to the will of the Lord, and that make to the aduancement of his glory. This is also a proofe of great profiting, that in a maner forgetting our selues, and altogether leauing the regard of our selues, we trauell to employ our studie to God and his commandemenrs. For when the Scripture biddeth vs to leaue priuie regard of our selues, it doth not onely race out of our mindes the couetousnesse of hauing the greedy seeking for power and fauour of men: but also rooteth out ambition and all desire of worldly glory, and other more secret pestilences. Truely a Christian man must be so fashioned and disposed, to thinke throughout all his life, that he hath to doe with God. In this sort, as he shall examine all his doings by Gods will and iudgement: so he shall reuerently direct vnto him all the earnestly bent diligence of his minde. For he that hath learned to looke vpon God in all things that he hath to doe, is therewithall turned away from all vaine thoughts. This is that forsaking of our selues, which Christ euen from their first beginning of instruction so earnestly gaue in charge to his disciples: which when it once hath gotten possession in the hart, leaueth no place at all, first neither for pride, nor disdainfulnesse, nor vaine glorious boasting, then neither for couetise, nor filthy lust, nor riotousnesse, nor deintinesse, nor for other euils that are engendred of the loue of our selues. Contrariwise, whersoeuer it reigneth not, there either most filthy vices doe rage without shame, or if there be any spice of vertue, it is corrupted with peruerse desire of glory. For shew me a man, if thou canst, that vnlesse he haue forsaken himselfe according to the commandement of the Lord, wil of his owne free will vse goodnes among men. For all they that haue not been possessed with this feeling, if they haue followed vertue, they haue done it at the least for praises sake. And all the Philosophers that euer most all affirmed that vertue was to be desired for it selfes sake, were puffed vp with so great pride, that it appeared that they desired vertue for no other thing, but that they might haue matter to be proud vpon. But God is so nothing at all delighted, neither with those gapers for the peoples breath, nor with these swelling beastes, that he pronounceth that they haue alreadie receiued their reward in the world, and maketh harlots and Publicanes nearer to the kingdome of heauen, than them. And yet we haue not throughly declared with how many and how great stops man is hindred from that which is right, so long as he hath not forsaken himselfe. For it was truely said in times past, that there is a world of vices hidden in the Soule of man. And thou canst finde no other remedies, but denying thy selfe, and leauing regard of thy selfe, to bend thy minde to seeke those things that the Lord requireth of thee, and to seeke them therefore onely because they please him.

The parts of a well ordered life, set downe by Saint Paul. Tit. 2. 12.

3 In another place the same Paul doth more plainly, although shortly, go through all the parts of a well ordered life, saying: The grace of God that bringeth saluation vnto all men, hath appeared and teacheth vs, that we should deny all vngodlinesse, and worldly lusts, and that we should liue sober minded, righteously and godly in this present world, looking for the blessed hope and glorious appearing of the mighty God, and of our Sauiour Iesus Christ, which gaue himselfe for vs to redeeme vs from all vnrighteousnes, and to purge vs a peculiar people vnto himselfe feruently giuen vnto good works. For after that he hath set foorth the grace of God to encourage them, to make ready the way for vs to worship God, he taketh away two stops that doe most hinder vs, that is to say, vngodlinesse, whereunto we are naturally too much inclined, and Worldly desires, which extend further. And vnder the name of vngodlinesse, he not onely meaneth superstitions, but also comprehendeth all that disagreeth with the earnest feare of God. And worldly lusts are in effect as much as the affections of the flesh. Therefore he commandeth vs in respect of both the tables of the law, to put off our owne wit, and to forsake all that our owne reason and will informeth vs. And all the doings of our life he bringeth into three parts, sobrietie, righteousnesse, and godlinesse: of the which sobrietie without doubt signifieth as well chastitie and temperance, as a pure and measurable sparing vse of temporall things, and a patient sufferance of pouertie. Righteousnesse containeth all the dueties of equitie, to giue euery man his own. The third is Godlinesse, that seuereth vs from the defilings of the world, and with true holinesse ioyneth vs to God. These things, when they be knit together with an vnſeparable knot, make a full perfection. But for as much as nothing is more hard, than forſaking the reaſon of the fleſh, yea ſubduing and renouncing her deſires, to giue our ſelues to God and our brethren, and to ſtudie for an Angelike life in the filthy ſtate of the earth: therefore Paul, to looſe our mindes from all ſnares, calleth vs backe to the hope of bleſſed immortalitie, admoniſhing vs not to ſtriue in vaine: becauſe as Chriſt hath once appeared the Redeemer, ſo at his laſt comming, he ſhall ſhew the fruit of the ſaluation that he hath purchaſed. And thus he driueth away the entiſements that blinde vs, and make vs not to aſpire as we ought, to the heauenly glorie: yea and he teacheth that we muſt trauell as men being from home in this world, that the heauenly inheritance be not loſt or fall away from vs.

4 Now in theſe words we perceiue, that the forſaking of our ſelues hath partly reſpect to men, and partly, yea chiefly to God. For whereas the Scripture biddeth vs ſo to behaue our ſelues with men, that we preferr them before vs in honor, that we faithfully employ our ſelues wholy to procure their commodities: therefore it giueth ſuch commandements as our minde is not able to receiue, but firſt being voide of naturall ſenſe. For (with ſuch blindneſſe we run all into loue of our ſelues) euery man thinketh himſelfe to haue a iuſt cauſe to aduance himſelfe, and to deſpiſe all other in compariſon of himſelfe. If God haue giuen vs any good gift, by and by bearing our ſelues bold thereof, we lift vp our courage, and not onely ſwell, but in a maner burſt with pride. The vices wherewith we abound we doe both diligently hide from other, and to our ſelues we flatteringly faigne them light and ſlender, and ſometime embrace them for vertues. And if the ſame good gifts, which we praiſe in our ſelues, or better doe appeare in other, leaſt we ſhould be compelled to giue place to them, we doe with our enuiouſneſſe deface them and finde fault with them. If there be any faultes in them, we are not contented ſeuerely and ſharply to marke it, but we alſo odiouſly amplifie it. Hereupon groweth that inſolencie, that euery one of vs, as though he were priuiledged from the common eſtate, would be higher than the reſt, and careleſſly and proudly ſet light by euery man, or deſpiſe them as inferiours. The poore yeeld to the rich, baſe people to gentlemen, ſeruants to their maſters, vnlearned to the learned: but there is no man that doth not nouriſh within himſelfe ſome opinion of excellencie. So euery man in flattering himſelf, beareth a certaine kingdom in his breſt. For preſumptuouſly taking vpon them ſomewhat whereby to pleaſe themſelues, they iudge vpon the wits and maners of other men. But if they come to contention, there burſteth out their poyſon. For many doe make a ſhew of great meekeneſſe, ſo long as they finde all things gentle and louely: but how many a one is there that keepeth that continuall courſe of modeſtie, when he is pricked and ſtirred to anger? And there is no remedie hereof, but that the moſt hurtfull peſtilence of loue, of ſoueraigntie and ſelfeloue be rooted out of the bottome of their hearts, as it is rooted out by the doctrine of the Scripture. For there we are ſo taught, that we muſt remember that the good gifts that God hath giuen vs, are not our owne good things, but the free gifts of God, whereof if any be proud, they bewray their owne vnthankfulneſſe. Who maketh thee to excell? Paul ſaith, if thou haſt receiued all things, why doeſt thou boaſt as if they were not giuen thee: Then, that we muſt with continuall reknowledging of our faultes, call our ſelues backe to humilitie. So ſhall remaine in vs nothing to be proude vpon, but there ſhall be much matter to abaſe our ſelues. Againe, we are commanded, whatſoeuer gifts of God we ſee in other men, ſo to reuerence and eſteeme thoſe gifts, that we alſo honour thoſe men in whom they be. For it were a great lewdneſſe for vs, to take from them that honor, that God hath vouchſafed to giue them. As for their faults, we are taught to wink at them, not to cheriſh them with flattering, but that we ſhould not by reaſon of thoſe faults triumph againſt them, to whom we ought to beare good will and honour. So ſhall it come to paſſe, that with what man ſoeuer we haue to doe, we ſhall behaue our ſelues not onely temperately and modeſtly, but alſo gently and friendly. As a man ſhall neuer come any other way to true meekeneſſe, but if he haue a heart endued with abaſing of himſelfe, and reuerencing of other.

The deniall of our ſelues hath relation partly to men but chiefly to God. Rom. 12.10. Phil. 2.3.

5 Now how hard it is, for thee to doe thy dutie in ſeeking the profit of thy neighbour? Thou ſhalt herein labour in vaine, vnleſſe thou depart from regard of thy ſelfe, and

and in a maner put off thy ſelfe. For how canſt thou performe theſe things that Paul teacheth to be the workes of charitie, vnleſſe thou forſake thy ſelfe to giue thy ſelfe wholy to other? Charitie (ſaith he) is patient and gentle, not proud, not diſdainfull, enuieth not, ſwelleth not, ſeeketh not her owne, is not angrie, &c. If this one thing be required, that we ſeeke not the things that are our owne, we ſhall doe no ſmall violence to nature, which ſo bendeth vs to the onely loue of our ſelues, that it doth not eaſily ſuffer vs negligently to paſſe ouer our ſelues and our owne things, to watch for other mens commodities, yea to depart with our owne right to reſigne it to another. But the Scripture, to lead vs thither as it were by the hand, warneth vs that whatſoeuer gracious gifts we obtaine of the Lord, they are committed vnto vs vpon this condition, that they ſhould be beſtowed to the common benefit of the Church: and that therefore the true vſe of all Gods graces is a liberall and bountifull communicating of them to other. There can be no certaine rule, nor more forceable exhortation could be deuiſed for the keeping of the ſame, than when we be taught that all the good gifts that we haue, are things of God deliuered, committed to our truſt vpon this condition, that they ſhould be diſpoſed to the benefit of our neighbours. But the Scripture goeth yet further, when it compareth them to the powers wherewith the members of mans body are endued. No member hath his power for himſelfe, nor applieth it to his priuate vſe: but powreth it abroade into the other members of the ſame bodie, and taketh no profit thereof, but ſuch as proceedeth from the common commoditie of the whole bodie. So whatſoeuer a godly man is able to doe, he ought to be able to doe it for his brethren, in prouiding none otherwiſe priuately for himſelfe, but ſo that his mind be bent to the common edification of the Church. Let this therefore be our order for kindneſſe and doing good: that whatſoeuer God hath beſtowed vpon vs, whereby we may help our neighbour, we are the Bailifes thereof, and bound to render account of the diſpoſing of it. And that the onely right diſpoſing is that which is tried by the rule of loue. So ſhall it come to paſſe, that we ſhall alway not onely ioyne the trauell for other mens commoditie with the care of our owne profit, but alſo ſet it before the care of our owne. And that we ſhould not happen to be ignorant that this is the true lawe of diſpoſing all the gifts that we receiue of God, he hath in the old time ſet the ſame lawe euen in the ſmalleſt gifts of his liberalitie. For he commanded the firſt fruits of corne to be offered vnto him, by which the people might teſtifie that it was vnlawfull for them to take any fruit of the goods that were not firſt conſecrate to him. If the gifts of God be ſo onely then ſanctified vnto vs, when we haue with our owne hand dedicated them to the author thereof, it is euident that it is an vntrue abuſe thereof that doth not ſauour of ſuch dedication. But it ſhall be vaine for thee to goe about to enrich the Lord with communicating to him of thy things. Therefore ſith thy liberalitie cannot extend vnto him, as the Prophet ſaith, thou muſt vſe it toward his Saints that are in earth. Therefore almes are compared to holy oblations, that they may now be correſpondent to theſe of the law.

others except we haue firſt denied our ſelues. And our dutie it is to profit other men with whatſoeuer God hath benefited vs.

6 But that we ſhould not be wearie with doing good (which otherwiſe muſt needs come quickly to paſſe) that other thing muſt be adioyned which the Apoſtle ſpeaketh of, that charitie is patient and not moued to anger. The Lord commandeth to do good to all vniuerſally, of whom a great part are moſt vnworthie, if they be conſidered by their owne deſeruing. But heere the Scripture helpeth with a very good meane, when it teacheth that we muſt not haue reſpect what men deſerue of themſelues, but that the image of God is to be conſidered in all men, to which we owe all honor and loue. But the ſame is moſt diligently to be marked in them of the houſhold of faith, in ſo much as it is in them renued and reſtored by the ſpirit of Chriſt. Therefore whatſoeuer man thou light vpon, that needeth thy helpe, thou haſt no cauſe to withdraw thy ſelfe from doing him good. If thou ſay that he is a ſtranger: but the Lord hath giuen him a marke, that ought to be familiar vnto thee, by the reaſon that he forbiddeth thee to deſpiſe thine owne fleſh. If thou ſay that he is baſe and naught woorth: but the Lord ſheweth him to be ſuch a one, to whom he hath vouchſafed to giue the beauty of his image. If thou ſay that thou oweſt him nothing for any thing that he hath done for thee: but God hath ſet him as it were in his place in reſpect of whom, thou knoweſt ſo many and ſo great beneſties wherewith he hath bound thee vnto him. If thou ſay that he is vnworthie that thou ſhouldeſt labour any thing at all for his ſake: but the image of God whereby he is commended vnto thee, to worthy that thou ſhouldeſt giue thy ſelfe and all that thou haſt vnto it. But if he haue not onely deſerued no good at thy hand, but alſo prouoked thee with wrongs and euill doings: euen this is no iuſt cauſe why thou ſhouldeſt ceaſe both to loue him and to doe for him the dutifull workes of loue. Thou wilt ſay, he hath farre otherwiſe deſerued of me. But what hath the Lord deſerued? Which when he commaundeth thee to forgiue all wherein he hath offended thee, truely he willeth the ſame to be imputed to himſelfe. Truly this is that onely way to come to that which is vtterly againſt the nature of man; much more is it hard for man, I meane, to loue them that hate vs, to recompence euill with doing good, to render bleſſings for reproches: if we remember that we muſt not conſider the malice of men, but looke vpon the image of God in them, which defacing and blotting out their faults, doth with the beautie and dignitie of it ſelfe allure vs to imbrace it.

Matth. 6. 24. & 18. 35.

Luk. 17. 3. Matth. 5. 44.

7 Therefore this mortification ſhall then onely take place in vs, when we performe the duties of charitie. But it is not he that perfourmeth them, that onely doth all the dutifull workes of charitie, although he leaue none of them vndone, but he doth them of a ſyncere affection of loue. For it may happen, that a man may fullie performe to all men all that he oweth, ſo much as concerneth outward duties: and yet he may be farre from the true performing of it. For you may ſee ſome that would ſeeme very liberall, which yet doe giue nothing but either with pride of looke, or with churliſhneſſe of words they vpbraid it. And we be come to ſuch wretchednеſſe in this vnhappie world, that almoſt no almes are giuen of any men, or at leaſt of the moſt part of men, without reproching. Which peruerſeneſſe ſhould not haue beene tollerable among the very heathen. For of Chriſtians is ſomewhat more required then to ſhew a cheerefulneſſe in countenance, and make their doings louely with gentleneſſe of words. Firſt they muſt take vpon them the perſonage of him whom they ſee to neede their helpe, and then ſo pittie their caſe, as if themſelues did feele and ſuffer it: ſo that they may be caried with feeling of mercie and gentleneſſe, euen as they would be to helpe themſelues. He that ſhall come ſo minded to helpe his brethren, will not onely not defile his doings with any arrogancie or vpbraiding, but alſo neither will deſpiſe his brother to whom he doth good as one needing his helpe, nor treade him vnder foote as one bound vnto him: no more than we vſe to reproch a ſicke member, for eaſing whereof the whole bodie laboureth, or to thinke it ſpecially bound to the other members, becauſe it hath drawen more helpe vnto it than it hath recompenſed. For it is thought that the common interpartning of duties betweene members of one bodie, hath no free kind of gift, but rather that it is a payment of that which being due by the law of nature, it were monſtrous to denie. And by this reaſon it ſhall follow, that he may not thinke himſelfe diſcharged that hath performed one kinde of duetie, as it is commonly vſed, that when a rich man hath giuen any thing of his owne, he leaueth other charges to other men, as not belonging to him. But rather euery man ſhall thinke thus with himſelfe, that he is altogether debter to his neighbours, and that he muſt determine none other end of vſing his liberalitie, but when abilitie faileth, which how large ſoeuer it be, muſt be meaſured by the rule of charitie.

To do the works of Charitie it is nothing, except they be done charitably.

8 Now let vs more fully declare the principall part of forſaking our ſelues, which wee ſaide to haue reſpect to God. Wee haue ſaid much of it alreadie, which it were ſuperfluous to rehearſe againe: it ſhall be ſufficient to intreate of it ſo farre as it frameth vs to quietneſſe of minde and ſufferance. Firſt therefore in ſeeking the commoditie or quietneſſe of this preſent life, the Scripture calleth vs hereunto, that reſigning vs and our things to the Lords will, we would yeeld vnto him the affections of our heart to be tamed and ſubdued. To couet wealth and honors, to compaſſe authoritie, to heape vp riches, to gather together all ſuch follies as ſerue for royaltie and pompe, our luſt is outragious, and our greedineſſe infinite. On the other ſide of pouertie, ignobilitie, and baſe eſtate, we haue a maruellous feare and maruellous hatred, that mooue vs to trauell by all meanes to eſchue them. Hereby a man may ſee, how vnquiet a minde they haue, how many ſhifts they attempt, with what ſtudies they wearie their life, that that frame their life after their owne deuise: to attaine those things that their affection of ambition or couetousnesse requireth, and on the other side to escape pouertie and baseneſſe. Therefore the godly must keepe this way, that they be not entangled with such snares. First let them not either desire, or hope for, or thinke vpon any other meane of prospering, than by the blessing of the Lord: and therefore let them safely and boldly rest themselues vpon it. For howsoeuer the flesh thinke it selfe sufficient of her selfe, when she either trauelleth by her owne diligence, or endeoureth with her owne studie, or is holpen by the fauour of men, to the attayning of honour and wealth: yet it is certaine, that all these things are nothing, and that we shall nothing preuaile with wit or trauell, but in so much as the Lord shall prosper both. But on the other side his onely blessing findeth away through all stops, to make all things proceede with vs to a ioyfull and luckie end. Then howsoeuer we may most of all obtaine any glorie or wealth without it (as we daily see the wicked to get heapes of great honors and riches) yet forasmuch as they vpon whom resteth the curse, doe feele no parcell of felicitie, we can obtaine nothing without his blessing that shall not turne vs to euill. And it is not at all to be coueted, that maketh men more miserable.

He which knoweth himselfe and his estate to depend wholly vpon the blessing of God, will neither seek to aduance himselfe by euill meanes, nor immoderately desire to be aduanced, nor impatiently murmure at any thing which happeneth.

9 Therefore if we beleeue that all the meane of prosperous successe and such as is to be wished, consisteth in the onely blessing of God, which being absent, all kindes of miserie and calamitie must happen vnto vs: this remaineth also, that we doe not greedily endeuor to wealth and honors standing vpon our owne fineneſſe of wit or diligence, not leaning to the fauour of men, nor trusting vpon a vaine imagination of fortune, but that we alway looke vnto the Lord, to be lead by his guiding to whatsoeuer lot he hath prouided. So first it shall come to passe, that we shall not violently rush to the catching of riches and inuading of honors, by wrong, by guile and euill craftie meanes, or extortion with doing iniurie to our neighbours, but shall onely follow those fortunes that may not leade vs from innocencie. For who may hope for the helpe of Gods blessing among fraudes, extortions, and other suttle meanes of wickedneſſe? For as Gods blessing followeth no man but him that thinketh purely, and doth rightly, so it calleth backe all them of whom it is desired, from crooked thoughts, and corrupt dooings. Then we shal be brideled that we burne not with vnmeasurable desire of growing rich, nor ambitiously gape for honors. For with what face may a man trust to be holpen of God, to obtaine those things that he desireth against his word? For God forbid that God should giue the helpe of his blessing to that which he curseth with his owne mouth. Last of all, if it succeede not according to our wish and hope, yet we shall be restrained from impatience, and from cursing our state whatsoeuer it be: because we know that that is to murmure against God, at whose will riches and pouertie, baseneſſe and honors are disposed. Briefly, he that resteth himselfe in such sort as is aforesaid vpon the blessing of God, neither will by euill subtleties hunt for those things that men are wont outragiously to couet, by which craftie meanes he thinketh that he shall nothing preuaile: nor if any thing happen prosperously will impute it to himselfe, and to his owne diligence, endeuour or to fortune, but will assigne it to God the Author. But if while other mens estates doe flourish, he goe but slenderly forward, yea or slide backward, yet he will beare his ill fortune with greater quietneſſe and moderation of minde, than a prophane man will beare a meanely good successe, which is not altogether so good as he desired: because he hath a comfort wherein he may more quietly rest, than vpon the highest top of wealth and authoritie: because he accounteth that his things are ordered by God as is auailable for his saluation. So we see that Dauid was minded, and yeeldeth himselfe to be ruled by God, he declareth himselfe to be like to a weined childe, and that he walketh not in high things or maruellous aboue himselfe.

The quiet contentment of minde which groweth vnto men in the manifold casuall miseries of this life, if they be

10 And the godly mindes ought to haue that quietneſſe and sufferance not onely consisting in this behalfe: but also it must extend to all chaunces whereunto our present life is subiect. Therefore no man hath rightly forsaken himselfe, but he hath so resigned himselfe vp wholy to the Lord, that he suffereth all the parts of his life to be gouerned by his will. He that is so framed in minde, whatsoeuer happen, will neither thinke himselfe miserable, nor will with enuiousneſſe against God complaine of his fortune. How necessarie this affection is, shall hereby appeare, if you consider to how many chances we be subiect. Diuers kinds of diseases doe trouble vs, sometime the pestilence cruelly reigneth, sometime we are sharply vexed with calamities of warre, sometime frost or haile deuouring the hope of the yeare, bringeth barrennesse, that driueth vs to dearth: sometime our wife, parents, children, or kinsfolks are taken away by death, our house is consumed with fire: these be the things at chauncing whereof men curse their life, detest the day of their birth, haue Heauen and Light in execration, murmure against God, and (as they be eloquent in blasphemies) accuse him of vniustice and crueltie: But a faithfull man must euen in these chances behold the mercifull kindnesse and fatherly tendernesse of God. Therefore whether he see his house destroyed, his kinsfolke slaine, yet he will not therefore cease to praise God, but rather will turne himself to this thought: Yet the Grace of the Lord that dwelleth in my house will not leaue it desolate. Or if when his corne is blasted or bitten, or consumed with frosts, or beaten downe with haile, he see famine at hand, yet he will not despaire, nor speake hatefully of God, but will remaine in this confidence, We are yet in the Lords protection, and sheep brought vp in his pastures: he therefore will finde vs foode euen in the extremest barrennesse. Or if he be troubled with sickenesse, euen then he will not be discouraged with bitternesse of sorrow to burst out into impatience and quarrell thus with God: but considering the righteousnesse and lenitie in Gods correction, he will call himselfe backe to patience. Finally whatsoeuer shall happen, because he knoweth it ordained by the hand of God, he will take it with a well pleased and thankefull minde, least he should stubbornely resist his authoritie, into whose power he hath yeelded himselfe and all his. Therefore let that fooliſh and most miserable comfort of the heathen be farre from a Christian mans heart, which to strengthen their mindes against aduersities, did impute the same to fortune, with whom they counted it fooliſh to be angrie, because she was blinde and vnaduised, that blindly wounded both the deseruing and vndeseruing. For contrariwise this is the rule of godlinesse, that the onely hand of God is the iudge and gouernesse of both fortunes, and that it runneth not forward with vnaduised sudden rage, but with most orderly iustice dealeth among vs both good things and euill.

once assured not that fortune doth blindly tosse, but God prouidently dispose their whole estate.

Psal. 79. 13.

THE EIGHT CHAPTER.

BVt a godly minde must yet climbe vp higher, euen to that whereunto Christ calleth his disciples, that euery one take vp his crosse. For all whom the Lord hath chosen and vouchsafed to receiue into his company, must prepare themselues to a hard, trauelsome and vnquiet life, and full of many and diuers kinds of incommodities. So it is the will of the heauenly Father, to exercise them in such sort, that he may haue a true proofe of them that be his. Beginning at Christ, his first begotten Sonne, he proceedeth with this order toward all his children. For whereas Christ was the best beloued sonne aboue the rest, and in whom the Fathers mind was fully pleased, yet we see how he was not tenderly and daintily handled: so that it may be truely said, that he was not onely exercised with a perpetuall crosse so long as he dwelled in earth, but that all his life was nothing else but a kind of continuall crosse. The Apostle sheweth the cause thereof to be, that it behooued that he should learne obedience by those things that he suffred. Why then should we priuiledge our selues from that estate, whereunto it behooued Christ our head to be subiect, specially sith he became subiect thereunto for our cause, to shew vs an example of patience in himselfe? Therefore the Apostle saith, that this is the appointed end of all the children of God, to be fashioned like vnto him. Whereupon also in hard and sharp chaunces, which are reckoned aduersities and euils, ariseth a great comfort vnto vs, that we communicate with the suffrings of Christ: that as he entred out of a maze of all troubles into the heauenly glory, so we may by diuers tribulations be brought into the same glory. For so saith Paul himselfe, that when we learne the communicating of his afflictions, we do also conceiue the power of his resurrection: and when we are fashioned like vnto death, we are so prepared to the fellowship of his

He which forsaketh himselfe must arme himselfe to indure a trauelsome estate of life, wherein there is notwithstanding this comfort, we go no other way than Christ himselfe hath troden before vs.

his glorious rising againe. How much may this auaile to asswage all the painefulnesse of the crosse, that the more we are afflicted with aduersities, so much the more sure is our fellowship with Christ confirmed? by communicating whereof, our sufferings are not onely made blessed vnto vs, but also do much help vs to the furtherance of our saluation.

Affliction necessarie for vs not onely as for Christ to testifie our obedience vnto God, but further also to bring vs to a sensible feeling of our owne imbecilitie and weakenesse.

2 Beside that, our Lord had no neede to take vpon him to beare the crosse, but to testifie and proue his obedience to his Father: but wee for diuers causes haue neede to leade our life vnder a continuall crosse. First (as we be naturally bent to attribute all things to our flesh) vnlesse our weakenesse be shewed vs as it were before our eies, we do easily esteeme our owne strength aboue due measure, and doubt not that whatsoeuer happen, it will continue vnbroken and vnouercome against all hard assaults. Whereby we are caried into a fooliſh and vaine confidence of flesh, and then trusting thereupon, we stubbornly waxe proud against God himselfe, as though our owne powers without his grace did suffice vs. This arrogancy he can no way better beate downe, than when he prooueth vnto vs by experience, not onely how feeble, but also how fraile we be. Therefore he afflicteth vs either with shame, or pouertie, or losse of children, or sickneſſe, or other calamities, which we being vnable to beare in respect of our selues, do by and by sinke downe vnder them. Being so humbled we learne to call vpon his strength, which onely maketh vs to stand vpright vnder the heauie burden of afflictions. Yea the most holy, how well soeuer they know that they stand by the grace of God and not by their owne force, yet are too much assured of their owne strength and constancie, vnlesse by the triall of the crosse, he bring them into a more inward knowledge of themselues. The slothfulnesse crept into Dauid: I said in my rest, I shall neuer be mooued, Lord, thou hadst stablished in thy good pleasure a strength to my hill, thou hiddest away thy face, I was striken. For he confesseth that with sluggishnesse in prosperitie his senses were dulled, that not regarding the grace of God, vpon which he should haue hanged, he leaned vnto himselfe, to promise himselfe perpetuall continuance. If this chanced to so great a Prophet: which of vs ought not to be fearefull, that we may be heedfull? Therefore whereas in prosperitie they flatter themselues with opinion of a greater constancie and patience, when they are once humbled with aduersitie, they learne that their former opinion was but hypocrisie. The faithfull (I say) being admonished by such examples of their diseases, doe thereby profit to humilitie, that being vnclothed of the wrongfull confidence of the flesh, they may resort to the grace of God. And where they are once come to his grace, they feele the presence of Gods strength, wherein is aboundantly sufficient succour for them.

Psal. 30. 8.

Affliction by teaching vs how feeble we are of our selues, causeth to rest only vpon God. This breedeth patience, whereby experience groweth of Gods vpholding them that relie vpō him, which triall of his goodnesse in things past, stablisheth the credit of his truth for things to come, and increaseth hope. Rom. 5. 3.

3 And this is it that Paul teacheth, that by troubles is engendred patience, by patience proofe. For whereas God hath promised the faithfull that he will be present with them in troubles, they feele the same to be true, when they stand patiently being vpholden by his hand, which by their owne strength they were not able to do. Patience therefore bringeth a proofe by experience to the holy ones, that God when neede requireth, will indeede performe the help that he hath promised. And thereby also their hope is confirmed: forasmuch as it were too much vnthankfulnesse not to looke for in time to come, the same truth of God that they had already by experience prooued to be constant and sure. We see now how many good things do come vnto vs in one knot by the crosse. For ouerthrowing the opinion that we falsly presume of our owne strength, and discloſing our hypocrisie that delighteth vs, it shaketh away the hurtfull confidence of the flesh, and teacheth vs being so humbled, to rest vpon God onely, by which it commeth to passe, that we neither be oppressed nor fall downe. And after victorie followeth hope, insomuch as the Lord in performing that which he hath promised, stablisheth the credite of his truth for time to come. Truely, although there were no more reasons but these, it appeareth how much the exercise of the crosse is necessarie for vs. For it is a matter of no small importance, to haue the blinde loue of thy selfe wiped away, that thou mayst well know thine owne weakenesse. To feele thine owne weakenesse, that thou mayst learne to distrust thy selfe: to distrust thy selfe, that thou mayst remoue thy confidence from thy selfe vnto God, to rest with confidence of hart vpon God, that being vpholden by his help, thou mayst continue vnouercome to the last last end: to stand fast by his grace, that thou mayst vnderstand that he is true in his promises: to know by proofe the truth of his promises, that thy hope may be strengthened thereby.

4 The Lord hath also an other end of afflicting his, to trie their patience, and instruct vs to obedience. Not that they can vse any obedience toward him, other than the same that he giueth them: but so it pleaseth him by open examples to make approoued by witnesses, and to set foorth the graces that he hath bestowed vpon his holy ones, that they should not lie idlely hid within them. And therfore in bringing foorth into open shew the strength of sufferance and constancie, wherewith he hath furnished his seruants, it is said that he trieth their patience. And from hence came these sayings: that God tempted Abraham, and had proofe of his godlinesse, by this, that he refused not to offer vp in sacrifice his owne and onely sonne. Therefore Peter teacheth, that our faith is so prooued in troubles, as gold is tried in a fornace. And who can say that it is not expedient, that the most noble gift of patience, which a faithfull man hath receiued of his God, should be brought foorth into vse, that it may be made certainely knowen and manifest? For otherwise men will not esteeme it as it is worthie. Now if God himselfe doth rightfully when he ministreth matter to stir vp the vertues that he hath giuen to his faithfull, that they should not lie hidden, yea lie vnprofitable and perish: then is there good reason of the afflictions of the holy ones, without which their patience should be nothing. I say also that by the crosse they are instructed to obedience, because they are so taught to liue not after their owne wish, but after the will of God. Truely if all things should flow vnto them after their owne mind, they would not know what it were to follow God. And Seneca rehearseth that this was an old Prouerbe, when they exhorted any man to suffer aduersities, Follow God. By which they declared, that then only man truely entred vnder the yoke of God, when he yeelded his hand and backe to Gods correction. Now if it be most righteous, that we should shew our selues in all things obedient to the heauenly Father, then we ought not to refuse, that he should by all meanes accustome vs to yeeld obedience vnto him.

By affliction God bringeth foorth the vertues of his Saints, which before lay hid, into open shew, and also traineth them in true obedience. Gen.12.1. 1.Pet.1.7.

De vita beata cap.15.

5 But yet we perceiue not how necessarie this obedience is for vs, vnlesse we doe also consider, how wanton our flesh is to shake off the yoke of God, so soone as it hath beene but a little while daintily and tenderly handled. The same happeneth vnto it that chanceth to stubborne horses, which if they be a few daies pampred idlely, they cannot afterward for fearcenesse be tamed, neither doe know the rider, to whose gouernement they somewhat before obeyed. And this is continuall in vs that God complaineth to haue been in the people of Israell, that being well fed and couered with fatnesse, we kicke against him that fed and nourished vs. The liberalitie of God should indeed haue allured vs to consider and loue his goodnesse, but for as much as our euill nature is such, that we are alway corrupted with his tender vsage, it is more than necessarie for vs, to be restrained by some discipline, that we run not outragiously into such a stubborne wantonnesse. So that we should not grow fierce with vnmeasurable abundance of riches, that we should not waxe proud being lifted vp with honors, that we should not become insolent, being puffed vp with other good gifts, either of the soule, bodie, or fortune, the Lord himselfe, as he foreseeth it to be expedient, preuenteth it, and with the remedie of the crosse subdueth and bridleth the fiercenesse of our flesh, and that diuers waies, so much as is healthfull for euery man. For all are not alike sicke of all one diseases, or do alike need of hard healing. And thereupon is to be seene how some are exercised with one kinde of crosse, and some with another. But whereas the heauenly Phisition handleth some more gently, and purgeth some with sharper remedies, when he meaneth to prouide for the health of all: yet he leaueth none free or vntouched, because he knoweth all without exception to be diseased.

Deut.33.15.

6 Moreouer, the most mercifull father needeth not onely to preuent our weakenesse, but many times to correct our passed offences. Therefore so oft as we be afflicted, the remembrance of our forepassed life ought by and by to enter into our mind: so without doubt we shall finde that we haue done somewhat worthy of chastisement. Yet we ought not chiefly to ground our exhortation to patience vpon the acknowledging of sinne. For the Scripture ministreth vs a farre better consideration, when it saith,

1.Cor 11.8. faith, that the Lord correcteth vs with aduersities, that we should not be damned with this world. Therefore we ought euen in the very sharpnesse of tribulations to acknowledge the kindnesse and goodnesse of our father toward vs, forasmuch as euen then he ceaseth not to further our saluation. For he doth afflict, not to destroy or kill vs, but rather to deliuer vs from the damnation of the world. That thought shall leade vs to

Prou.3.11. that, which the Scripture teacheth in another place: My sonne, refuse not the Lords correction, nor be weary when thou shalt be rebuked of him. For whom the Lord loueth, he correcteth, and embraceth him as a father doth his childe. When we know his rod to be the rod of a father, is it not our dutie rather to shew our selues obedient children and willing to learne, than with obstinacie to doe like desperate men, that are hardned with euill doings? The Lord leeseth vs, vnlesse he call vs backe by correction when we are fallen away from him: so that the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues

Heb.12.8. rightly saith that we are bastards, and not children if we be out of correction. Therefore we are most froward, if we cannot suffer him when he declareth his good will, and the care that he hath for our saluation. This the Scripture teacheth to be the difference betweene the vnbeleeuers and the faithfull, that the vnbeleeuers as the bondslaues of a rooted and hardened wickednesse, are made the worse and more obstinate with whipping: the faithfull, like children hauing an honest freedome of nature, doe thereby profit to repentance. Now must thou choose of whether number thou wilt be. But because I haue spoken of this matter in another place, I am contented to touch it briefly, and so will make an end.

When the cause of our suffering is righteousnesse it is not a crosse, but a gaine to suffer.

7 Moreouer it is a singular comfort, when we suffer persecution for righteousnesse. For then we ought to thinke, how great an honor God vouchsafeth to grant vs, that he so garnisheth vs with the peculiar marke of his souldiers. I meane that they suffer persecution for righteousnesse, not onely that suffer for defense of the Gospell, but also that are troubled for any defence of righteousnesse. Whether therefore in maintaining the truth of God against the lies of Sathan, or in taking in hand the defense of good men and innocents against the wrongs of the wicked, we be driuen to runne into the displeasure and hatred of the world, whereby our life or goods, or estimation, may come in danger: let it not be greeuous or loathsome vnto vs to employ our selues for God, Matth.5.15. or let vs not thinke our selues miserable in those things in which he hath with his owne mouth pronounced vs blessed. Pouertie indeede, if it be considered in it selfe, is miserable: likewise banishment, contemptuous estate, prisonment, shame: Finally, death is the vttermost of all calamities. But when the fauour of our God breatheth vpon vs, there is none of all these things, but it turneth to our felicitie. Therefore let vs rather be content with the testimonie of Christ, than with the false estimation of the flesh. So shall it come to passe, that we shall reioyce as the Apostles did, when God shall account vs woorthie to suffer reproch for his name. For why? If we being innocent, and knowing our selues cleere in our consciences, are by the naughtie dealing of wicked men spoyled of our goods: we are indeede brought to pouertie thereby among men, but so riches truly do grow vnto vs in heauen before God. If we be thrust out of our houses, we are the more inwardly receiued into the houshold of God. If we be vexed and despised, we take so much the deeper rootes in Christ. If we be noted with reproches and shame, we are in so much the more honorable place in the kingdome of God. If we be slaine, so is the entrie made open for vs vnto blessed life. Let vs be ashamed to esteeme lesse these things, vpon which the Lord hath set so great a price, than shadowish and fickle enticing pleasures of present life.

* Patience doth not extinguish the feeling of that bitternesse which is in trouble, but vanquish the troublesome vexation which is felt.
1.Pet.4.12.
1.Tim.4.10.
2.Cor.6.8.

8 * Sith therfore the Scripture doth with these and like admonitions giue sufficient comfort for the shames or calamities that we suffer for defense of righteousnesse, we are too much vnthankfull if we do not gladly and cheerefully receiue them at the Lords hand, specially sith this is the kinde of crosse, most properly belonging to the faithfull, whereby Christ will be glorified in vs. As also Peter teacheth. But it is more greeuous to gentle natures to suffer shame than a hundred deaths: therefore Paul expressly admonisheth that we shall not onely suffer persecutions, but also reproches, because wee trust in the liuing God. As in another place he teacheth vs after his example to walke through slaunder and good report. Yet there is not required of vs such a cheere-a cheerefulneſſe as may take away all feeling of bitterneſſe and ſorrow, or elſe the patience of the holie ones in the croſſe were no patience, vnleſſe they ſhould be both tormented with ſorrow and vexed with griefe. If there were no hardneſſe in pouertie, no paine in ſickneſſe, no griefe in ſhame, no horrour in death, what valiantneſſe or temperance were it to beare them indifferently? But when euery one of theſe doth with the naturall bitterneſſe thereof bite the hearts of vs all, herein doth the valiantneſſe of a faithfull man ſhew it ſelfe, if being aſſaied with the feeling of ſuch bitterneſſe, how grieuouſly ſoeuer he be troubled with it, yet with valiantly reſiſting he ouercommeth it, his patience vttereth it ſelfe herein, if being ſharply prouoked, he is yet ſo bridled with the feare of God, that he burſteth not out into any diſtemper. His cheerefulneſſe appeareth herein, if being wounded with ſadneſſe and ſorrow, he reſteth vpon the ſpirituall comfort of God.

9 This conflict, which the faithfull doe ſuſtaine againſt the naturall feeling of ſorrow, while they ſtudie for patience and temperance, Paul hath verie well deſcribed in theſe wordes. We are put to diſtreſſe in all things, but we are not made ſorowfull: we labour, but we are not left deſtitute: we ſuffer perſecution, but we are not forſaken in it: we are throwen downe, but we periſh not. You ſee how to beare the croſſe patiently, is not to be altogether aſtoniſhed, and without all feeling of ſorrow: as the Stoickes in old time did fooliſhly deſcribe a valiant harted man, to be ſuch a one, as putting off all nature of man, was alike moued in proſperitie and in aduerſitie, in ſorrowfull and ioyfull eſtate, yea ſuch a one as like a ſtone was mooued with nothing: and what haue they profited with this high wiſedome? Forſooth they haue painted out ſuch an image of wiſedome as neuer was found, and neuer can hereafter be among men: But rather while they coueted to haue too exact and preciſe a patience, they haue taken away all the vſe of patience out of mans life. And at this day alſo among Chriſtians there are new Stoickes, that reckon it a fault not onely to grone and weepe, but alſo to be ſad and carefull. But theſe ſtrange concluſions doe commonly proceede from idle men, which buſiyng themſelues rather in ſpeculation than doing, can doe nothing but breede vs ſuch new found doctrines. But we haue nothing to do with that ſtonie Philoſophie, which our maſter and Lord hath condemned not onely by his word but alſo by his example. For he mourned and wept both at his owne and other mens aduerſities. The world (ſaith he) ſhall reioyce, but you ſhall mourne and weepe. And becauſe no man ſhould finde fault therewith, by his open proclamation, he hath pronounced them bleſſed that mourne. And no maruell. For if all weeping be blamed, what ſhall we iudge of the Lord himſelfe, out of whoſe bodie dropped bloudy teares? If euery feare be noted of infidelitie, what ſhall we iudge of that quaking feare wherewith we read that he was not ſlenderly ſtriken? If all ſadneſſe be miſliked, how ſhall we like this, that he confeſſeth his ſoule to be ſad euen to the death.

Iohn 17.20.

Math. 5.4.

Luke 22.44.

10 This I thought good to ſpeake to this end, to call godly mindes from deſpaire, that they ſhould not therefore altogether forſake the ſtudie of patience, becauſe they cannot put off the naturall affection of ſorrow: which muſt needes happen to them, that make of patience a ſenſe leſſe dulnes, and of a valiant & conſtant man, a ſtock. For the Scripture giueth to the holy ones the praiſe of patience, when they are ſo troubled with hardnes of aduerſities, that yet they be not ouercome nor throwen downe with it: when they be ſo pricked with bitternes, that they be alſo delighted with ſpirituall ioy: when they be ſo diſtreſſed with griefe, that yet they receiue courage againe being cheared with the comfort of God. Yet in the meane time that repugnancie abideth ſtill in their hearts, that naturall ſenſe eſchueth and dreadeth thoſe things that it knoweth to be againſt it: but the affection of godlineſſe trauaileth euen through all thoſe difficulties to the obeying of Gods will. This repugnancie the Lord expreſſed when he ſaid thus to Peter: When thou waſt yong thou didſt gird thy ſelfe and didſt walke whether thou wouldeſt: But when thou art old, an other ſhall gird thee and lead thee whether thou ſhalt not be willing. Neither is it likely that Peter, when the time came that he muſt glorifie God by his death, was drawen vnwillingly and reſiſting vnto it. Elſe his martyrdome ſhould haue but ſmall praiſe. But howſoeuer he did with great cheerefulnes of hart obey the ordinance of God, yet becauſe he had not put off the nature of man, he was doubly strained with two sorts of wils. For when he did by himselfe consider the bloudy death that he should suffer, being striken with horror thereof, he would gladly haue escaped it. On the other side, when it came in his minde, that he was called vnto it by the commandement of God, then conquering and treading downe feare, he gladly, yea and cheerefully tooke it vpon him. This therefore we must indeuour if we will be the Disciples of Christ, that our minds be inwardly filled with so great a reuerence and obedience to God, as may tame and subdue to his ordinance all contrarie affections. So shall it come to passe, that with whatsoeuer kind of crosse we be vexed, euen in the greatest anguishes of minde, we shall constantly keepe patience. For aduersities shall haue their sharpnesse, wherewith we shall be bitten: so when we are afflicted with sickenesse, we shall both grone and be disquieted and desire health: so being pressed with pouertie, we shall be pricked with the stings of carefulnesse and sorrow: so shall we be striken with griefe of shame, contempt and iniury: so shall we yeeld due teares to nature at the buriall of our friends: but this alway shall be the conclusion. But the Lord willed so. Therefore let vs follow his will. Yea euen in the middest of the prickings of sorrow, in the middest of mourning and teares this thought must needs come betweene, to encline our heart to take cheerefully the very same things, by reason whereof it is so moued.

The contrarie affections which are in godly afflicted minds.

The difference betweene Christian and Philosophicall patience.

11 But forasmuch as wee haue taken the chiefe cause of bearing the crosse, out of the consideration of the will of God, we must in few words define what difference is betweene Philosophicall and Christian patience. Truely very few of the Philosophers climbed to so high a reason, to vnderstand that the hand of God doth exercise vs by afflictions, and to thinke that God is in this behalfe to be obeyed. But they bring no other reason, but because we must so doe of necessitie. What is this else, but to say that thou must yeeld vnto God, because thou shalt trauaile in vaine to wrastle against him? For if we obey God, only because we so must of necessitie: then if we might escape, we would cease to obey. But the Scripture biddeth vs to consider a farre other thing in the will of God, that is to say, first iustice and equitie, then the care of our saluation. These therefore be the Christian exhortations to patience, whether pouerty, or banishment, or prisonment, or shame, or sickenesse, or losse of parents, or children, or any other like thing doe grieue vs, we must thinke that none of these things doeth happen, but by the will and prouidence of God, and that he doth nothing but by most iust order: For why? do not our innumerable and daily offences deserue to be chastised more sharplie: and with more grieuous correction, than such as the mercifull kindnesse of God laieth vpon vs? Is it not most great equitie, that our flesh be tamed, and as it were made acquainted with the yoke, that she do not wantonly grow wilde according to her nature? Is not the righteousnesse and truth of God worthy, that we should take paine for it? But if there appeare an vndoubted righteousnesse in our afflictions, we cannot without vnrighteousnesse either murmure or wrastle against it. We heare not now that cold song: We must giue place, because we so must of necessitie, but we heare a liuely lesson and full of effectualnesse, We must obey, because it is vnlawfull to resist: we must suffer patiently, because impatience is a stubbornnesse against the righteousnesse of God. But now, because that thing onely is worthie to be loued of vs, which we know to be to our safety and benefite, the good father doth this way also comfort vs, when he affirmeth that euen in this that he afflicteth vs with the crosse, he prouideth for our safetie. But if it be certaine that troubles are healthfull for vs, why should we not receiue them with a thankfull and well pleased minde? Therefore in patiently suffering them, we doe not forcibly yeeld to necessitie, but quietly agree to our owne benefite. These thoughts (I say) doe make that how much our minds are greeued in the crosse with naturall feeling of bitternesse, so much they be cheered with spirituall gladnesse. Whereupon also followeth thankesgiuing, which cannot be without ioy. But if the praise of the Lord and thankesgiuing proceedeth of nothing but of a cheerefull and ioyfull hart, and there is nothing that ought to interrupt the same praising of God and thankesgiuing in vs: hereby appeareth how necessarie it is that the bitternesse of the crosse be tempered with spirituall ioy.

THE

THE NINTH CHAPTER.

Of the meditation of the life to come.

BVt with whatsoeuer kinde of trouble we be distressed, we must alway looke to this end, to vse our selues to the contempt of this present life, and thereby be stirred to the meditation of the life to come. For, because God knoweth well how much we be by nature inclined to the beastly loue of this world, he vseth a most fit meane to draw vs backe, and to shake off our sluggishnesse, that we should not sticke too fast in that loue. There is none of vs that desireth not to seeme to aspire and endeuour all their life long to heauenly immortalitie. For we are ashamed to excell bruite beasts in nothing: whose state should be nothing inferiour to ours, vnlesse there remaine to vs a hope of eternitie after death. But if you examine the deuises, studies, and doings of euery man, you shall finde nothing therein but earth. Hereupon groweth that senslesnesse, that our minde being daseled with vaine glistering of riches, power, and honors, is so dulled that it cannot see farre. Our hart also being possessed with couetousnesse, ambition, and lust, is so weighed downe, that it cannot rise vp higher. Finally, all our soule entangled with entisements of the flesh seeketh her felicitie in earth. The Lord to remedie this euill, doth with continuall examples of miseries teach this of the vanitie of this present life. Therefore that they should not promise themselues in this life a sound and quiet peace, he suffereth them to be many times disquieted and troubled either with warres, or vprores, or robberies, or other iniuries. That they should not with too much greedinesse, gape for fraile and transitorie riches, or rest in the riches that they alreadie possesse, sometime with banishment, sometime with barrennesse of the earth, sometime with fire, sometime by other meanes he bringeth them to pouertie, or at least holdeth them in measure. That they should not with too much ease take pleasure in the benefits of Marriage, he either maketh them to be vexed with the frowardnesse of their wiues, or plucketh them downe with ill children, or punisheth them with want of issue. But if in all these things he tenderly beareth with them, yet least they should either swell with foolish glorie, or immeasurably reioice with vaine confidence, he doth by diseases and dangers set before their eies, how vnstable, and vanishing be all the goods that are subiect to mortalitie. Then onely therefore we rightly profit in the discipline of the crosse when we learne that this life, when it is considered in it selfe, is vnquiet, troublesome, and innumerable waies miserable, and in no point fully blessed: and that all those that are reckoned the good things thereof are vncertaine, fickle, vaine, and vncorrupted, with many euils mixed with them. And hereupon we doe determine, that heere is nothing to be sought or hoped for but strife: and that when we thinke of our crowne, then we must lift vp our eies to heauen. For thus we must beleeue. That our minde is neuer truly raised to the desire and meditation of the life to come, vnlesse it haue first conceiued a contempt of this present life.

The miseries of this life must teach vs not to seeke our felicitie heere.

2 For betweene these two there is no meane, the earth must either become vile in our sight, or hold vs bound with intemperate loue of it. Therefore if we haue any care of eternitie, we must diligently indeuour to loose our selues from these fetters. Now because this present life hath many flattering pleasures wherewith to allure vs, a great shew of pleasantnesse, grace and sweetnesse, wherewith to delight vs: it is much behouefull for vs to be now and then called away, that we be not bewitched with such allurements. For what, I pray you, would be done, if we did heere enioy a continuall concourse of good things and felicitie, sith we cannot with continuall spurres of euils be sufficiently awaked to consider the miserie thereof? Not only the learned doe know, but also the common people haue no Prouerbe more common than this, that mans life is like a smoke or shadow: and because they sawe it to be a thing verie profitable to be knowne, they haue set it out with many notable sentences. But there is nothing that we do either more negligently consider, or lesse remember. For we goe about all things as though we would frame to our selues an immortalitie in earth. If there be a corpes caried to buriall or if we walke among graues, then, because there is an image of death before our eies, I graunt we doe maruellously well discourse like Philosophers vpon the vanitie of this life. Albeit we doe not that continually, for many times all theſe things doe nothing moue vs. But when it happeneth our Philoſophy laſteth but a while, which ſo ſoone as we turne our backes, vaniſheth away, and leaueth no ſtep at all of remembrance behinde it: finally, it paſſeth away as clapping of hands vpon a ſtage at any pleaſant ſight. And we forgetting not onely death, but alſo that we be ſubiect to death, as though we had neuer heard any report thereof, fall to a careleſſe aſſuredneſſe of earthly immortalitie. If any man in the meane time tell vs of the Prouerbe, that man is a creature of a daies continuance, we graunt it indeede: but ſo heedleſſly, that ſtill the thought of euerlaſting continuance reſteth in our minde. Who therefore can denie, that it is a great profit to vs all, not onely to be admoniſhed in words, but by all the examples of experience that may be, to be conuinced of the miſerable eſtate of earthly life? foraſmuch as euen when we are conuinced, we ſcarcely ceaſe to ſtand amaſed with peruerſe and fooliſh admiration of it, as though it contained the vttermoſt end of good things. But if it be neceſſary that God inſtruct vs, it is our duetie likewiſe on our behalfe to harken to him when he calleth and awaketh our dulneſſe, that deſpiſing the world we may with al our harts endeuour to the meditation of the life to come.

We may not ſo deſpiſe the life which we enioy in the world that the eſtimation of thoſe good things which God doth beſtow vpon vs be vnthankefully diminiſhed.

3 But let the faithfull accuſtome themſelues to ſuch a deſpiſing of preſent life, as may neither engender a hatred thereof, nor any vnthankfulneſſe toward God. For this life, howſoeuer it is full of infinite miſeries, is yet worthily reckoned among the not ſlender bleſſings of God. Therefore if we acknowledge no benefit of God in it, we are guiltie of no ſmall vnthankfulneſſe toward God himſelfe. But ſpecially it ought to be to the faithfull a teſtimonie of Gods good will, foraſmuch as it is wholy directed to the furtherance of their ſaluation. For before that he openly deliuer vnto vs the inheritance of eternall glorie, his will is to ſhew himſelfe a Father vnto vs by ſmaller examples: and theſe be the benefits that are daily beſtowed vpon vs. Sith therefore this life ſerueth vs to vnderſtand the goodneſſe of God, ſhall we diſdaine it as though it had not a crum of goodneſſe in it? We muſt therefore put on this feeling and affection, to reckon it among the gifts of goodneſſe that are not to be refuſed. For though there wanted teſtimonies of Scripture, of which there are both many moſt euident, very nature it ſelfe doth exhort vs to giue thanks to the Lord, for that he hath brought vs into the light of it, that he graunteth vs the vſe of it, that he giueth vs all neceſſarie ſuccours for the preſeruation of it. And this is a much greater reaſon, if we conſider that we are in it after a certaine maner prepared to the glorie of the heauenly kingdome. For ſo the Lord hath ordained that they which in time to come ſhall be crowned in heauen, muſt fight certaine battels in earth, that they ſhould not triumph, till they had ouercome the hard aduentures of the battell, and obteined the victorie. Then another reaſon is, that we doe by diuerſe benefits begin therein to taſte the ſweetneſſe of Gods liberalitie, that our hope and deſire ſhould be whetted too long for the reuealing thereof. When this is determined, that it is a gift of Gods clemencie, that we liue this earthly life, for which as we be bound vnto him, ſo we ought to be mindefull and thankefull: then we ſhall in fit order come to conſider the moſt miſerable eſtate thereof, to this end that we may be deliuered from too much greedineſſe of it, whereunto as I haue before ſaid, we are of our ſelues naturally enclined.

This life is not ſimplie to be lothed but in compariſon of the life to come.

4 Now whatſoeuer is taken from the wrongfull deſire of this life, ought to be added to the deſire of a better life. I graunt indeed that they thought truely, that thought it beſt not to be borne, and the next, to die quickly. For what could they being deſtitute of the light of God and true religion, ſee therein but vnhappie and miſerable? And they did not without reaſon, that mourned and wept at the births of their friends, and ſolemnly reioyced at their burials, but they did it without profit, becauſe being without the right doctrine of Faith, they did not ſee how that may turne to good to the godly, which is of it ſelfe neither bleſſed nor to be deſired: and ſo they ended their iudgement with deſperation. Let this therefore be the marke of the faithfull in iudging of mortall life, that when they vnderſtand it to be of it ſelfe nothing but miſerie, they may reſort wholly the more freſhly and readily to the eternall life to come. When we come to this compariſon, then this preſent life may not onely be ſafely neglected, but alſo vtterly deſpiſed and loathed in compariſon of the other. For if Heauen be our Country,

Country, what is the earth elſe but a place of baniſhment? If the departing out of the world be an entring into life, what is the world but a graue? to abide in it, what is it elſe but to be drowned in death? If to be deliuered from the bodie is to be ſet in perfect libertie, what is the bodie elſe but a priſon? If to enioy the preſence of God is the higheſt ſumme of felicitie, is it not miſerable to lacke it? But till we be eſcaped out of the world, we wander abroad from the Lord. Therefore if the earthly life be compared with the heauenly life, doubtleſſe it ought to be deſpiſed and troden vnder foote. But it is neuer to be hated, but in reſpect that it holdeth vs in ſubiection to ſinne, and yet that hatred is not properly to be laid vpon our life. But howſoeuer it be, yet we muſt be ſo mooued either with wearineſſe or hatred of it, that deſiring the end of it, we may be alſo ready at the will of the Lord to abide in it, ſo that our wearineſſe may be far from all grudging and impatience. For it is like a place in battell array, wherein the Lord hath placed vs, which we ought to keepe till he call vs away. Paul indeed lamenteth his ſtate that he is holden bound in the bonds of the bodie longer than he wiſhed, and ſighed with feruent deſire of his redemption: neuertheleſſe to obey the Commandement of the Lord, he profeſſed himſelfe readie to both, becauſe he acknowledgeth himſelfe to owe this vnto God, to glorifie his name, either by death or life: and that it is in God to determine what is moſt expedient for his glorie. Therefore if we muſt liue and die to the Lord, let vs leaue to his will the time of our life and death, but ſo that we be ſtill feruent in deſire of death, and be continually occupied in meditation thereof, and deſpiſe this life in compariſon of the immortalitie to come, and wiſh to forſake it when it ſhall pleaſe the Lord becauſe of the bondage of ſinne.

1.Cor.5.6.

Rom 7.29.

Phil.1.23.

5 But this is monſtrous, that in ſteede of that deſire of death, many that boaſt themſelues to be Chriſtians, are ſo afraid of it, that they tremble at euery mention of it, as of a thing betokening vnluckily and vnhappie. Truely it is no maruell, if naturall ſenſe in vs doe quake for feare when we heare of the diſſoluing of vs. But this is in no wiſe tollerable, that there be not in a Chriſtian mans breaſt the light of godlineſſe, that ſhould with greater comfort ouercome and ſuppreſſe that feare, how great ſoeuer it be. For if we conſider that this vnſtedfaſt, faultie, corruptible, fraile, withering, and rotten tabernacle of our bodie, is therefore diſſolued, that it may afterward be reſtored againe into a ſtedfaſt, perfect, vncorruptible and heauenly glorie: ſhall not faith compell vs feruently to deſire that which nature feareth; If we conſider that by death we are called home out of baniſhment, to inhabite our countrie, as a heauenly countrie, ſhall we obtaine no comfort thereby? but there is nothing that defireth not to abide continually. I graunt, and therefore I affirme, that we ought to looke vnto the immortalitie to come, where we may attaine a ſtedfaſt ſtate that no where appeareth in earth. For Paul doth very well teach, that the faithfull ought to goe cheerefully to death: not becauſe they would be vnclothed, but becauſe they deſire to be newly clothed. Shall bruit beaſtes, yea and liueleſſe creatures, euen ſtockes and ſtones, knowing their preſent vanitie, be earneſtly bent to looking for the laſt day of the reſurrection, that they may with the children of God be deliuered from vanitie, and ſhall we that are endued with the light of wit, and aboue wit enlightned with the ſpirit of God, when it ſtandeth vpon our being, not lift vp our mindes beyond this rottenneſſe of earth? But it perteineth not to my preſent purpoſe, nor to this place, to ſpeake againſt this peruerſeneſſe. And in the beginning I haue already profeſſed, that I would not here take vpon me the large handling of common places. I would counſell ſuch fearefull mindes to read Cyprians booke of mortalitie, vnleſſe they were meete to be ſent to the Philoſophers, that they may begin to be aſhamed when they ſee the contempt of death that thoſe doe ſhew. But this let vs hold for certainely determined, that no man hath well profited in Chriſt his ſchoole, but he that doth ioyfully looke for the day both of death and of the laſt reſurrection. For both Paul deſcribeth all the faithfull by this marke, and alſo it is common in the Scripture, to call vs thither as oft as it will ſet foorth a ground of perfect gladneſſe. Reioice (ſaith the Lord) and lift vp your heads, for your redemption commeth neere at hand. Is it reaſonable I pray you, that the thing which he willed to be of ſo great force to raiſe vp ioy and cheerefulneſſe in vs, ſhould breede nothing but ſorrow and diſcouragement? If it be ſo, why doe we ſtill boaſt of him as of our ſchoolemaſter?

The conſideration that ſhould conquer the feare of death in Chriſtian mindes.

Let

Let vs therefore get a ſounder minde, and howſoeuer the blinde and ſenſeleſſe deſire of the fleſh doe ſtriue againſt it, let vs not doubt to wiſh for the comming of the Lord, not only with wiſhing, but alſo with groning & ſighing, as a thing moſt happie of all other. For he ſhall come a redeemer to vs, to draw vs out of the infinite gulfe of euils and miſeries, and to lead vs into that bleſſed inheritance of his life and glory.

We cannot but be troubled in minde till we turne our eies from beholding the preſent face of things that are, vnto the conſideration of that which is to come.

6 This is certainely true: all the nations of the faithfull, ſo long as they dwell in earth, muſt be as ſheepe appointed to ſlaughter, that they may be faſhioned like Chriſt their head. Therefore they were in moſt lamentable caſe, vnleſſe they had their minde raiſed vp into heauen, and ſurmounted all that is in the world, and paſſed ouer the preſent face of things. Contrariwiſe when they haue once lifted their heads aboue all earthly things, although they ſee the wealth and honors of the wicked flouriſhing, if they ſee them enioying quiet peace, if they ſee them proud in gorgiouſneſſe and ſumptuouſneſſe of all things, if they ſee them to flow in plentifull ſtore of all delights, beſide that if they be ſpoiled by their wickedneſſe, if they ſuſtaine reprochfull dealings at their pride, if they be robbed by their couetouſneſſe, if they be vexed by any other outrage of theirs: they will eaſily vphold themſelues in ſuch aduerſities. For that day ſhall before their eies, when the Lord ſhall receiue his faithfull into the quiet of his kingdome, when he ſhall wipe all teares from their eies, when he ſhall cloth them with the robe of glory and gladneſſe, when he ſhall feede them with the vnſpeakeable ſweeteneſſe of his deinties, when he ſhall aduance them to the fellowſhip of his high eſtate: finally when he ſhall vouchſafe to interparte his felicitie with them. But theſe wicked ones that haue flouriſhed in the earth, he ſhall throwe into extreme ſhame, he ſhall change their delights into torments, their laughing and myrth into weeping and gnaſhing of teeth, he ſhall diſquiet their peace with terrible torments of conſcience, he ſhall puniſh their deintineſſe with vnquenchable fire, and ſhall put their heads in ſubiection to thoſe godly men, whoſe patience they haue abuſed. For this is righteouſneſſe (as Paul teſtifieth) to giue releaſe to the miſerable and to them that are vniuſtly afflicted, and to render affliction to the wicked that doe afflict the godly, when the Lord Ieſus ſhall be reuealed from heauen. This truely is our onely comfort, which if it be taken away, we muſt of neceſſitie either deſpaire, or flatteringly delight our ſelues with the vaine comforts of the world to our owne deſtruction. For euen the Prophet confeſſeth that his feete ſtaggered, when he taried too long vpon conſidering the preſent proſperitie of the wicked: and that he could not otherwiſe ſtand ſtedfaſt, but when he entred into the ſanctuarie of God, and bended his eies to the laſt end of the godly and the wicked. To conclude in one word then onely the croſſe of Chriſt triumpheth in the harts of the faithfull vpon the Diuell, fleſh, ſinne, and the wicked, when our eies are turned to the power of the reſurrection.

THE TENTH CHAPTER.

How we ought to vſe this preſent life, and the helpes thereof.

The vſe of things which ſerue for this preſent life is neither ſo ſtrict as ſome, nor ſo looſe as others haue imagined.

BY ſuch introductions the Scripture doth alſo well informe vs what is the right vſe of earthly benefites: which is a thing not to be neglected in framing an order of life. For if we muſt liue we muſt alſo vſe the neceſſarie helpes of life: neither can we eſchew euen thoſe things that ſeeme rather to ſerue for delight then for neceſſitie. Therefore we muſt keepe a meaſure that we may vſe them with a pure conſcience, either for neceſſitie or for delight. That meaſure the Lord appointeth by his word, when he teacheth that this life is to them that be his, a certaine iourney through a ſtrange countrey, by which they trauell toward the kingdome of heauen. If we muſt but paſſe through the earth, doubtleſſe we ought ſo farre to vſe the good things of the earth, as they may rather further then hinder our iourney. Therefore Paul doth not vnprofitably counſell vs ſo to vſe this world, as though we vſed it not: and to buy poſſeſſions with ſuch a minde as they vſe to be ſold. But becauſe this place is ſlipperie, and ſo ſlope on both ſides, that it quickly maketh vs to fall, let vs labour to faſten our foote there, where we may ſtand ſafely. For there haue beene ſome, that otherwiſe were good and holy men, which when they ſaw intemperance and riot continually to range with vnbrideled vnbrideled luſt, vnleſſe it be ſharply reſtrained, and were deſirous to correct ſo great a miſchiefe, they could finde none other way, but ſuffered man to vſe the benefits of the earth, ſo farre as neceſſitie required. This was indeede a godly counſell, but they were too ſeuere. For (which is a very perillous thing) they did put ſtreiter bonds vpon conſciences, than thoſe wherewith they were bound by the word of God. And they expound neceſſitie, to abſtaine from all things that a man may be without. And ſo by their opinion, a man might ſcarcely take any more foode than bread and water. And ſome be yet more ſeuere: as it is read of Crates the Thebane, that did throwe his goods into the Sea, becauſe if they were not deſtroyed, he thought that he ſhould be deſtroyed by them. Many at this day, while they ſeeke a pretence whereby the intemperance of the fleſh in vſe of outward things may be excuſed, and while they goe about to prepare a way for the fleſh raging in wantonneſſe, do take that as a thing confeſſed, which I doe not grant them, that this libertie is not to be reſtrained with any limitation of meaſure, but that it is to be left to euery mans conſcience to vſe as much as he ſeeth to be lawfull for him. Truely I confeſſe that conſciences neither ought nor can in this point be bound by certaine and preciſe formes of lawes. But foraſmuch as the Scripture teacheth generall rules of lawfull vſe, we muſt ſurely meaſure the vſe according to theſe rules.

2 Let this be a principle: that the vſe of Gods gifts ſwarueth not out of the way, when it is referred to that ende, whereunto the Author himſelfe hath created and appointed them for vs, for as much as he hath created them for our good and not for our hurt. Therefore no man can keepe a righter way than he that ſhall diligently looke vnto this end. Now if we conſider to what end he hath created meates, we ſhall find that he meant to make prouiſion not onely for neceſſitie, but alſo for delight and pleaſure. So in apparell, beſide neceſſitie he appointed another ende, which is comelineſſe and honeſtie. In herbes, trees, and fruites, beſide diuerſe profitable vſes, there is alſo a pleaſantneſſe of ſight, and ſweetneſſe of ſmell. For if this were not true, the Prophet would not reckon among the benefites of God that Wine maketh glad the hart of man, and that Oile maketh his face to ſhine, the Scripture would not eachwhere, to ſet foorth his liberalitie, rehearſe that he hath giuen all ſuch things to men. And the very naturall qualitie of things doe ſufficiently ſhew to what end and how farre we may vſe them. Shall the Lord haue ſet in flowers ſo great a beautie, as preſenteth it ſelfe to our eies: ſhall he haue giuen ſo great a ſweeteneſſe of ſauour as naturally floweth into our ſmelling: and ſhall it be vnlawfull either for our eies to take the vſe of that beautie, or for our ſmelling to feele that ſweetneſſe of ſauour? What? Hath he not ſo made difference of colours, that he hath made ſome more acceptable than other? What? Hath he not giuen to gold and ſiluer, to iuorie and marble, a ſpeciall grace whereby they might be made more precious than other mettals or ſtones? Finally, hath he not made many things commendable vnto vs without neceſſary vſe?

God hauing made things not onely for neceſſitie but alſo for delight, there is no cauſe why men for whom they are made, may not vſe the one as well as the other. Pſal. 104. 15.

3 Therefore away with that vnnaturall Philoſophie, which in graunting vs of the creatures no vſe but of neceſſitie, not onely doth niggardly bereaue vs of the lawfull vſe of Gods liberalitie, but alſo cannot take place, vnleſſe it firſt haue ſpoiled man of all his ſenſes & made him a blocke. But on the other ſide we muſt with no leſſe diligence prouide a ſtay for the luſt of the fleſh, which if it be not brought into order, ouerfloweth without meaſure: and it hath (as I haue ſaid) defenders of it, which vnder pretence of allowed libertie do grant vnto it all things. Firſt there is one bridle put in the mouth of it, if this be determined, that all things are created for vs to this end, that we ſhould know the author of them, and giue him thankes for his tender kindneſſe toward vs. Where is thy thankſgiuing, if thou ſo gluttonouſly fill thy ſelfe with daintie meates or with wine, that thou either be made ſenſeleſſe, or vnfit to doe the duties of godlineſſe and of thy calling? Where is the reknowledging of God, if thy fleſh by too great abundance boyling in filthie luſt, doth with her vncleanneſſe infect thy minde, that thou canſt not ſee any thing that is right or honeſt? In apparell, where is thankfulneſſe to God, if with coſtly gorgeouſneſſe thereof we both fall in admiration of our ſelues and diſdaine other? If with the trimnes & cleanlines of it, we prepare our ſelues to vnchaſtitie? Where is the reknowledging of God, if our minde be fixed vpon the gayneſſe of our apparell? For many ſo giue all their ſenſes to bodily delights, that the minde lieth ouerwhelmed.

Our acknowledging with thankefulneſſe that all good things are receiued at the hands of God, brideleth the exceſſiue abuſe of meates, apparel, furniture, & all things needfull vnto life.

Many

Many are so delighted with marble, gold and paintings, that they become as it were men made of marble, that they be as it were turned into mettals, and be like vnto painted images. The smell of the kitchin, or sweetnesse of sauour so dulleth some, that they can smell nothing that is spirituall. And the same is also to be seene in the rest. Therefore it is certaine that hereby the licentiousnesse of abusing is somewhat restrained, and that rule of Paul confirmed, that we be not too carefull of the flesh, for the lustes thereof, to which if we graunt too much, they boile out aboue measure and temper.

Rom. 13. 14.

The light estimation of this present life, and the earnest meditation of immortalitie cut teth off the ouer great care which men haue of outward things.

4 But there is no surer nor readier way than that which is made vs by the contempt of this present life, and the meditation of heauenly immortalitie. For thereupon follow two rules: the one, that they which vse this world, should be so minded as though they vsed it not, they that marrie wiues, as though they did not marrie: they that buy, as though they did not buy, as Paul teacheth. The other, that they should learne, as well to beare pouertie, quietly and patiently, as abundance moderately. He that biddeth thee to vse this world as though thou didst not vse it, doth cut away not onely the intemperance of gluttonie in meate and drinke, and too much deintinesse, sumptuousnesse, pride, hautinesse, and niceneſſe, in fare, building, and apparell, but also all care and affection that may either withdraw thee or hinder thee from thinking of the heauenly life, or from studie to garnish thy soule. But this was long agoe truely said of Cato: that there is great carefulnesse of trimming our bodie, and great carelesnesse of vertue. And it is an old prouerbe, that they which are much busied in care of their bodie are commonly careleſſe of their soule. Therefore, although the libertie of the faithfull in outward things is not to be restrained to a certaine forme, yet truely it must be subiect to this law, to beare verie litle with their owne affections, but contrariwise still call vpon themselues with continually bent minde, to cut off all shew of superfluous plentie, much more to restraine riotous excesse, and to take diligent heede, that they doe not of helpes make to themselues hinderances.

1. Cor. 7. 3.

A minde contented to want, and perswaded that it standeth accountable to God for things receiued, will easily moderate it selfe in the vse of earthly things.

5 The other rule shall be, that they that haue but small and slender riches, may learne to lacke patiently, that they be not carefully moued with immeasurable desire of them: which patience they that keepe, haue not a little profited in the Lords schoole: as he that hath not at least somewhat profited in this behalfe, can scarcely haue any thing whereby to prooue himselfe the scholler of Christ. For beside this that the most part of other vices doe accompanie the desire of the earthly things, he that beareth pouertie impatiently, doth for the most part bewray the contrarie disease in abundance. I meane hereby that he which will be ashamed of a poore coate, will be proud of a costly coate: he that will not be content with a hungrie supper, will be disquieted with desire of a daintier, and would also intemperately abuse those dainties if he had them: he that hardly and vnquietly beareth a priuate and base estate, will not abstaine from pride if he climbe to honours. Therefore let all them that haue an vnfained zeale of godlinesse, endeuour to learne by the Apostles example, to be full and hungrie, to haue store, and suffer want. The Scripture hath also a third rule, whereby it tempereth the vse of earthly things, of which we haue spoken somewhat when we entreated of the precepts of charitie. For the Scripture decreeth that all earthly things are so giuen vs by the bountifulnesse of God, and appointed for our commoditie, that they may be as things deliuered vs to keepe, whereof we must one day yeelde an account. We must therefore so dispose them, that this saying may continually sound in our eares, yeeld an account of thy bailiwike. Therewithall let this also come in our minde. Who it is that asketh such an account, euen he that hath so much commended abstinence, sobrietie, honest sparing. and modestie, and abhorreth riotous sumptuousnesse, pride, ostentation, and vanitie, which alloweth no other disposing of goods, but such as is ioyned with charitie: which hath alreadie with his owne mouth condemned all those delightfull things that doe withdraw a mans minde from chastitie and cleannesse, or doe dull his wit with darknesse.

Philip. 4. 12.

The consideration of that whereunto God hath called vs, is 6 Last of all, this is to be noted, that the Lord biddeth euery one of vs in all the doings of his life, to haue an eie to his calling. For he knoweth with how great vnquietnesse mans wit boileth, with how skipping lightnesse it is carried hither and thither, how greedie his ambition is to holde diuerse things at once. Therefore that all things

ſhould not be confounded with our folly & raſhneſſe, he hath appointed to euery man his duetie in ſeuerall kindes of life. And that no man raſhly run beyond his bounds, he hath named all ſuch kinds of life, vocations. Therefore euery mans ſeuerall kind of life is vnto him as it were his ſtanding appointed him by God, that they ſhould not all their life vncertainly wander about. And this diuiſion is ſo neceſſarie, that all our doings are meaſured thereby in his ſight, and oftentimes contrary to the iudgement of mans reaſon and Philoſophie. There is no deede accounted more noble, euen among the Philoſophers, than for a man to deliuer his countrey from tyrannie: by the voice of Gods iudgement the priuate man is openly condemned that layeth hand vpon a tyrant. But I will not tarie vpon the rehearſing of examples. It is ſufficient if we know that the calling of the Lord is in euery thing the beginning and foundation of well doing: to which he that doth not direct himſelfe, ſhall neuer keepe a right way in his doings. He may peraduenture ſometime doe ſomewhat ſeeming worthy of praiſe: but whatſoeuer that be in the ſight of men, before the throne of God it ſhall be reiected: moreouer there ſhall be no conuenient agreement in the parts of his life. Therefore our life ſhall then be beſt framed, when it ſhall be directed to this marke: For then, no man caried with his owne raſhneſſe will attempt more than his calling may beare, becauſe he knoweth that it is not lawfull to paſſe beyond his bounds. He that ſhall be a man of baſe eſtate, ſhall contentedly liue a priuate life, leſt he ſhould forſake the degree wherein God hath placed him. Againe this ſhall be no ſmall reliefe to cares, labours, greeſes and other burdens, when a man ſhall know that in all theſe things, God is his guide. The more willingly the magiſtrate will execute his office: the houſholder will binde himſelfe to his duetie: euery man in his kinde of life will beare and paſſe through the diſcommodities, cares, tediouſneſſe, and anguiſhes thereof: when they are perſwaded that euery mans burden is laid vpon him by God. Hereupon alſo ſhall grow ſingular comfort, foraſmuch as there ſhall be no worke ſo filthie and vile, (if it be ſuch a one as thou obey thy calling in it) but it ſhineth and is moſt precious in the ſight of God.

the laſt rule & the beſt direction for the guidance of al actions which are incident into this life.

THE ELEVENTH CHAPTER.

Of the iuſtification of Faith, and firſt of the definition of the name and of the thing.

I Thinke I haue alreadie ſufficiently declared before, how there remaineth for men being accurſed by the law one onely helpe to recouer ſaluation: againe, what Faith is, and what benefits of God it beſtoweth vpon man, and what fruites it bringeth forth in him. The ſumme of all was this, that Chriſt is giuen vs by the goodneſſe of God, and conceiued and poſſeſſed of vs by Faith, by partaking of whom we receiue principally two graces: the firſt, that being reconciled to God by his innocencie, we may now in ſteed of a Iudge haue a merciſull Father in heauen: the ſecond, that being ſanctified by his ſpirit, we may giue our ſelues to innocencie, and pureneſſe of life. As for regeneration, which is the ſecond grace, we haue alreadie ſpoken of it as much as ſeemed to be ſufficient. The maner of iuſtification was therefore leſſe touched, becauſe it ſerued well for our purpoſe, firſt to vnderſtand both how the Faith by which alone we receiue freely giuen righteouſneſſe by the mercie of God, is not idle from good works: and alſo what be the good workes of the holy ones, whereupon part of this queſtion entreateth. Therefore they are firſt to be throughly diſcuſſed, and ſo diſcuſſed that we muſt remember that this is the chiefe ſtay of vpholding religion, that we may be the more carefull and heedefull about it. For vnleſſe thou firſt know, in what ſtate thou art with God, and what his iudgement is of thee: as thou haſt no ground to ſtabliſh thy ſaluation, ſo haſt thou alſo none to raiſe thy reuerent feare toward God. But the neceſſitie of this knowledge ſhall better appeare by knowledge it ſelfe.

The matter of iuſtification the chiefeſt ſtaie whereby religion is vpheld.

2 But that we ſtumble not at the firſt entrie, (which we ſhould doe if we ſhould enter diſputation of a thing vnknowen) let vs firſt declare what is ment by theſe ſpeeches, Man to be iuſtified before God, To be iuſtified by Faith or by works. He is ſaid to be iuſtified afore God, that is pronounced by the iudgement of God both iuſt and accepted for his owne righteouſneſſe ſake. For as wickedneſſe is abhominable before God, consisteth of two parts, forgiuenesse of sinnes and imputation of Christs righteousnesse.

God, so a sinner cannot finde fauour in his eies, in respect that he is a sinner, or so long as he is accounted such a one. Therefore whersoeuer sinne is, there also appeareth the wrath and vengeance of God. He is iustified that is not accounted in place of a sinner but of a iust man, and by reason thereof he standeth fast before the iudgement seate of God when all sinners fall. As if an innocent be brought to be arraigned before the seate of a righteous Iudge, when iudgement is giuen according to his innocencie, he is said to be iustified before the Iudge: so he is iustified before God that being exempt out of the number of sinners hath God a witnesse and affirmer of his righteousnesse. Therefore after the same maner a man shall be said to be iustified by works, in whose life there is found such cleannesse and holinesse, as may deserue the testimonie of righteousnesse before the throne of God: or he that with the vprightnesse of his workes is able to answer and satisfie Gods iudgement. Contrariwise he shall be said to be iustified by Faith that being excluded from the righteousnesse of works, doth by Faith take hold of the righteousnesse of Christ: wherewith when he is clothed, he appeareth in the sight of God, not as a sinner, but as righteous. So we simply expound iustification to be an acceptation, whereby God receiuing vs into fauour taketh vs for righteous. And we say that the same consisteth in forgiuenesse of sinnes, and imputation of the righteousnesse of Christ.

Proofe that iustification is taken for Gods acquitting men from sinne, and his imputing vnto them the righteousnesse which is in Christ.

3 For confirmation hereof there are many and euident testimonies of Scripture. First it cannot be denied, that this is the proper and most vsed signification of the word. But because it is too long to gather all the places and compare them together, it shall be enough to put the readers in minde of them, for they may of themselues easily marke them. But I will bring foorth some, where this iustification that we speake of is expressly entreated of by name. First, where Luke saith that the people when they had heard Christ did iustifie God. And where Christ pronounceth that wisedome is iustified by her children: he doth not meane there, that they do giue righteousnesse, which alway remaineth perfect with God, although all the world goe about to take it away from him: nor in this place also to make the doctrine of saluation righteous, which hath euer that of it selfe. But both these speeches are as much in effect, as to giue to God and his doctrine the praise that they deserue. Againe when Christ reprocheth the Pharisees, that they iustifie themselues, he doth not meane that they obtaine righteousnesse by well doing, but doe vaine-gloriously seeke for the fame of righteousnes, whereof indeede they be voide. They that are skilfull of the Hebrue toong doe better vnderstand the sense of this phrase: in which toong they are not onely called wicked dooers, that are guiltie in their conscience of any wicked doing, but also they that come in danger of iudgement or condemnation. For when Bersabe saith that she and Salomon shall be wicked doers, she doth not therein acknowledge any offence, but complaineth that she and her sonne shall be put to shame, to be numbred among the reprobate and condemned. But by the processe of the text it easily appeareth, that the same word in Latine also, cannot otherwise be taken but by way of relation, and not to signifie any qualitie. But as concerning the matter that we are now in hand with: where Paul saith, that the Scripture did fore-see, that God iustifieth the Gentiles by Faith, what may a man vnderstand thereby, but that God doth impute righteousnesse by Faith? Againe, when he saith that God iustifieth the wicked man that is of the Faith of Christ, what meaning can be thereof, but by the benefit of faith to deliuer them from the damnation which their wickednesse deserued? And yet he speaketh more plainly in the conclusion, when he cried out thus, Who shal accuse Gods elect? It is God that iustifieth; who shall condemne? It is Christ that died, yea that rose againe, and now maketh intercession for vs. It is as much in effect as if he should say, Who shall accuse thē whom God acquiteth? Who shall condemne them whose patrone Christ is and defendeth them? To iustifie therefore is nothing else, than to acquite him that was accused, from guiltinesse as allowing his innocencie. Sith therefore God doth iustifie vs by the intercession of Christ, he doth acquite vs, not by allowance of our owne innocencie, but by imputation of righteousnesse, that we may be counted for righteous in Christ, which are not righteous in our selues. So in the 13. Chapter of the Actes, in Paules sermon: by him is forgiuenesse of sinnes preached vnto you, and euery one that beleeueth in him is iuſtified from all thoſe things, from which you could not be iuſtified in the Law of Moſes. You ſee that after forgiueneſſe of ſinnes, iuſtification is added in place of an expoſition. You ſee plainely that it is taken for abſolution, you ſee that it is taken away from the workes of the Law, you ſee that it is the meere beneficiall gift of Chriſt, you ſee that it is receiued by Faith. Finally, you ſee that there is a ſatisfaction ſpoken of where he ſaith that we are iuſtified from ſinnes by Chriſt. So when it is ſaid that the Publicane came iuſtified out of the Temple, we cannot ſay that he obtained righteouſneſſe by any deſeruing of works. This therefore is ſaid, that after pardon of his ſinnes obteined, he was counted for righteous before God. He was therefore righteous, not by approouing of works, but by Gods free abſolution. Wherefore Ambroſe ſayeth very well, that calleth the confeſſion of ſinnes a lawfull iuſtification.

Luc. 18. 14.

In Pſal. 118. Homili. 10.

Iuſtification expreſſed in Scripture by acceptation into fauor, defined by pardon, oppoſite vnto guiltines, contained in the name of reconcilement.

4 But to leaue ſtriuing about the word: if we looke vpon the thing it ſelfe, as it is deſcribed vnto vs, there ſhall remaine no more doubt. For truely Paul doth expreſſe iuſtification by the name of acceptation, when he ſaith (Epheſ. 1. 5.) we are appointed vnto adoption by Chriſt, according to the good pleaſure of God, vnto the praiſe of his glorious fauour, whereby he hath accounted vs acceptable or in fauour. For the ſame is meant by it that is ſaid in another place, that God doth freely iuſtifie. In the 4. Chapter to the Romanes, he firſt calleth it an imputation of righteouſneſſe, and ſticketh not to ſay that it conſiſteth in forgiueneſſe of ſinnes. That man (ſaid he) is called of Dauid a bleſſed man, to whom God accounteth or imputeth righteouſneſſe without works, as it is written: Bleſſed are they whoſe iniquities are forgiuen, &c. Truly he there doth intreat not of one part of iuſtification, but of all iuſtification wholly. And he teſtifieth that Dauid in that place maketh a definition of iuſtification, when he pronounceth that they are bleſſed to whom is giuen free forgiueneſſe of ſinnes. Whereby appeareth that this righteouſneſſe whereof he ſpeaketh, is in compariſon ſimply ſet as contrarie to guiltineſſe. But for this purpoſe, that is the beſt place where he teacheth that this is the ſumme of the meſſage of the Goſpell, that we ſhould be reconciled to God: becauſe it is his will to receiue vs into fauor through Chriſt, in not imputing ſinnes vnto vs. Let the Readers diligently wey all the whole proceſſe of the text. For by & by after, where he addeth by way of expoſition, that Chriſt which was without ſinne was made ſinne for vs, to expreſſe the maner of reconciliation, doubtleſſe he meaneth nothing elſe by the word reconciling but iuſtifying. And that which he ſaith in another place, that we are made righteous by the obedience of Chriſt, could not ſtand together, vnleſſe we be accounted righteous before God, in him, and without our ſelues.

2. Cor. 5. 18.

Rom. 5. 19.

Oſianders opinion concerning iuſtification.

5 But where as Oſiander hath brought in, I wote not what monſter of eſſentiall righteouſnes, whereby, although his will was not to deſtroy free righteouſneſſe, yet he hath wrapped it within ſuch a miſt, as darkeneth godly mindes, and bereaueth them of the earneſt feeling of the grace of Chriſt: therefore ere I paſſe further to other things, it is woorth the labour to confute this doting error. Firſt this ſpeculation is but of meere and hungry curioſitie. He doth in deede heape together many teſtimonies of Scripture, to prooue that Chriſt is one with vs, and we one with him, which needeth no prooſe: but becauſe he keepeth not this bond of vnitie, he ſnareth himſelfe. But we which hold that we are made all one with Chriſt by the power of his ſpirit, may eaſily vndoe all his knots. He had conceiued a certaine thing very neare to the opinion of Manichees, to deſire to conuey the ſubſtance of God into men. Hereupon riſeth another inuention of his that Adam was faſhioned after the Image of God, becauſe euen before the fall Chriſt was ordained the paterne of the nature of man. But becauſe I would be ſhort, I will tarry vpon the matter that I haue preſently in hand. He ſaith that we are one with Chriſt. We graunt. But we deny that the ſubſtance of Chriſt is mingled with ours. Moreouer we ſay that this principle, that Chriſt is righteouſneſſe to vs, becauſe he is an eternall God, the fountaine of righteouſneſſe and the very ſelfe righteouſneſſe of God, is wrongfully drawen to defend his deceites. The Readers ſhall pardon me, if I doe now but touch theſe things that the order of teaching requireth to be deferred vnto another place. But although he excuſe himſelfe from meaning nothing elſe by the name of eſſentiall righteouſneſſe, but to reſiſt this opinion that we are accounted righteous for Chriſts ſake: yet he plainly expreſſeth that he is not contented with that righteousnesse that is purchased for vs by the obedience and sacrifice of Christ, but faigneth that we are substantially righteous in God, as well by substance as by qualitie powred into vs. For this is the reason why he so earnestly affirmeth, that not onely Christ, but also the Father & the holy Ghost do dwell in vs. Which although I grant to be true, yet I say that he wrongfully wresteth it. For he should haue cõsidered the maner of dwelling, that is, that the Father and the holy Ghost are in Christ, and as the fulnesse of the Godhead dwelleth in him, so do we possesse whole God in him. Therfore all that he saith seuerally of the Father and the holy Ghost, tendeth to no other end but to draw the simple from Christ. And then he thrusteth in a mixture of substances, whereby God powring himselfe into vs, doth make vs as it were a part of himselfe. For he reckeneth it almost a matter of nothing, that it is wrought by the power of the holy Ghost, that we grow into one with Christ, and that he is our head and we his members, vnlesse his very substance be mingled with vs. But in the Father and the holy Ghost (as I haue said) he doth more openly bewray what he thinketh, euen this, that we be iustified not by the onely grace of the Mediator, and that righteousnesse is not simply or perfectly offered vs in his person, but that we are made partakers of the righteousnesse of God, when God is essentially made one with vs.

Osianders first errour, that iustifying righteousnesse is not a free imputation of holinesse, but an holinesse which the substance of God remaining in vs doth worke.

6 If he did say no more, but that Christ in iustifying vs, is by essentiall conioyning made ours: and that not onely he is our head, in that he is man, but also that the substance of the diuine nature is powred into vs: He should with lesse hurt feede himselfe daintily, and peraduenture so great a contention should not haue beene raised for this doting error. But sith this beginning is like a cuttle that with casting out of blacke and thicke blood hideth her many tailes, we must needes earnestly resist vnlesse we will wittingly and willingly suffer that righteousnesse to be taken from vs, which only bringeth vs confidence to glory of saluation. For in all this discourse, the name of righteousnesse, and this word iustifying, extend to two parts: that to be iustified is not only to be reconciled to God with free pardon, but also to be made righteous, that righteousnes is not a free imputation but a holinesse and vprightnesse, which the substance of God remaining in vs doth breath into vs. Then he stoutly denieth, that Christ is our righteousnesse in respect that being a Priest he did with satisfactorily purging sinnes appease his Father toward vs, but in respect that he is eternall God and life. To proue that first point, that God doth iustifie not onely by forgiuing but also by regenerating, he asketh whether God doth leaue them whom he doth iustifie such as they were by nature, chaunging nothing of their vices. The answere hereof is very easie: that as Christ cannot be torne in parts, so these two things which we together and ioyntly receiue in him, that is to say righteousnesse and sanctification, are inseparable. Therefore whom soeuer God receiueth into fauour, he doth also therewithall giue them the spirit of adoption, by the power whereof he newly fashioneth them after his image. But if the brightnesse of the Sunne cannot be seuered from the heate thereof, shall we therefore say that the earth is warmed with the light, and enlightened with the heate? There is nothing more fit for this purpose, than this similitude, The Sunne with his heate giueth life and fruitfulnesse to the earth, with his beames he giueth light and brightnesse. Here is a mutuall and vnseparable conioyning: yet reason for forbiddeth to conuey to the one that which is peculiar to the other. Like absurditie is in this confusion of two sortes of graces, that Osiander trusteth in. For because God doth in deed renew them to the obseruing of righteousnesse whom he freely accounteth for righteous, therefore Osiander confoundeth that gift of regeneration with this free acceptation, and affirmeth that they be all one and the selfe same thing. But the Scripture ioyning them both together, yet doth distinctly recken them, that the manifold grace of God may the better appeare vnto vs. For that saying of Paul is not superfluous, that Christ was giuen vs vnto righteousnesse and sanctification. And whensoeuer he reasoneth to proue by the saluation purchased for vs by the fatherly loue of God, and by the grace of Christ, that we are called to holinesse and cleannesse, he plainely declareth, that it is one thing to be iustified, and another to be made new creatures. But when Osiander commeth to the Scripture, he corrupteth as many places as he alleadgeth. Where Paul saith that Faith is accounted for righteousnesse to him that worketh worketh not, but beleeueth in him that iuſtifieth the wicked man, he expoundeth it to make righteous. With like raſhneſſe, he depraueth all the fourth Chapter to the Romanes, and ſticketh not with like falſe colour to corrupt that place which I euen now alledged, Who ſhall accuſe the elects of God? it is God that iuſtifieth: where it is plaine that he ſpeaketh ſimply of guiltines & acquiting, and the meaning of the Apoſtle hangeth vpon a comparing of contraries. Therefore Oſiander is found too fond a babler, as well in that reaſon as in alledging the teſtimonies of Scripture. And no more rightly doth he ſpeake of the name of righteouſnes, in ſaying that Faith was accounted to Abraham for righteouſnes, after that embracing Chriſt (which is the righteouſnes of God and God himſelfe) he excelled in ſingular vertues, whereby appeareth that of two whole places he hath wrongfully made one corrupt place. For the righteouſnes that is there mentioned, pertaineth not to the whole courſe of his calling: but rather the holy Ghoſt teſtifieth, that although the vertues of Abrahã were ſingularly excellent, & that with long continuãce he at length had encreaſed them: yet he did no other way pleaſe God, but by this, that he receiued by faith the grace offered in the promiſe. Whereupon followeth, that in iuſtification there is no place for workes, as Paul very well affirmeth. Rom. 4.5.

7 As for this that Oſiander obiecteth, that the power of iuſtifying is not in Faith of it ſelfe, but in reſpect that it receiueth Chriſt, I willingly graunt it. For if Faith did iuſtifie of it ſelfe, or by inward force, as they call it, and as it is alway feeble and vnperfect it could not worke iuſtification but in part, ſo ſhould the iuſtification be maymed, that ſhould giue vs but a piece of ſaluation. As for vs, we imagine no ſuch thing, but in proper ſpeaking do ſay that God onely iuſtifieth: and then we giue the ſame to Chriſt, becauſe he was giuen vs vnto righteouſneſſe: and Faith we compare as it were to a veſſell. For except we came emptie with open mouth of our Soule to craue the grace of Chriſt, we cannot be able to receiue Chriſt. Whereupon we gather that we doe not take from Chriſt the power of iuſtifying, when we teach that he is firſt receiued by Faith, before that his righteouſneſſe be receiued. But yet I doe not admit the crooked figures of this Sophiſter, when he ſaith that faith is Chriſt: as if an earthen pot were a treaſure, becauſe gold is hidden in it. For the reaſon is not vnlike, but that Faith although it be by it ſelfe of no worthineſſe or price, may iuſtifie vs in bringing Chriſt, as a pot full of money maketh a man rich. Therefore I ſay that Faith, which is onely the inſtrument to receiue righteouſnes, is vnfitly mingled with Chriſt which is the materiall cauſe and both Author and Miniſter of ſo great ſo a benefit. Now is this doubt alſo diſſolued. How this word Faith ought to be vnderſtanded when we entreat of iuſtification.

Iuſtification granted by Oſiander to be through beleeuing, ſo that beliefe be taken for Chriſt which is beleeued.

8 In the receiuing of Chriſt he goeth further: for he ſaith, that the inward word is receiued by the miniſtration of the outward word, thereby to draw vs from the prieſthood of Chriſt and the perſon of the Mediatour to his outward Godhead. As for vs, we diuide not Chriſt, but we ſay that he is the ſame eternall word of God, which reconciling vs to God in his fleſh, gaue vs righteouſnes: and we confeſſe that otherwiſe he could not haue fulfilled the office of Mediator, and purchaſed vs righteouſneſſe, vnleſſe he had bene eternall God. But this is Oſianders doctrine, whereas Chriſt is both God and man, that he was made righteouſneſſe to vs, in reſpect of his nature of Godhead, and not of manhood. But if this properly belong to the Godhead, then it ſhal not be peculiar to Chriſt, but common with the father and the holy ghoſt, for as much as there is not one righteouſneſſe of the one, and another of the other. Moreouer, that which was naturally from eternitie, could not be conueniently ſaid to be made to vs. But although we grant this, that God was made righteouſnes for vs: how ſhall it agree that that which is ſet betweene, is made of God? Truly that properly belongeth to the perſon of the Mediator: which though he containe in himſelfe the nature of Godhead, yet here he is ſpecially ſignified by his proper title, by which he is ſeuerally diſcerned from the father and the holy Ghoſt. But he fooliſhly triumpheth in that one word of Hieremie, where he promiſeth that the Lord Iehouah ſhall be our righteouſneſſe, but out of that he ſhall gather nothing, but that Chriſt which is righteouſneſſe, is God openly ſhewed in the fleſh. In another place we haue rehearſed out of Pauls ſermon, that God purchaſed to himſelfe the Church with his bloud, if any man gather thereupon, that the bloud wherewith ſins were purged was diuine, and of the nature of Godhead, who who can abide so foule an errour? But Osiander thinketh that with this so childish a cauillation he hath gotten all things, he swelleth, he leapeth for ioy, and stuffeth many leaues full with his bigge words: when yet there is a plaine and readie solution for it in saying that the word Iehoua indeed when he is made the issue of Dauid shall be the Esay 53.11. righteousnesse of the godly: But Esay teacheth in what sense, saying: My iust seruant shall with knowledge of himselfe iustifie many. Let vs note that the Father speaketh: that he giueth to the Sonne the office of iustifying: he addeth a cause, for that he is iust, and setteth the maner or meane as they call it in the doctrine whereby Christ is knowen. For it is a more commodious exposition to take this word Daah knowledge passiuely. Hereupon I gather first that Christ was made righteousnesse when he did put on the forme of a seruant: secondly, that he did iustifie vs in respect that he shewed himselfe obedient to his Father: and that therefore he doth not this for vs according to his nature of Godhead, but according to the office of dispensation cõmitted vnto him. For although God alone is the fountaine of righteousnesse, and we be made righteous by no other meanes but by the partaking of him: yet because we are by vnhappie disagreement estranged from his righteousnesse we must needs come downe to this lower remedy, that Christ may iustifie vs with the force of his death and resurrection.

How Christ doth iustifie as man, and how as God.

9 If he obiect that this is a worke of such excellencie, that it is aboue the nature of man, and therefore cannot be ascribed but to the nature of God, the first I grant: but in the second I say that he is vnwisely deceiued. For although Christ could neither cleanse our Soules with his blood, nor appease his Father with his sacrifice, nor acquite vs from guiltinesse, nor doe the office of a Priest, vnlesse he had beene true God, because the strength of the flesh had beene too weake for so great a burden: yet it is certaine that he perfourmed all these things according to his nature of manhood. For if it be demanded how we be iustified, Paul answereth, by the obedience of Christ.
Rom.5.19. But did he any otherwise obey than by taking vpon him the shape of a seruant? whereupon we gather that righteousnesse was giuen vs in his flesh. Likewise in the other words (which I maruell that Osiander is not ashamed to alleadge so often) he appointeth the fountaine of righteousnesse no where else but in the flesh of Christ. Him that knew no sinne he made sinne for vs, that we might be the righteousnesse of God in him. Osiander with full mouth aduaunceth the righteousnesse of God, and triumpheth as though he had prooued that it is his imaginatiue ghost of essentiall righteousnesse: when the words sound farre otherwise, that we be righteous by the clensing made by Christ. Very yoong beginners should not haue beene ignorant that Iohn 10. the righteousnesse of God is taken for the righteousnesse that God alloweth, as in Iohn, where the glory of God is compared with the glory of men. I know that sometime it is called the righteousnesse of God, whereof God is the Author and which God giueth vs: but though I say nothing, the Readers that haue their sound wit, doe perceiue that nothing else is meant in this place, but that we stand vpright before the iudgement seate of God, being vpholden by the clensing sacrifice of Christs death. And there is not so great importance in the word, so that Osiander doe agree with vs in this point that we are iustified in Christ, in this respect that he was made a propitiatorie sacrifice for vs, which cannot agree with his nature of Godhead. After which sort, when Christ meaneth to seale the righteousnesse and saluation that he hath brought vs, he setteth before vs an assured pledge thereof in his flesh. He doth in deede call himselfe the liuely bread, but expressing the maner here, he addeth that his flesh is verily meate, and his bloud is verily drinke. Which maner of teaching is seene in the Sacraments, which although they direct our Faith to whole Christ, and not to halfe Christ, yet they doe therewithall teach that the matter of righteousnesse and saluation remaineth in his flesh: Not in that that he is only man, he either iustifieth or quickeneth of himselfe, but because it pleased God to shew openly in the Mediator that which was hidden and incomprehensible in himselfe. Whereupon I am wont to say, that Christ is as it were a fountaine set open for vs, out of which we may draw that which otherwise should without fruite lie hidden in that close and deepe spring that riseth vp vnto vs in the person of the Mediator. In this maner and meaning, I doe not deny that Christ as he is God and man doth iustifie vs, and that this is also the worke of the Father and the holy Ghoſt as well as his. Finally, that the righteouſneſſe whereof Chriſt maketh vs partakers, is the eternall righteouſneſſe of the eternall God, ſo that he yeelde to the ſure and plaine reaſons that I haue alleadged.

Although we be not iuſtified vnleſſe Chriſt doe dwell in our harts, yet it is not the eſſentiall poſſeſſing of Chriſt as God which doth iuſtifie.

10 Now that he ſhould not with his cauillations deceiue the vnskilfull, I grant that we want this incomparable benefite, till Chriſt be made ours. Therefore we ſet that conioyning of the head and the members, the dwelling of Chriſt in our harts, and that myſticall vnion, in the higheſt degree: that Chriſt being made ours, may make vs partakers of the gifts wherewith he is endued. Therefore we doe not behold him a farre off out of our ſelues, that righteouſneſſe may be imputed vnto vs, but becauſe we haue put on him, and are graffed into his body: finally becauſe he hath vouchſafed to make vs one with him, therefore we glory that we haue a fellowſhip of righteouſneſſe with him. So is Oſianders ſlanderous cauillation cofuted, where he ſaith that we count Faith righteouſneſſe, as though we ſpoiled Chriſt of his right, when we ſay that we come by Faith emptie to him, to giue roume to his grace, that he onely may fill vs. But Oſiander refuſing this ſpirituall conioyning, enforceth a groſſe mingling with the faithfull, and therefore he odiouſly calleth all them Zwinglians that ſubſcribe not to his fantaſticall errour, concerning eſſentiall righteouſneſſe: becauſe they doe not thinke that Chriſt is ſubſtantially eaten in the Lords Supper. As for me, I count it a great glory to be ſo reproched of a proud man & giuen to his owne errors. Albeit he touched not me onely, but alſo other writers well knowen to the world, whom he ought to haue modeſtly reuerenced. It mooueth me nothing, which meddle not with mine own priuate cauſe: and ſo much the more ſincerely I handle this cauſe, being free from all corrupt affection. Whereas therefore he ſo importunately requireth eſſentiall righteouſneſſe, and the eſſentiall dwelling of Chriſt in vs, it tendeth to this end: firſt that God ſhould with a groſſe mixture poure himſelfe into vs, as he faigned a fleſhly eating of Chriſt in the Supper: ſecondly that God ſhould breath his righteouſneſſe into vs, whereby we may be really righteous with him: for by his opinion, this righteouſnes is as well God himſelfe, as the goodneſſe or holineſſe, or pureneſſe of God. I will not ſpend much labour in wiping away the teſtimonies that he bringeth, which he wrongfully wreſteth from the heauenly life vnto this preſent ſtate. Through Chriſt (ſaith Peter) are giuen vs the precious and moſt great promiſes, that we ſhould be made partakers of the nature of God: As though we were now ſuch as the Goſpell promiſed that we ſhall be at the laſt comming of Chriſt: yea Iohn telleth vs, that we ſhall then ſee God as he is, becauſe we ſhall be like vnto him. Onely I thought good to giue a ſmall taſt to the readers, that I doe of purpoſe paſſe ouer theſe trifles: not for that it is hard to confute them, but becauſe I will not be tedious in a ſuperfluous worke.

1. Pet. 1. 4.

The earneſt aſſurance of ſaluation enfeebled by Oſiander taking the iuſtification which is by righteouſneſſe imputed.

11 But in the ſecond point lurketh more poiſon, where he teacheth that we are righteous together with God. I thinke I haue already ſufficiently proued, that although this doctrine were not ſo peſtilent, yet becauſe it is cold and fruitleſſe, and of it ſelfe ſo vaine that it melteth away, it ought worthily to be vnſauoury to ſound and godly Readers. But this is an vntolerable wickedneſſe, vnder pretence of double righteouſneſſe, to enfeeble the earneſt aſſurance of ſaluation, and to carie vs aboue the cloudes, that we ſhould not embrace by Faith the grace of propitiation, and call vpon God with quiet mindes. Oſiander ſcorneth them, that teach that this word Iuſtifying is a law terme: becauſe, we muſt be righteous indeede. And he abhorreth nothing more than to ſay, that we be iuſtified by free imputation. But, if God do not iuſtifie vs by acquiting and pardoning, what meaneth that ſaying of Paul, God was in Chriſt reconciling the world to himſelfe, not imputing to men their ſinnes? For, him that had done no ſinne, he made ſinne for vs, that we might be the righteouſneſſe of God in him. Firſt I winne thus much, that they be iudged righteous that be reconciled to God. The maner how is declared, for that God iuſtifieth by forgiuing, as in another place iuſtification is ſet as contrarie to accuſation, which comparing of them as contraries, doth clearely ſhew that it is a phraſe borrowed from the vſe of the law. And there is no man being but meanely practiſed in the Hebrew tongue. if he haue a ſober braine, that is ignorant that this phraſe came from thence, and whereunto it tendeth, and what it meaneth. Now where Paul ſaith that Dauid deſcribed the righteouſneſſe without works, in theſe words, words, Blessed are those whose sinnes are forgiuen: Let Osiander answere me whether this be a full definition or but halfe a one. Truely Paul bringeth not in the Prophet for a witnesse, as though he taught that forgiuenesse of sinnes is but a part of righteousnesse, or a thing that ioyneth with other to the iustifying of man: But he includeth whole righteousnesse in free forgiuenesse, pronouncing the man blessed, whose sinnes are couered, to whom God hath forgiuen iniquities, and to whom he imputeth no transgressions. He doth measure and iudge such a mans felicitie thereby, because he is not this way righteous indeede, but by imputation. Osiander taketh exception and saith, that this should be slaunderous to God, and contrarie to his nature, if he should iustifie them that indeede remaine still wicked. But we must remember, as I haue alreadie said, that the grace of iustifying is not seuered from regeneration although they be seuerall things. But because it is more than sufficiently knowen by experience, that there abide alwaies in the righteous some remnants of sinne, it must needes be that they be far otherwise iustified than they be reformed into newnesse of life. For this latter point of reformation, God so beginneth in his elect, and throughout the whole course of their life, by little and little, and sometime slowly proceedeth in it, that they be alway before his seate in danger of the iudgement of death. But he iustifieth them not by part-meale, but so that they may freely, as clothed with the pureneſse of Christ, appeare in heauen. For no portion of righteousnesse could appease our consciences, till they be satisfied that God is fully pleased with vs, because we be righteous in his sight without exception. Whereupon followeth, that the doctrine of iustification is misturned, yea, ouerturned from the very foundation, when doubting is cast into mens mindes, when the affiance of saluation is shaken, when the free and dreadlesse inuocation is hindered, yea when quiet and tranquillitie with spirituall ioy is not stablished.

Gala.3.18. Whereupon Paul gathereth an argument by contraries, to proue, that the inheritance is not by the law. For by this meane faith should be made voide, which if it haue respect to workes, is ouerthrowen, because none of the most holie shall therein finde whereupon to trust. This difference of iustifying and regenerating (which two things Osiander confounding together, calleth two sorts of righteousnesse) is verie well expressed by Paul:

Rom.7.24. for speaking of his reall righteousnesse indeede, or of the vprightnesse wherewith he was endued (which Osiander nameth essentiall righteousnesse) he

Rom.8.33. lamentably crieth out: Wretch that I am: who shall deliuer me from the bodie of this death? But flying to the righteousnesse which is grounded vpon the onely mercie of God, he gloriously triumpheth ouer both life, death, reproches, hunger, sword, and all aduersities. Who shall accuse the elects of God whom he iustifieth? For I am surely perswaded, that nothing shall seuer vs from his loue in Christ. He plainly publisheth, that he hath the righteousnesse which alone fully sufficeth to saluation before God, so that the wretched bondage which he knowing to be in himselfe, did a little before bewaile his estate, may not minish nor any way hinder his boldnesse to glorie. This diuersitie is sufficiently knowen, and so familiar to all the holie ones, that grone vnder the burden of iniquities, and yet with victorious confidence, do mount vp aboue all feares. As for this that Osiander obiecteth, that it disagreeth with the nature of God, it falleth vpon himselfe. For although he clotheth the holie ones with a double righteousnesse as it were with a furred garment, yet he is compelled to confesse that without forgiuenesse of sinnes, they neuer pleased God. If that be true, then at least let him graunt, that they which are not righteous indeed, are accounted righteous according to the appointed proportion of imputation, as they call it. But how far shall a sinner extend this free acceptation that is put in place of righteousnesse; shall he measure it by the pound or by the ounce? Truely he shall hang doubtfull and wauering to this side and that side, because he may not take vnto him so much righteousnesse as shall be necessarie to stablish confidence. It is happie that he that would binde God to a law, is not Psal.51.6. iudge of this cause. But this shall stand stedfast, that thou maiest be iustified in thy sayings and ouercome when thou art iudged. But how great presumption is it to condemne the chiefe iudge when he freely acquiteth, that this answere may not be in

Exod.33.19. force, I will haue mercie vpon whom I will haue mercie. And yet the intercession of Moses which God did put to silence with this saying, tended not to this end that he should ſhould ſpare none, but that he ſhould acquite altogether, taking away their condemnation although they were guiltie of offence. And we doe ſay that they which were loſt haue their ſinnes buried and ſo are iuſtified before God: becauſe, as God hateth ſinne, ſo he can loue none but them whom he iuſtifieth. But this is a maruellous maner of iuſtifying, that they being couered with the righteouſneſſe of Chriſt ſtand not in feare of the iudgement which they haue deſerued, and when they worthilie condemne themſelues are accounted righteous without themſelues.

The fond obiections which Oſiander gathereth againſt them that hold a man iuſtified not by the righteouſneſs which Chriſt worketh in vs as he is God, but which we haue in his death and reſurrection as he is man.

12 But the Readers are to be warned, that they take good heede to the myſterie which he braggeth that he will not hide from them. For after that he hath long and largely trauailed to proue that we doe not obtaine fauour with God by the onely imputation of the righteouſneſſe of Chriſt, becauſe this ſhould be impoſſible for him to count them for righteous that are not righteous, (I vſe his owne words) at length he concludeth that Chriſt was giuen vs vnto righteouſneſſe, not in reſpect of his nature of manhood but of his nature of Godhead: and that although this righteouſneſſe cannot be found but in the perſon of the Mediatour, yet it is the righteouſneſſe not of man but of God, he doth now binde his rope made of two righteouſneſſes, but he plainly taketh away the office of iuſtifying from Chriſtes nature of manhood. But it is good to ſee how he diſagreeth. It is ſaid in the ſame place, that Chriſt was made vnto vs wiſedome, which belongeth to none but to the eternall worde. Therefore Chriſt in that he is man is not wiſedome. I anſwere that the onely begotten ſonne of God was indeede his eternall wiſedome, but in Paules writings that name is giuen him in diuers wiſe, becauſe all the treaſures of wiſedome and knowledge are laid vp in him. That therefore which he had with his father, he diſcloſed vnto vs: and ſo that which Paul ſaith is not referred vnto the eſſence of the ſonne of God, but to our vſe, and is rightly applied to Chriſtes nature of manhood: becauſe although he ſhined a light in darkneſſe, before that he did put on fleſh, yet it was a hidden light till the ſame Chriſt came foorth in the nature of man, the ſhining ſunne of righteouſneſſe, which therefore calleth himſelfe the light of the world. Alſo it is fooliſhly obiected of him, that the power of iuſtifying is far aboue both Angels and men: for as much as this hangeth not vpon the worthineſſe of any creature, but vpon the ordinance of God. If Angels will take vpon them to ſatisfie God, they can nothing preuaile, becauſe they are not appointed thereunto. But this ſingularly belonged to Chriſt being man, which was made ſubiect to the law, to redeeme vs from the curſe of the law. Alſo he doth ſlanderouſly cauill, that they which denie that Chriſt is our righteouſneſſe according to his nature of Godhead, doe leaue but one part of Chriſt, and (which is worſe) doe make two Gods, becauſe although they confeſſe, that God dwelleth in vs, yet they ſay againe that we are not righteous by the righteouſneſſe of God. For although we call Chriſt the author of life, in reſpect that he ſuffered death to deſtroy him that had the power of death, we do not by and by take away that honor from whole Chriſt as he was openly ſhewed God in the fleſh, but we onely make a diſtinction how the righteouſneſſe of God is conueied vnto vs, that we may enioy it. In which point Oſiander hath too fowly erred. Neither doe we denie that that which is openly giuen vs in Chriſt, proceedeth from the ſecret grace and power of God: and we ſtriue not againſt this, that the righteouſneſſe which Chriſt giueth vs is the righteouſneſſe of God that proceedeth from God: but we hold this ſtedfaſtly, that we haue righteouſneſſe and life in the death and reſurrection of Chriſt. I ouerpaſſe that heaping together of places whereof he may well be aſhamed, wherewith he hath tediouſly combred the Readers without choiſe and without common reaſon, to proue that whereſoeuer is made mention of righteouſneſſe, there ought to be vnderſtanded this eſſentiall righteouſneſſe. As where Dauid calleth vpon the righteouſneſſe of God to helpe him: whereas he doth in ſumme aboue an hundred times, Oſiander ſticketh not to corrupt ſo many ſentences. And nothing ſtronger is the other obiection, that that is properly and rightly called righteouſneſſe, whereby we be mooued to do rightly, but that God only worketh in vs both to will and to performe. For we doe alſo not denie, but that God reformeth vs with his ſpirit vnto holineſſe of life and righteouſneſſe: but we muſt firſt ſee whether he doe this by himſelfe and immediately, or by the hand of his ſonne, with whom he hath left all the fulneſſe of his holy ſpirit, that with his abundant ſtore he ſhould ſupply the neede of his members. Moreouer, although righteouſneſſe come vnto vs out of the ſecret fountaine of the Godhead, yet it followeth not that Chriſt which ſanctified himſelfe in the fleſh for our ſakes, was righteouſneſſe vnto vs according to his nature of Godhead. No leſſe fond is that which he ſaith, that Chriſt himſelfe was righteous by the righteouſneſſe of God. Becauſe vnleſſe the will of his father had mooued him, he could not himſelfe haue ſatisfied the office committed vnto him. For though we haue in another place ſaid, that all the deſeruings of Chriſt himſelfe doe proceede from the meere good will of God, yet that maketh nothing to that fantaſticall thing, wherewith Oſiander bewitcheth both his owne and ſimple mens eies. For who would ſuffer a man to gather this concluſion, that becauſe God is the fountaine and beginning of our righteouſneſſe, therefore we be eſſentially righteous, and the eſſence of Gods righteouſneſſe dwelleth in vs? In redeeming the Church (ſaith Eſay) God did put on his righteouſneſſe as a harneſſe: but did he ſo to ſpoyle Chriſt of his armour which he had giuen him, to make him to be no perfect redeemer? But the Prophet meant nothing elſe but that God borowed nothing out of himſelfe, nor was holpen by any aid to redeeme vs. Which thing Paul briefely expreſſed in other words, ſaying, that he gaue vs ſaluation to the ſhewing of his righteouſneſſe. But this doeth not ouerthrow that which he teacheth in another place, that we are righteous by the obedience of one man. Finally, whoſoeuer wrappeth vp a double righteouſneſſe, that poore ſoules may not reſt in the meere onely mercie of God, he doeth in a mockerie crowne Chriſt with thornes.

13 But foraſmuch as a great part of men imagineth righteouſneſſe to be made of faith and works, let vs firſt ſhew this alſo, that the righteouſneſſe of faith and works doe ſo differ, that when the one is ſtabliſhed, the other muſt needs be ouerthrowen. The Apoſtle ſaith, that he eſteemed all things as doung, that he might win Chriſt, and finde in him the righteouſneſſe that is of God by faith, counting not his righteouſneſſe that which is by the lawe, but that which is by the faith of Ieſus Chriſt. You ſee that here is alſo a compariſon of contraries, and that here is declared that he which will obtaine the righteouſneſſe of Chriſt, muſt forſake his owne righteouſneſſe. Therefore in another place he ſaith, that this was the cauſe of fall to the Iewes, that going about to eſtabliſh their owne righteouſneſſe, they were not ſubiect to the righteouſneſſe of God. If in ſtabliſhing our owne righteouſneſſe we ſhake away the righteouſneſſe of God, therefore to obtaine Gods righteouſneſſe our owne muſt be vtterly aboliſhed. And he ſheweth the ſame thing, when he ſaith, that our glorying is not excluded by the law, but by faith. Whereupon followeth, that ſo long as there remaineth any righteouſneſſe of works, how little ſoeuer it be, there ſtill remaineth to vs ſome matter to glorie vpon. Now if faith exclude all glorying, then the righteouſneſſe of works can no wiſe be coupled with the righteouſneſſe of faith. To this effect he ſpeaketh ſo plainely in the fourth Chapter to the Romanes, that he leaueth no roume for cauillations or ſhifts: If (ſayeth he) Abraham was iuſtified by works, he hath glorie. And immediatly he addeth: but he hath no glorie in the ſight of God. It followeth therefore that he was not iuſtified by works. Then he bringeth an other argument by contraries, when reward is rendered to works, that is done of debt and not of grace. Therefore it is not of the deſeruings of works. Wherefore farewell their dreame, that imagine a righteouſneſſe made of faith and workes mingled together.

Righteouſneſſe cannot be by faith and works ioyned together.

14 The Sophiſters thinke that they haue a ſuttle ſhift, that make to themſelues ſport and paſtime with wreſting of Scripture, and with vaine cauillations. For they expound worke in that place to be thoſe which men not yet regenerate do only literally and by the endeuour of free will without the grace of Chriſt: and do ſay that it belongeth not to ſpirituall workes. So by their opinion a man is iuſtified both by faith and by workes. So that the workes be not his owne, but the gifts of Chriſt and the fruites of regeneration. For they ſay that Paul ſpake ſo for none other cauſe, but to conuince the Iewes, truſting vpon their owne works, that they did fooliſhly preſume to claime righteouſneſſe to themſelues, ſith the onely ſpirit of Chriſt doeth giue it vs, and not any indeuour by our owne motion of nature. But they do not marke that in the compariſon of the righteouſneſſe of the law and the righteouſneſſe of the Goſpell which

Not only the workes of men vnregenerate but alſo faithfull mens deeds are excluded in the matter of iuſtification.

Paul bringeth in in another place, all workes are excluded with what title ſoeuer they be adorned. For he teacheth that this is the righteouſneſſe of the law, that he ſhould obtaine ſaluation that hath performed that which the law commandeth: and that this is the righteouſneſſe of faith, if we beleeue that Chriſt died and is riſen againe. Gal 3.12.
Moreouer we ſhall hereafter ſhew in place fit for it, that ſanctification and righteouſneſſe are ſeuerall benefites of Chriſt. Whereupon followeth that the very ſpirituall workes come not into the account when the power of iuſtifying is aſcribed to Faith. And where Paul denieth (as I euen now alledged) that Abraham had any thing whereupon to glory before God, becauſe he was not made righteous by works: this ought not to be reſtrained to the literall and outward kind of vertues, or to the endeuour of free will. But although the life of the Patriarch Abraham were ſpirituall and in maner Angelike, yet he had not ſufficient deſeruings of works to purchaſe him righteouſneſſe before God.

15 The Schoolemen teach a little more groſly that mingle their preparations: but theſe doe leſſe infect the ſimple and vnskilfull with corrupt doctrine, vnder pretence of Spirit and grace hiding the mercie of God which onely is able to appeaſe trembling conſciences. But we confeſſe with Paul, that the doers of the Law are iuſtified before God: but becauſe we are all farre from the keeping of the Law, hereupon we gather, that the workes which ſhould moſt of all haue auailed to righteouſneſſe, doe nothing help vs becauſe we lacke them. As for the common Papiſts or Schoolemen, they are in this point doubly deceiued: both becauſe they call Faith an aſſuredneſſe of conſcience in looking for reward at the hand of God for deſeruings, and alſo becauſe they expound the grace of God not to be a free imputation of righteouſneſſe, but the Holy Ghoſt helping to the endeuour of holineſſe. They reade in the Apoſtle that he which Heb.11.6.
commeth to God, muſt firſt beleeue that there is a God, and then that he is a renderer of reward to them that ſeeke him. But they marke not what is the maner of ſeeking. And that they are deceiued in the name of grace, is plainly proued by their owne writings. For Lombard expoundeth, that iuſtification by Chriſt is giuen vs two waies, Sent.li.3.diſt. 16.ca.2.
Firſt (ſaith he) the death of Chriſt doth iuſtifie vs, when by it charitie is ſtirred vp in our harts, by which we are made righteous. Secondly, that by the ſame death ſinne is deſtroyed, whereby Satan held vs captiue, ſo that now he hath not whereby to condemne vs. You ſee how he conſidereth the grace of God principally in iuſtification, to be ſo far as we are directed to good workes by the grace of the holy Ghoſt. He would forſooth haue followed the opinion of Auguſtine: but he followeth him a far off, and goeth far out of the way from rightly following him: becauſe if Auguſtine haue ſpoken any thing plainely he darkeneth it: if there be any thing in Auguſtine not very vnpure, he corrupteth it. The Schoolemen haue ſtill ſtraied from woorſe to woorſe, till with headlong fall at length they be rolled downe into a Pelagian error. And the very ſentence of Auguſtine, or at leaſt his maner of ſpeaking is not altogether to be receiued, For though he ſingularly well taketh from man all praiſe of righteouſneſſe, and aſſigneth it wholy to the grace of God, yet he referreth grace to ſanctification, whereby we are renewed into newneſſe of life by the holy Ghoſt.

The righteouſneſſe of Faith ſpoken of in Scripture turneth men quite from their owne works to the free goodnes of God, which pardoneth ſinne, and cauſeth ſinners to ſeeke the mercie whereby they are pardoned, and in Chriſt made righteous.

16 But the Scripture, when it ſpeaketh of the righteouſneſſe of Faith, leadeth vs to a far other end, that is to ſay, that turning away from the looking vpon our owne workes, we ſhould onely looke vnto the mercie of God and perfection of Chriſt. For it teacheth this order of iuſtification, that firſt God vouchſaueth to embrace man being a ſinner with his meere and free goodneſſe, conſidering nothing in him but miſerie whereby he may be mooued to mercy, foraſmuch as he ſeeth him altogether naked and void of good works, fetching from himſelfe the cauſe to do him good: then, that he moueth the ſinner himſelfe with feeling of his goodneſſe, which deſpairing vpon his owne works caſteth all the ſumme of his ſaluation vpon Gods mercy. This is the feeling of Faith, by which feeling the ſinner commeth into poſſeſſion of his ſaluation, when he acknowledgeth by the doctrine of the Goſpell that he is reconciled to God: that obtaining forgiueneſſe of ſinnes by meanes of the righteouſneſſe of Chriſt, he is iuſtified: and although he be regenerate by the ſpirit of God, he thinketh vpon continuall righteouſneſſe laid vp for him not in the good works to which he applieth himſelfe, but in the the onely righteousnesse of Christ. When these things shall be euery one particularly weyed, they shall giue a perfect declaration of our sentence. Albeit they might be better disposed in another order than they are set foorth. But it maketh little matter, so that they hang together in such sort that we may haue the whole matter truly declared and surely prooued.

The difference which S Paul to the Romans putteth betwen the righteousnes of the Gospell & of the law, excludeth works from that iustification which is through faith. Rom.10.5.

17 Here it is good to remember the relation that wee haue before said to be betweene faith and the Gospell: because it is said for this cause that faith iustifieth, for that it receiueth and embraceth the righteousnesse offered in the Gospell. And whereas it is said to be offered by the Gospell, thereby all consideration of workes is excluded. Which thing Paul declareth many times elsewhere, but most plainley in two places. For, to the Romanes, comparing the law and the Gospell together he saith: the righteousnesse that is by the law is thus, The man that doth these things shall liue in them. But the righteousnesse that is of faith offereth saluation, if thou beleeue in thy heart and confesse with thy mouth the Lord Iesus, and that the father hath raised him vp from the dead. See you not how he maketh this the difference of the law and the Gospell, that the law giueth righteousnesse to works, and the Gospel giueth free righteousnesse without helpe of works? it is a notable place, and that may deliuer vs out of many hard doubts, if we vnderstand that the same righteousnesse that is giuen vs by the Gospel is free from all conditions of the law. This is the reason, why he doth more than once with great seeming of contrarietie set the promise by way of oppesition against the law, as if the inheritance be of the law, then it is not of the promise: and all the rest in the same chapter to the same effect. Truely the law it selfe hath also her promises. Therefore there must needes be in the promises of the Gospel, something different and diuers from the promises of the law, vnlesse we will confesse that the comparison is verie fond. But what diuersitie shall this be, vnlesse it be that they are freely giuen, and vpholden by the onely mercie of God, whereas the promises of the law hang vpon the condition of works? Neither let any man here carpe against me, and say, that in this place the righteousnesse is reiected which men of their owne force and free will would compell God to receiue? for as much as Paul without exception teacheth that the law in commanding profiteth nothing: because there is none not onely of the common multitude, but also of the perfectest, that fulfilleth it. Loue vndoubtedly is the chiefe point of the law: when the spirit of God frameth vs vnto it, why is it not to vs a cause of righteousnesse, but for that euen in the holie ones it is vnperfect, and therefore of it selfe deserueth no reward.

Gal.3.18.

Rom.8.3.

The same difference to the same effect taught in the Epistle to the Galathians. Gal.3.12.

18 The second place is this. It is manifest that no man is iustified by the law before God: Because the righteous man shall liue by faith. But the law is not of faith: but the man that doth these things shall liue in them. How could this argument otherwise stand together, vnlesse we agree vpon this point, that works come not into the account of faith, but are vtterly to be seuered from it? The law (saith he) differeth from faith. Why so? because works are required to the righteousnes thereof. Therefore it followeth that works are not required to the righteousnes of faith. By this relation it appeareth that they which are iustified by faith are iustified beside the deseruing of works, yea without the deseruing of works, because faith receiueth that righteousnesse which the Gospel giueth. And the Gospell differeth from the law in this point, that it bindeth not righteousnes to works, but setteth it in the onely mercie of God. Like hereunto is that which he affirmeth to the Romanes, that Abraham had nothing to glorie vpon, because faith was imputed to him vnto righteousnesse, and he addeth a confirmation, because then there is place for the righteousnesse of faith, when there are no works to which a reward is due. Where be works (saith he) due reward is rendred vnto them: that which is giuen to faith is freely giuen. For the verie meaning of the words that he vseth in that place serue to proue the same. Whereas he adioyneth within a little after, that therefore we obtaine the inheritance by faith as according to grace, hereupon he gathereth that the inheritance is of free gift, because it is receiued by faith: and how commeth that, but because faith without any helpe of works leaneth wholy vpon the mercy of God? And in the same meaning without doubt he teacheth in another place, that the righteousnesse of God was openly shewed without the law, although it hath witnesse

Rom.4.8.

witnesse borne of it by the law and the Prophets: because excluding the law, he saith, that it is not holpen by works, and that we obtaine it not by working, but come emptie that we may receiue it.

19 By this time the Reader perceiueth with what equitie the Sophisters doe at this day cauill at our doctrine, when we say, that man is iustified by faith onely. They dare not denie that man is iustified by faith because it is so often found in Scripture: but because this word, Onely, is neuer expressed, they cannot abide to haue such an addition made. Is it so? But what wil they answer to these words of Paul, where he affirmeth that righteousnesse is not of faith except it be freely giuen? How can free gift agree with works? And with what cauillations wil they mock out, that which he saith in another place, that the righteousnesse of God is manifestly shewed in the Gospel? If righteousnesse be manifestly shewed in the Gospell, surely therein is contained not a torne or halfe righteousnesse, but full and perfect. Therefore the lawe hath no place therein. And they stand vpon not onely a false but also a foolish shift about this exclusiue word, Onely. Doeth not he perfectly enough giue all things to onely faith, that taketh all things from workes? What, I pray you meane these sayings, that righteousnesse was manifestly shewed without the law: that man is iustified freelie and without the works of the law? Heere they haue a wittie shift to escape withall, which although they deuise it not themselues, but borrowed it of Origen and certaine of the old writers, yet is very foolish. They prate that the ceremoniall works of the law, not the morall, are excluded. They profite so with continuall brawling, that they know not the very first rules of Logike. Doe they thinke that the Apostle doted when he alleaged these places to proue his saying? The man that shall doe these things shall liue in them: and, Cursed is euery one that fulfilleth not all things that are written in the volume of the law. Vnlesse they be mad, they will not say that life was promised to the keepers of Ceremonies, or curse threatned onely to the breakers of them. If these places be to be vnderstanded of the morall lawe, it is no doubt that the morall workes also are excluded from the power of iustifying. To the same purpose serue these arguments that he vseth: because the knowledge of sinne was by the law, therefore righteousnesse is not by the law. Because the lawe worketh wrath, therefore it worketh not righteousnesse. Because the lawe cannot make conscience assured, therefore also it cannot giue righteousnesse. Because faith is imputed vnto righteousnesse, therefore righteousnesse is not a reward of worke, but is giuen being not due. Because we are iustified by faith, therefore glorying is cut off. If there had bin a law giuen that might giue life, then righteousnesse were truly by the law: but God hath shut vp all vnder sinne that the promise might be giuen to the beleeuers. Let them now fondly say if they dare, that these things are spoken of ceremonies and not of maners: but very children would hisse out so great shamelesnesse. Therefore let vs hold this for certaine, that the whole lawe is spoken of, when the power of iustifying is taken away from the law.

The doctrine carped at without cause which teacheth iustification by faith, onely excluding thereby workes not onely ceremoniall but morall also.

20 But if any man maruaile why the Apostle vseth such an addition, not being content with onely naming works: the reason is readie to be shewed for it. For, although works be so highly esteemed, yet they haue that value by the allowance of God, rather than by their owne worthinesse. For who can boast vnto God of any righteousnesse of workes, but that which he hath allowed? Who dare claime any reward as due vnto them, but such as he hath promised? They haue therefore this of the bountifulnesse of God, that they are counted worthie both of the name and reward of righteousnesse: and they be of value onely for this cause, when the purpose of him that doth them is by them to shew his obedience to God. Wherefore the Apostle in another place, to proue that Abraham could not be iustified by works, alleageth that the law was giuen almost foure hundred and thirtie yeeres after the couenant made. Vnlearned men would laugh at such an argumēt, because there might be righteous works before the publishing of the law. But because he knew that there was no such value in works but by the testimonie and vouchsauing of God, therefore he taketh it as a thing confessed, that before the law they had no power to iustifie. We vnderstand why he namely expresseth the worke of the law, when he meaneth to take away iustification from any workes because controuersie may be mooued of those and none other.

Neither can workes iustifie though they be highly esteemed because the value of them dependeth onely vpon Gods allowance, neither doth loue giue vnto faith the force whereby it is able to iustifie.
Galat.3.7.

Albeit

Albeit sometime he excepteth all works without any addition, as when he saith that by the testimonie of Dauid blessednes is assigned to that man, to whom the Lord imputeth righteousnesse without works. Therefore they can with no cauillations bring to passe, but that we shall get this generall exclusiue only. And they do in vaine seeke that trifling subtletie, that we are iustified by that only faith which worketh by loue, so that righteousnesse must stand vpon loue. We graunt in deed with Paul, that no other faith iustifieth, but that which is effectually working with charitie: but that faith taketh not her power of iustifying from that effectualnesse of charitie. Yea it doth by no other meane iustifie, but because it bringeth vs into the communicating of the righteousnesse of Christ. Or else all that which the Apostle so earnestly presseth, should fall to nought. To him that worketh (saith he) the reward is not reckoned according to grace, but according to debt. But to him that worketh not, but beleeueth in him that iustifieth the vnrighteous, his faith is imputed vnto righteousnesse. Could he speake more euidētly than in so saying? that there is no righteousnesse of faith but where there are no works to which any reward is due: and that only then faith is imputed vnto righteousnesse, when righteousnesse is giuen by grace that is not due.

Galat.5.6.

Rom.4.4.

Sinne putteth enmitie betweene man and God: so that except it be pardoned vs, we cannot be ioyned vnto him.

Esai.59.7.

21 Now let vs examine how true that is, which is said in the definition, that the righteousnesse of faith is the reconciliation with God, which consisteth vpon the only forgiuenesse of sinnes. We must alway returne to this principle, that the wrath of God resteth vpon all men, so long as they continue to be sinners. That hath Esay excellently well set out in these words: The hand of the Lord is not shortned, that he is not able to saue: nor his eare dulled that he cannot heare: but your iniquities haue made disagreement betweene you and your God, and your sinnes haue hidden his face from you that he heareth you not. We heare that sinne is the diuision betweene man and God, and the turning away of Gods face from the sinner. Neither can it otherwise be. For it is disagreeing from his righteousnesse to haue any fellowship with sinne. Wherefore the Apostle teacheth that man is enemie to God till he be restored into fauour by Christ. Whom therefore the Lord receiueth into ioining with him, him he is said to iustifie: because he can neither receiue him into fauour, nor ioyne him with himselfe, but he must of a sinner make him righteous. And we further say, that this is done by the forgiuenesse of sinnes. For if they whom the Lord hath reconciled to himselfe be iudged by their works, they shall be found still sinners in deede, who yet must be free and cleane from sinne. It is certaine therefore that they whom God imbraceth, are no otherwise made righteous, but because they are cleansed by hauing the spots of their sinnes wiped away by forgiuenesse, that such a righteousnesse may in one word be called the forgiuenesse of sinnes.

Rom.5.8.

Righteousnes and reconcilement vnto God doe mutually containe the one the other, and are attained vnto when our sinnes are not imputed.

2.Cor.5.19.

2.Cor.5.21.

Rom.4.6.

22 Both these are most cleerly to be seene by these words of Paul, which I haue already alleaged: God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, not imputing their sinnes to man, and he hath left with vs the word of reconciliation. And then he addeth the summe of his message, that him which knew no sinne he made sinne for vs, that we might be made the righteousnesse of God in him. Here he nameth righteousnesse and reconciliation without difference, that we may perceiue that the one is mutually contained vnder the other. And he teacheth the manner to attaine this righteousnesse to be when our sinnes are not imputed vnto vs. Wherefore doubt thou not hereafter how God doth iustifie vs, when thou heares that he doth reconcile vs to himselfe by not imputing sinnes. So to the Romanes he prooueth by the testimonie of Dauid, that righteousnesse is imputed to man without works, because Dauid pronounceth the man blessed whose iniquities are forgiuen, whose sinnes are couered, to whom the Lord hath not imputed his offences. Without doubt by blessednesse he there meaneth righteousnesse. As sith he affirmeth the same to stand in the forgiuenesse of sinnes, there is no cause why we should otherwise define it. Therefore Zacharie the father of Iohn the Baptist singeth, that the knowledge of saluation consisteth in the forgiuenesse of sinnes. Which rule Paul following in his Sermon which he made to the Antiochians concerning the summe of saluation, as Luke reporteth it, concluded in this maner: By him forgiuenesse of sinnes is preached vnto you, and euery one that beleeueth in him is iustified from all these things, from which ye could not be iustified in the lawe of Moses.

Luk.1.77.

Act.13.38.

The

The Apoſtle ſo knitteth the forgiueneſſe of ſinnes with right eouſneſſe, that he ſheweth that they be both all one. Whereupon he rightfully reaſoneth that the righteouſneſſe is freely giuen vnto vs, which we obtaine by the louing kindneſſe of God. Neither ought it to ſeeme a ſtrange vnuſed ſpeech, that the faithfull are righteous before God, not by works, but by free acceptation: ſith both it is ſo oft found in the Scripture, and the old authors alſo do ſometime ſo ſpeake. For Auguſtine ſaith thus in one place: The righteouſnes of the ſaints in this world ſtandeth rather in forgiueneſſe of ſins, than in perfection of vertues. Wherewith agreeth the notable ſentence of Bernard: Not to ſin is the righteouſnes of God: but the righteouſneſſe of man, is the mercifull kindneſſe of God. He had before affirmed that Chriſt is to vs righteouſnes in abſolution, and therefore that they onely are righteous that haue obtained pardon by mercie.

De ciuit. Dei cap. 27. Serm. 23 in cant. Ser. 22.

23 Hereupon alſo followeth this, that by the onely meane of Chriſts righteouſneſſe, we obtaine to be iuſtified before God. Which is as much in effect as if it were ſaid, that man is not righteous in himſelfe, but becauſe the righteouſneſſe of Chriſt is by imputation enterpartened with him, which thing is woorthie to be heedfully marked. For that trifling error vaniſheth away, to ſay that man is therefore iuſtified by faith, becauſe faith taketh part of the Spirit of God by which he is made righteous, which is ſo contrarie to the doctrine aboue taught, that they can neuer be made to agree together. For it is no doubt that he is voide of his owne righteouſneſſe, that is taught to ſeeke righteouſneſſe without himſelfe. This the Apoſtle affirmeth moſt plainly when he writeth that he which knew no ſinne was made for vs a propitiatorie ſacrifice to clenſe away ſinne, that we might be made the righteouſneſſe of God in him. You ſee that our righteouſneſſe is not in vs but in Chriſt, and that it belongeth to vs only by this title, becauſe we be partakers of Chriſt, becauſe we poſſeſſe all his riches with him. And it maketh nothing to the contrarie that in another place he teacheth, that ſinne was condemned of ſinne in the fleſh of Chriſt, that the righteouſneſſe of the law might be fulfilled in vs: where he meaneth no other fulfilling, but that which we obtaine by imputation. For the Lord Chriſt doth in ſuch ſort communicate his righteouſneſſe with vs, that after a certaine maruellous maner, he powreth the force thereof into vs, ſo much as pertaineth to the iudgement of God. It appeareth that he did no otherwiſe meane, by the other ſentence which he had ſpoken a litle before. As by the diſobedience of one man we were made ſinners, ſo by the obedienc of one man we are iuſtified. What is it elſe to ſet our righteouſneſſe in the obedience of Chriſt, but to affirme that hereby onely we are accounted righteous, becauſe the obedience of Chriſt is imputed vnto vs as if it were our owne? Therefore me thinkes that Ambroſe hath excellently well ſhewed how there is an example of this righteouſneſſe in the bleſſing of Iacob. For Iacob hauing not of himſelfe deſerued the preeminence of the firſt begotten ſonne, hid himſelfe in the apparell of his brother, and being clothed with his brothers coate that ſauoured of a moſt ſweete ſmell, he crept into the fauour of his father, and receiued the bleſſing to his owne commoditie vnder the perſon of another: ſo we doe lie hidden vnder the precious pureneſſe of Chriſt our elder brother, that we may get a teſtimonie of righteouſneſſe in the ſight of God. The words of Ambroſe are theſe. Whereas Iſaac ſmelt the ſauour of the garments, peraduenture this is ment thereby, that we are not iuſtified by workes but by faith: becauſe fleſhly weakneſſe hindreth workes, but the brightneſſe of faith which meriteth forgiueneſſe of ſins, ouerſhadoweth the error of deeds. And truly ſo it is. For, that we may appeare before the face of God vnto ſaluation, it is neceſſary for vs to ſmell ſweetly with his odour, and to haue our faultes couered and barred with his perfection.

The righteouſneſſe of Chriſt imputed vnto vs maketh vs righteous.

THE TVVELFTH CHAPTER.

That to the end we may be fully perſwaded of the free iuſtification, we muſt lift vp our mindes to the iudgement ſeate of God.

ALthough it appeareth by moſt euident teſtimonies, that all theſe things are true yet we ſhall not cleerely perceiue how neceſſarie they be, vntill we haue ſet before our eyes thoſe things that ought to be the groundes of all this diſputation. Firſt therefore of their owne works is their not considering how exact puritie it must be that shall answer the law when it commeth to be strictly examined before the iudgement seate of God.

therefore let vs remember this, that we purpose not to speake of the righteousnesse of a worldly iudiciall court, but of the heauenly iudgement seate: that we should not measure by our owne small portion, by what vprightnesse of works Gods iudgements may be satisfied. But it is maruellous to see with what rashnesse & boldnesse it is commonly debated. Yea and it is to be seene how none doe more boldly or with fuller mouthes (as the saying is) prate of the righteousnesse of works, than they that are either monstrously sicke of open outward diseases, or be readie to burst with inward vices. That commeth to passe because they thinke not vpon the righteousnesse of God, whereof if they had neuer so little feeling, they would neuer make so great a mockery of it. And truely it is out of measure lightly regarded, when it is not acknowledged to be such and so perfect that nothing be imputed vnto it but euery way whole and absolute, and defiled with no vncleanesse: such as neuer was and neuer shall be able to be found in man. It is indeed easie and ready for euery man in Schooles to talke vainely vpon the worthinesse of works to iustifie men: But when they come vnto the sight of God, such dalliance must auoid, because there is earnest doing vsed, and no trifling strife about words. To this, to this I say, we must apply our mind, if we will profitablie enquire of true righteousnesse, how may we answer the heauenly iudge when he calleth vs to account. Let vs thinke him to be a iudge, not such a one as our own vnderstandings do of themselues imagine: but such a one as he is painted out in the Scripture, with whose brightnesse the Starres shall be darkned, by whose strength the hilles do melt away, by whose wrath the earth is shaken, by whose wisedome the wise are taken in their subtletie, by whose pureness all things are proued vnpure, whose righteousnesse the Angels are not able to beare, which maketh the innocent not innocent, whose vengeance when it is once kindled pearceth to the bottome of hell. If he (I say) sit to examine mens dooings, who shall appeere assured before his throne? who shall dwell with a deuouring fire? saith the Prophet. Who shall abide with continuall burnings? he that walketh in righteousnesses and speaketh truth, &c. But let such a one come foorth, whatsoeuer he be. But that answer maketh that none commeth foorth. For this terrible saying soundeth to the contrarie: Lord if thou marke iniquities, Lord, who shall abide it? truly all must needs immediately perish, as it is written in another place: Shall man be iustified if he be compared with God, or shall he be purer then his maker? Behold, they that serue him are not faithfull, and he hath found peruersenesse in his Angels. How much more shall they that dwell in houses of clay, and that haue an earthly foundation, be consumed with mothes? they shall be cut downe from the morning to the euening. Behold among his Saints there is none faithfull, and the heauens are not cleane in his sight: how much more is man abhominable and vnprofitable, which drinketh iniquitie as water? I graunt indeed that in the booke of Iob, is mention made of a righteousnesse that is higher than the keeping of the law. And it is good to vnderstand this distinction: because although a man did satisfie the law, yet he could not so stand to the triall of that righteousnesse that passeth all senses. Therefore although Iob be cleare in his owne conscience, yet he is amased, and not able to speake because he seeth that very angelike holinesse cannot appease God, if he exactly weigh their works. But I therefore will at this time ouerpasse that righteousnesse which I haue spoken of, because it is incomprehensible: but only this I say, that if our life be examined by the rule of the written law, we are more than senseless if so many curses wherewith the Lord hath willed vs to be awaked do not torment vs with horrible feare, and among other this generall curse, Cursed is euery one that doth not abide in all the things that are written in the booke. Finally all this discourse shall be but vnsauorie and cold, vnlesse euery man yeeld himselfe guiltie before the heauenly iudge, and willingly throw downe and abase himselfe, being carefull how he may be acquited.

Esay 33.14.

Psal.130.3. Iob.4.17.

Deut.27.26.

How righteous soeuer we be in comparison of other men, this in the sight of God is not able to make vs blameles.

2 To this, to this I say, we should haue lift vp our eies, to learne rather to tremble for feare, than vainely to reioice. It is indeed easie, so long as the comparison extendeth no further than men, for euery man to thinke himselfe to haue somewhat which other ought not to despise. But when we rise vp to haue respect vnto God, then suddenly that confidence falleth to the ground and commeth to nought. And in the same case altogither is our soule in respect of God, as mans body is in respect of the heauen. For the

the light of the eie, ſo long as it continueth in viewing things that lie neere vnto it, doth ſhew of what pearcing force it is, but if it be once directed vp to the ſunne, then being daſelled and dulled with the too great brightnes thereof, it feeleth no leſſe feeblenes of it ſelfe in beholding of the Sunne, than it perceiued ſtrength in beholding inferiour things. Therefore let vs not deceiue our ſelues with vaine confidence, although we count our ſelues either equall or ſuperiour to other men: but that is nothing to God, by whoſe will this knowledge is to be tried. But if our wildneſſe cannot be tamed with theſe admonitions, he will anſwere to vs as he ſaid to the Phariſees: you be they that iuſtifie your ſelues before men: but that which is high to men is abhominable to God. Now goe thy way and proudly boaſt of thy righteouſneſſe among men, while God from heauen abhorreth it. But what ſay the ſeruants of God that are truly inſtructed with his Spirit? Enter not into iudgement with thy ſeruant, becauſe euery liuing man ſhall not be iuſtified in thy ſight. Another ſaith, although in ſomewhat diuers meaning: Man cannot be righteous with God: if he will contend with him, he ſhall not be able to anſwere one for a thouſand. Here we now plainly heare what is the righteouſneſſe of God, euen ſuch as can be ſatisfied with no works of men, to whom when it examineth vs of a thouſand offences, we cannot purge our ſelues of one. Such a righteouſneſſe had that ſame choſen inſtrument of God Paul conceiued, when he profeſſed that he knew himſelfe guiltie in nothing, but that he was not thereby iuſtified.

3 And not onely ſuch examples are in the holy Scriptures, but alſo all godly writers do ſhew that they were alway of this minde. So Auguſtine ſaith, All the godly that grone vnder this burden of corruptible fleſh, and in this weakneſſe of life haue this only hope that we haue one Mediator Ieſus Chriſt the righteous, and he is the appeaſement for our ſinnes. What ſaith he? If this be their onely hope, where is the confidence of workes? For when he calleth it only, he leaueth none other. And Bernard ſaith. And indeed where is ſafe and ſtedfaſt reſt and aſſuredneſſe for the weake, but in the wounds of our Sauiour? and ſo much the ſurer I dwell therein as he is mightier to ſaue. The world rageth, the bodie burdeneth, the diuell lieth in waite: I fall not, becauſe I am builded vpon the ſure rocke: I haue ſinned a grieuous ſinne, my conſcience is troubled, but it ſhall not be ouertroubled, becauſe I ſhall remember the woundes of the Lord. And hereupō afterward he concludeth, Therfore my merit is the Lords taking of mercy, I am not vtterly without merite, ſo long as he is not without mercies. But if the mercies of the Lord be many, then I alſo haue as many merites. Shall I ſing mine owne righteouſneſſe? Lord I will remember onely thy righteouſneſſe. For that is alſo my righteouſneſſe, for he is made vnto me righteouſneſſe of God. Againe in another place, This is the whole merite of man, if he put his whole hope in him that ſaueth whole man. Likewiſe where retaining peace to himſelfe he leaueth the glory to God, To thee (ſaith he) let glory remaine vnminiſhed: it ſhall be well with me, if I haue peace, I forſweare glory altogether, leaſt I wrongfully take vpon me that which is not mine owne, I looſe alſo that which is offered me. And more plainly in another place he ſaith: Why ſhould the Church be carefull of merites, which hath a ſurer and ſafer way to glory vpon the purpoſe of God? So there is no cauſe why thou ſhouldeſt aske, by what merites we hope for good things, ſpecially when thou heareſt in the Prophet, I will doe it, not for your ſakes, but for mine owne ſake, ſaith the Lord. It ſufficeth for merite, to know what merites ſuffice not. But as it ſufficeth for merite not to preſume of merites, ſo to be without merites ſufficeth to iudgement. Whereas he freely vſeth this worde Merites for good works, we muſt therein beare with the cuſtome. But in the ende his purpoſe was to make hypocrites afraid, that wildly range with licentiouſneſſe of ſinning againſt the grace of God. As afterward he expoundeth himſelfe, ſaying: Happy is the Church that neither wanteth merites without preſumption, nor preſumption without merites. It hath whereupon to preſume, but not merites. It hath merites, but to deſerue, not to preſume. Is not the very not preſuming a deſeruing? Therefore it preſumeth ſo much the more boldly, becauſe it preſumeth not, hauing large matter to glory vpon, euen the many mercies of the Lord.

the iudgement of God. For if the Starres that seemed most bright in the night season, doe loose their brightnesse, with sight of the Sunne, what thinke we shall become euen of the rarest innocencie of man, when it shall be compared with the pureneſſe of God? For that shall be a most seuere examination, that shall pearce into the most hidden thoughts of the hart, and (as Paul saith) shall reueale the secrets of darkenesse, and disclose the hidden things of the hart, which shall compell the lurking and vnwilling conscience to vtter all things that now are fallen out of remembrance. The diuell our accuser will presse vs, which is priuie to all the wicked deeds that he hath mooued vs to doe. There the outward pompous shewes of good workes which now onely are esteemed, shall nothing profit vs. Onely the pureneſſe of will shall be required. Wherefore the hypocrisie, not onely whereby euery man knowing himselfe guiltie before God desireth to boast himselfe before men, but also wherewith euery man deceiueth himselfe before God (as we be all inclined to stroke and flatter our selues) shall fall downe confounded, howsoeuer it now be proude, with more than drunken boldnesse. They that bend not their wit to such a sight, may indeede for a short time sweetly and pleasantly frame a righteousnesse to themselues, but it is such a righteousnesse as shall be by and by shaken away from them at the iudgement of God: like as great riches heaped vp in a dreame doe vanish away from men when they awake. But they that shall earnestly as it were in the sight of God, enquire of the true rule of righteousnesse, shall certainely finde that all the works of men, if they be iudged by their owne worthinesse, are nothing but defilings and filthinesse: that that which among the common people is accompted righteousnesse, is before God meere wickednesse: that that which is iudged puritie, is vncleannesse: that that which is reckoned glorie, is but shame.

That partiall and blinde affection which because we beare vnto our selues when we are our own iudges, maketh vs fondly to imagine that such we shall seeme also when God iudgeth vs must be shaken off. Prou.21.2. & 16.2.

5 From this beholding of the perfection of God, let it not grieue vs to descend to looke vpon our selues without flatterie or blind affection of loue. For it is no maruell if we be all so blind in this behalfe, forasmuch as none of vs doth beware of the pestilent tenderneſſe toward himselfe, which (as the Scripture crieth out) naturally sticketh fast in vs all. To euery man (saith Salomon) his owne way is right in his owne eies. Againe. All the waies of man seeme cleane in his owne eies. But what? Is he acquited by this blindnesse? No, But (as he further saith in the same place) the Lord weigheth the hearts, that is to say, while man flattereth himselfe by reason of the outward visor or righteousnesse that he beareth in resemblance, in the meane time the Lord with his ballance examineth the hidden vncleanneſſe of the heart. Therefore sith we so nothing profit with such flatteries, let vs not wilfully mocke our selues to our owne destruction. But that we may trie our selues rightly, we must necessarily call backe our conscience to the iudgement seate of God. For we do altogether need his light to disclose the secret foldings of our peruersnes, which otherwise lie too deeply hidden. For then and neuer till then, we shall cleerely perceiue what is meant hereby: that man being rottennesse and a worme, abhominable and vaine, which drinketh wickednesse as water, is far from being iustified before God. For who should make that cleane that is conceiued of vncleane seed? not one man. Then shall we also finde that by experience, which Iob said of himselfe? If I will goe about to shew my selfe innocent, mine owne mouth shall condemne me: If I will shew my selfe righteous: it will proue me wicked. For that is not meant of one age onely, but of all ages, which the Prophet in old time complained of Israell, that all went astray like sheepe, that euery one turned aside to his owne way. For he there comprehendeth all them, to whom the grace of redemption should come. And the rigorousnesse of this examination ought to proceed so far, till it subdue vs, so that we be fully throwen downe withall, and by that meane prepare vs to receiue the grace of Christ. For he is deceiued that thinketh himselfe able to receiue the enioying of this grace, vntill he haue first throwen downe all hawtinesse of minde. This is a knowen saying: that God confoundeth the proude, and giueth grace to the humble.

6 * But what way is there to humble our selues, but that we being altogether needie and emptie, should giue place to the mercie of God? For I do not call it humblenesse, if we thinke that we haue any thing remaining with vs. And hitherto they haue taught a very hurtfull hypocrisie that haue ioyned these two things together, that we must thinke humblie of our selues before God, and that we must make some account of

of our owne righteouſneſſe. For if we confeſſe to God contrarie to our owne thinking, we do wickedly lie vnto him: but we cannot thinke as we ought, but that by and by all that ſeemeth glorious in vs muſt be troden vnder foote. Therefore when thou hearest in the Prophet, that there is prepared ſaluation for the humble people, and abacement for the eies of the wicked: Firſt thinke, that there is no entrie open to ſaluation, vntill thou haue laid away all pride and taken to thee perfect humbleneſſe: then, that the ſame humbleneſſe is not a certaine modeſtie whereby thou giueſt ouer to the Lord a haire breadth of thine owne right, as they are called humble before men that do neither preſumptuouſly aduance themſelues, nor reprochfully triumph ouer other, although they ſtand vpon ſome eſtimation of their owne excellencie: but an vnfained ſubmiſſion of a mind throwen downe with feeling of his owne miſerie and needineſſe. For it is ſo eachwhere deſcribed in the word of God. When the Lord ſaith thus in Zephanias: I will take away out of thee him that outragiouſly reioyceth, and I will leaue in the mids of thee the afflicted man and the poore man, and they ſhall truſt in the Lord: doth he not there plainly ſhew who be humble? euen they that lie afflicted with knowledge of their owne pouertie. On the other ſide he calleth the proude, outragious reioycers, becauſe men ioying in proſperitie are wont to reioyce without meaſure. But to the humble whom he purpoſeth to ſaue, he leaueth nothing but to truſt in the Lord. And likewiſe it is ſaid in Eſay: Whom ſhall I looke vnto, but to the poore and contrite in ſpirit, and him that feareth my words? Againe: The high and excellent, that inhabiteth eternitie, his name is holie, that dwelleth on high, and in the holie place, and with the contrite and humble ſpirit, to quicken the ſpirit of the humble and the hart of the contrite. When thou ſo oft heareſt the name of contrition, vnderſtand thereby the wound of the hart, that ſuffereth not a man throwen downe on the ground to riſe againe. With ſuch contrition ought thy hart to be wounded, if thou wilt according to the ſaying of God be aduanced with the humble: If that be not done, thou ſhalt be brought low with the mightie hand of God to thy ſhame and diſgracement.

7 And our beſt Schoolemaſter thinking it not enough to ſhew it out in words, hath alſo ſet out vnto vs in a parable the image of true humilitie as in a painted table. For he bringeth foorth a Publicane that ſtanding a farre off, not daring to lift vp his eies to Heauen, with much knocking his breſt, prayeth in this wiſe: Lord be mercifull to me a ſinner. Let vs not thinke theſe to be tokens of fained modeſtie, that he dare not looke vp to Heauen, nor to come neerer, that with knocking his breſt he confeſſeth himſelfe a ſinner: but let vs know that they be teſtimonies of inward affliction. On the other ſide he ſetteth the Phariſee which thanketh God that he is not of the common ſort of men, either an oppreſſer, or an vnrighteous man, or an adulterer, becauſe he faſted twiſe on the Sabboth, and gaue tithes of all that he poſſeſſed. He doth with open confeſſion acknowledge that the righteouſneſſe which he hath is the gift of God: but becauſe he ſtandeth in confidence that he is righteous, he departeth from God vnfauoured and in hatred. The Publicane by acknowledging of his owne wickedneſſe is iuſtified. Hereby we may ſee, how great is the eſtimation of our humbling vs before God: ſo that the hart cannot be open to receiue his mercie, vnleſſe it be firſt void of all opinion of his owne worthineſſe. When this opinion hath poſſeſſed the place, it ſhutteth vp the way for Gods mercy to enter. And that no man ſhould doubt hereof, Chriſt was ſent of his Father into the earth with this commiſſion, to bring glad tidings to the poore, to heale the contrite in hart, to preach libertie to the captiue, and deliuerance to them that were ſhut vp in priſon, and to comfort them that mourne: to giue them glory for aſhes, oyle for mourning, the robe of praiſe for the ſpirit of ſorrow. According to this commiſſion, he calleth none but them that labor and are loden to take part of his liberalitie. And in an other place he ſaith: I came not to call the righteous, but ſinners.

8 Therefore if we will giue place to the calling of Chriſt, let all arrogancie and careleſneſſe depart far away from vs. Arrogancie groweth of a fooliſh perſwaſion of our owne righteouſneſſe, when a man thinketh himſelfe to haue ſomewhat, by the deſerning whereof he may be commended before God, careleſneſſe may be euen without any perſwaſion of workes. For many ſinners, becauſe being drunke with ſweetneſſe of vices they thinke not vpon the iudgement of God, lie as it were ſenſeleſſly amaſed with a diſeaſe of drouſineſſe, that they aſpire not to the mercy offered them. But we muſt no leſſe ſhake off ſuch dull ſluggiſhneſſe, than we muſt caſt away all vaine confidence of our ſelues, that we may without encombrance haſten to Chriſt, that we being emptie and hungrie may be filled with his good things. For we ſhall neuer ſufficiently haue truſt in him, vnleſſe we vtterly diſtruſt of our ſelues, we ſhall neuer ſufficiently raiſe vp our courages in him, vnleſſe they be firſt throwen downe in our ſelues. We ſhall neuer ſufficiently haue conſolation in him, vnleſſe we be firſt deſolate in our ſelues. Therefore we be then meete to take hold of and obtaine the fauour of God, caſting away all truſt of our ſelues, but truſting vpon the onely aſſuredneſſe of his goodneſſe, when (as Auguſtine ſaith) forgetting our owne deſeruings, we embrace the gifts of Chriſt. Becauſe if he ſought deſeruings in vs, we ſhould not come to his gifts. Wherewith Bernard very well accordeth, comparing proud men to vnfaithfull ſeruants, that arrogantly claime any thing be it neuer ſo litle to their owne deſeruings: becauſe they doe wrongfully keepe to themſelues the praiſe of grace paſſing by them, as if a wall would ſay that it bringeth forth the ſun-beame which it receiueth through a window. But, not to tarrie longer hereupon, let vs take a ſhort but a generall and ſure rule, that he is prepared to take part of the fruits of Gods mercy, that hath vtterly emptied himſelfe, I will not ſay of righteouſneſſe, which is none at all, but of the vaine and windie image of righteouſneſſe. Becauſe euery man ſo much hindereth his receiuing of the liberalitie of God as he reſteth in himſelfe.

De verbis Apoſt. cap. 8 Ser. 15. in Cā.

THE THIRTENTH CHAPTER.

That there are two things to be marked in free iuſtification.

We cānot without robbing God of his glory challenge any thing to our ſelues. Rom. 3. 15.

AND here are alway two things to be principally looked vnto: that is to ſay, that there may remaine to the Lord his glorie vnminiſhed, and as it were wholy and perfectly maintained, and to our conſciences an vntroubled quietneſſe and calme tranquilitie before his iudgement. We ſee how oft and how earneſtly the Scripture exhorteth vs, to giue onely to God a confeſſion of praiſe, when we entreat of righteouſneſſe. And the Apoſtle teſtifieth, that this was the Lords principal purpoſe of giuing vs righteouſneſſe in Chriſt, that he might ſhew his owne righteouſneſſe. And what a ſhewing that ſhould be, he declareth immediately after: that is, if he alone be knowen to be righteous, and that iuſtified him that is of the faith of Ieſus Chriſt. Thou ſeeſt that the righteouſneſſe of God is not ſufficiently ſet out, vnleſſe he alone be accounted righteous, and doe communicate the grace of righteouſneſſe to them that deſerue it not. By this meane he will haue euery mouth to be ſtopped, and the whole world to be made ſubiect to him. For while man hath any thing to ſpeake in his owne defence, ſo long there is ſomewhat taken away from the glorie of God. So in Ezechiel he teacheth how much we glorifie his name by reknowledging of our owne wickedneſſe. You ſhall remember (ſaith he) the waies and all the wicked doings wherewith ye haue beene defiled. And ye ſhall be diſpleaſed with your ſelues in your owne ſight, in all the euils that ye haue committed. And ye ſhall know that I am the Lord, when I ſhall doe good to you for mine owne names ſake, & not according to your moſt wicked offences. If theſe things be contained in the true knowledge of God, that we being brooſed with knowledge of our owne iniquitie, ſhould conſider that he doth good to vs whereas we be vnworthy thereof: why then doe we to our great hurt attempt to ſteale away from the Lord any parcell be it neuer ſo ſmall of the praiſe of his free goodneſſe? Likewiſe Ieremie when he crieth out, Let not the wiſe man glory in his wiſedome, or the rich man in his riches, or the ſtrong man in his ſtrength, but let him that glorifieth, glory in the Lord: doth he not there declare that ſomewhat is diminiſhed from Gods glory, if man glory in himſelfe? To this purpoſe truely doth Paul apply thoſe words, when he teacheth that all the parts of our ſaluation are repoſed in Chriſt, that we ſhould not glorie but in the Lord. For his meaning is that he riſeth vp againſt God and darkeneth his glorie, whoſoeuer thinketh that he hath any thing be it neuer ſo little of his owne.

Ezec. 20. 42.

Iere. 9. 3.

1. Cor. 1. 30.

What it is not to glory in our ſelues.

2 This is the trueth, we neuer truely glory in him, vnleſſe we be vtterly put from our owne glory. On the other ſide, this is to be holden for a catholike principle, that all they they glory againſt God that glory in themſelues. For Paul iudgeth that onely by this meane the world is made ſubiect to God, when all matter to glory vpon is vtterly taken from men. Therefore Eſay, when he declareth that Iſraell ſhall haue their iuſtification in God, ſaith alſo that they ſhall there alſo haue their praiſe: as though he ſhould ſay, that he Lord to this end iuſtifieth the elect that they ſhould glorie in him and in nothing elſe. But how we ought to be praiſed in the Lord, he had taught in the verſe next before: that is, that we ſhould ſweare that our righteouſneſſes and ſtrength are in the Lord. Note that there is not required a bare confeſſion, but confirmed with an oath, that a man ſhould not thinke that he ſhall be diſcharged with I wot not what faigned humilitie. And let no man here alleadge for excuſe that he doth not glorie when without arrogancie he reknowledgeth his owne righteouſneſſe: for there can be no ſuch eſtimation but it engendreth confidence, nor confidence but it breedeth glorie. Therefore let vs remember that in all the diſputation of righteouſneſſe we muſt haue regard to this end, that the praiſe thereof remaine with the Lord whole and perfect. Foraſmuch as for declaration of his righteouſneſſe (as the Apoſtle teſtifieth) he hath powred out his grace vpon vs, that he might be iuſt and iuſtifying him that is of the faith of Chriſt. Wherefore in another place, when he had taught that the Lord gaue vs ſaluation, to ſet out the glorie of his name, afterward as it were repeating the ſame thing he addeth: ye are ſaued by grace, and by the gift of God, not by workes, that none ſhould glory. And when Peter telleth that we are called vnto hope of ſaluation that we ſhould declare the powers of him that hath called vs out of darkneſſe into his marueilous light, without doubt his meaning is ſo to make the onely praiſes of God to ſound in the eares of the faithfull, that they ſhould with deepe ſilence oppreſſe all arrogancie of the fleſh. In a ſumme, man cannot without robberie of God chalenge to himſelfe any one crum of righteouſneſſe: becauſe euen ſo much is plucked and taken away from the glorie of Gods righteouſneſſe.

Rom. 2. 29.
Hay 45. 25.

Rom 3. 26.
Eph. 1. 2.
Eph. 1. 8.

3 Now if we aske by what meane the conſcience may be quieted before God, we ſhall finde no other meane but if free righteouſneſſe be giuen vs by the gift of God: Let vs alway thinke vpon this ſaying of Salomon, Who ſhall ſay, I haue cleanſed my heart, I am made cleane from my ſinne? Truely there is no man that ſhall not be ouerwhelmed with infinite filthineſſe. Therefore let euen the perfectſt man deſcend into his owne conſcience, and call his doings to account: what end ſhall he haue? Shall he ſweetely reſt as though all things were in good order betweene him and God? and ſhall he not rather be vexed with terrible torments, when he ſhall feele matter of damnation abiding in himſelfe if he be iudged according to his workes? The conſcience if it looke vpon God, muſt of neceſſitie either haue aſſured peace with his iudgement, or be beſieged with the terrours of hell. Therefore we profit nothing in diſputing of righteouſneſſe vnleſſe we ſtabliſh ſuch a righteouſneſſe, with the ſtedfaſtneſſe whereof our ſoule may be ſtaied in the iudgement of God. When our ſoule ſhall haue whereby it may both without feare appeare before the face of God, and receiue his iudgement, vnſhaken, then and not till then let vs know that we haue found an vnfaigned righteouſnes. Therefore not without cauſe the Apoſtle ſtandeth ſo much vpon this point, with whoſe wordes I had rather expreſſe it than with mine owne. If (ſaith he) the promiſe of inheritance be of the law, faith is made voide, the promiſe is made aboliſhed. He firſt inferreth that faith is diſanulled and made voide if the promiſe of righteouſneſſe haue reſpect to the deſeruings of our works, or doe hang vpon the keeping of the law. For ſo could euery man aſſuredly reſt in it: becauſe it could neuer come to paſſe that any man might aſſuredly determine with himſelfe that he had ſatisfied the law, as indeede neuer any man doth by workes fully ſatisfie it. Whereof, that we ſhould not neede to ſeeke far for teſtimonies to prooue it, euery man may be a witneſſe to himſelfe that will with a right eie behold himſelfe. And hereby appeareth, in how deepe and darke corners hypocriſie buried the mindes of men, while they ſo careleſſly beare with themſelues, that they ſticke not to ſet their owne flatteries againſt the iudgement of God, as though they would binde to a ſtay his iudiciall proceeding. But the faithfull that doe ſyncerely examine themſelues, are grieued and tormented with a far other maner of carefulneſſe. Therefore there ſhould ſo enter into all mindes a doubting, and at length a very very deſpaire where each man for himſelfe ſhould make account, with how great a burden of debt he is ſtill ouerpreſſed, and how far he is from the condition wherewith he is charged. Lo, how Faith is by this meane already expreſſed and extinguiſhed. For to wauer, to varie, to be caried vp and downe, to ſticke faſt in doubting, to be holden in ſuſpenſe, to ſtagger, and at length to deſpaire, is not to truſt: but to ſtrengthen thy minde with conſtant certaintie and perfect aſſuredneſſe, and to haue whereupon to reſt and faſten thy foote.

The opinion of righteouſneſſe by our owne workes troubleth the conſcience and bereaueth vs of all tranquilitie of minde.
Pro. 20. 9.

Rom. 4. 14.

To reſt vpon the worthines of our own works, is to make the promiſes of God vnefficiuall.

4 He adioyneth alſo an other thing, that is, that the promiſe ſhall thereby be made of no effect and voide. For if the fulfilling thereof doe hang vpon our deſeruing, when ſhall we come thus farre as to deſerue the bountifulneſſe of God? Alſo this ſecond point hangeth vpon the former: For the promiſe ſhall not be fulfilled but to them that beleeue it. Therefore if Faith be fallen, there ſhall remaine no force of the promiſe. Therefore the inheritance is of Faith, that it may be according to grace, to ſtabliſh the promiſe. For it is aboundantly well ſtabliſhed when it reſteth vpon the onely mercie of God: becauſe his mercie and truth are with a perpetuall knot ioyned together, that is to ſay, whatſoeuer God mercifully promiſeth, he alſo faithfully performeth. So Dauid before that he required ſaluation by the word of God firſt determineth the cauſe thereof to be in his mercy. Let thy mercies (ſaith he) come vnto me, thy ſaluation according to thy word. And rightfully: becauſe God is by no other meane perſwaded to make the promiſe but of his owne meere mercie. Therefore we muſt herein ſtay, and deepely faſten all our hope and not to looke to our owne workes, to ſeeke any helpe of them. And that you ſhould not thinke that I herein ſpeake any new thing: Auguſtine doth alſo teach that we ought ſo to doe. Chriſt (ſaith he) ſhall reigne for euer in his ſeruants. God hath promiſed it, God hath ſaid it, & if that be not enough, God hath ſworne it. Therefore foraſmuch as the promiſe is ſtabliſhed, not according to our deſeruings, but according to his mercie, no man ought to ſpeake fearefully of that of which he can not doubt. Bernard alſo ſaith: The Diſciples of Chriſt ſay, Who can be ſaued? But he anſwered, this is impoſſible with men, but it is not impoſſible with God. This is all our confidence, this is our onely comfort, this is the whole ground of our hope, but being aſſured of the poſſibilitie, what ſay we of his will? Who knoweth whether he be worthie of loue or hatred? Who hath knowen the Lords meaning? Or who hath beene his counſeller? Here now Faith muſt of neceſſitie helpe vs, here muſt his truth ſuccour vs, that that which is hidden from vs in the hart of the Father, may be reueiled by the Spirit, and his Spirit teſtifying it may perſwade our hearts that we are the Sonnes of God. And it may perſwade vs by calling and iuſtifying vs freely by Faith, in which things there is as it were a certaine meane paſſage from the eternall predeſtination to the glorie that is to come. Briefely let vs thus conclude. The Scripture declareth that the promiſes of God are not ſtabliſhed, vnleſſe they be taken hold of with aſſured affiance of conſcience: and whereſoeuer there is any doubting or vncertaintie, it pronounceth that they be voide. Againe it pronounceth that they doe nothing but ſtagger and wauer, if they reſt vpon our own works. Therefore we muſt needs either looſe righteouſneſſe, or we muſt not conſider our owne works, but onely Faith muſt take place, whoſe nature is this, to lift vp her eares and ſhut her eyes, that is to ſay, to be heedfully bent to the promiſe onely, and to turne away her thought from all mans worthineſſe or deſeruing. So is that notable prophecie of Zacharie fulfilled, that when the wickedneſſe of the land ſhall be done away, a man ſhall call his friend vnder his vine & vnder his figge tree, where the Prophet declareth that the faithfull doe no otherwiſe enioy true peace but after obteining of the forgiueneſſe of ſins. For this cauillation is to be remembred in the Prophets, that when they ſpeake of the kingdome of Chriſt, they ſet out the outward bleſſings of God as figures of the ſpirituall things. Whereupon Chriſt is called both the king of peace and our peace, becauſe he appeaſeth all the troubleſome motions of conſcience. If we ſeeke by what meane he doth it, we muſt needs come to the ſacrifice by which God is appeaſed. For he ſhall neuer ceaſſe to tremble for feare that ſhall not determine that God is appeaſed by the onely ſatisfactorie cleanſing wherein Chriſt hath ſuſtained his wrath. Finally peace is no where elſe to be ſought for but in the terrors of Chriſt our redeemer.

5 But

5 But why doe I vſe ſo darke a teſtimonie? Paul euery where demeth that there is peace or quiet ioy left to conſciences, vnleſſe it be determined that we be iuſtified by Faith. And he therewithall declareth whence that aſſuredneſſe commeth, namely when the loue of God is powred into our hearts by the holy Ghoſt: as if he had ſaid, that our conſciences cannot otherwiſe be quieted, vnleſſe we be certainely perſwaded that we pleaſe God. Whereupon alſo in another place he crieth out in the perſon of all the godly, Who ſhall ſeuer vs from the loue of God, which is in Chriſt? becauſe we ſhall tremble euen at euery little breath, till we be arriued into the hauen: but we ſhall be without care euen in the darkeneſſe of death, ſo long as the Lord ſhall ſhew himſelfe a Paſtor to vs. Therefore whoſoeuer prate that we are iuſtified by Faith, becauſe being regenerate we are iuſt by liuing ſpiritually: they neuer taſted the ſweetenеſſe of grace, to conſider that God will be mercifull vnto them. Whereupon alſo followeth, that they doe no more know the maner of praying rightly, than Turkes and whatſoeuer other prophane Nations. For (as Paul witneſſeth) it is no true Faith vnleſſe it teach and put vs in minde of that moſt ſweete name of Father, yea vnleſſe it open our mouth freely to cry out Abba Father. Which in another place he more plainely expreſſeth, where he ſaith that in Chriſt we haue boldneſſe and entrie in confidence by the faith of him. Truely this commeth not to paſſe by the gift of regeneration: which as it is alway vnperfect in the fleſh, ſo it conteineth in it ſelfe manifold matter of doubting. Wherefore we muſt of neceſſitie come to this remedie, that the faithfull ſhould determine that they may by no other right, hope for the inheritance of the heauenly kingdome, but becauſe being graffed into the body of Chriſt, they are freely accounted righteous. For as touching iuſtification, Faith is a thing meerely paſſiue, bringing nothing of our owne to the recouering of the fauour of God, but receiuing of Chriſt that which we want.

Vpon theſe two promiſes that we ought to aſcribe all glory vnto God, and ſeeke the aſſurance of our owne harts, which we cannot doe as long as we ſeeke righteouſneſſe in our owne works, it followeth that to be iuſtified by Faith, is not as ſome imagine to be iuſt by liuing according to that ſpirit which the faithfull haue receiued.

THE FOVRTEENTH CHAPTER.

What is the beginning of iuſtification, and the continuall proceedings thereof.

THat the matter may be made more plaine, let vs ſearch, what may be the righteouſneſſe of man in the whole courſe of his life: and let vs make foure degrees thereof. For men either being endued with no knowledge of God, are drowned in idolatrie: or being entred into profeſſion by ſacraments, denying God with vncleanes of life, whom they confeſſe with mouth, they are Chriſts no further than in name: or they be hypocrites which couer the wickedneſſe of their hearts, with vaine deceitfull colours: or being regenerate by the Spirit of God, they endeuour themſelues to true holineſſe. Specially when they are to be iudged by their naturall gifts, from the crowne of their head to the ſole of their foote, there ſhall not be found one ſparkle of goodneſſe, vnleſſe peraduenture we will accuſe the Scripture of falſhood, when it ſetteth out all the Sonnes of Adam with theſe titles that they be of froward and ſtubborne heart, that all the imagination of their heart is euill from their infancie, that their thoughts be vaine, that they haue not the feare of God before their eyes, that none of them vnderſtandeth or ſeeketh God, briefly that they be fleſh, by which word are vnderſtanded all thoſe works which Paul rehearſeth, fornication, vncleaneneſſe, vnchaſtitie, riotouſneſſe, worſhipping of idoles, witchcrafts, enmities, contentions, emulations, angers, diſſentions, ſectes, enuies, manſlaughters, and whatſoeuer filthineſſe and abhomination may be deuiſed. This forſooth is the worthineſſe, with confidence whereof they muſt be proud. But if any among them excell with ſuch honeſtie of maners as may haue ſome ſhew of holineſſe among men: yet becauſe we know that God regardeth not the outward gliſtering, we muſt ſearch the very fountaine of workes if we will haue them to auaile any thing to righteouſneſſe. We muſt (I ſay) throughly looke into them, from what affection of hart theſe works proceede. But although here lieth open a moſt large fielde to diſcourſe in, yet becauſe the matter may be declared in very few words, I will follow as much as I may a briefeneſſe in teaching.

Foure ſortes of men whoſe workes are in this queſtion to be conſidered of: the firſt ſuch as are not at all indued with any true knowledge of God.

2 *First I deny not that whatſoeuer excellent gifts appeere in the vnbeleeuers, they are the giftes of God. Neither doe I ſo differ from common iudgement, that I would affirme affirme that there is no difference betweene the iuſtice, temperance and equitie of Titus and Traianus, and the rage, intemperance, and crueltie of Caligula, or Nero, or Domitian: betweene the filthie luſtes of Tiberius, and in this behalfe the continencie of Veſpaſian: and (that we may not tarrie vpon ſome ſpeciall vertues or vices) betweene the obſeruing and the deſpiſing of right and lawes: For there is ſo great difference of right and wrong, that it appeareth euen in the dead image thereof. For what thing ſhall there remaine well ordered in the world, if we confound theſe together? Therefore ſuch a difference betweene honeſt and vnhoneſt doings, the Lord hath not onely engraued in the mindes of all men, but alſo doth oft confirme it with the diſpenſation of his prouidence. For we ſee how he extendeth many bleſſings of this preſent life to them that among men doe follow vertue. Not becauſe that outward image of vertue deſerueth ſo much as the leaſt benefit of his: but ſo it pleaſeth him to declare by proofe how much true righteouſneſſe pleaſeth him, when hee ſuffereth euen outward and faigned righteouſneſſe not to be without reward. Wherevpon followeth that which we euen now confeſſed, that theſe vertues ſuch as they be, or rather images of vertues are the gifts of God, for as much as there is nothing in any wiſe praiſe woorthie, which proceedeth not from him.

There is a puniſhable wickednesſe in the greateſt righteouſneſſe of vnbeleeuers. Lib. 4. cont. Iulianum.

3 But neuertheleſſe it is true which Auguſtine writeth, that all they that are ſtrangers from the true religion of the one God, howſoeuer they be accounted woorthy of admiration for opinion of vertue, are not onely woorthie of no reward, but rather are woorthie of puniſhment, becauſe they doe with defiling of their heart, beſpot the pure good things of God. For though they be the inſtruments of God to preſerue the fellowſhip of men with iuſtice, continencie, temperance of mirde, valiantnes, and wiſedome: yet they doe very euilly execute theſe good works of God: becauſe they are reſtrained from euill doing, not by ſincere loue of goodneſſe, but either by onely ambition, or by loue of themſelues, or by ſome other crooked affection. Whereas therefore they are corrupt by the very vncleannelle of heart, as by their beginning, they are no more to be reckoned among vertues, than thoſe vices which are woont to deceiue by reaſon of neereneſſe and likeneſſe of vertue. Finally when we remember, that the end of that which is right, euer is that God be ſerued: whatſoeuer tendeth to any other end, foorthwith worthily looſeth the name of right. Becauſe therefore they haue not reſpect to the marke which the wiſedome of God appointeth: although the thing that they doe, ſeeme good in doing, yet by a wrongfull end it is ſinne. He concludeth therefore that all the Fabricij, Scipioes, and Catoes, in all thoſe excellent actes of theirs: yet ſinned in this behalfe, that whereas they lacked the light of faith, they did not apply them to the end to which they ought to haue applied them: and that for that cauſe true righteouſneſſe was not in them: for as much as duties are not weighed by the doings, but by the endes.

Whatſoeuer is dont by men vnreconciled vnto God is ill done, 1. Ioan. 5. 12. Lib. 2 ad Bonif. in cap. 5 Præfat in Pſal.

4 Moreouer if it be true which Iohn ſaith: that there is no life without the ſonne of God: who ſo haue no part in Chriſt, what maner of men ſoeuer they be, whatſoeuer they doe or goe about, yet they run forward with their whole courſe into deſtruction and the iudgement of eternall death. After this reaſon, is that ſaid of Auguſtine. Our religion diſcerneth the righteous from the vnrighteous, not by law of workes: but by the verie law of faith, without which, thoſe that ſeeme good works are turned into ſinnes. Wherefore the ſame Auguſtine ſaith very well in another place, when he compareth the endeuour of ſuch men to running out of the way. For how much faſter a man runneth out of the way, ſo much further he is from the marke, and therefore is made ſo much more miſerable. Wherefore he affirmeth that it is better to halt in the way, than to runne out of the way. Finally, it is certaine that they are euill trees, forasmuch as without the communication of Chriſt there is no ſanctification. They may therefore beare faire fruits and beautiful to the eie, yea and ſweete in taſte, but in no wiſe good fruits. Hereby we eaſily perceiue that whatſoeuer man thinketh, purpoſeth or doth, before that he be reconciled to God by faith, is accurſed, and not onely of no value to righteouſneſſe, but of certaine deſeruing to damnation. And why diſpute we hereof as of a doubtfull thing, ſith it is already prooued by the witneſſe of the Apoſtle, that it is impoſſible that any man may pleaſe God without faith?

Heb. 11 6.

5 But

5 But there ſhall yet appeare a plainer proofe, if the grace of God be in compariſon, directly ſet againſt the naturall ſtate of man. For the Scripture crieth out euery where, that God findeth nothing in man whereby he may be prouoked to doe good to him, but with his owne free goodneſſe preuenteth him. For what can a dead man doe to attaine life? But when he lighteneth vs with the knowledge of himſelfe, he is ſaid to raiſe vs from death, and to make vs a new creature. For we ſee that oftentimes, ſpecially of the Apoſtle, the goodneſſe of God is ſet foorth vnto vs by this title, God (ſaith he) which is rich in mercie, for the great loue wherewith he loued vs, euen when we were dead by ſinnes, hath made vs aliue together in Chriſt, &c. In another place, where vnder the figure of Abraham he entreateth of the generall calling of the faithfull, he ſaith: it is God that giueth life to the dead, and calleth thoſe things that are not, as though they were. If we be nothing, what (I beſeech you) can we doe? Wherefore the Lord ſtrongly beateth downe this arrogancie, in the hiſtorie of Iob, in theſe words: who preuenteth me, and I ſhall render it him? for all things are mine. Which ſentence Paul expounding applyeth it to this, that we ſhould not thinke that we bring any thing to the Lord but meere ſhame of needineſſe and emptineſſe. Wherefore in the place aboue cited, to prooue that we are come into the hope of ſaluation by his grace alone, not by works, he alleadgeth that we are his creatures becauſe we are new begotten in Chriſt Ieſus, to the good works which he hath prepared that we ſhould walke in them. As if he had ſaid: which of vs may boaſt that he hath with his righteouſneſſe prouoked God, ſith our firſt power to doe good proceedeth out of regeneration? For as we are made by nature, oyle ſhall ſooner be wrong out of a ſtone, than a good worke out of vs. Truely it is wonderfull if man being condemned of ſo great a ſhame, dare yet ſay that there remaineth any thing with him. Therefore let vs confeſſe with this noble inſtrument of God, that we are called of God with a holy calling, not according to our workes, but according to his purpoſe and grace: and that the kindneſſe and loue of God our Sauiour toward vs hath appeared, becauſe he hath ſaued vs, not by the workes of righteouſneſſe which we haue done, but according to his own mercie: that being iuſtified by his grace, we might be made the heires of eternall life. By this confeſſion we diſpoile man of all righteouſneſſe euen to the leaſt little peece thereof, till he be by onely mercy regenerate into hope of eternall life: foraſmuch as if the righteouſneſſe of works doe bring any thing toward the iuſtifying of vs, it is falſly ſaid that we are iuſtified by grace. Truely the Apoſtle had not forgotten himſelfe, when he affirmed iuſtification to be of free gift, which in another place reaſoneth that grace is now not grace, if works doe any thing auaile. And what other thing doth the Lord meane, when he ſaith, that he came not to call righteous men but ſinners? If onely ſinners are receiued, why ſeeke we an entrie by faigned righteouſneſſe?

There is in vs no more power to doe good, till God in mercie haue renewed vs, than there is in a dead bodie to exerciſe any action of life.

6 Still this ſame thought hath now and then recourſe to my minde, that it is perill leaſt I ſhould doe wrong to the mercies of God, which doe ſo carefully trauaile in prouing of this things as though it were doubtfull or darke. But becauſe our enuiouſneſſe is ſuch, as vnleſſe it be moſt ſtraitly thruſt out of place, it neuer yeeldeth to God that which is his, I am compelled to tarry ſomewhat the longer vpon it. Yet foraſmuch as the Scripture is cleere enough in this matter, I will in fighting rather vſe the wordes thereof than mine owne. Eſay, when he hath deſcribed the vniuerſall deſtruction of mankind, doth immediatly after very fitly adioyne the order of reſtoring. The Lord hath ſeene, and it ſeemed euill in his eies. And he ſaw that there is no man: and he marueiled that there is none that offereth himſelfe: & he hath ſet ſaluation in his own arme, and hath ſtrengthened himſelfe with his owne righteouſneſſe. Where are our righteouſneſſes if it be true which the Prophet ſaith: that there is no man that helpeth the Lord in recouering his ſaluation? So an other Prophet, where he bringeth in the Lord, diſcourſing of the reconciling of ſinners to himſelfe, ſaith: I will eſpouſe thee to me for euer, in righteouſneſſe, iudgement, grace and mercie. I will ſay to her that hath not obtained mercy, thou haſt obtained mercy. If ſuch couenant, which it is certaine to be the firſt coniojning that we haue with God, ſtandeth vpon the mercie of God, there is left no foundation of our owne righteouſneſſe. And I would faine learne of thoſe men which faine that man meeteth God with ſome righteouſneſſe of works, whether they thinke

God vouſafeth vnto by vs, ſeeketh vs of meere loue, and doth not only propoſe a redemption whith we by our own works may obtaine in Chriſt, but by effectuall calling ingraffe vs into Chriſt by whoſe blood being ſo ingraffed we are redeemed.

thinke that there is any righteousnesse at all, but that which is acceptable to God. If it be madnesse to thinke so, what acceptable thing to God can proceed from his enemies, whom he wholy abhorreth with all their doings? That all we, I say, are the deadly and professed enemies of our God, the truth it selfe testifieth, till being iustified, we are receiued into friendship. If iustification be the beginning of loue, what righteousnesse of works shall goe before it? So Iohn, to turne away that pestilent arrogancie, doth diligently put in minde how we did not first loue him. And the selfe same thing the Lord had long before taught by the Prophet: I will loue them saith he, with a free loue, because mine anger is turned. Certainely his loue is not prouoked by workes, if it hath of his owne accord inclined it selfe vnto vs. But the rude common sort of men thinke it to be nothing else, but that no man hath deserued that Christ should performe our redemption: yet that to the entring into the possession of redemption, we be holpen by our own works. Yea, but howsoeuer we be redeemed of Christ, yet till we be by the calling of the Father graffed into the communion of him, we are both heires of darknesse and death, and the enemies of God. For Paul teacheth that we are not cleansed and washed from our vncleannesses by the blood of Christ, vntill the holy Ghost worketh that cleansing in vs. Which same thing Peter minding to teach, declareth that the sanctifying of the Spirit auaileth vnto obedience & the sprinckling of the blood of Christ. If we be by the Spirit sprinckled with the blood of Christ vnto cleansing, let vs not thinke that before such watering we be any other than a sinner is without Christ. Let this therefore remaine certaine, that the beginning of our saluation is as it were a certaine resurrection from death to life: Because when for Christs sake it is giuen to vs to beleeue in him, then we first begin to passe from death into life.

Osee. 14. 15.

1. Cor. 6. 11.

1. Pet. 1. 2.

The second and third sortes of men mentioned Sect. 1. hauing not Faith, can not haue righteousnesse such as doth sanctifie them indeed.

7 Vnder this sort are comprehended they which haue in the diuision aboue set beene noted for the second and third sort of men. For the vncleanesse of conscience prooueth that both of them are not yet regenerate by the Spirit of God. And againe, whereas there is no regeneration in them, this prooueth the want of Faith. Whereby appeareth that they are not yet reconciled to God, nor yet iustified in his sight: forasmuch as these good things are not attained to, but by Faith. What can sinners being estranged from God bring foorth; but that which is accursed in his iudgement? With this foolish boldnesse in deede, both all wicked men are puffed vp, and specially hypocrites, because howsoeuer they know that there whole hart swarmeth full of filthines, yet if they doe any works that haue a shew of goodnesse, they thinke them worthie that God should not despise them. Hereof groweth that pernitious error, that being prooued guiltie of a wicked and mischieuous mind, yet they cannot be driuen to confesse themselues voide of righteousnesse: but euen when they acknowledge themselues vnrighteous, because they cannot deny it, yet they arrogantly claime some righteousnesse vnto them. This vanitie the Lord excellently well confuteth by the Prophet, Aske (saith he) the Priestes, saying: if a man carry sanctified flesh in the hem of his garment, and putteth to it bread or other meate, shall it be sanctified? The Priestes answered: No. And Haggee said. If a defiled man in soule touch any of these things, shall it be defiled? The Priestes answered: it shall be defiled. Haggee said: So is this people before my face, saith the Lord: and so all the workes of their handes: and all things that they offer to me shall be defiled. I would to God that this saying might either get full credit with vs, or well be setled in our remembrance. For there is no man, though he be otherwise in his whole life neuer so hainous a wicked doer, that can abide to be perswaded, that which the Lord here plainely pronounceth. The naughtiest man, so soone as he hath performed one or two doubtfull deeds of the law, doubteth not that it shall be accounted to him for righteousnes. But the Lord cryeth to the contrary, that there is no sanctification gotten thereby, vnlesse the hart be first well clensed. And not contented therewith, he affirmeth that all the works whatsoeuer they be that proceede from sinners, are as defiled with vncleannes of the hart. Therefore let the name of righteousnesse depart from these works which are by the Lords own mouth condemned of filthinesse. And with how fit a similitude doth he shew the same? For it might haue been obiected, that whatsoeuer the Lord had commaunded, was inuiolably holy. But he on the contrary side setteth against them, that it is no maruell, if those things that are hal-

Hag. 2. 12.

lowed by the Law of the Lord, are defiled with the filthineſſe of naughtie men: whereas an vncleane hand prophaneth a holy thing with touching it.

8 The ſame matter he excellently well handleth in Eſay. Offer not (ſaith he) ſacrifice in vaine: incenſe is abhomination to me: my Soule hateth your Calends and ſolemnities. They are become tedious to me, and I haue beene wearie with bearing them: when you ſhall hold vp your hands I will turne away mine eies from you: when you ſhall multiply prayer I will not heare: for your hands are full of blood. Be waſhed, be cleane, take away the euill of your thoughts. What meaneth this that the Lord ſo loatheth the obeying of his owne Law? Yea, but he here refuſeth nothing that is of the naturall obſeruing of the Law, the beginning whereof he euery where teacheth to be the vnfained feare of his name. When that is taken away, whatſoeuer things are offered him are not onely trifles, but ſtinking and abhominable filthineſſe. Now let the hypocrites goe, and keeping peruerſneſſe wrapped vp in their hart, endeuour to deſerue the fauour of God with works. But by this meane, they ſhall more and more prouoke him to wrath. For to him the ſacrifices of the wicked are abhominable, and the onely prayer of vpright men pleaſeth him. Therefore we hold that out of doubt, which ought to be moſt commonly knowen to him, that is euen but meanely exerciſed in the Scriptures, that euen thoſe works that ghiſter moſt glorioully in men not yet truely ſanctified, are ſo farre from righteouſneſſe in the ſight of the Lord, that they be iudged ſinnes. And therefore they haue ſaid moſt truely that haue taught that fauour with God is not procured to any perſon by workes: but contrariwiſe that workes doe then pleaſe, and neuer till then, when the perſon hath firſt found grace in the ſight of God. And this order is religiouſly to be kept, to which the Scripture leadeth vs by the hand. Moſes writeth that the Lord had reſpect to Abel and to his works. See you not how he declareth that God is fauourable to the men, before that he had reſpect to their works? Wherefore the cleanſing of the hart muſt goe before, that the works which come from vs, may be louingly receiued of God: becauſe this ſaying of Ieremie is alway in force, that the works of God haue reſpect vnto truth. And that it is onely Faith by which the harts of men are clenſed, the holy Ghoſt hath affirmed by the mouth of Peter: whereby it is certaine, that the firſt foundation is in true and liuely Faith.

The harts of hypocrites being not purged, their works in appearance faire, cannot in the ſight of God leuingly be accepted.

Act. 15. 6. Iere. 5. 3.

9 Now let vs looke what righteouſneſſe they haue, whom wee haue ſet in the fourth degree. We grant that when God by the meane of the righteouſneſſe of Chriſt, reconcileth vs to himſelfe, and giuing vs free forgiueneſſe of ſinnes, accounteth vs for righteous, with ſuch mercy is alſo conioyned that his beneficiall doing, that by his holy ſpirit he dwelleth in vs, by the power whereof the luſtes of our fleſh are daily more and more mortified, but we are ſanctified: that is to ſay, hallowed to the Lord vnto true pureneſſe of life, when our hearts are framed to the obedience of the law: that this may be our chiefe will, to ſerue his will, and by all meanes to aduance onely his glorie. But euen while by the guiding of the holy Ghoſt we walke in the waies of the Lord, leaſt we yet forgetting our ſelues ſhould waxe proud, there are left certaine remnants of imperfection, which may miniſter vs matter of humilitie. There is none righteous, (ſaith the Scripture) that doth good and ſinneth not. What maner of righteouſneſſe therefore will they yet get by their workes? Firſt, I ſay, that the beſt worke that can be brought foorth of them, is yet alway ſprinkled and corrupted with ſome vncleanneſſe of the fleſh, and hath as it were ſome dregs mingled with it. I ſay, let a holy ſeruant of God chooſe out of all his life the moſt excellent thing that he ſhall thinke that he hath done in the whole courſe thereof, and let him well conſider all the parts of it, without doubt hee ſhall finde ſomewhere ſomewhat ſauouring of the rottenneſſe of the fleſh, foraſmuch as to doing well our cheerefull quickneſſe is neuer ſuch as it ought to be, but in ſlacking our courſe our weakeneſſe is much. Although we ſee that there are euident foule blots wherewith the workes of the holy are beſpred, yet graunt that they be nothing but moſt little ſpots: ſhall they nothing offend the eies of God, before whom euen the ſtarres are not cleane? Thus haue we ſhewed that there commeth not ſo much as one good worke out of holy men, which if it be iudged in it ſelfe deſerueth not iuſt reward of ſhame.

From the fourth ſort of men, ſuch as be truely iuſtified through Chriſt there proceedeth no one good worke in all pointes holy and perfect.

1. Reg. 8. 6.

If we could doe any thing perfectly good, yet the euill which we doe, would make it vnauailable vnto righteousnesse, God iudgeing vs according to the rigour of the law which doth not require only some thing righteous, but forbiddeth euery vnrighteous thing vnder paine of death and condemnation.

Exec. 18. 24.
Iac. 2. 10.

10 Secondly I say, that if it were possible that we should haue some throughly pure and perfect works, yet one sinne is enough to blot out and quench all the remembrance of the former righteousnesse, as the Prophet saith, With whom also Iames agreeth: He that offendeth (saith he) in one, is made guiltie of all. Now sith this mortall life is neuer pure or void from sinne, whatsoeuer righteousnesse we should purchase, being from time to time with sinnes following corrupted, oppressed and lost, it should not come into the sight of God, nor be accounted to vs for righteousnesse. Finally when the righteousnesse of works is intreated of, we must not haue respect to the workes of the Law, but to the commandement. Therefore if we seeke righteousnesse by the Law, we shall in vaine bring foorth one or two works: but a perpetuall obedience of the Law is there necessarie. Wherefore the Lord doth not but once (as many fooleshly thinke) impute to vs for righteousnesse that same forgiuenesse of sins whereof we haue spoken, that hauing once obtained pardon of our life past, we should afterward seeke righteousnesse in the law, because he should so doe nothing else but bring vs into a false hope, and mocke and laugh vs to scorne. For sith no perfection could come to vs so long as we are clothed with this flesh, and sith the Law threatneth death and iudgement to all them that performe not full righteousnesse in worke: it shall alway haue whereof it may accuse and condemne vs, vnlesse the mercy of God on the other side did withstand it, to acquite vs from time to time with continuall forgiuenesse of sinnes. Wherefore this standeth alway certaine which we said at the beginning, that if we be weighed by our owne worthinesse, whatsoeuer we purpose or goe about, yet we with all our trauailes and endeuours are worothy of death and destruction.

11 Vpon these two points we must strongly stand fast: that there was neuer any worke of a godly man, which if it were examined by the seuere iudgement of God, was not damnable. Againe, if there be any such shewe, (which is not possible for Man) yet being corrupted and defiled with the sinnes, wherewith it is certaine that the doer of it is loden, it looseth the grace. And this is the chiefe point of our disputation. For about the beginning of iustification there is no strife betweene vs and the sounder sort of schoolemen, but that a sinner being freely deliuered from damnation obtaineth righteousnesse, and that by the forgiuenesse of sinnes: sauing that they vnder the word of iustification comprehend the renewing wherewith we are newly formed by the spirit of God vnto the obedience of the law, and thus they describe the righteousnesse of a man regenerate, that man being once reconciled to God by the faith of Christ, is by good workes iudged righteous before God, and by their deseruing is accepted. But the Lord contrariwise pronounceth that he imputed to Abraham faith for righteousnesse, not at the time when he yet serued idols, but when he had alreadie many yeeres excelled in holinesse of life. Therefore Abraham had long worshipped God from a pure heart, and had performed the obedience of the law which may be performed of a mortall man, yet he hath righteousnesse reposed in faith. Whereupon we gather, according to the argument of Paul, that it was not of workes. Likewise when it is said in the Prophet: The righteous man shall liue by faith, it is not spoken of wicked and prophane men, whom the Lord iustifieth by conuerting them to the faith, but the speech is directed to the faithfull, and to them is promised life by faith. Paul also taketh away all doubt, when for confirming of that sentence, he taketh this verse of Dauid: Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiuen. But it is certaine, that Dauid speaketh not of the wicked, but of the faithfull, such as himselfe was: because he spake out of the feeling of his owne conscience. Therefore this blessednesse we must not haue once in our life, but hold it throughout all our life. Last of all he testifieth that the embassage concerning the free reconciliation with God is not published for one or two daies, but is perpetuall in the Church. Therefore the faithfull haue euen to the end of their life no other righteousnesse than that which is there set foorth. For Christ euerlastingly remaineth the Mediator to reconcile the father to vs, and the effectualnesse of his death is euerlasting: namely washing, satisfaction, expiation, finally perfect obedience, wherewithall our iniquities are couered. Neither doth Paul to the Ephesians say, that we haue the beginning of saluation out of grace, but that we are saued by grace, not of workes, that no man should glorie.

12 The ſtarting holes which the Schoolemen doe here ſeeke to eſcape by, doe not deliuer them. They ſay that good works are not by inward worthineſſe in themſelues of ſo great value, that they be ſufficient to purchaſe righteouſneſſe, but this, that they be of ſo great value, is of grace accepting them. Then, becauſe they be driuen to confeſſe that the righteouſneſſe of works is in this life alway vnperfect, they grant that we, ſo long as we liue, doe neede forgiueneſſe of ſinnes, whereby the want of workes may be ſupplied: but that the defaults which are committed, are recompenced with works of ſupererogation. For I anſwer, that the accepting grace as they call it, is none other than is free goodneſſe wherewith the Father embraceth vs in Chriſt, when he clotheth vs with the innocencie of Chriſt, and accounteth the ſame ours, that by the beneficiall meane therof he may take vs for holy, pure, and innocent. For, the righteouſneſſe of Chriſt (which as it onely is perfect, ſo onely can abide the ſight of God) muſt be ſet in our ſteede, and be preſented at the barre as a ſuretie. Herewith we being furniſhed, doe obtaine continuall forgiueneſſe of ſinnes in Faith. With the pureneſſe hereof our filthineſſes and vncleanneſſes of imperfections being couered are not imputed: but are hidden, as if they were buried, that they may not come into the iudgement of God, vntill the hower come, when the olde man being ſlaine and vtterly deſtroyed in vs, the goodneſſe of God ſhall receiue vs into bleſſed peace with the new Adam, where let vs looke for the day of the Lord in which in receiuing vncorrupt bodies, we ſhall be remooued into the glory of the heauenly kingdome.

The ſhifts of ſchoolemen in maintaining the righteouſnes of good works.

13 If theſe things be true, verily no works of ours can of themſelues make vs acceptable and pleaſing to God: neither can the workes themſelues pleaſe, but in reſpect that man being couered with the righteouſneſſe of Chriſt, pleaſeth God, and obtaineth forgiueneſſe of his ſinnes. For God hath not promiſed the reward of eternall life to ſome certaine works, but only pronounceth that he which doth theſe things ſhall liue: ſetting the notable curſe againſt all them that continue not in all things. Whereby the deuiſe of righteouſneſſe in part is largely confuted, ſith no other righteouſneſſe is admitted into heauen, but a whole obſeruing of the law. And no whit ſounder is that which they are wont to babble of ſupplying of recompence by works of Supererogation. For why? Doe they not ſtill returne to the ſame place from whence they are alreadie ſhut out: that he which keepeth the law in part, is by works ſo farre righteous? That which no man of ſound iudgement will graunt them, they doe too ſhameleſſy take for confeſſed. So oft the Lord teſtifieth that he acknowledgeth no righteouſneſſe of workes, but in the perfect obſeruing of his law. What obſtinacie is it, that we when we are deſtitute of that obſeruing, leaſt we ſhould ſeeme ſpoyled of all glorie, that is, to haue altogether giuen place to God, doe boaſt our ſelues of I wot not what ſmall peeces of a few works, & goe about by ſatisfactions to redeeme that which wanteth. Satisfactions haue already before beene ſufficiently ouerthrowen, that we ought not now ſo much as to dreame of them. Onely this I ſay, that they which ſo play the fooles, do not wey how deteſtable a thing ſin is before God: for truly they ſhould vnderſtand that the whole righteouſneſſe of men being laid vpon a heape, is not ſufficient to make recompence for one ſinne. For we ſee that man was by one offence ſo caſt away and abandoned of God, that he therewithall loſt all meane to recouer ſaluation. Therefore the power of ſatisfaction is taken away, wherewith they flatter themſelues, but ſurely ſhall neuer ſatisfie God, to whom nothing is pleaſant or acceptable that proceedeth from his enemies. And his enemies are all they to whom he purpoſeth to impute ſinnes. Therefore our ſinnes muſt be couered and forgiuen, before that the Lord haue reſpect to any worke of ours. Whereupon followeth that the forgiueneſſe of ſins is of free grace which they doe wickedly blaſpheme that truſt in any ſatisfactions. Let vs therefore, after the example of the Apoſtle, forgetting thoſe things that are behinde vs, and haſtning forward to thoſe things that are before vs, runne in our race, endeuouring to the price of the high calling.

The imperfection of our works is not either by works of Supererogation or ſatisfaction ſupplied.

14 But how doth the boaſting of the works of ſupererogation agree with that rule which is taught vs, that when we haue done all things that are cõmanded vs, we ſhould ſay that we are vnprofitable ſeruants, and that we haue done no more than we ought? To ſay before God, is not to faine or to lie, but to determine with thy ſelfe, that which thou art assured of. The Lord therefore commaunded vs vnfainedly to thinke and consider with our selues, that we doe not any free beneficiall doings to him, but to render due seruice. And worthily. For we are seruants indebted in so many seruices, as we are not able to discharge, although all our thoughts and all our members, were turned into dutifull deedes of the law. And therefore that which he saith, When ye haue done all things that are commaunded you, &c. is as much in effect, as if the righteousnesse of one man were more than all the righteousnesse of men. How therefore may we (of whom there is none that is not most farre distant from this marke) be so bold as to boast that we haue added a heape to the full measure? Neither is there any cause why any man may take exception and say, that nothing withstandeth but that his endeuour may proceede beyonde necessarie duties, which in some behalfe ceaseth those that be from necessarie. For this we must altogether hold, that we can imagine nothing that auaileth either to the worship or the loue of God, which is not comprehended vnder the law of God. If it be a part of the law, let vs not boast of voluntary liberality, where we are bound to necessitie.

Luk. 17. 10.

Vnto God we can doe no more than we owe: if we doe that which he requireth not, it is such as we cannot looke that euer he will reward.

15 And for this purpose that glorying of Paul is out of season alleadged. That among the Corinthians he did of his owne will yeeld of his right, which otherwise he might haue vsed if he had would, & that he hath emploied vpon thē not only so much as he ought of dutie, but also hath giuen them his free trauell beyonde the bounds of duties. But they should haue marked the reason there expressed, that he did this least he should be an offence to the weake. For false and deceitfull workemen did boast themselues with this alluring shew of liberalitie, whereby they might both procure fauour to their poisonous doctrines, and raise vp hatred to the Gospell, so that Paul was driuen of necessitie either to bring the doctrine of Christ into danger, or to meete with such crafties. Go to: if it be to a Christian man an indifferent thing, to run into offence, when he may refraine it, than I graunt that the Apostle did something of supererogation for the Lord. But if this were by right required of a wise distributer of the Gospell, then I say that he did that which was his dutie to doe. Finally, although there appeare no such cause, yet this saying of Chrysostome is alway true, that all our things are in the same case wherein are the proper possessions of bondmen, which it is certaine by the law to be due to their Lord. And Christ hath vttered the same in the parable. For he asked what thanke we will giue to a bond seruant when hauing been all the day trauailed with sundry labours he returneth home to vs in the euening. But it is possible, that he hath laboured with greater diligence than we durst haue required. Be it so: yet he hath done nothing but that which by his state of bondage he ought, for he with his whole abilitie is ours. I speake not of what sort their Supererogations are which these men will boast of to God: for they be trifles, such as he neither hath at any time commanded, nor doth approoue them, nor will allow them when account shall be made before him. In this signification onely we will graunt that they are works of Supererogation, namely of which it is spoken in the Prophet: who hath required these things at your hands: But let them remember what is in another place spoken of these things: Wherefore doe yee wey your siluer and not in bread? Yee spend your labour and not in being satisfied. It is indeed not verie hard for these idle Rabbines to dispute vnder the shadow in a soft chaire: but when the soueraigne iudge shall sit in his iudgement seat, such windie decrees shall of necessitie vanish away. This, was to be sought what assiance of defence we may bring to his iudgement seat, not what we may talke of in schooles and corners.

Luk.17.7.

Psal.1 12.
Psal.55.2.

We must beware of trusting vnto, and of glorying in our workes.

16 In this behalfe there are chiefly two pestilences to be driuen out of our mindes: that we put no assiance in the righteousnesse of works. And that we ascribe no part of glorie to them. The Scriptures doe euery where thrust vs from all maner of assiance, when they teach that our righteousnesses do stinke in the sight of God, vnlesse they receiue a good sauour from the innocencie of Christ, and that they can doe nothing but prouoke the vengeance of God, vnlesse they be susteined by the tendernes of his mercy. Moreouer they so leaue nothing to vs, but that we should craue the mercy of our iudge with that confession of Dauid, that none shall be iustified before him, if he require account of his seruants. But where Iob saith: If I haue done wickedly, woe to me:

but

but if I doe righteously, yet I will not so lift vp my head: though he meane of that most high righteousnesse of God, whereunto the very Angels answer not: yet he therewithall sheweth that when they come to the iudgement of God, there remaineth nothing for all mortall men, but to hold their peace as dumbe. For it tendeth not only to this purpose that he had rather willingly yeeld than dangerously striue with the rigorousnes of God: but he meaneth that he felt no other righteousnesse in himselfe, than such as at the first moment should fall before the sight of God. When affiance is driuen away, all glorying must also necessarily depart. For who can giue the praise of righteousnes to these works, the affiance wherof trembleth before the sight of God? We must therefore come whither Esay calleth vs, that all the seede of Israel may be praised and glory in God: because it is most true which he saith in another place, that we are the planting of the glory of God. Our minde therefore shall then rightly be purged, when it shall neither in any behalfe rest vpon the confidence of works, nor reioyce in the glory of them. But this errour encouraged foolish men to the puffing vp of this false and lying affiance, that they alway set the cause of their saluation in works.

Esay 46.10. Esay 61.3.

17 But if we looke to the foure kindes of causes, which the Philosophers teach vs to consider in the effect of things, we shall finde that none of them doth accord with workes in the stablishing of our saluation. For the Scripture doth euery where report that the cause of procuring the eternall life to vs, is the mercie of the heauenly Father and his free loue toward vs: that materiall cause is Christ with his obedience, by which he purchased righteousnesse for vs. What also shall we say to be the formall or instrumentall cause but faith? And these three causes Iohn comprehendeth together in one sentence, when he saith. God so loued the world, that he gaue his onely begotten son, that euery one which beleeueth in him may not perish, but may haue euerlasting life. Now the finall cause the Apostle testifieth to bee both the shewing of the righteousnesse of God and the praise of his goodnesse: where hee rehearseth also the other three in expresse wordes. For he saith thus to the Romanes: all haue sinned and doe neede the glorie of God: but they are iustified freely by his grace. Heere thou hast the head and first fountaine, namely that God embraced vs with his free mercie. Then followeth: by the redemption which is in Christ Iesu. Heere thou hast as it were the matter whereof righteousnesse is made for vs through faith in his bloud. Heere is shewed the instrumentall cause, whereby the righteousnesse of Christ is applied to vs. Last of all he ioyneth the end, when he saith, vnto the shewing of his righteousnesse that he may be righteous and the righteous-maker of him that is of the faith of Christ. And (to touch by the way that this righteousnesse standeth of reconciliation) he setteth expressly by name, that Christ was giuen to vs for reconciliation. So in the first chapter also to the Ephesians he teacheth that we are receiued of God into fauour by meere mercie: that the same is wrought, by the intercession of Christ: receiued by faith: all to this end, that the glorie of the goodnesse of God may fully shine. When we see that all the parts of our saluation are so without vs, what cause is there that we should now either haue affiance or glorie in workes? Neither can euen the most sworne enemies of the grace of God moone any controuersie with vs about the efficient or finall cause, vnlesse they will denie the whole Scripture. In the Materiall and formall cause they cast a false colour, as though our works haue a halfe place with faith and the righteousnesse of Christ. But this also they teach, the Scripture crying out against them, which simply affirmeth both that Christ is to vs for righteousnesse and life, and that this benefit of righteousnesse is possessed by onely faith.

Workes no way the cause of saluation.

Iohn 3.16.

Rom.3.23.

18 But whereas the holy men doe oftentimes strengthen and comfort themselues with remembrance of their owne innocencie and vprightnesse, and sometime also forbeare not to report of it with praise, that is done two waies: either that in comparing their good cause with the euill cause of the wicked, they conceiue thereby assured trust of victorie, not so much for commending of their owne righteousnesse, as for the iust and deserued condemning of their aduersaries: or that euen without comparison other, while they record themselues before God, the pureness of their owne conscience bringeth to them both some comfort and affiance. Of the first of these two waies, we shall see hereafter: Now let vs briefely, declare of the latter, how it agreeth with that which we haue abouesaid, that in the iudgement of God we must rest vpon no affiance of workes, and glorie vpon no opinion of them. This is the agreement that the holy ones, when it concerneth the founding and stablishing of their saluation, doe without respect of workes bend their eies to the onely goodnesse of God. And they doe not only bend themselues to it afore all things as to the beginning of blessednesse, but doe rest therein as in the fulfilling of it. A conscience so founded, raised and stablished, is also stablished with consideration of workes: namely so far as they are the witnessings of God dwelling and raigning in vs. Sith therefore this affiance of works hath no place, vnlesse thou haue first cast the whole affiance of thy minde vpon the mercie of God: it ought not to seeme contrarie to that whereupon it hangeth. Wherefore when we exclude the affiance of workes, we meane onely this that a Christian minde may not bow to the merit of works as to the succour of saluation, but should throughly rest in the free promise of righteousnesse. But we forbid it not to vnderprop and strengthen this faith with the signes of the good will of God toward it selfe. For if all the good gifts which God hath bestowed vpon vs, when they be recorded in remembrance, are to vs after a certaine maner as it were beames of the face of God, by which we are enlightned to behold that soueraigne light of goodnesse: much more is the grace of good workes, which sheweth that the Spirit of adoption is giuen vs.

The comfort which righteous men doe conceiue by the conscience of their integritie is grounded vpon the knowledge of righteousnesse without respect of works. Pro 14.26. Gen.24.40. 2.King.20.3.

19 When therefore the holy ones doe by innocencie of conscience confirme their Faith, and gather matter of reioycing, they doe nothing but call to minde by the fruit of their calling, that they are adopted of the Lord into the place of children. This therefore that is taught by Salomon, that in the feare of the Lord is stedfast assuredness: and this that sometime the holy ones vse this protestation, to the intent that they may be heard of the Lord, that they haue walked before his face in vprightnesse and simplicitie: haue no place in laying the foundation of stablishing of conscience: but are then onely of value, if they be taken of the ensuing effect: because both that feare is no where which may stablish a full assuredness, and the holy ones are priuie in their conscience of such an vprightnesse, wherewith are yet mingled many remnants of the flesh. But forasmuch as of the fruites of regeneration they gather an argument of the holy Ghost dwelling in them, they doe thereby not slenderly strengthen themselues to looke for the helpe of God in all their necessities, when they by experience finde him their Father in so great a matter. And euen this also they cannot doe, vnlesse they haue first conceiued the goodnesse of God, sealed with no other assuredness, than of the promise. For if they begin to wey it by good works, nothing shall be more vncertaine nor more weake: forasmuch as if workes be considered by themselues, they shall no lesse by their imperfection shew proofe of the wrath of God, than they do with howsoeuer imperfect pureness testifie his good will. Finally they doe so set out the benefits of God, that yet they turne not away from the free fauour of God, in which Paul testifieth that there is the length, breadth, depth, and height of them: as if he should say: Whether soeuer the senses of the godly doe turne themselues, how high soeuer they climbe, how far and wide soeuer they extend them, yet they ought not to goe out of the loue of Christ, but hold themselues wholy in the meditation thereof, because it comprehendeth all kinde of measures in it. And therefore he saith that it excelleth and surmounteth aboue all knowledge: and that when we acknowledge how much Christ hath loued vs, we are fulfilled into all the fulnesse of God. As in another place, when he glorieth that all the godly are vanquishers in battell, he by and by addeth a reason, because of him that loued vs.

Eph.3.18.

Rom.8.37.

If we doe good it is Gods doing and not ours, & with the good which is his, there is much euill of ours mingled.

20 We see now that there is not in the holy ones that affiance of workes, which either giueth any thing to the merit of thē (forasmuch as they regard them none otherwise than as the gifts of God, whereby they reknowledge his goodnesse, none otherwise than as signes of their calling, whereby they may thinke vpon their election) or which withdraweth not any thing from the free righteousnesse which we obtaine in Christ, forasmuch as it hangeth vpon it, and standeth not without it. The same thing doth Augustine in few words, but very well set out where he writeth, I doe not say to the Lord, despise not the works of my hands, or I haue sought the Lord with my hands and haue not beene deceiued. But I doe not commend the works of my hands: for I feare feare, leaſt when thou haſt looked vpon them, thou ſhalt finde moe ſins than Mercies: onely this I ſay, this I aske, this I deſire, deſpiſe not the works of thy hands, behold in me thy worke, not mine. For if thou beholdeſt mine, thou damneſt me, if thou beholdeſt thine, thou croweſt me. For alſo whatſoeuer good workes I haue, they are of thee. He ſetteth two cauſes, why he dare not boaſt of his workes to God, becauſe if he haue any good works, he ſeeth therein nothing his owne: ſecondly, becauſe the ſame is alſo ouerwhelmed with multitude of ſinnes. Whereupon commeth to paſſe that the conſcience feeleth thereby more feare & diſmaying than aſſuredneſſe. Therefore he would haue God no otherwiſe to looke on his well doings, than that reknowledging in them the grace of his calling, he may make an end of the worke which he hath begun.

In what ſenſe the good which we doe, is termed a cauſe of that good which God doth vnto vs.

21 But furthermore whereas the Scripture ſheweth that the good workes of the faithfull, are cauſes why the Lord doth good to them, that is ſo to be vnderſtanded, that that which we haue before ſet may ſtand vnſhaken, that the effect of our ſaluation conſiſteth in the loue of God the Father: the matter, in the obedience of the Sonne: the inſtrument, in the enlightening of the holy Ghoſt, that is to ſay, in Faith: that the end is the glory of the ſo great kindneſſe of God. Theſe things withſtand not, but that the Lord may embrace workes as inferiour cauſes. But whence commeth that? Namely whom the Lord of his mercie hath appointed to the inheritance of eternall life, them with his ordinary diſpenſation he doth by good works bring into the poſſeſſion thereof. That which goeth before in order of diſpenſation, he calleth the cauſe of that which followeth. After this maner he ſometime deriueth eternall life from works: not for that it is to be aſcribed to them: but becauſe whom he hath choſen, them he doth iuſtifie, that he may at length glorifie them, he maketh the grace that goeth before which is a ſtep toward that which followeth, after a certaine maner the cauſe of it. But ſo oft as he hath occaſion to aſſigne the true cauſe, he biddeth vs not to flee to works, but holdeth vs in the onely thinking vpon the mercy of God. For what maner of thing is this which he teacheth by the Apoſtle: The reward of ſin is death: the grace of the Lord, is life euerlaſting? Why doth he not ſet righteouſnes in cõpariſon againſt ſin, as he ſetteth life againſt death? Why doth he not make righteouſnes the cauſe of life, as he maketh ſin the cauſe of death? For ſo ſhould the compariſon of contraries haue ſtand well togither, which is much broken by this turning. But the Apoſtle meant by this compariſon to expreſſe that which was truth, that death is due to the deſeruings of men: that life is repoſed in the onely mercy of God. Finally in theſe maners of ſpeaking is rather expreſſed the order than the cauſe: becauſe God in heaping graces vpon graces, taketh cauſe of the firſt to adde the ſecond, that he may leaue nothing vndone to the enriching of his ſeruants: and he ſo continually extendeth his liberalitie, that yet he would haue vs alway to looke vnto the free election which is the fountaine and beginning of it. For although he loueth the gifts which he daily giueth, in ſo much as they ſpring out of that fountaine: yet it is our part to hold faſt that free acceptation, which alone is able to vphold our ſoules: as for ſuch gifts of his Spirit as he afterward giueth vs, ſo to adioyne them to the firſt cauſe, that they miniſh nothing of it.

Rom. 8. 30.

Rom. 6. 23.

THE FIFTEENTH CHAPTER.

That thoſe things that are commonly boaſted concerning the merits of works, doe ouerthrow as well the praiſe of God in giuing of righteouſneſſe, as alſo the aſſuredneſſe of ſaluation.

Whether works though not iuſtifying may notwithſtanding merit.

NOw we haue declared that which is the chiefe point in this matter: that becauſe if righteouſneſſe be vpholden with workes, it muſt needs by and by fall downe before the ſight of God, it is contained in the onely mercie of God, the onely communicating of Chriſt, and therefore in onely faith. But, let vs diligently marke that this is the chiefe ſtay of the matter, leaſt we be entangled with that generall errour, not only of the common people, but alſo of learned men. For ſo ſoone as queſtion is mooued of the iuſtification of faith and workes, they flee to thoſe places which ſeeme to giue to workes ſome merite in the ſight of God: as though the iuſtification of works were fully wonne, if it be once prooued that they be of any value with God. But we haue aboue aboue plainely shewed that the righteousnesse of workes consisteth onely in the perfect keeping of the Law. Whereupon followeth that no man is iustified by works, but he that hauing climbed vp to the highest top of perfection cannot be prooued guiltie of any offence bee it neuer so little. Therefore it is another and a seuerall question: Howsoeuer works suffice not to iustifie a man, whether yet doe they not deserue fauour with God?

The name of Merit although vsed by the auncient Fathers without preiudice to the truth might nenertheles haue better beene spared.

2 First of the name of Merite I must needs say this afore hand, that whosoeuer first applied it to works of men compared to the iudgement of God, he did very ill prouide for the pureness of Faith. Truely I doe by my good will abstaine from striues about wordes, but I would wish that this sobriete had alway beene vsed among Christian writers, that they would not haue found in their hearts to vse words strange from the Scriptures, which ingendred much offence and no fruite. For whereto, I beseech you, was it needfull to haue the name of Merite brought in, when the price of good works might be fitly expressed by another name without offence? But how much offence that word containeth in it, is euident with the great hurt of the world. Surely as it is most proud it can doe nothing but darken the grace of God, and fill men with froward pride. The old writers of the Church, I graunt, haue commonly vsed it, and I would to God they had not with the abusing of one little word, giuen to posteritie matter of errour. Howbeit they themselues also doe in many places testifie, how in no case they meant to giue any preiudice against the trueth. For thus saith Augustine in one place. Let Merits of men heere hold their peace, which haue perished by Adam: and let the grace of God raigne, by Iesus Christ. Againe, the Saints giue nothing to their owne Merits: they will giue all to none but to thy mercy, O God. In another place. When man seeth that whatsoeuer good he hath, hee hath it not from himselfe, but from his God, hee seeth that all that which is praysed in him, is not of his owne merits, but of the mercy of God. You see how taking from men the power of doing well, hee also throweth downe the dignitie of merite. And Chrysostome saith, Our works, if there be any, which follow the free calling of God, are repaiment and debt: but the giftes of God are grace and bountifulnesse, and the greatnesse of liberall giuing. But leauing the name, let vs rather looke vpon the thing I haue verily before alleaged a sentence out of Bernard, As it sufficeth to merite, not to presume of merits: so to want merits, sufficeth to iudgement. But by adding foorth with an exposition, he sufficiently mitigateth the hardnesse of the word, where he saith: Therefore care thou to haue merits: when thou hast them, know that they are giuen hope for fruite, the mercy of God: and so thou hast escaped all danger, of pouertie, vnthankfulnesse, and presumption. Happy is the Church which neither wanteth merits without presumption, nor presumption without merits. And a little before he had largely shewed, how godly a meaning hee vsed. For of merits (saith he) why should the Church be carefull, which hath a stedfaster and surer cause to glory of the purpose of God? God cannot denie himselfe, he will do that which he hath promised. If there be no cause why thou shouldest aske, by what merits may we hope for good things? specially sith thou heares it said, Not for your sakes, but for my sake: it sufficeth to merite, to know that merits suffice not.

Eze. 36. 22.

3 What all our works deserue, the Scripture sheweth when it saith that they cannot abide the sight of God, because they are full of vncleanesse: then, what the perfect obseruing of the law (if any such could be found) shall deserue, when it teacheth that we should thinke our selues vnprofitable seruants, when we haue done all thinges that are commanded vs? because we shall haue giuen nothing freely to the Lord, but onely haue performed our due seruices, to which there is no thanke to be giuen. But those good works which he himselfe hath giuen vs, the Lord both calleth ours and testifieth that they are not onely acceptable to him, but also that they shall haue reward. It is our dutie againe for our part, to be encouraged with so great a promise, and to gather vp our hearts, that we be not wearied with well dooing. and to yeeld true thankfulnesse to so great bountifulnesse of God. It is vndoubted that it is the grace of God whatsoeuer there is in works that deserueth praise: that there is not one drop, which we ought properly to ascribe to our selues. This if we doe truely and earnestly acknowledge, there vanisheth away not only all affiance, but also opinion of merite. We (I say) doe doe not part the praise of good works (as the Sophisters doe) betweene God and man: but we reserue it whole, perfect, and vnminished to the Lord. Onely this we assigne to man, that euen the selfe-same workes that were good hee by his vncleannesse corrupteth and defileth. For nothing commeth out of man, how perfect soeuer he be, that is not defiled with some spot. Therefore, let the Lord call into iudgement euen these things that are best in the workes of men, he shall verily espie in them his own righteousnesse, but mans dishonestie and shame. Good workes therefore do please God and are not vnprofitable to the doers of them, but rather they receiue for reward the most large benefits of God: not because they so deserue, but because the goodnesse of God hath of it selfe appointed this price vnto them. But what spitefulnesse is this, that men not contented with that liberalitie of God, which giueth vndue rewards to workes that deserue no such thing, doe with ambition full of sacriledge endeuour further, that that which is wholly of the liberalitie of God, may seeme to be rendred to the merits of men. Heere I appeale to the common iudgement of euery man. If any man that hath a taking of profit in a piece of ground by another mans liberall graunt, doe also claime to himselfe the title of proprietie: doth he not by such vnthankfulnesse deserue to loose the very selfe possession which he had? Likewise, if a bond-slaue being made free of his Lord, doe hide the baseneſse of the estate of a Libertine, and boast himselfe to be a free-man borne: is he not woorthie to be brought backe into his former bondage? For this is the right vse of enioying a benefit, if wee neither claime to our selues more than is giuen, nor doe defraud the author of the benefit of his praise: but rather doe so behaue our selues, that that which he hath giuen from him selfe to vs, may seeme after a certaine maner to remaine with him. If this moderation be to bee kept toward men, let all men looke and consider what maner of moderation is due to God.

Libertine is he that is free by manumission, not by birth.

4 I know that the Sophisters doe abuse certaine places, to proue thereby that name of Merite toward God is found in the Scriptures. They alleage a sentence out of Ecclesiasticus, Mercy shall make place to euerie man, according to the Merite of his works. And out of the Epistle to the Hebrues, Forget not doing good and communicating, for with such sacrifices men merite of God. As for my might in resisting the authoritie of Ecclesiasticus, I do now release it. Yet I deny that they faithfully alleage that which Ecclesiasticus, whatsoeuer writer yee were, hath written. For the Greeke copie is thus: πᾶσα ἐλεημοσύνη ποιήσει τόπον, ἕκαστος γὰρ κατὰ τὰ ἔργα αὐτοῦ ἀφίσει. He shall make place to euery mercy, and euery man shall finde according to his works. And that this is the true text, which is corrupted in the Latine translation, appeareth both by the framing of these words, and by a longer ioyning together of the sentence going before. In the Epistle to the Hebrues, there is no cause why they should snare vs in one little word, when in the Greeke words of the Apostle is nothing else but that such sacrifices doe please and are acceptable to God. This alone ought largely to suffice to subdue and beate downe the outragiousnesse of our pride, that wee faine not any woorthinesse to works beyond the rule of Scripture. Now the doctrine of the Scripture is, that all our good works are continually besprinkeled with many filthie spots, wherwith God may be worthily offended and be angry with vs: so farre is it off, that they be able to win him to vs, or to prouoke his liberalitie toward vs: Yet because hee of his tender kindnesse doth not examine them by extremitie of law, he taketh them as if they were most pure, and therefore though without merite, he rewardeth them with infinite benefits both of this present life and of the life to come. For I do not allow the distinction set by men otherwise learned and godly: that good works deserue the graces that are giuen vs in this life, and that eternall life is the reward of Faith alone. For the Lord doth commonly alway set in heauen the reward of labours and the crowne of battel. Againe, to giue it so to the merite of works, that it be taken away from grace, that the Lord heapeth vs with graces vpon graces, is against the doctrine of the Scripture. For though Christ saith that to him that hath, shall be giuen, and that the faithfull and good seruant which hath shewed himselfe faithfull in few things, shall be set ouer many: yet he also sheweth in another place, that the encreases of the faithfull are the gifts of his free goodnesse. All yee that thirst (saith he) come to the waters; and yee that haue not money, come and buie milke and honie without mony and without any exchange. Whatsoeuer

Testimonies abused for proofe of Merites: whereas the doctrine of Scripture doth indeed teach the cleane contrary, that our good works deserue nothing at the hands of God, either in this life or in the life to come.

soeuer therefore is now giuen to the faithfull for helpe of saluation, yea and blessednesse it selfe, is the meere liberalitie of God: yet both in this and in those he testifieth that he hath consideration of workes: because to testifie the greatnesse of his loue toward vs, he vouchsafeth to graunt such honour not onely to vs, but also to the giftes which he hath giuen vs.

Christ is such a foundation that being builded vpon him we cannot rest any thing vpon the worthinesse of our owne works. 1.Cor.3.11.

5 If these things had in the ages past beene handled and disposed in such order as they ought to haue beene, there had neuer risen so many troubles and dissensions. Paul saith, that in the building of Christian doctrine, we must keepe still that foundation which he had laid among the Corinthians, beside which no other can be laide: and that the same foundation is Iesus Christ. What maner of foundation haue we in Christ? is it that he was to vs the beginning of saluation: that the fulfilling thereof should follow of our selues? and hath he but onely opened the way, by which we should goe forward of our owne strength? Not so: but, as he said a litle before, when we acknowledge him, he is to vs righteousnesse. No man therefore is well founded in Christ, but he that hath full righteousnesse in him: forasmuch as the Apostle saith not that he was sent to helpe vs to obtaine righteousnesse, but that he himselfe might be our righteousnesse. Namely, that we are chosen in him from eternitie before the making of the world, by no deseruing of ours, but according to the purpose of the good pleasure of God: that by his death we are redeemed from the damnation of death, and deliuered from destruction: that in him we are adopted of the heauenly father into children & heires: that by his bloud we are reconciled to the Father: that being giuen to him to be kept we are deliuered from perill of perishing and of being lost: that being so engraffed in him, we are alreadie after a certaine maner partakers of eternall life, being entred into the kingdome of God by hope: and yet more: that hauing obtained such partaking of him, howsoeuer we be yet fooles in our selues, he is wisedome for vs before God: howsoeuer we be sinners, he is righteousnesse for vs: howsoeuer we be vncleane, he is cleannesse for vs: howsoeuer we be weake, howsoeuer vnarmed and lying open in danger of Sathan, yet ours is the power which is giuen him in heauen and earth, whereby he may tread downe Sathan for vs, and breake the gates of hels: howsoeuer we still carrie about with vs the body of death, yet he is life for vs: briefly that all his things are ours, and we in him haue all things, in our selues nothing. Vpon this foundation, I say, it behooueth that we builded, if we will encrease into a holy temple to the Lord.

Being without Christ we can do no worke that pleaseth God: being in him we are not endued onely with an abilitie of meriting saluation for our selues, but possest with that righteousnesse and life which Christ hath merited for vs. 1 Iohn 5.12. 6 But the world hath a long time beene otherwise taught. For there hath beene found out I wot not what morall good works, by which men may be made acceptable to God before that they be graffed in Christ. As though the Scripture lieth, when it saith, that they are all in death which haue not possessed the sonne. If they be in death, how should they bring foorth matter of life? As though it were of no more force, that whatsoeuer is done without faith, is sinne: as though there may be good fruits of an euill tree. But what haue these most pestilent Sophisters left to Christ wherein he may shew foorth his power? They say that he hath deserued for vs the first grace, namely the occasion of deseruing: that it is now our part not to faile the occasion offered. O desperate shamelesnesse of vngodlinesse. Who would haue thought that men professing the name of Christ, durst so strip him naked of his power, and in a maner tread him vnder foote? This testimonie is each where spoken of him, that all they are iustified that beleeue in him: these fellowes teach, that there commeth from him no other benefit, but this, that the way is opened to euery man to iustifie himselfe. But I would to God they tasted what these sayings meane: that all they haue life that haue the Son of God: that whosoeuer beleeueth, is already passed from death into life, that we are iustified by his grace, that we might be made heires of eternall life: that the faithfull haue Christ abiding in them, by whom they cleaue fast to God: that they which are partakers of his life, doe sit with him in heauenly places: that they are transplanted into the kingdome of God, and haue obteined saluation and innumerable other such. For they doe not declare, that there commeth by the faith of Christ nothing but the power to obteine righteousnesse or saluation, but that they are both giuen to vs. Therefore so soone as thou art by faith engraffed into Christ, thou art already made the son of God, the heire of heauen, partaker of righteousnesse, possessor of life, and (that their lies may may be better confuted) thou haſt not obtained the fit abilitie to deſerue, but euen all the deſeruings of Chriſt: for they are communicated to thee.

7 So the Sorbonicall ſchooles, the mothers of all errours, haue taken from vs the iuſtification of faith which is the ſumme of all godlineſſe. They grant verily in word, that man is iuſtified by formed faith: but this they afterward expound, becauſe good works haue of faith this that they auaile to righteouſneſſe: that they ſeeme in a maner to name faith in mockage, ſith without great enuiouſneſſe it could not be paſſed ouer in ſilence, ſeeing it is ſo oft repeated of the Scripture. And not yet contented, they do in the praiſe of good works priuily ſteale from God ſomewhat to giue away to man. Becauſe they ſee that good works little auaile to aduance man, and that they cannot bee properly called Merits, if they be accounted the fruits of the grace of God: they picke them out of the ſtrength of free will, oile forſooth out of a ſtone. And they denie not in deed that the principall cauſe of them is in grace: but they affirme that therby is not excluded free will, by which is all merite. And this not onely the latter Sophiſters do teach, but alſo their Pythagoras, Lombard: whom if you compare with theſe men, you may ſay to be ſound witted and ſober. It was truely a point of maruellous blindeneſſe, that when they had Auguſtine ſo oft in their mouth, they ſaw not with how great carefulneſſe that man prouided that no peece of the glorie of good works were it neuer ſo little, ſhould be conueied to men. Heere before where he entreated of free will, wee recited certaine teſtimonies of his to this purpoſe, of which ſort there are oftentimes found many like in his writings, as when hee forbiddeth vs that wee ſhould no where boaſt of our merites, becauſe euen they alſo are the gifts of God: And when he writeth that all our merite is onely of grace, that it is not gotten by our ſufficiencie, but is all made by grace, &c. It is no maruell that Lombard was blinde at the light of the Scripture, in which it appeareth that he was not ſo well practiſed. Yet nothing could be deſired more plain againſt him and his diſciples, than this word of the Apoſtle. For when he forbiddeth Chriſtians all glorying, hee adioyneth a reaſon why it is not lawfull to glory: becauſe we are that handworke of God, created to all good workes, that we ſhould walke in them. Sith therefore there commeth out of vs no good thing, but in ſo much as we be regenerate: and our regeneration is wholie of God without exception: there is no right why we ſhould claime to our ſelues one ounce in good works. Finally whereas they continually call vpon good workes, in the meane time they ſo inſtruct conſciences, that they neuer dare haue affiance, that they haue God well pleaſed and fauourable to their works. But contrariwiſe we, without making mention of any Merite, doe yet by our doctrine raiſe vp the courages of the faithfull with ſingular comfort, when we teach them that in their works they pleaſe God, and are vndoubtedly accepted vnto him. Yea and alſo heere we require that to man attempt or goe about any worke without faith, that is to ſaie, vnleſſe we doe firſt with aſſured confidence of minde determine that he ſhall pleaſe God.

The ſchoolemen though for faſhion ſake granting righteouſneſſe by faith in ſome ſort, neuertheleſſe to eſtabliſh merits doe aſcribe vnto mans free will, that whereby the grace and glory of God is much impaired, and mens conſciences bereaued of all aſſurance in the fauorable acceptance of God.

8 Wherefore let vs not ſuffer our ſelues to be led ſo much as one haire bredth away from this onely foundation: which being laid, wiſe builders doe afterward wel and orderly builde vpon it. For if there be need of doctrine and exhortation, they put men in minde, that the Sonne of God hath appeared to this end, that he might deſtroy the works of the diuell: that they ſhould not ſinne which are of God, that the time paſt is enough for the fulfilling of the deſires of the Gentiles: that the elect of God are veſſels of mercy choſen out vnto honour, which ought to be made cleane from all filthineſſe. But all is ſpoken at once, when it is ſhewed that Chriſt will haue ſuch diſciples, which forſaking themſelues, and taking vp their croſſe, doe follow him. Hee that hath forſaken himſelfe, hath cut off the roote of all euils, that he may no more ſeeke thoſe things that are his owne. He that hath taken vp his croſſe, hath framed himſelfe to all patience and mildeneſſe. But the example of Chriſt conteineth both theſe and all other duties of godlineſſe and holineſſe. He ſhewed himſelfe obedient to his father, euen to the death: he was wholly occupied in doing the works of God: he with his whole hart breathed out the glory of his father: he gaue his ſoule for his brethren: hee both did good and wiſhed good to his enemies. If there be neede of comfort, theſe will bring marueilous comfort, that we be in affliction, but we are not made carefull: that wee labour

THE SIXTEENTH CHAPTER.

The doctrine of iustification by Christ without works falsely accused as a meane to make men slacke and careless to doe well.

WIth this one word may the shamelessnesse of certaine vngodly men be confuted, which slander vs with saying that we destroy good works, and doe draw men away from the following of them, when we say that they are not iustified by works: nor doe deserue saluation: and againe, that we make too easie a way to righteousnesse, when we teach that it lieth in the free forgiuenesse of sinnes, and that we doe by this enticement allure men to sinne, which are of their owne will too much enclined thereto alreadie. These slanders (I say) are with that one word sufficiently confuted: yet I will briefly answer to them both. They alleadge that by the iustification of faith, good workes are destroied. I leaue vnspoken, what maner of men bee these zealous louers of good workes which doe so backebite vs. Let them haue licence as freely to raile as they doe licentiously infect the whole world with the filthinesse of their life. They faine that they bee greeued, that when Faith is so gloriously aduaunced, workes are driuen downe out of their place. What if they bee more raised vp, and stablished? For neither doe we dreame of a faith void of good works, nor a iustification that is without them. This onely is the difference, that when wee confesse that faith and good workes doe necessarilie hang together, yet we set iustification in faith not in workes. For what reason wee doe so, we haue in readinesse easily to declare, if we doe but turne to Christ vnto whom our faith is directed, and from whom it receiueth her whole strength. Why therefore are we iustified by faith? because by faith we take hold of the righteousnesse of Christ, by which alone we are reconciled to God. But this thou canst not take holde of, but that thou must also therewithall take holde of sanctification. For hee was giuen to vs, for righteous-
1. Cor. 1. 30. nesse, wisedome, sanctification, and redemption. Therefore Christ iustifieth none whom he doth not also sanctifie. For these benefites are coupled together with a perpetuall and vnseperable knot, that whom he enlightneth with his wisedome, them he redeemeth: whom he redeemeth he iustifieth: whom he iustifieth he sanctifieth. But for as much as our question is onely of righteousnesse and sanctifying, let vs stay vpon these. We may put difference betweene them, yet Christ containeth them both vnseparably in himselfe. Wilt thou therefore obtaine righteousnesse in Christ? Thou must first possesse Christ: and thou canst not possesse him, but that thou must be made partaker of his sanctification: because he cannot be torne in peeces. Sith therefore the Lord doth grant vs these benefites to be enioyed none otherwise than in giuing himselfe, he giueth them both together, the one neuer without the other. So appeereth how true it is, that we are iustified not without works, and yet not by works: because in the partaking of Christ, whereby we are iustified, is no lesse contained sanctification than righteousnesse.
